

COMMENTARIES
ON THE
LAW OF SCOTLAND.

PRINTED BY MURRAY AND GIBB,

FOR

T. & T. CLARK, LAW PUBLISHERS, EDINBURGH.

LONDON,	STEVENS AND SONS.
„	STEVENS AND HAYNES.
„	SIMPKIN AND CO.
DUBLIN,	HODGES, SMITH, AND CO.
GLASGOW,	SMITH AND SONS.
NEW YORK,	C. SCRIBNER AND CO.

COMMENTARIES

ON THE

LAW OF SCOTLAND,

AND ON

THE PRINCIPLES OF MERCANTILE JURISPRUDENCE.

BY

GEORGE JOSEPH BELL, ESQ., ADVOCATE,

PROFESSOR OF THE LAW OF SCOTLAND IN THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

SEVENTH EDITION,

BEING A RE-PUBLICATION OF THE FIFTH EDITION

WITH ADDITIONAL NOTES,

ADAPTING THE WORK TO THE PRESENT STATE OF THE LAW, AND COMPRISING ABSTRACTS OF THE MORE RECENT ENGLISH AUTHORITIES ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE LAW OF SCOTLAND.

BY

JOHN M'LAREN, ESQ., ADVOCATE,

SHERIFF OF CHANCERY.

VOLUME I.

T. & T. CLARK, 38, GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

MDCCCLXX.

PREFACE.

IN preparing this edition, the Editor, in compliance with what he believes to be the general wish of the Profession, has re-published the text and notes of Professor Bell without alteration, and has added notes adapting the work to the present state of the law. He deems it right to state, however, that in revising the second volume he has entirely omitted the author's chapter on the now repealed Bankruptcy Acts of King George the Third, and has substituted for it Mr. Shaw's chapter on the Bankruptcy Acts of the present reign, which embraces Professor Bell's observations in so far as applicable to the present state of the law. Considerations of utility imperatively demanded this sacrifice of a portion of the original text; and in making it, the Editor believes he has in no degree deviated from the spirit of the plan of publication announced in the title-page of the work.

The Editor is aware that some members of the Profession, whose opinions are entitled to the greatest respect, would prefer to have the Commentaries entirely re-cast, according to the method of which Mr. Sergeant Stephen's Blackstone is a successful example. But he believes that, although the Commentaries of Professor Bell must eventually give place to more matured expositions founded on their basis, the Profession is not sufficiently prepared, nor is the science of Mercantile Jurisprudence in Scotland sufficiently advanced, for this method of treatment. The editorial matter, although consisting to a large extent of statements of principle which might without impropriety have been transferred to the text, has therefore been thrown into the form of notes. In this shape the continuity of the new matter is of course very much broken; but, on the other hand, the reader has the advantage of being able to read the original text apart from the additions engrafted upon it.

The Editor desires to acknowledge assistance kindly rendered by professional friends. His thanks are due in an especial manner to Mr. J. A. Dixon of Glasgow, who kindly placed at his disposal a series of most instructive notes, the fruit of much private study and research, on the subjects of Sale, Guarantee, and Agency. The Editor has frankly availed himself of the permission thus accorded to him, and the examination which he has made of the sources of authority referred to in Mr. Dixon's contributions has fully satisfied him of their accuracy and value.

In preparing the work for the press, references to Morrison's Dictionary of Decisions have been substituted for the old references to the Folio Reports. The places of the original reports can always be found from the Reports in the Dictionary, and from Tait's Index.

5 RUTLAND SQUARE, EDINBURGH, September 1870.

PREFACE TO AUTHOR'S EDITIONS.

A LITTLE after the middle of the seventeenth century, the Law of Scotland was reduced to a regular system in the admirable Institutions of Lord Stair—a work so well digested in all its parts, so liberal in principle, so good in arrangement, so distinguished for sound judgment and excellent adaptation to the business and concerns of men, that it would seem almost beyond the age in which it was written, were it not in truth a digest of the judgments of the Court of Session reduced to order, according to the spirit and arrangement of the Roman jurisprudence.

A new Institute was published nearly a century afterwards—a posthumous work, prepared from the lectures of Mr. Erskine, who filled the chair of Scottish Law in the University of Edinburgh. In this work the actual state of the law at that time is exhibited with a conciseness and perspicuity surpassed only by Mr. Erskine's previous work on the Principles of the Law of Scotland.

A very remarkable change has since taken place in our national jurisprudence. In particular, the trade of Scotland has been extended, and with it the principles of Mercantile Law have grown up, and very rapidly advanced towards maturity. The Roman law, indeed, has furnished the great principles on which Mercantile Jurisprudence has in modern Europe been grounded, and in that learning the older Scottish lawyers were eminently skilled. But although the habits and the education of our lawyers prepared them for cultivating with advantage the principles of Mercantile Jurisprudence, it has happened, from particular circumstances, that, as a branch of law, this, till about half a century ago, has been comparatively neglected in Scotland.

Towards the end of the century before the last, there was some appearance of a growing attention to this department of law, proceeding partly from the influence of foreign example, chiefly, perhaps, from the circumstances of the country. In that part of their professional studies which depended on the Roman jurisprudence, our lawyers received or finished their education on the Continent. In France particularly, they were accustomed to pass some part of their youth, and to attend the sittings of the Parliament of Paris, after the model of which the Court of Session was formed. The French 'Plaidoyez' were their models in forensic eloquence; and Sir George M'Kenzie, in his inaugural oration on opening the Library of the Faculty of Advocates, seems to speak the fashionable language of his day when he glories in the 'Roman eloquence' of France and Scotland, compared with the dry and abstract arguments of the lawyers of other countries. About the middle of the seventeenth century, the attention of the lawyers of France was strongly called to the doctrines of Mercantile Jurisprudence; and, first, the Ordonnance of 1667; afterwards, that which was proposed and accomplished by Colbert in 1673; and, finally, the still more celebrated Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681, gave a splendour to Commercial Law which could not fail to make an impression upon the lawyers of Scotland. With this example, the advancing state of Scottish commerce co-operated in preparing the way for a growing attention to the subject. The spirit infused into the country by that bold speculator who projected the Bank of England, and who, after having first meditated the establishment of an Indian trade in Scotland, proposed afterwards the magnificent scheme of a settlement on the Isthmus of Darien, excited to an excessive height the commercial enterprise of his countrymen. The laws of commerce necessarily rose into notice; and we find, accordingly, that some attention was paid to Commercial Law in Lord Stair's time.

But this dawning of Mercantile Jurisprudence was soon overcast. The failure of the Darien Expedition, and of all the splendid and premature schemes which had been formed for the advancement of Scotland, effectually checked mercantile enterprise; and the Union with England gave to the spirit of the country a direction entirely new.

The Union was soon followed by two rebellions, which not only disturbed the tranquillity, and interrupted the natural advancement of industry, wealth, and commerce, but produced a similar effect on the progress of the law. The numerous forfeitures which followed the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 gave rise to a multitude of difficult questions of high interest relative to the connection of superior and vassal, the nature and efficacy of destinations in deeds of entail, and the force of real securities over land. All the learning of the Feudal Law came more immediately to be called into use, and the professional success, as well as the character of a lawyer, was estimated chiefly according to his skill in the law of heritable property. The jurisprudence of mercantile dealings, fitted for times of a different complexion, was almost entirely abandoned. In the work of Mr. Erskine, published after this era, there is very little to be found concerning Commercial Law; and the valuable learning concerning contracts, and the principles of Mercantile Jurisprudence in general, to be found in the Institutions of Lord Stair, shrinks in the Institute of Mr. Erskine into a very narrow compass.

After the agitation of the rebellions had ceased, and the confidence of the country in the continuance of public tranquillity began to be restored, there appeared something like a revival of the spirit of trade. The improvement of land and the encouragement of manufactures were promoted by the institution of a Board of Commissioners for the management of the forfeited estates which had been annexed to the Crown. Instructions were given that, in the administration of this trust, those Commissioners should be careful to hold out liberal encouragement to industry; and to the sound discretion with which this duty was exercised may in a great measure be ascribed the commencement of that agricultural improvement which soon sprung up in Scotland. A bank was instituted, the professed object of which was to aid the proprietors of land in their exertions; but the slow returns from such an employment of capital, with some other failures in the management, or rather in the conception, of the true nature and uses of a bank, led to the ruin of the establishment.

The country had been essentially benefited by the exertions which had been made, and not only agricultural improvement, but commercial enterprise were greatly promoted; but still there was little of the spirit of Mercantile Jurisprudence. The merchants were left to struggle with all the evils of our old law, little suited to the occasions of commercial intercourse; and a proposal, made by merchants, to introduce a system of Bankrupt Law similar to that of England met with the most determined opposition from our lawyers. The wide-spread ruin which followed on the fall of the Douglas Bank tended to allay this opposition, and to satisfy even lawyers that the old maxims and rules, and the forms of diligence of our ancient law, were in many respects ill adapted to commercial intercourse in the shock of extensive bankruptcies; and gradually the nation was reconciled to the passing of the first Bankrupt Law in the year 1772.

It is from that time only that the rise of the Mercantile Law of Scotland is to be dated, and that the attention of our lawyers and judges began to be directed judicially to commercial dealings.

It may naturally be imagined that the most obvious and best course would have been to adopt at once the Mercantile Law of England, which had already made great progress towards perfection. But there is some soul of good in things evil: national jealousy, and the repugnance which still prevailed to an acknowledgment of superiority on the part of England, prevented any premature attempt to assimilate the jurisprudence of the two countries, even in relation to those transactions in which there was a perpetual intercourse of trade between them.

When, in these circumstances, the present work was begun, now nearly thirty years ago, it was with hesitation and difficulty, and with much cautious disquisition, that I could venture to approach some of the doctrines of Mercantile Law; and it has been only in the course of five successive editions of the book that I have been able, on the one hand, to dismiss much reasoning that, by the authoritative recognition of the principle, had become unnecessary, and, on the other, gradually to extend my Commentaries to other questions as they rose into importance, or as room was left for their discussion by the abridgment of what had become familiar and established.

From what has been said concerning the history of Scottish jurisprudence, it may be inferred that, in searching for materials by which to illustrate the principles of Mercantile Law, much aid could not be derived from our own books. A considerable share of the attention of persons educated for the Bar in Scotland has necessarily at all times been directed, in the course of studying the civil law, to the great principles which regulate contracts; and there never has been occasion to discuss questions of this sort, on which the judges and lawyers of Scotland have been found deficient in the learning, or unskilled in the principles, which ought to rule such determinations. But unfortunately those learned and able arguments, so often delivered by the judges on questions of general jurisprudence and of Mercantile Law, had for a long time been known only to those who heard them delivered, or to others by an obscure tradition; and what might have enlightened the law, and done honour to the judicial establishment of Scotland, had been lost in the imperfect reports made of adjudged cases. In those reports, not only the decisions were not preserved in the language of the judges who pronounced them, but the very grounds on which they were made were kept out of view, and nothing preserved but a mere skeleton of the case, and of the arguments of counsel, accompanied with a transcript of the formal words of judgment.

In this dearth of materials afforded by the books of the Scottish law, it was natural, or necessary, to look abroad for aid—to the writings of foreign lawyers, and the decisions of foreign courts; and the occasion was such as to justify the use of such authorities.

The Law-merchant is universal. It is a part of the law of nations, grounded upon the principles of natural equity, as regulating the transactions of men who reside in different countries, and carry on the intercourse of nations, independently of the local customs and municipal laws of particular states. For the illustration of this law, the decisions of courts, and the writings of lawyers in different countries, are as the recorded evidence of the application of the general principle; not making the law, but handing it down; not to be quoted as precedents, or as authorities to be implicitly followed, but to be taken as guides towards the establishment of the pure principles of general jurisprudence.

This general Law-merchant is in England said to form part of the common law; and it is so much a part of that law, that it requires not to be proved by witnesses, like matter of foreign regulation, but is noticed judicially by the Court. The same precision in the laying down of this doctrine is not to be found in Scotland, because in our books little attention has been given to the subject, and the dicta of our judges have perished. But the same principle operates as in England; and our courts are daily in the habit of proceeding on this Law-merchant as fully authoritative in Scotland, and of allowing the decisions of courts and the writings of lawyers to be cited in illustration of it.

But, in mentioning foreign authorities and decisions as coming in aid of our own imperfect materials, it is necessary to distinguish in a particular manner those of England. Not only from the extent and variety of her commerce, but from the fortunate circumstances which marked the progress of this part of her jurisprudence, the English books afford valuable aid in cultivating the subject of Mercantile Law.

During the troubles which agitated and depressed this country, England was triumphantly proceeding in her great career of commercial prosperity; and the progress of her jurisprudence, which might naturally be expected to accompany that of her trade, was happily directed by the successive wisdom and learning of many great men. It has been objected to the judicial decisions of some of those judges, that they did not sufficiently study to form precedents for future cases. But there had gradually been accumulated a rich collection of materials, when Lord Mansfield, in the middle of the last century, was appointed Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. This eminent man, who has been called the father of the Commercial Law of England, devoted his splendid talents, during an uninterrupted period of thirty years, to the great duty of constructing, in a series of judicial determinations, a system of Mercantile Jurisprudence. The spirit with which he proceeded has thus been stated by one who enjoyed much of his confidence, the late Mr. Justice Buller:—‘Within thirty years the Commercial Law of this country has taken a very different turn from what it did before. Before that period, we find that in courts of law all the evidence in mercantile cases was thrown together; they were left generally to a jury, and they produced no established principle. From that time we all know the great study has been to find some certain general principles which shall be known to all mankind, not only to rule the particular case then under consideration, but to serve as a guide for the future. Most of us have heard these principles stated, reasoned upon, enlarged, and explained, till we have been lost in admiration at the strength and stretch of the human understanding.’

This design, so far most happily accomplished by Lord Mansfield, has been steadily kept in view by the judges who have succeeded him in the courts of England: Lord Kenyon, Lord Ellenborough, Lord Eldon, while he sat in a court of law, and during the long period of his presiding in the House of Lords. The arguments which have been delivered from the Bench, for nearly a century, by so many eminent men, are reported to us so faithfully, that we have before us as materials of study the whole of what has been laid down by the judges of England upon Mercantile Jurisprudence.

But in the use of those materials a task of great delicacy remained to be performed. England and Scotland were, by the Articles of Union, placed so entirely on the same footing in all the regulations respecting trade, that the system of Mercantile Jurisprudence in the two countries is truly to be considered as the same; and of late years the judgments of Westminster Hall and those of the Court of Session have in both countries been allowed to be quoted as the decisions of British courts upon the Mercantile Law of Great Britain. Still much caution is to be observed in the adopting of English judgments as authorities in Scotland; and I state this, the rather that I think there has appeared of late some danger lest the purity of this part of jurisprudence, and the integrity of our own system of law, should be impaired by too indiscriminate a use of English authorities. In a large proportion of cases which come into courts of justice, the relation, and consequent rights of parties, stand on such a footing that the Law-merchant and the municipal law or local custom are in a manner blended together, and it is difficult to discriminate on what precise ground the decision has proceeded amidst these elements of judgment. Even the peculiar forms of trial and science of pleading, as embodied in a decision, may often lead to mistake, and a judgment may appear to be given on a general principle of jurisprudence, which turns entirely on a point of form. There is evidently, therefore, great hazard in transferring the decisions pronounced upon cases of this description in one country to the practice of another system; and unless the separation be carefully made, rules of foreign municipal law may be incautiously imported, and an adulterate precedent adapted as authority in Mercantile Law, for the illustration of which we look into those cases. Of those dangers arising from the peculiarities of municipal law, the lawyers of England have been more fully aware than we are accustomed to be in this country. To avoid them was one great aim of Lord Mansfield in his determinations of mercantile cases; and every one who has conversed much with lawyers of the higher class in England must have seen the same wise caution distinguishing all their inquiries into the nature and foundations of legal doctrines, and the weight of authorities and decisions.

In observing this caution, and in attempting to extract from various and sometimes discordant materials the pure doctrines of the Law-merchant, while the task I had undertaken appeared to promise usefulness, it was also a task of great difficulty. Many of the English cases have by Lord Mansfield, and upon the model which he began, been decided with so much care in the determination of the principle, that they are as lights in this obscure path. Others contain so strong an infusion of common law intimately blended in the judgment, that without a careful comparison of them with the great principles of jurisprudence delivered in the Roman law, and recognised in the Scottish authorities, or commented on by foreign writers of credit, there was much hazard of impairing what it was my design to clear, and of substituting, in the place of mere obscurity, corrupted doctrine and mistaken principles. But I trusted that amidst the delicacies of the undertaking, and the chance of failure, some benefit might arise. While I did not profess to embrace the whole details, or deliver a digest of the Mercantile Law, but merely to investigate questions of this description which presented themselves, I was satisfied that what appeared to me so embarrassing after so much study, must to those whose researches were only occasional, and undertaken with a view to the discussion or decision of a particular question, present difficulties no less formidable, and that a free examination of the principles of Mercantile Law, as illustrated by the decisions and legal authorities of England as well as of Scotland, might contribute in some degree to the improvement of this great system in both countries. I ventured to expect that, if the design were properly executed, it might enable the lawyers of England to become better acquainted with our jurisprudence than hitherto they had found to be practicable. Some of that learned body I have been mortified to find ignorant on this subject, and in no degree aware of the admirable principles and comprehensive views by which the law of Scotland is distinguished. Others, again, whose opinions will finally prevail, have a very different sense of this matter. Lord Bacon long ago said: 'I have read, and read with delight, the Scottish Statutes, and some other collections of their laws;—with delight, I say, partly to see the brevity and propriety of speech, and partly to see them come so near our own laws.' And in the present day men of the first eminence in the law of England have expressed their high admiration and respect for the law of Scotland, and make no scruple to profess the care with which they are accustomed to examine into its doctrines in preparing to determine questions of general jurisprudence, or in deliberating on suggestions fit to be made to the Legislature for the improvement of the English law.

The hope of producing a work which might be of some use in opening a fuller communication between the laws of the two countries, in promoting a free examination of the difference between them, or in showing how completely they coincide in some points of importance to both, carried me through many difficulties. I am happy to say that I have succeeded in this great object beyond my most sanguine expectations; and that, with whatever imperfections this work may be chargeable, I have at least the comfort to think that it has been instrumental in introducing the lawyers of England and of Scotland to a more intimate knowledge of the contrasted excellences of their respective systems of jurisprudence.

But this book was not meant to be a commentary on Mercantile Law alone.

In every branch of the law there has been a very remarkable progress since Mr. Erskine's time. The necessity even for a new Institute has been strongly felt; and one of the schemes for improving the jurisprudence of Scotland, which the Bar has often contemplated, was that there should be drawn up, by the co-operation of men of talent and high authority, a modern digest or code of the law. At other times, we have cherished the hope as less visionary, that a very eminent person, peculiarly qualified for so great an undertaking, and in possession of invaluable materials for the purpose, might be induced to think that he should best discharge that debt which every man is said to owe to his profession, by the publication of an Institute. Had a work of such surpassing usefulness as the Bar were prepared to expect from that quarter made its appearance, the field of these commentaries would have been much narrowed. And although there might still have been some questions of heritable right and competition, on which a commentary might have been useful, as requiring an examination more in detail, a discussion somewhat less abstract than it is fit or possible to deliver in an institutionary work, I should have abstained from much of that discussion which in the want of any modern Institute I have thought necessary for completing my view of the laws which regulate the connection of debtor and creditor.

In the whole course of these extensive labours, I have accustomed myself to examine all the cases and authorities with the greatest freedom, but I hope with that respect and deference which become an individual. In questions of Mercantile Law, I have been actuated by a sincere desire to find the governing principle of universal jurisprudence, or to discriminate the peculiarities that may justify a determination in one part of the empire, which may not perhaps be entitled to prevail in another. I have been encouraged in my labours by the greatest authorities of my own time in both parts of the island; and I am proud to acknowledge the highest gratification that the author of such a performance can have bestowed upon him, in the recorded approbation of the Scottish Bar, and in the public notice with which both Scottish and English judges have from the bench been pleased to distinguish this work.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION—OBJECT AND PLAN OF THE WORK,	1

BOOK I.

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE LAW OF DEBTOR AND CREDITOR IN SCOTLAND.

CHAP. I. OF EXECUTION FOR DEBT, OR DILIGENCE REAL AND PERSONAL,	3
CHAP. II. OF THE EFFECT OF INSOLVENCY ON THE DILIGENCE OF INDIVIDUAL CREDITORS,	7
Principles of Bankrupt Law,	ib.
View of the English Bankrupt Law,	12
View of the Scottish Bankrupt Law,	13

BOOK II.

OF THE SEVERAL KINDS OF ESTATE WHICH MAY BE ATTACHED FOR DEBT.

PART I.

OF ESTATES IN LAND, AND CONNECTED WITH LAND.

CHAP. I. OF PROPERTY IN LAND AS RESPONSIBLE FOR DEBT,	19
SEC. 1. OF THE VASSAL'S ESTATE, OR DOMINIUM UTILE,	20
SEC. 2. OF THE ESTATE OF THE SUPERIOR, AS AFFECTED BY CONDITIONS IN THE FEUDAL GRANT,	21
SEC. 3. OF LIMITED ESTATES IN LAND, DEPENDING ON DECLARATIONS OF USES, OR ON RESERVATION OF BURDENS, OR OF FACULTIES,	29
ART. 1. Of the Settlement of Estates in TRUST,	30
ART. 2. Of Estates by RESERVED BURDEN,	39
ART. 3. Of FACULTIES or Powers to Burden Land with Debt,	ib.
VOL. I.	c

	PAGE
SEC. 4. LIMITED ESTATES IN LAND DEPENDING ON DEEDS OF ENTAIL—COMMENTARY ON THE ACT 1684, c. 22,	43
SEC. 5. LIMITED ESTATES OF LIFERENT AND FEE,	52
1. Of Conventional Liferents,	ib.
2. Of Legal Liferents—Terce—Courtesy,	56
SEC. 6. OF LIMITED ESTATES BY MEANS OF CONJUNCT RIGHTS,	61
CHAP. II. OF LEASEHOLD PROPERTY AS RESPONSIBLE FOR DEBT,	63
SEC. 1. EFFECT OF LEASE AGAINST PURCHASERS OF THE LAND, AGAINST CREDITORS, AND AGAINST HEIRS OF ENTAIL,	ib.
SUBSEC. 1. Completion of the Tenant's Right,	64
SUBSEC. 2. Duration of the Lease,	66
SUBSEC. 3. Of Rent,	68
SUBSEC. 4. Of Meliorations and Improvements,	70
SUBSEC. 5. Effect of Local Custom,	71
SEC. 2. OF THE TENANT'S ESTATE AS AVAILABLE TO CREDITORS OR ASSIGNEES,	ib.
CHAP. III. OF SUCCESSION IN HERITAGE AS AFFECTING THE INTERESTS OF CREDITORS,	79
SEC. 1. OF THE RIGHT TO ADJUDGE THE ANCESTOR'S ESTATE FOR DEBTS OF THE HEIR,	80
SEC. 2. OF THE RIGHT OF CREDITORS TO ADOPT THE HEIR'S CHALLENGE OF DEEDS ON DEATHBED—COMMENTARY ON THE LAW OF DEATHBED,	ib.
SUBSEC. 1. Legal Character of Deathbed,	82
1. Nature of the Disease,	ib.
2. Counter Presumptions, and Evidence of Liege Poustie , Commentary on the Act 1696, c. 4, Kirk or Market, Commentary on Act of Sederunt 1652,	83
3. Whether Equivalents are admissible to prove Liege Poustie ,	84
4. Refutation of the Presumption arising from Presence at Kirk or Market,	86
SUBSEC. 2. Deeds liable to Challenge on Deathbed,	87
1. Deeds directly Prejudicial to the Heir,	ib.
2. Deeds indirectly Prejudicial to the Heir,	ib.
SUBSEC. 3. Means taken for evading the Law of Deathbed,	89
SUBSEC. 4. Exercise by Creditors of the Right of Challenge,	90
1. Heirs entitled to Challenge,	92
2. Title of Creditors to prosecute in room of the Heir,	ib.
3. Exclusion of Creditors by the Heir's Approbation,	93
SEC. 3. OF THE RIGHT OF CREDITORS TO AVAIL THEMSELVES OF THE DEBTOR'S OTHER PRIVILEGES AS HEIR,	ib.
SUBSEC. 1. APPARENT HEIR'S Right to Possession of the Ancestor's Estate,	94
SUBSEC. 2. Of the Heir's Right to claim a Share of the Moveable Estate with or without COLLATION,	ib.
1. Right to collate the Succession,	95
2. Right of Heir to share the Moveables without Collation,	96
3. Mode of giving effect to the several Rights in Collation,	97
	98

PART II.

OF INCORPOREAL RIGHTS, NOT CONNECTED WITH LAND, CONSIDERED AS A FUND FOR THE PAYMENT OF DEBT.

	PAGE
CHAP. I. OF ORDINARY DEBTS,	100
CHAP. II. OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS, AND OTHER PUBLIC DEBTS,	100
SEC. 1. GOVERNMENT STOCK,	ib.
SEC. 2. BANK STOCK,	101
CHAP. III. OF RIGHTS UNDER POLICIES OF INSURANCE,	102
CHAP. IV. OF PATENT RIGHTS AND LITERARY PROPERTY,	103
SEC. 1. OF INVENTIONS SECURED BY PATENT,	104
SEC. 2. OF LITERARY PROPERTY,	111
1. Property in Unpublished Works,	ib.
2. Property in Published Works,	114
CHAP. V. OF HONOURS AND DIGNITIES,	120
CHAP. VI. OF OFFICES,	121
CHAP. VII. OF ALIMINARY OFFICES,	124
CHAP. VIII. FACULTIES OR RIGHTS OF RESTITUTION AVAILABLE TO CREDITORS,	127
SEC. 1. RESTITUTION AGAINST THE DEEDS OF PUPILS AND MINORS,	128
1. Deeds in Pupillarity,	ib.
2. Deeds in Minority,	129
3. Restitution on Lesion against Deeds in Minority,	130
SEC. 2. RESTITUTION AGAINST DEEDS BY PERSONS INSANE OR FATUOUS,	132
SEC. 3. RESTITUTION AGAINST THE DEEDS OF PERSONS INTERDICTED,	134
SEC. 4. RESTITUTION ON THE GROUND OF FACILITY, CIRCUMVENTION, AND LESION,	136
CHAP. IX. OF RIGHTS OF SUCCESSION IN MOVEABLES,	137
CONCLUSION OF PARTS I. AND II.—RATIFICATION OF EXCEPTIONABLE DEEDS,	ib.
SEC. 1. EXPRESS RATIFICATION OF EXCEPTIONABLE CONTRACTS, CONVEYANCES, OR SETTLEMENTS,	138
SEC. 2. IMPLIED ASSENT OR CONFIRMATION OF PREVIOUS DEEDS OR CONTRACTS,	139
1. Of Homologation,	ib.
2. Of the Doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate,	141

PART III.

OF PROPERTY IN MOVEABLES CORPOREAL.

CHAP. I. OF PROPERTY IN SHIPS,	146
SEC. 1. HISTORY AND POLICY OF THE NAVIGATION ACTS,	147
SEC. 2. OF A SHIP'S NATIONAL CHARACTER,	149
1. Description of British Privileged Ships,	ib.
2. Description of Foreign Privileged Ships,	150
SEC. 3. OF THE REGISTERING OF BRITISH SHIPS,	151

	PAGE
SEC. 4. OF THE SALE AND TRANSFERENCE OF SHIPS,	155
1. Sale of a Ship,	ib.
2. Sale of Shares in a Ship,	157
3. Sales in absence of Owners,	158
4. Transference to Heirs, Creditors, etc.,	ib.
5. Mortgage of Ships and Deeds in Security,	159
6. Evidence of Ownership in Vessels or Shares,	ib.
[Present State of the Law of PROPERTY in SHIPS],	ib.
 CHAP. II. OF PROPERTY IN GOODS AND MERCHANDISE,	176
SEC. 1. OF THE TRANSFERENCE OF GOODS AND COMMODITIES BY SALE AND DELIVERY,	ib.
SUBSEC. 1. Of RISK as a Criterion of the Transference of Goods,	179
SUBSEC. 2. Of Completion of the Transference by DELIVERY,	181
ART. 1. Of the Transference of Goods in the Seller's own Possession directly to the Buyer,	183
ART. 2. Transference of Goods in the custody of another for the Seller,	194
1. Goods in the hands of Wharfingers, Warehouse-keepers, and Agents,	ib.
2. Goods warehoused for the Duties—Commentary on the Warehousing Acts,	199
Provisions of the Warehousing Act,	201
Transference of Goods Warehoused and under Bond,	204
Goods the Property of Warehouseman,	ib.
Goods in the Bond Warehouses of third Parties,	205
SUBSEC. 3. Transference of Goods and Merchandise while in the hands of Shipmasters and Carriers,	212
SUBSEC. 4. Transference by Delivery to a third Person as representing the Buyer,	215
SEC. 2. OF THE SELLER'S RIGHT OF RETENTION FOR THE PRICE, AND OF STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU,	223
SUBSEC. 1. History of the Doctrine of Stoppage of Goods in Transitu ,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Rules of Retaining Goods, or Stopping in Transitu ,	230
SUBSEC. 3. By whom the Right of Stopping may be exercised,	245
SUBSEC. 4. Upon what Conditions the Seller is obliged to allow the Goods to proceed,	246
SUBSEC. 5. Of the manner of Stopping Goods in Transitu ,	247
SUBSEC. 6. Effect of Stopping in Transitu ,	250
SUBSEC. 7. Of the Buyer's Rejection of Goods sold, for which he is unable to pay,	253
SEC. 3. OF RESTITUTION OF GOODS AFTER DELIVERY,	256
SUBSEC. 1. Of Conditions in Sale,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Of Restitution on account of Fraud in the Contract of Sale,	261
SEC. 4. OF REPUTED OWNERSHIP OF MOVEABLES, AS RAISING A RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DEBTS OF THE POSSESSOR,	269
ART. 1. Of Reputed Ownership,	ib.
ART. 2. Of Possession legitimately separated from the Ownership,	274
SUBSEC. 1. Of Goods and Effects in possession of another than the Owner, in the course of Legal Contracts,	275
1. Goods sent on SALE and RETURN,	288
2. Transactions with Bankers,	290
3. Consignments of Goods for Advances and Sale,	294
SUBSEC. 2. Of the effect of Changes on the Property entrusted to the Bankrupt,	ib.

	PAGE
CONCLUSION OF BOOK II.—OF THE EFFECT OF RADICAL OBJECTIONS AND OF CONDITIONS AND PERSONAL EXCEPTIONS ON THE DOCTRINES OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS,	297
SEC. 1. RADICAL DEFECT OF TITLE IN THE DEBTOR,	299
SEC. 2. RIGHTS HELD BY THE DEBTOR UNDER QUALIFICATIONS AND CONDITIONS,	300
SEC. 3. OF THE EXCEPTION OF FRAUD AS IT AFFECTS CREDITORS,	309

BOOK III.

OF CREDITORS BY PERSONAL OBLIGATION OR CONTRACT.

PART I.

ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION OF DEBT.

CHAP. I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF OBLIGATION AND CONTRACT,	312
SEC. 1. OF CONVENTIONAL OBLIGATIONS AND CONTRACTS,	313
ART. 1. Of the CONSENT requisite in Conventional Obligations,	ib.
ART. 2. Of Obligations and Contracts considered as LEGAL or ILLEGAL,	317
SUBSEC. 1. Of Obligations and Contracts Immoral, or contra Bonos Mores ,	318
SUBSEC. 2. Contracts against Public Policy :—
1. Internal Policy—Domestic Relations—Restraints on Marriage—Marriage Brokage— Restraints on Natural Liberty—Freedom of Election,	321
2. External Policy :—
1. War—Neutrals—Licences—Contraband of War—Blockade—Alien—Enemy,	323
2. Revenue—Contraband of Trade or Smuggling Contracts,	326
3. Contracts Usurious,	327
4. Effect of Illegality of Debt against third Parties,	330
5. Debt, partly Illegal,	332
SUBSEC. 3. Of Obligations Onerous or Gratuitous, Pure, Future, or Contingent,	ib.
ART. 3. Of the various ways in which Obligations and Contracts are constituted,	335
Commentary on the STAMP LAWS,	336
SUBSEC. 1. Obligations and Contracts constituted by Writing,	340
1. Solemn Writings,	ib.
2. Privileged Writings— In Re Mercatoria —Offer and Acceptance,	342
Doctrine of Locus Pœnitentiæ , Rei Interventus , and Homologation,	345
Some shorter Prescriptions, presuming Falsehood in Writing—Triennial—Quinquennial,	346
SUBSEC. 2. Of Verbal Agreements and Book Debts,	347
Commentary on TRIENNIAL PRESCRIPTION,	348
CHAP. II. OF UNILATERAL OBLIGATIONS,	351
SEC. 1. OF BONDS AND OBLIGATIONS,	352
SEC. 2. OF BONDS OF ANNUITY, AND OTHER CONTINGENT DEBTS,	353

	PAGE
SEC. 3. OF JOINT AND SEVERAL OBLIGATIONS,	361
SEC. 4. OF CAUTIONARY OBLIGATIONS,	364
SUBSEC. 1. Of Cautionary Engagements, or Suretyship in general,	ib.
Extinction or Discharge of Cautionary Obligations,	374
1. Limitation or Prescription of Cautionary Obligations—Commentary on the Act 1695,	ib.
2. Effect of Discharging the Principal Debtor,	376
3. Negligence and Implied Discharge,	378
SUBSEC. 2. Of Cautionary Obligations for Faithful Performance,	380
1. Cautioner for Bank Agent,	ib.
2. Cautioner for Messenger,	382
3. Cautioner for Notary,	383
4. General Rules of Responsibility by Cautioners for Duties of Office,	384
SUBSEC. 3. Of Cautionary Obligation for a Cash-Credit with a Bank,	385
SUBSEC. 4. Of Letters of Credit or Guarantee,	388
Discharge of Guarantee,	394
Guarantee on Del Credere Commission,	ib.
Implied Guarantee,	396
SUBSEC. 5. Of Judicial Caution,	ib.
SUBSEC. 6. Of Bonds of Presentation,	401
[Note on the effect of the MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT ACT],	402
SEC. 5. OF BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY-NOTES,	411
SUBSEC. 1. Of the FORM and REQUISITES of Bills and Notes, and of Objections appearing ex facie —Form—Stamp—Vitiation and Alterations—Prescription,	413
SUBSEC. 2. Of the DRAWING, ACCEPTANCE, and ENDORSEMENTS of Bills and Notes,	421
1. Drawing of Bills,	ib.
2. Acceptance of Bills and Notes,	422
3. Endorsement and Transfer of Bills and Notes,	426
SUBSEC. 3. Of the Parties by whom, and against whose Estates, a Demand may be made on Bills and Notes,	429
1. Demand on Bills and Notes in Real Transactions,	ib.
1. PRESENTMENT of Bills,	432
For Acceptance,	433
For Payment,	434
Days of Grace—Usance,	ib.
Day and Hour of Presentment,	ib.
Place of Presentment,	436
2. PROTEST of Bills and Notes,	437
3. Intimation or NOTICE of Dishonour,	439
Time for Notice—Foreign Bills—Inland Bills,	441
By whom Notice is to be given,	443
To whom Notice is to be given,	444
4. Equivalents of Protest and Notice, and Waiving of Negotiation,	ib.
5. Demand by one accepting or paying on Protest for Honour,	447
6. Remedy to the Bill Holder beyond the Bill,	449
2. Demands on Accommodation-Bills and Notes,	ib.

	PAGE
CHAP. III. MUTUAL CONTRACTS,	454
1. Reciprocal Effects of Mutual Contracts—Retention—Stopping in Transitu ,	ib.
2. Rules of Interpretation of Contracts,	455
SEC. 1. OF THE CONTRACT OF SALE,	458
SUBSEC. 1. General Principles relative to Sale,	ib.
1. Constitution of the Contract of Sale,	ib.
2. Completion of the Contract,	460
3. Conditions, Implied or Express,	463
[WARRANTY and REPRESENTATION],	466
4. Effect of Insolvency,	471
SUBSEC. 2. Claims in respect of the Contract of Sale,	ib.
1. On the part of the Seller,	ib.
2. On the part of the Buyer,	477
SEC. 2. OF CONTRACTS OF HIRING,	481
SUBSEC. 1. General Principles,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Hiring of Moveables,	ib.
1. Claims under this Contract on the part of the Lessee—2. By the Person Letting to Hire —Principles of Responsibility for Neglect,	482
SUBSEC. 3. Hiring of Labour,	485
1. Claims under this Contract on the Employer's Bankruptcy—2. On the Workman's Bankruptcy,	487
Care in Custody,	488
Skill,	489
SUBSEC. 4. Hiring of CARRIAGE by Land,	490
Claims under this Contract—
1. By the Carrier,	491
2. By Passengers and Owners of Goods,	ib.
SUBSEC. 5. Digression concerning the EDICT Nautæ, Caupones, Stabularii ,	495
1. Persons liable under the Edict,	496
2. Extent of Responsibility,	499
3. Limitation of Responsibility,	501
SEC. 3. OF MERCANTILE AGENTS OR FACTORS,	505
SUBSEC. 1. General Principles relative to Mercantile Agency,	506
1. Constitution of the Power,	ib.
2. Implied Mandate and Actio Institoria ,	509
3. Commission and Diligence Prestable,	516
4. Extent of Authority,	ib.
5. Factor's Power to Pledge,	517
[Under the Statutes],	521
6. Termination of Factor's Powers,	522
SUBSEC. 2. Claims under the Contract of Commission, or Mercantile Agency,	526
1. Claims on Bankruptcy of the Principal,	ib.
[Rights of the Principal on Agent's Contracts against third Parties],	526
[Claims by the Principal against the Agent],	530
[Claims by the Agent],	534

	PAGE
2. Claims on Bankruptcy of the Factor or Agent,	539
[PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY of Agents],	540
CHAP. IV. OF MARITIME CONTRACTS,	546
Introductory View of Maritime Law,	ib.
SEC. 1. OF CONTRACTS RELATIVE TO THE EQUIPMENT OF THE VESSEL,	551
SUBSEC. 1. Employment of the Ship,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Of the Appointment of a Shipshusband,	552
Claims on Bankruptcy of the Owners,	553
Claims on the Shipshusband's Bankruptcy,	554
SUBSEC. 3. Of the Shipmaster or Captain,	ib.
Claims on Bankruptcy of the Owners,	557
Claims on the Master's Bankruptcy,	ib.
SUBSEC. 4. Of the Hiring of Mate and Seamen,	ib.
Claims on the Bankruptcy of the Owners,	561
SUBSEC. 5. Contracts for Repairs and Furnishings to Ships,	567
1. Contracts with the Owners for Repairs, and who is liable as such,	ib.
2. Contracts with the Master for Repairs, etc.,	571
Repairs and Furnishings at Home,	572
Repairs and Money in a Foreign Port,	573
Hypothec on Ship for Foreign Repairs,	ib.
3. Contracts of Bottomry and Respondentia ,	578
Sale of the Ship or Cargo for the Supply of Necessaries,	584
Claims for Repairs and Furnishings on Bankruptcy,	585
SEC. 2. OF CONTRACTS FOR THE EMPLOYMENT OF THE SHIP ON GENERAL OR SPECIAL AFFREIGHTMENT,	586
SUBSEC. 1. General Principles relating to Contracts of AFFREIGHTMENT,	ib.
1. Of Charter-Parties of Affreightment,	ib.
2. Of Ships on General Freight,	589
3. BILLS OF LADING,	590
SUBSEC. 2. Claims on Contracts of Affreightment under Charter-Parties and Bills of Lading,	595
1. Claims on the Bankruptcy of the Shipowners,	ib.
In relation to the Loading,	596
In relation to the Condition of the Ship,	597
In relation to the Conduct of the Voyage,	602
In relation to the Termination of the Voyage,	604
RESPONSIBILITY OF SHIPOWNERS, etc., under the Edict Nautæ , etc., and of the Limitations of this Responsibility by recent Statutes,	606
2. Claims on the Bankruptcy of the Merchant or Shipper,	612
Obligation to furnish a Cargo,	ib.
Obligation to pay Freight,	614
Of Lay Days and Demurrage,	621
SEC. 3. OF THE INDEMNIFICATION OF LOSS OR DAMAGE SUFFERED IN A VOYAGE,	625
SUBSEC. 1. Of the Indemnification of Loss from COLLISION of Ships,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Of Indemnification of Loss by GENERAL AVERAGE; and of the Lex Rhodia de Jactu ,	629
1. In what Circumstances, and for what Losses, may Contribution be demanded,	631

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

XXV

	PAGE
2. Of Property liable to Contribution,	635
3. Mode of Valuing and Apportioning General Average,	636
SUBSEC. 3. Of SALVAGE,	638
Who are entitled to Salvage,	639
What Acts entitle to Salvage,	641
Who is liable for Salvage,	642
Amount of Salvage,	ib.
SUBSEC. 4. Of Contracts of INSURANCE,	645
1. Claims on Bankruptcy of the Insured,	ib.
2. Claims on the Bankruptcy of the Underwriters,	649
Requisites of the Policy,	ib.
Proof of the Interest and Loss,	653
Digression concerning Valuations and the Adjustment of Losses,	659
Defences against the Claim of the Insured,	662
Breach of Warranty,	ib.
Concealment or Misrepresentation,	665
Deviation or Alteration,	669
CHAP. V. OF CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE AND UPON LIVES,	671
SEC. 1. INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE,	ib.
Risks and Losses insured against,	672
Warranty and Representation,	673
Of Settling and Adjusting Losses,	ib.
SEC. 2. INSURANCE ON LIFE,	675
CHAP. VI. OF CLAIMS BY WIVES AND CHILDREN,	678
SEC. 1. CLAIMS BY WIFE OR CHILDREN, WHERE THERE IS NO SPECIAL CONTRACT,	679
SUBSEC. 1. Of Marriage dissolving within Year and Day without Issue,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Of Marriage subsisting for a Year, or productive of a Living Child,	680
SEC. 2. CLAIMS BY WIFE OR CHILDREN UNDER SPECIAL CONTRACT,	681
SUBSEC. 1. Claims under Contracts of Marriage and Bonds of Provision,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Claims in consequence of Contracts or Decrees of Separation,	688
CHAP. VII. OF CLAIMS OF WARRANDICE,	689
CHAP. VIII. OF INTEREST OF MONEY, OF DAMAGES, AND OF PENALTIES,	690
SEC. 1. OF CLAIMS FOR INTEREST, SIMPLE AND ACCUMULATED,	ib.
Interest as Damage,	691
Claims for Interest on Convention, Express or Implied,	692
Commencement and Termination of Interest,	694
Accumulation of Principal and Interest,	695
SEC. 2. OF CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES,	698
SEC. 3. OF PENALTIES,	699

PART II.

THE DOCTRINE OF PASSIVE TITLES, OR THE EFFECT OF DEBT AGAINST REPRESENTATIVES.

	PAGE
CHAP. I. OF PASSIVE REPRESENTATION,	703
CHAP. II. OF LIMITED REPRESENTATION,	705
SEC. 1. LIMITED REPRESENTATION PRODUCED BY JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS,	ib.
SEC. 2. OF ENTRY AS HEIR CUM BENEFICIO INVENTARII,	706
SEC. 3. LIMITED RESPONSIBILITY FROM POSSESSION BY APPARENT HEIR IN CONFERRING ON CREDITORS A RIGHT AGAINST THE NEXT HEIR ENTERING,	708

BOOK IV.

OF PREFERENCES BY SECURITIES, VOLUNTARY OR JUDICIAL, OVER THE HERITABLE ESTATE.

CHAP. I. OF VOLUNTARY SECURITIES ON THE FEUDAL ESTATE,	712
Wadset,	ib.
Infetment of Annualrent,	713
Heritable Bond,	ib.
Heritable Bond and Disposition in Security,	ib.
Absolute Disposition with Back-Bond,	714
Securities for Relief of Sums and Engagements,	ib.
Securities for Cash-Credits,	715
SEC. 1. OF THE COMPLETION OF HERITABLE SECURITIES BY RECORDED SASINE,	ib.
SUBSEC. 1. Of the Instrument of Sasine,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Of the Recording of the Sasine,	717
SUBSEC. 3. Of Sasines in Burgage Subjects,	721
SUBSEC. 4. Of the Preference of Sasines as depending on the Nature of the Precept, the State of the Titles, etc.,	722
SEC. 2. OF SECURITIES AND CONVEYANCES IN COMPETITION,	724
SUBSEC. 1. Rights in Security depending on Sasine in the Claimant,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Rights in Security depending on Sasine in another Person,	726
1. Mode of constituting a Reserved Burden,	ib.
2. Nature and Effect of the Right,	730
SUBSEC. 3. Preferences depending on Conditions in Real or in Personal Rights to Land,	733
Excambion—Real Warrandice,	ib.
SUBSEC. 4. General Review of Objections that may be taken against these Securities,	734
1. Objections to the Debt,	ib.
2. Objections to the Security—Want of Stamp—Exhausting of Precept of Sasine—Special Precept— Jus Accrescendi ,	735
3. Objections from Insolvency,	738
Effect of Objections,	ib.
SEC. 3. OF PUBLIC BURDENS, LAND-TAX, REPAIRS OF CHURCHES,	739

	PAGE
CHAP. II. OF JUDICIAL SECURITIES OVER LANDS AND HOUSES,	740
SEC. 1. HISTORY AND NATURE OF THE SIMPLE ADJUDICATION FOR DEBT,	ib.
SEC. 2. ADJUDICATION FOR DEBT,	746
SUBSEC. 1. Adjudication of Property vested in the Debtor,	747
SUBSEC. 2. Adjudication of Property to which the Debtor has succeeded,	ib.
SUBSEC. 3. Adjudication of the Debtor's Property after his Death,	749
SEC. 3. ADJUDICATION IN SECURITY,	752
SEC. 4. ADJUDICATION UPON DEBITA FUNDI,	753
SEC. 5. COMMENTARY ON THE STATUTES FOR REGULATING PREFERENCES AMONG ADJUDGING CREDITORS,	754
SUBSEC. 1. Adjudication by Creditors of the same Debtor,	ib.
1. Pari passu Preference while the Debtor is alive,	ib.
Description of the First Effectual Adjudication,	755
Term during which all Adjudgers may partake of the Preference of the First Effectual,	758
Publication of the First Effectual, and Provisions for Lessening the Expense of Adjudications,	759
2. Pari passu Preference where the Debtor is dead,	763
3. Preferences of Adjudication led after Year and Day,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Preferences among Adjudging Creditors of different Classes, viz. of the Ancestor and of the Heir,	764
Commentary on the Statute conferring a Preference on the Ancestor's Creditors,	ib.
1. Competition of Diligence by Creditors of the Ancestor and of the Heir,	766
2. Inefficacy of the Heir's Voluntary Conveyance to defeat the Creditors of the Ancestor,	770
SEC. 6. GENERAL REVIEW OF THE OBJECTIONS THAT MAY BE TAKEN AGAINST ADJUDICATION FOR DEBT,	773
SUBSEC. 1. Nature and Description of an Articulate Adjudication,	ib.
SUBSEC. 2. Objections to the Grounds and Warrants of Adjudication,	774
1. Grounds of the Decree of Adjudication—Constitution of the Debt,	775
2. Warrants of Decree of Adjudication—Preliminary Proceedings,	778
SUBSEC. 3. Objections to the Adjudication,	779
SUBSEC. 4. Effect of Diligence by the Crown,	781
SEC. 7. OF ADJUDICATION IN IMPLEMENT,	782
SEC. 8. OF JUDGE AND WARRANT,	784
Of Declarator and Adjudication,	785
CONCLUSION OF CHAP. II. OF ACCESSORIES TO LAND, AND OTHER HERITABLE SECURITIES,	786
CHAP. III. OF REAL SECURITIES OVER PROPERTY SIMPLY HERITABLE,	791
SEC. 1. VOLUNTARY SECURITIES,	ib.
SEC. 2. JUDICIAL SECURITIES,	793

COMMENTARIES

ON

THE LAW OF SCOTLAND.

INTRODUCTION.

THE design of this work is to present a view of the Civil Jurisprudence of Scotland in its practical application to the ordinary business of life. With this intention, the several rights and obligations will be explained on which a demand, or action, for debt may be grounded; the estates or funds described, out of which they may be satisfied; and the various grounds of preference by which particular claimants may be distinguished from the general mass brought under review, as in relation to that state of insolvency on the part of the debtor, which places in the keenest rivalry, and under the most vigilant examination, the pretensions of each creditor to a share of the inadequate fund.

In conducting an inquiry which comprehends so great a variety of matter, it is my intention, in the FIRST BOOK, to take a general review of the Law of DEBTOR and CREDITOR; chiefly for the purpose of describing generally the means which are by law provided for compelling the payment of debt when prosecuted by an individual creditor, and to serve as an introduction to the more detailed consideration of the effect produced by rivalry and the inadequacy of the funds of payment.

The various kinds of estate of which creditors may avail themselves for the payment of debt, will form the subject of the SECOND BOOK; with the several questions which may arise out of the ambiguous states of possession in which property may be placed at the moment of insolvency.

The inquiry will naturally be directed, in the next place, as the subject of the THIRD BOOK, to the rights of personal creditors; in which it is proposed to explain the general principles of PERSONAL OBLIGATION, and CONTRACT, with the grounds of action or claim of debt which arise from them ; and this part of the work will admit of an ample commentary on the doctrines of MERCANTILE and MARITIME CONTRACTS, which have been more imperfectly explained, either in separate treatises or in the writings of our institutional authors, than any other part of Scottish jurisprudence.

In the FOURTH BOOK will be presented a view of the several grounds of PREFERENCE AMONG CREDITORS, whether resting on securities over the heritable or moveable estate, or on the peculiar footing of privileged debts.

Having in this way considered the relation of creditor and debtor in the abstract, without regard to their characters as individual or social, that distinction will next demand attention. The great operations of mercantile business are conducted by Partnerships, either avowed and acting under an appropriate name or firm, or secret with sleeping partners, or momentary, as in joint adventure. In the FIFTH BOOK I shall give a full view of the LAW of PARTNERSHIP, and of the several very important aspects in which it has lately presented itself to public consideration.

In the SIXTH BOOK I shall proceed to consider the BANKRUPT LAWS ; and, after an inquiry into the description and character of insolvency and of bankruptcy, the peculiar regulations will be explained by which, in contemplation of bankruptcy, debtors have been prohibited from granting securities voluntarily, and creditors stopped from acquiring preferences by means of execution, with a view to prevent the fraudulent concealment of funds, and the creation of partial preferences. A digest will be attempted of the rules of RANKING and DISTRIBUTION, by which the estate of the debtor is applied in extinction of his debts. And afterwards will be explained the history, nature, and effects of those institutions by which the estate and person of the debtor are placed under the control of creditors, when he is unable to discharge his obligations, and by which the sale and final distribution of his estate are effected. This includes an explanation of the process of SALE and RANKING, MERCANTILE SEQUESTRATION, and TRUST DEEDS for creditors, with the law of IMPRISONMENT and CESSIO BONORUM.

The work will be concluded by a review of the MUTUAL RELATIONS OF THE SCOTTISH AND FOREIGN LAWS relative to DEBTOR and CREDITOR.

BOOK I.

GENERAL REVIEW OF THE LAW OF DEBTOR AND CREDITOR IN SCOTLAND.

IT may be useful, in commencing an inquiry into the practical jurisprudence of Scotland, as exhibited in the competition and contests of creditors, shortly to review the general doctrines of the Scottish Law of Debtor and Creditor in the two states of Solvency and of Bankruptcy.

CHAPTER I.

OF EXECUTION FOR DEBT, OR DILIGENCE REAL AND PERSONAL.

THE several writs of execution provided by law for enforcing the payment of debt, are directed either, first, against the ESTATE of the debtor, for the purpose of having it transferred to the creditor in satisfaction of his debt, or converted into money, and the price paid to the creditor; or, secondly, against the PERSON of the debtor, with the intention of indirectly, but often more effectually and rapidly, compelling him to find the means of payment.

In the law of Scotland, all harsh and sudden proceedings for the recovery of debt have been restrained by a spirit of forbearance towards the debtor, happily enough combined with precautions for the safety of the creditor.

Execution for debt proceeds by writs under the King's signet, issued in virtue of special warrants from the Supreme Court.¹

The regular system of judgment and execution established in the Roman law,² was, in the kingdoms of modern Europe, much interrupted. But without stopping to explain the

¹ [Every decree of a Court (unless in declaratory actions) now contains a warrant on which execution may proceed. 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, secs. 1, 2. See Bell's Prin. 2270 sqq.]

² In Rome, judgments were carried into execution under the immediate superintendence of the judge who pronounced them, or of the judge or magistrate within whose jurisdiction the subject of execution lay. For this purpose, at the distance of four months after sentence (which period was allowed for voluntary obedience), an action was instituted called ACTIO JUDICATI; in which the judge first issued his warrant to seize, as a judicial pledge, the moveables, and within eight days to sell them for payment of the debt; and afterwards, if there was a deficiency of moveables, he authorized the immoveable property to be seized, and delivered in pledge to the creditor, or put under the care of a factor or curator. At the end of two months, if the debt was not extinguished, he authorized the land, etc., to be sold publicly, and the debt to be paid from the price, the balance being delivered over to the debtor.—Dig. lib. xlii. tit. 1, De Re Jud. l. 15 and 31; Cod. lib. viii. tit. 34; De Jure Dom. impetr. l. 3. At first there seems to have been no remedy where no purchaser made offer for the lands; but afterwards an alternative was introduced, by which the property might be adjudged over to the creditor to the value of his debt.—Cod. lib. viii. tit. 23, Si in causa Jud. pig. l. 2 and 3.

feudal jurisdictions—the power of barons, counts, and sheriffs to hold courts and give judgment—or the confusion and surcease of justice which arose from the repledging of defendants [4] by powerful lords, it may be sufficient to say, that the increasing power of the Royal Courts, and, both in England and in Scotland, the delegation by brieves issued from the King's Chancery to sheriffs or other officers to try the cause by jury, redeemed the course of justice from those interruptions, and gradually established a more uniform course of jurisprudence. Those brieves, while they constituted only a jurisdiction for the special occasion, contained also a warrant by which the jurisdiction which they created might be fully executed. This warrant at first authorized the attachment and seizure of the moveables of the debtor, in order to enforce attendance, and to be the subject of execution; and the execution was afterwards extended to land. But the constraint of the person was permitted only in the recovery of merchant debts; or gradually established by indirect forms of proceeding, as for rebellion against the commands of the Church and of the King.

In the fifteenth century a great revolution took place in the judicial policy of Scotland. The Court of Session was instituted after the model of the Parliament of Paris; the brief of distress fell into disuse; the principle of the Roman and French jurisprudence was adopted; and judgments were executed by means of special writs issued on judicial warrant, and analogous to the Roman Actio Judicati.

Generally speaking, those warrants are decrees, either pronounced in the course of an action, or issued summarily in virtue of the consent of the debtor. To explain fully the law relative to decrees of the former kind, would require a review of the several courts of civil jurisdiction, and of the several forms of action by which payment of debt may be demanded; a discussion by much too extensive to be entered on here, and which is not necessary to this introductory view. The decree by consent, called a Decree of Registration, may generally be described as directly grounded on the registration of an obligation or contract in the books of a court of competent jurisdiction, by virtue of a previous consent incorporated in the obligation or contract. Proceeding on such consent, a fictitious judgment is given forth by the clerk of court, authorizing all usual and necessary writs of execution, as if by authority of the judge.¹ Analogous to this, though perhaps more operose in its form, is the English warrant of attorney to confess judgment; and the greater simplicity of the Scottish consent to registration for summary execution, has enabled the Legislature to declare that, by legal construction, such consent shall be implied in bills of exchange and promissory notes, whereupon protests for non-payment may be recorded to the effect of having a decree of registration issued; and in this way the necessity is avoided of an action on those instruments of trade which are in daily use, and creditors have immediate access to the most summary execution.²

The judgment or decree has of itself no effect whatever on the debtor's funds. It does not, as in England, bind the land from its date, however quickly execution may follow;

¹ The form of the clause of registration incorporated in bonds or contracts is this:—‘And I consent to the registration hereof in the books of Council and Session, or other judges' books competent, that letters of horning on six days' charge, and all other execution needful, may proceed upon a decree of the Lords thereof, to be interponed hereto, and to that effect constitute my procurators.’ The procurator so appointed did, in the original process, appear judicially and give consent to the decree; but the decree now proceeds summarily, and of course. On registration, an extract of the bond is given out, accompanied by a decree for execution. [A short form of the clause of registration applicable to all deeds of whatever nature was introduced by 10 and 11 Vict. c. 48, re-enacted by 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, secs. 8, 138; and somewhat anomalously, deeds requiring to be registered in the Register of Sasines may be recorded there for preservation and execution, provided the prescribed warrant of registration shall specify that they are to be so recorded. 31 and 32 Vict. c. 64, sec. 12.]

² By statute 1681, c. 20; 1696, c. 36; and 12 Geo. III. c. 72, secs. 41 and 42, a regular protest of a bill for non-payment or non-acceptance, or of a promissory note for non-payment, shall be a warrant for a decree of registration authorizing the king's writ of execution. The execution can proceed only on a previous charge to pay within a certain number of days; and if there be any good defence, it is competent to stop the execution by applying to the Supreme Court for suspension, on bail to pay the debt if the ground of suspension be bad.

neither are the moveables held, as in the hypothecary law of the Continent, to be attached or affected till a writ of attachment is actually executed.

The writs executorial, or diligences, as they are called, by which judgments are put [5] in execution, or payment of debts enforced, may be distinguished into two classes: one intended to enforce payment out of the estate, or by constraint of the person; the other to provide for intermediate security till this more complete execution can be accomplished.

1. EXECUTION OR DILIGENCE FOR COMPELLING IMMEDIATE PAYMENT.—Diligence, or execution for payment of debt, may proceed against the estate of the debtor as soon as judgment in a suit, or decree of registration, is given out: or, even without such a decree, a warrant for certain writs may be obtained on exhibiting to the judge a valid and formal contract or obligation in writing.¹

Against the LAND or other HERITABLE ESTATE of the debtor, his creditor may proceed by two forms of diligence: one directed only to the purpose of laying an embargo on the debtor's power of alienation to the creditor's prejudice; the other being a judicial transfer of the estate in payment of the debt. The former is called INHIBITION, the latter ADJUDICATION.

INHIBITION is a writ in the King's name, by which the debtor is prohibited from disposing of his land or heritable property to the disappointment of the inhibiting creditor, and even from incurring new debts, by which his land may be affected to the inhibitor's prejudice. This inhibition against the debtor is accompanied by a prohibition to all dealers and others to take conveyances from, or give credit to the debtor, relative to or grounded on the property comprehended in the inhibition. The writ is entered in a public record, where it may be examined by all the world, as forming an embargo on the credit and powers of the debtor. The effects of it will require a very minute consideration hereafter: at present it may be sufficient to observe, 1st, That as a mere prohibition this diligence confers no right on the creditor to enter on possession of the debtor's estate, but merely to challenge debts and overturn conveyances made in contempt of the writ; and 2^{dly}, That other creditors, whose debts are not within the prohibition, may, by the more active diligence of adjudication, acquire a right, as by transference, to the debtor's property, notwithstanding the existence of an inhibition. The debtor cannot be relieved from the embargo of an inhibition grounded on a debt which is already due, but by paying the debt. It is otherwise with inhibition in security of a debt not yet due, or still in litigation.—See below, p. 7.

ADJUDICATION.—This diligence proceeds in the proper form of an Actio Judicati,—the creditor producing his decree, or a written and formal obligation in proof of his right to demand execution; and the summons, which is to the Court of Session, concludes for having the debtor's lands adjudged to the creditor, redeemably. The judgment is alternative: either such a portion of land is, with the debtor's consent, adjudged to the creditor as may be found equivalent to the debt;² or, if the debtor do not choose to concur, a general adjudication of his whole lands is pronounced. It may be sufficient to say of this diligence, that from the moment the summons is executed it creates a lien over the land, called in law language litigiosity; so, at least, as to prevent the debtor from voluntarily alienating to the prejudice of the creditor: That, if the subject be simply heritable, the decree of adjudication completes the creditor's right; if it be of a feudal nature, the decree of adjudication is completed and carried into execution by the common feudal forms of infeftment. Adjudication, when thus completed, resembles a mortgage; it entitles the creditor to enter into possession, and to recover the rents; the estate being redeemable within ten years in the general adjudication, and five in the special. During this term of redemption the creditor must, [6] when called upon, account for what he actually has drawn, or might have drawn, and renounce his infetment if the debt has been paid off. If any part shall still remain due, it must either be paid off, and the estate redeemed, or the power of redemption may be foreclosed by an action for declaring the term expired.¹

¹ Inhibition or adjudication for attaching the heritable estate may be grounded on a written obligation, without a decree of constitution; or letters of arrestment for attaching moveables and debts may be obtained on a document of the same description.

² [The conclusion for special adjudication is now unnecessary, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 59; and is unknown in practice.]

The PERSONAL ESTATE of the debtor is taken in execution by POINDING, or by ARRESTMENT IN EXECUTION.

The warrant to poind or to arrest in execution may be granted by an inferior judge, who has pronounced decree, or in whose books the obligation has been registered for execution; or by the Court of Session, a warrant for letters of horning, poinding, and arrestment may be granted, on which they are issued at the signet.²

POINDING in the Scottish law, originally a part of the execution under the brieve of distress, gradually became unjust and oppressive. It was only when reformed in the reign of his late Majesty that it regained its original purity. It consists at present of an adjudication of goods belonging to the debtor, followed by a public sale, under the judicial superintendence of the sheriff of the county; the price being applied in payment of the debt due to the poinding creditor.

ARRESTMENT IN EXECUTION may be described as a lien created by attachment over money due to the debtor, or over moveable property of the debtor in the hands of a third party. The property or money thus attached is made effectual to the creditor by means of an action of forthcoming against the holder of the fund. To this action the debtor is made a party; and the object of the action is, that the arrestee should be ordained to deliver up to the arrester the debtor's property, or to pay to him the debt.³

By execution against the DEBTOR'S PERSON, he is indirectly compelled, by the terror of

¹ In England, as in every other feudal kingdom, land was for a time banished from commerce; and the only execution competent against the debtor's estate, was distress by seizure of moveables. The writ of LEVARI FACIAS entitled the sheriff to levy the rents and profits of the debtor's lands, as well as his common moveables; and, if necessary, another writ (VENDITIONI EXPONAS) was issued to authorize their sale. But it was not till the thirteenth century that land was in any degree open to execution for debt in England. In the reign of Edward I. a new kind of execution was introduced, which is thus explained by Sir William Blackstone: 'When the restriction of alienation began to wear away, the consequence still continued; and no creditor could take possession of lands, but only levy the growing profits; so that if the defendant alienated his land, the plaintiff was ousted of his remedy. The statute (13 Edward I. c. 18), therefore, granted the writ of ELEGIT, by which the defendant's goods and chattels are not sold, but only appraised, and all of them (except oxen and beasts of the plough) are delivered to the plaintiff, etc. If the goods are not sufficient, then the moiety, or one-half of his freehold lands which he had at the time of the judgment given, are also to be delivered to the plaintiff to hold, till out of the rents and profits thereof the debt be levied, or till the defendant's interest be expired.' 3 Blackst. 318. Thus the ELEGIT differs materially from our adjudication; for the estate or right which the creditor acquires in the real property of his debtor, is not, as ours, a right of property, redeemable like a mortgage, but merely a conditional right of possession, ceasing with the payment of the debt, but affording no means of carrying the real right of property to the creditor himself. [Stephen's Com. iii. 688, i. 316. Now, by 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110, sec. 11, on an elegit the sheriff delivers execution of all lands of the debtor, or held in trust for him at the time of entering up judgment, or over which, then or afterwards, he, or a trustee for him, has any disposing power for his own benefit. Still, however, the tenant in elegit has only a conditional estate defeasible when the amount of the judgment debt is levied.]

² [See above, p. 3, note.]

³ The original writs for execution against moveables in England were the LEVARI FACIAS and FIERI FACIAS. The former contained at first a power only to levy the goods, not to sell them; though, afterwards, the Supreme Courts came to insert in the writs of levari facias issued by them a power of selling. The fieri facias contained a power of levying the goods and debts, and 'making' of them to the avail of the debt. In the execution of these writs, the sheriff made the goods be valued, fixed an upset price upon them, and exposed them to sale. But here his power ended if no purchaser appeared; and a new writ, called venditioni exponas, was necessary to authorize a sale for what the goods might bring. The elegit, as applicable to moveables, introduced the power of appraisement, in case of the property not finding a purchaser. The fieri facias and the elegit are now the great writs of execution against moveables in England, and under them the purposes of our poinding and arrestment are accomplished; debts being levied under them, and goods sold for payment, or appraised to the value, and delivered in satisfaction. [See 1 and 2 Vict. c. 110, sec. 12. Stephen's Com. iii. 684 sqq.]

imprisonment, to bring forth his means, or to call on his friends to assist him in discharging his obligations; and the creditor is enabled, during his debtor's imprisonment, to keep [7] a more successful watch on all his motions relative to the disposal of his funds.

Personal execution cannot proceed till after the debtor has been required by a charge on letters of Horning to pay the debt, and a certain number of days have been allowed him for obedience. His disobedience to this charge is followed by letters of Caption, which is a warrant for his imprisonment. When imprisonment does follow, it is held by the law to have no other object than to enforce payment and the discovery of funds; and thus execution against the person does not preclude execution against the property. Nor can an imprisoned debtor bid defiance to his creditors while he lives with extravagance in prison.¹

2. DILIGENCE FOR INTERMEDIATE SECURITY.—The diligences of the Scottish law would be imperfect if these delays were granted to debtors before personal execution could proceed, or before execution could be had against the effects by poinding, or against the land by adjudication, unless some means of security were provided against their taking advantage of the indulgence. But it has been contrived to reconcile indulgence with security in a way that seems to be unknown in England.

The two forms of execution already explained, of Inhibition and Arrestment, are easily adapted to the purpose of intermediate security. The creditor who has not yet obtained judgment for his debt, or whose debt is not yet due, is allowed to use INHIBITION IN SECURITY, where his debtor appears to be vergens ad inopiam; so that during the discussion of the action, or until the arrival of the day of payment, or until he shall be in a condition to take execution for enforcing payment, he may be secured against the insolvency of his debtor and the sale of his property. The only difference between the effect of inhibition in security and inhibition on a debt already due is, that the former may be recalled on security being given for the debt; the latter only by payment. In the same way the creditor may use ARRESTMENT IN SECURITY, which also differs from the arrestment in execution by being subject to recall, on security being given for the debt; whereas the other cannot be relieved but by payment.

In regard to personal execution, the delay given to the debtor to prepare for payment is reconciled with the safety of the creditor by means of a MEDITATIO FUGÆ WARRANT. This the creditor may obtain on judicially swearing to the truth of his debt, and to his belief of the debtor's intention to escape from the country; and on justifying this belief to the magistrate in presence of the debtor, by the statement of his grounds of suspicion, and by an examination of the debtor himself. Under this warrant the debtor may be imprisoned, to abide the course of his creditor's diligence, unless he shall relieve himself by finding bail to remain in the country.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE EFFECT OF INSOLVENCY ON THE DILIGENCE OF INDIVIDUAL CREDITORS.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF BANKRUPT LAW.—The diligences now enumerated were devised for the use of creditors considered individually, and suffer mutual restraint by rivalryship, by the imprisonment of the debtor, the feri facias and elegit must sleep; and consequently the debtor may in the meanwhile live in prison luxuriously and extravagantly, with his funds untouched by execution.

¹ As imprisonment by the English law is not, like that of Scotland, a method merely of enforcing payment and the discovery of hidden funds, but a satisfaction for the debt, the creditor who has imprisoned his debtor can proceed with no execution against the property. While his right is satisfied

[8] joined with inadequacy of funds. At first the preference among rival creditors was regulated according to priority of execution; and the time is not long gone by when the threatened insolvency of a trader brought all his creditors upon him with a concurrence of diligence the most ruinous and deplorable. The policy of the laws relative to bankruptcy is at once to allay all this hurry and perturbation, to bring creditors as nearly as possible to equality, and to prevent the debtor from interfering to confer on favourite creditors a preference to which they are not justly entitled.

Independently of the peculiar rules of Bankrupt Law, creditors are insulated individuals, connected by no common interest, and not bound to co-operate in execution, or to take joint proceedings for the general benefit. Under the Bankrupt Law they are formed into a community. The inadequacy of the fund from which they are to be paid suggests the wisdom of mutual forbearance; a stop is put to the accumulation of expensive and separate proceedings; and the law, following the reasonable wish of the whole, or at least the equity of contending interests, prescribes a general plan for recovering and distributing the estate at the common expense. The proceedings against the person of the debtor suffer also a change under the Bankrupt Law. The right of imprisonment, which at common law belongs to the creditors of an insolvent debtor, is restrained by more comprehensive and liberal views; and although the debtor who is guilty of embezzlement or fraud is exposed to harsher constraints, and regulations more highly penal, he whose insolvency has arisen from innocent misfortune is relieved from prison, or discharged of his debts.

This peculiar system is not of rapid growth, but the mischances incident to trade necessarily lead to bankruptcies; and with the extension of commerce and the prevalence of the system of credit, the effect produced by such failures is extended over a country: 'Non enim possunt, una in civitate, multi rem atque fortunas amittere, ut non plures secum in eandem calamitatem trahunt.' It is amidst those frequent insolvencies that the great principles of the Bankrupt Law are established—that men feel by experience the absurdity and unjust consequences of the old maxims—that they come to take a more candid, equitable, and enlarged view of the effects of insolvency upon the common interests of all, and to acquire a just sense of the benefit to be derived from unanimity and from common proceedings.

In codes of bankrupt law which thus grow up amidst the multiplying transactions of a commercial country, two great points may be taken as the fundamental principles into which the whole is resolvable. One is, that from the moment of failure the inadequate fund becomes the common property of the creditors; the other, that as insolvency may often proceed from misfortune alone, it is frequently just, and even expedient, to grant to the debtor freedom from that imprisonment which would render him useless and a burden, if, having failed from the mischances incident to trade, he is willing to give up everything to his creditors.

The first of these principles is the more extensive in its operation, and forms the groundwork of all the peculiarities to be found in the Bankrupt Law with respect to the right of the creditors, the powers of the debtor over the estate, and the peculiar processes by which the funds are collected, converted into money, and distributed.

Thus it is a direct consequence of this principle, that from the moment of insolvency the debtor loses the power of a proprietor, and becomes a mere negotiorum gestor for his creditors in the management of the common fund—that he is bound to make a fair disclosure of his estate—that he is deprived of the power of making alienations from motives merely of generosity, of affection, or of gratitude. This is the fundamental principle of all those regulations by which, in the bankrupt laws of various countries, provision is made for the examination of the bankrupt, for preventing direct or indirect embezzlement, and for annulling fictitious debts and voluntary conveyances without value.

[9] A second consequence of the general principle is, that although in the ordinary case, a debtor is bound to pay his creditors at the appointed day, or to give security to those who are suspicious of his credit, and urgent for payment; he cannot, after insolvency, thus agree to favour any one, without doing injustice to the rest, by encroaching upon a fund which is common to them all. This, again, is the great foundation of those laws which have for their object the restraining of insolvent debtors from conferring preferences,—from making payments in contemplation of bankruptcy,—from delivering goods as the equivalent of payment, or granting deeds of security in favour of prior creditors over any part of the estate. And such laws are defective or perfect in proportion to the success with which this general principle may be reconciled with the rights of those who, ignorant of the debtor's condition, may have been induced to rely upon his credit.

A third consequence deducible from the above principle is, that as the debtor is stopped by the common right of the creditors from bestowing preferences upon individuals of their number, so those individuals themselves ought to be prevented from acquiring preferences by the use of separate diligence. With this view a judicial process is opened to the creditors for immediately vesting in them, or in trustees, the insolvent estate, to be managed for the general behoof, converted into money, and distributed at the common expense. The perfection of this set of regulations in any country must depend upon the simplicity of the process, the ease with which it may be obtained consistently with safety to persons not bankrupt, and the rapidity and economy with which the distribution under it may be accomplished.

Next, according to the general principle, each creditor is entitled to an equal share of the funds, unless, previous to the failure, a preferable real right have been created over some part of the estate or effects. It is not the design of the bankrupt law to take as a fund of division what does not belong to the bankrupt, or what may be exhausted and covered by real securities; but to allow, as far as may be consistent with those preferable rights, a perfect equality among the creditors.

And lastly, To make effectual the rights of the creditors, and give to each his due share in the distribution, modes of proceeding are invented for attaching and converting into money, quickly and at little expense, the estate and effects, and for accomplishing a division among those entitled to a share.

Thus the common interest of the creditors in the inadequate fund furnishes the principle which pervades and systematizes the whole regulations of the bankrupt law in relation to the estate of the debtor, his powers over it, and the mode of distribution.

The other great principle above alluded to bears reference rather to the condition of the debtor. It is a principle which ought to operate in the case of those who are not traders, as well as of those who are more directly exposed to all the dangers of commerce: for although the trader is chiefly liable to be overtaken by sudden misfortune, other men are not beyond the reach of mischance; and if a debtor, although no merchant, can vindicate his failure from suspicion, and is willing to deliver up his whole estate to his creditors, he ought at least to be freed from prison. The more frequent and unavoidable dangers of a merchant's condition, and the necessity of his acting much upon credit, entitles him, indeed, to some distinction; but this should consist, not in the punishment of other men, but rather in the absolute discharge of the fair trader from all his debts; while to other men should be granted the more limited remedy of freedom from jail.¹ It is a point even of public expediency, that an honest merchant who has failed should be enabled to recommence his trade unencumbered with the load of former debts, which he has already done everything in his power to discharge. And it is scarcely a hardship upon creditors to give this indulgence, since the chance of insolvency, so peculiarly incident to all mercantile [10] transactions, must, in all a merchant's dealings, enter into his calculations of risk.

¹ [The remedy of sequestration in bankruptcy is not now confined to traders.]

These seem to be the leading principles of the Bankrupt Law, considered in the abstract. The particular regulations of each state must of course vary with the general spirit of the common law, and with the peculiarities of its ordinary institutions. But, however numerous or perplexing the rules and institutions of any code may at first appear, in these points they will be found to centre; and the system may fairly be estimated as good or bad, in proportion as effect is given or denied to these general principles.

It might be interesting in this view to examine the systems of bankrupt law established in various nations; to inquire how far they accord with these abstract principles, and to what peculiarity any deviation is to be traced. But this is a large field of inquiry; and as it is of chief importance to understand the two systems of bankrupt law which are established in this island—to see how far they agree, and where they differ from each other—it may be proper in this preliminary inquiry to confine ourselves to a short contrast of the English and Scottish law in this respect.

EXAMINATION OF THE BANKRUPT LAW OF ENGLAND AND OF SCOTLAND.—That dread of the arbitrary maxims of the civil law, which has been the distinction and the boast of England, has not always been productive of happy results in municipal jurisprudence and regulation, though of incalculable benefit in the formation of the Constitution. In the department now under review, while the commerce of England was proceeding rapidly in its great career, the aversion from change still left creditors in full possession of all the old rights of execution, which the common law recognised, against the estates and persons of their debtors. So late as the sixteenth century, the power of imprisonment remained a sacred privilege of a creditor, and the preference over the funds by priority of execution was still the rule of the common law. It was in the thirty-fourth year of the reign of Henry VIII. that the first alteration was made upon the ancient jurisprudence. But this was an alteration suddenly proposed, in order to remedy evils which bore hard upon the rising commerce of the country, and could not in its full extent be applied to others than merchants, without overturning the whole system of the common law. To understand this fully, it may be proper to observe how radical an alteration was required in many essential points to provide for cases of insolvency.

There seem to have been three great inconveniences, which the rigid maxims of the English common law produced, in their application to the dealings of a commercial country. 1. There was no easy and simple method of procuring execution, or even intermediate security for debts by bill, etc., otherwise than in consequence of the judgment of a court, with all its necessary delays, and all the interruptions of vacations. This was to traders an evil of great magnitude, where their debtor was insolvent; for, during the interval, the debtor could not be prevented from enjoying his property, and sporting with the interests of his creditors. To remedy this was one great object of the English statutes of bankruptcy; and it was accomplished by authorizing a commission of bankruptcy to be issued, to which the effect of an immediate legal execution was given, so as to deprive the debtor of all power over his property, and carry it at once to his creditors, to be divided among them for payment. 2. Although originally imprisonment for debt was not, in England any more than with us, a part of the common law, it had grown up as the undoubted privilege of a creditor to take satisfaction for his debt by the confinement of his debtor's person; and against this confinement there was no relief but by payment of the debt. It could not fail to appear as a serious evil in a commercial country, that traders should be exposed to such a punishment, without any discrimination between extravagance or fraud and mere misfortune, and with no other limitation to the duration of the punishment than the caprice of the creditor: to afford relief against it formed another object of the bankrupt laws. 3. Although all fraudulent deeds are at common law ineffectual, it is a matter of no small difficulty to guard against the frauds which, upon the eve of bankruptcy, a debtor, and especially a merchant, may be enabled and tempted to commit. It was with this view found necessary in England, besides subjecting traders to a new code of penal laws, to allow the creditors to take out the commission of bankruptcy in secret, that it might fall suddenly upon the debtor, and surprise him while his schemes of fraud were not yet accomplished. But the severity of these laws, necessary perhaps in one view, afforded many opportunities for oppression.

In all these particulars (and in many more, which it is not necessary to detail at present), a wide departure from the maxims and rights of the common law was, in cases of insolvency, found necessary for the occasions of an enlarged commerce. But it was not to be expected that a system which so completely outraged that law in particulars so important, would be suffered to reach beyond the range of necessity which gave it birth. And although by the first statutes of bankruptcy, in Henry VIII.'s reign, the Commission was not restricted, but made applicable to all ranks of men, when the law came to be renewed, in the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, it was limited to merchants; and other persons were left to the rules of the common law, neither restrained by the energy nor favoured with the indulgence of this peculiar code. It has in this way happened that, till lately in England, no system of equality was devised for the creditors of those unconnected with trade, that no restraint was imposed upon execution by individual creditors, and that debtors unconnected with commerce continued exposed to perpetual imprisonment, at the will of their creditors.

The circumstances of Scotland, and the spirit of her common law, have been more favourable to the establishment of such regulations for insolvency as might safely be applied to all ranks of men. Our forefathers felt not that dread of the civil law by which our neighbours were actuated. Perhaps this might be accounted for from the peculiar circumstances of the nations at the time, and from the different ways in which that system was introduced into the two countries. But however this may be, the institutions and rules of our municipal law have been much improved by the influence of the Roman jurisprudence, holding it, as we have ever done, to be merely a body of general jurisprudence, the rules of which were to be adopted wherever they were sanctioned by views of expediency, and not inconsistent with our own institutions or peculiar customs. The law of execution for debt partook of this improvement; and instead of continuing fixed and unaltered, as in England, modifications and amendments were gradually admitted, according to the exigencies of an advancing people. In this way it happened, that when the commerce of Scotland called for regulations adapted to cases of insolvency, the general disposition of the common law accorded better than in England with the condition of the country, and prevented the necessity of violent remedies.

Instead of rigidly adhering, as the English had done, to the old rule, which required an action and judgment in every case before execution could pass, the decree of registration, or by consent, when introduced in Scotland, was by statute applied to bills of exchange as well as to formal bonds. This gave a rapidity of execution, the want of which had been felt in England, and which, we have seen, it was one object of the commission of bankruptcy to supply. The remedy of inhibition was adopted from the canon law, and that of the arrestment in security from the civil, as improved in the institutions of France, where that law was most successfully cultivated; and in this way we had already apt means for securing a creditor against his debtor's fraud during the dependence of his action, or the necessary delay of execution. We soon saw the justice also of the Cessio Bonorum of [12] the Roman law, which gave freedom to the debtor innocent of fraud, and willing to give up everything to his creditors. These were the three prominent evils which had called for so sudden an alteration of the law in England, and they were thus gradually remedied in the law of Scotland, while yet our commerce was in its infancy. When that commerce increased so as to require a law for insolvency, the only points still to be provided for were the suppression of frauds, and the equal, rapid, and economical distribution of the estate; and in legislating on these subjects, what had already been accomplished enabled Parliament to make provision for other cases, as well as for those of traders.

Thus the progress of the Scottish bankrupt law has been gradual. We see little of that violent opposition between the common law and the new institutions which accompanied and restrained every interposition of the Legislature of our neighbouring country. The common and the statute law have been enabled to go hand in hand, till at last, instead of leaving every case of insolvency not strictly mercantile to the imperfect and unjust rules of the old common law, as applicable to the recovery of single debts, a double system of laws relative to bankrupts has been formed,—one branch of it applicable to all cases of insolvency; the other approaching nearly to the English institution, and applicable only to mercantile failures.¹

From this general idea of the progress of the two systems, it may be proper to proceed briefly to mark their characteristical and distinguishing features as compared with each other, and with the view we have already taken of the spirit of bankrupt law.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE ENGLISH BANKRUPT LAW.—The English code of bankrupt law was, from its first institution, intended to form a complete body of regulations for the insolvencies of traders.

When, in the reign of Henry VIII., the commerce of England had risen to sufficient importance to call upon the Legislature for a set of regulations that should free the trader from the evils of the old law, a plan was devised, and thus reduced to form. A commission was named, consisting of the first judges of the land, to whom very unusual and extensive powers were given. 'Their powers were, to take orders and directions, at their own wisdom and discretion, with the bodies of insolvents, and with their real and personal estate; and to cause the said estate and property to be viewed, rented, and appraised, and to make the sale thereof: or otherwise to order the same for the satisfaction and payment of the creditors, in proportion to the quantities of their debts.' They were also vested with very high powers for the prevention and punishment of frauds, concealments, etc. In the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth's reign this system was altered. Instead of the commission being given to the judges, it was, by a long succession of statutes, ordered to be entrusted to such wise, discreet, and learned persons as the Lord Chancellor should appoint. The whole code has, in the progress of two hundred years, been gradually ripened till it has grown at last into a complete system, having the triple object of preventing frauds, of dividing equally and expeditiously the estate of the debtor, and of discharging him from his debts in cases of fair insolvency. 1. Certain acts are defined as indicative of bankruptcy, the commission of which is, with the view of preventing frauds, declared to vitiate all the bankrupt's future transactions, and to entitle (with certain precautions) any creditor to take out a commission from Chancery for vesting the bankrupt's estate in the hands of the commissioners, who order his shop to be locked, and himself to be taken into custody. 2. The commissioners, as a court of delegation from the Lord Chancellor, are the judges before whom the affairs of the bankruptcy are conducted, the debts proved, the bankrupt examined, and the funds vested in assignees for division, the orders and decisions of the commissioners being subject to the review of the Lord Chancellor. 3. The immediate and active management is entrusted [13] to assignees chosen by the creditors themselves. And, 4. The creditors are formed into a deliberative body, to determine all questions of management, and to judge whether the bankrupt be entitled to a discharge, reporting their opinion to the commissioners and the Lord Chancellor.

Such was the general scope of the bankrupt laws of England as they lately stood. They have now undergone a thorough revisal, and in two successive consolidating Acts the whole of those laws have been digested into a system better adapted to the necessities of the extensive trade and manufactures of England.¹ In this reformation, the following seem to be the points of chief importance:—1. The description is enlarged of those who are subject to the bankrupt laws, many persons being formerly beyond the operation of those Acts who ought to have been included. 2. The description has also been enlarged of the Acts which place a trader within the operation of those laws. 3. The rule of the Scottish law has been adopted, which authorizes a trader who finds himself in insolvent circumstances to secure the equal distribution of his estate among his creditors.² 4. The settlement of insolvency, by means of a trust-deed, has been encouraged and secured against interruption by a commission of bankruptcy. 5. After the example of the Scottish law, contingent creditors have been admitted to the benefit of the distribution; and (besides a great number of other improvements) the Scottish composition contract has been adopted as a most useful improvement of the system.³ Other improvements are still contemplated: one in the tribunal by which bankrupt law is administered, another in the facilitating of extrajudicial arrangements between debtor and creditor.

¹ [There is now no such distinction.]

Much as the English law has disregarded persons who are not traders, they have not been entirely overlooked. A debtor, although not a trader, was formerly entitled to the benefit of what was called the Lords' Act, intended as a remedy against the endless imprisonment of the common law. By this Act, a debtor in prison for a debt under £300 might petition the courts for liberation; and on stating his condition, his funds, and his debts, and conveying everything to his creditors, he might have been liberated. Had the law stopped here, it would have been analogous to our law of Cessio Bonorum; but the benefit of the whole remedy was destroyed by a declaration, that if the creditor, who had the debtor in execution, should object to his enlargement, and find security for payment of a maintenance to him (a weekly sum not exceeding two shillings and fourpence), he might detain him in prison. 32 Geo. II. c. 28.

The great difficulty of introducing a reform into any part of English jurisprudence, and of proposing relief to debtors that would not give occasion to unforeseen frauds, and great evil to creditors, did not deter Lord Redesdale and others from giving commencement to an institution which is still in a course of experimental legislation, and to the perfecting of which the attention of Parliament has been recently called.⁴ It is sincerely to be hoped [14] that all these exertions will be crowned with success, and that the great body of information already collected by the committee of the House of Commons on this subject, will result at last in some effectual provision for giving to England the benefit of a complete remedy for the imperfections and errors of the common law relative to imprisonment for debt.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE BANKRUPT LAW OF SCOTLAND.—In Scotland there was not at first any attempt to form a complete code of bankrupt law. The evils of perpetual imprisonment, and of fraudulent preferences by voluntary deeds or judicial diligence, first called bankrupt on his own petition, even with the concurrence of creditors to any amount.]

¹ This most useful reformation in English jurisprudence was commenced, in many important points, by Sir Samuel Romilly. The subject was then taken up more systematically by the merchants of London, on the suggestion of Mr. John Smith, and a very curious and important inquiry instituted, on that gentleman's motion, before a [Select] Committee of the House of Commons. In the Report from the Select Committee on the operation of the bankrupt laws—ordered to be printed, 11 July 1817; Minutes of Evidence, 16 March 1818; Report, 3 May 1818, and further Report of Minutes of Evidence, 8 May 1818—numerous proofs have been collected of the imperfection of these laws, and a great body of useful information brought together, with a view to their reformation. [The two latest statutes are those of 1861 and 1869, 24 and 25 Vict. c. 134; 32 and 33 Vict. c. 71, the existing Act.]

² [By the existing English Act, no debtor can be made a

³ See Analysis of the Bill now depending in Parliament for the consolidation and amendment of the Bankrupt Law, by the Hon. Robert Henley Eden, 1823. Practical Treatise on the Bankrupt Law as amended by the New Act, by the same author, 1825. To this gentleman English merchants are indebted for the careful analysis and consolidation which has reduced to a single Act the whole system of their bankrupt law. [Digest of the Bankrupt Law, with reference to the New Act, 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 56, by Lord Henley (R. H. Eden), 3d edit. 1832. Griffith and Holmes on the Law and Practice of Bankruptcy, 1867.]

⁴ See reports from Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Insolvent Debtors Acts, 53 and 54 Geo. III., printed 13 June 1816. See also 5 Geo. IV. c. 61.

for the attention of the Legislature, and were remedied, as it were individually, by particular regulations, long before any idea was entertained of establishing a system of laws for insolvency.

The first dawn of bankrupt law in Scotland is perceptible in a very remote age; for the Cessio Bonorum of the Roman law is found among the earliest vestiges of our jurisprudence. But though this remedy against perpetual imprisonment was established so early in Scotland, it was not till the seventeenth century that our commerce was sufficiently extended to turn the attention of the Legislature towards the frauds of bankrupts. The first statute which professed to regulate matters of this kind originated with the judges of the Court of Session. By an act or rule of that court, in July 1620 (which was adopted by Parliament, and makes the statute 1621, c. 18), all collusive donations by insolvent debtors to their friends and relations, directly or indirectly, were prohibited; as by such deeds, in the first instance, it is, that a debtor endeavours, on the eve of his failure, to save something for future subsistence, and to provide for those in whose welfare he is interested. In this law, provision was also made against the unfair interference of a debtor, to disappoint, by private conveyances, the diligence of his creditors already begun. This was done by declaring all such deeds subject to challenge by him who should thus be disappointed.

Towards the end of the century in which this law was enacted, cases of insolvency became more frequent, and, from the sums which they involved, infinitely more important than had hitherto been known in the country. Frauds were daily practised which the existing laws were found inadequate to repress. Where a debtor granted a deed of preference to a favourite creditor, although in the immediate prospect of bankruptcy, no remedy existed but a proof at common law that the debtor was insolvent at the date of the deed; and that the receiver knew this to be the case. These intricate points of inquiry gave occasion to many involved questions; and it was found in those investigations so difficult to come to any conclusive issue, that little progress was commonly made after vast expense and delay. The Court of Session, who found themselves daily called upon to decide questions of this kind, and saw the bad consequences which flowed from the want of a fixed principle in a matter of such importance, named a committee of their number to propose a remedy for it. This was in 1694; and the fifth statute, which passed in the Parliament of 1696, was the result of their suggestions. By that law an universal and precise rule was laid down; the character of bankruptcy was correctly defined; and, this point being fixed, a presumption of fraud was established against all deeds granted within sixty days before in favour of prior creditors.

Besides these provisions for the annulling of fraudulent deeds, a direct punishment was enacted against the bankrupts themselves. The statute of 1621 declared all bankrupts, etc., who should be guilty of fraudulent devices against their creditors, infamous, incapable of honours and dignities, benefices or offices, or of sitting as jurymen, or bearing witness in courts of justice. The statute of 1696 subjects all fraudulent bankrupts to trial by the Court of Session, and on conviction, to punishment, in the discretion of the court, short of [15] death; and the Cessio Bonorum afforded an indirect punishment of great efficacy, since the debtor could not hope for liberation, but by vindicating his honesty and fair dealing.

Thus, when the attention of the Legislature was first turned to the frauds of bankrupts, all that seemed to be requisite was to make such regulations as might give precision and force to the principles of common justice, in preventing the debtor from injuring the creditors, or unfairly preferring favourite individuals.

While those laws were required as remedies against frauds by voluntary deeds, the necessity began to be felt of introducing equality among creditors doing diligence against the estate. It may appear, at first sight, that the natural, as it certainly is the best remedy for inequalities among creditors, would have been, as in England, a judicial process for attaching and distributing the whole estate; but this remedy was not at that time adopted in Scotland. As the laws against preference by voluntary deed had been introduced in the shape of partial remedies, unconnected with any general process of division; so it happened also with respect to the laws against preference by diligence or legal execution.

The method adopted for equalizing the claims of creditors doing diligence, was so very peculiar, that it is not easy to make it be understood in so brief a summary. It was first introduced in diligence against land, which in those early days appeared of chief importance, and perhaps to this is owing its peculiar nature. The Legislature in Scotland was always averse to authorize such proceedings against land for debt as might irrevocably carry off his estate from a landholder; and on this account, adjudication, the diligence against land, was qualified by a power of redeeming the land, by payment within a limited term. While this term continued unexpired, it was impossible to sell the land for payment without the debtor's consent; and the creditor who first adjudged, of course, excluded posterior adjudgers. In cases of insolvency this was a great grievance. But the Legislature could not be prevailed on to sanction any proceedings more peremptory. To remedy the evil, it was declared that all who should adjudge within a year should be held as equal in right. This was called the pari passu preference. It was manifestly a very imperfect remedy, till some means should be provided for bringing the land to sale. But at last the Legislature yielded so far as to allow a judicial sale of land for payment of debt, where the creditors were in possession, and the debtor bankrupt.

Still the old maxims regulated Execution against moveables, and the rule of preference rested upon mere priority in diligence. Not only was opportunity thus given for constituting fraudulent preferences, and for collusion with debtors; but from the overstrained anxiety of creditors, upon the slightest alarm, to secure for themselves a preference, much unnecessary expense was incurred, to the prejudice both of the creditors and of the debtor. It was not till the year 1754—notwithstanding the precedent in the case of adjudications—that even partial measures were adopted for securing equality among creditors doing diligence against the moveables. The Court of Session made an Act of Sederunt in that year, establishing an equality of preference among all poinders and arresters within a certain period of bankruptcy. But this was a mere experiment; and upon the expiration of the Act, which was in force only for four years, it was not renewed. This part of the law, therefore, fell back into its old state of imperfection: priority gave preference; and on the slightest alarm, creditors poured in with diligence against the unhappy debtor, and the most unjust preferences took place among the creditors. In this most imperfect state the law continued till the year 1772, when the first sequestration law was passed. It proved a salutary remedy at a very critical moment.

This was the first attempt to form anything like a general code of bankrupt law in Scotland. Instead of a commission of bankruptcy, as in England, a form of sequestra- [16] tion was adopted, under which the Court of Session sequestered the whole personal estate of the debtor, to be managed and sold by a judicial factor, and fairly divided among the creditors; and it was declared that no diligence against moveables by arrestment or poinding, within thirty days previous to the petition for sequestration, should give any preference, in the event of a sequestration taking place, the poinder being bound to deliver the goods poinded, or the price of them, if sold, and the arrester to deliver the arrested goods or debt to the factor, in order to be distributed among the creditors.

But this first attempt to form a general code of bankrupt law for regulating the disposal of the personal estate was extremely imperfect. Like the first plan of the English commission in Henry VIII.'s time, it included all ranks of men; and as in England it was thought proper to restrict their new code to traders, so it appeared to be necessary, in the renewal of the Scottish law, to separate the trading and manufacturing part of the community from other men. But in doing this, the Legislature did not altogether neglect the bankruptcy of those unconnected with trade, nor leave them to struggle with the evils of the old law. They felt that traders are often deeply interested as creditors, and their credit much involved with men who themselves are not traders; and in altering the law a double remedy was introduced,—one for traders, simple like that of England; another for common bankruptcies, supplying what had formerly been left unprovided for in relation to the preferences by diligence against moveables.

First, In excluding from the sequestration the bankruptcy of men unconnected with trade, it did not occur that any new regulations for the heritable estate were requisite; but it was necessary to devise some means for preventing, in the execution against moveables, those preferences which had, prior to 1772, been the cause of so much anxiety to creditors and oppression to debtors. The plan adopted was nearly similar to that of the Act of Sederunt 1754. By 23 Geo. III. c. 12, the bankruptcy of the debtor (as under the statute of 1696, c. 5) was taken as the criterion of preference among arresters and poinders, instead of the date of presenting the petition for sequestration. All arrestments and poindings within thirty days before and four months after the bankruptcy, were put upon an equal footing; and by the statute 33 Geo. III. c. 74, the period is still further extended to sixty days prior to the bankruptcy.

There are several forms of action in which effect is given to these equalizing rules for diligence against moveables; but the most general is that of a multiplepoinding, or action of double distress, similar to the English action of interpleader, in which the holder of the funds calls into the field every creditor who has a claim upon them, that the order of preference may be determined by the court, the fund divided, and the holder of it discharged.

Secondly, The mercantile system of bankrupt law in Scotland, though differing in form, and also in many essential points, from that of England, is so far similar, that both seem to accord well with the great pervading principles of bankrupt law.

By the first statute in 1772, the plan of distribution, which included only the personal estate, was alternative. 1. By the sequestration of the common law a disputed estate is taken by the court under its own management, and a factor appointed, accountable to the court, for behoof of the parties interested. Upon this model it was provided that a petition should be presented to the Court of Session, praying that, after due notification to the debtor, his personal estate should be sequestered, and put under the management of a factor, who should be chosen by the creditors, and should act under the direction of the court in disposing of the estate; and the creditors were to be ranked and the price distributed by a judgment of the court. 2. As the expense and delay of those proceedings (which were all judicial) were very considerable, it was declared that the creditors might choose, at a meeting to be held after the sequestration had been awarded, whether to continue [17] the sequestration, or to appoint a trustee, and have the whole affairs managed extrajudicially. Many improvements were made upon this plan, both in 1783 and in 1793; but these it would be improper at present to detail. It may be sufficient to observe, that the whole estate, real and personal, heritable and moveable, is now included in the sequestration, and that the radical change made upon the spirit of the institution was the combination of the judicial and private alternatives of the first law into one consistent system of trust and of judicial control, so as to give all the advantages of a private trust with all the benefits to be expected from the superintendence of a court of law. The sequestration, as a general diligence, stops all individual proceedings, and gives an opportunity for having the estate managed in the meantime by a factor, till the creditors can appear and verify their claims, in order to elect a trustee. This election of the trustee finishes the sequestration properly so called, and the judicial trust begins. The trustee is vested with the estate, and is the manager and distributor of the fund. In his management he is assisted by three commissioners, elected by the creditors from their own body, as a committee of management, and their proceedings are subject to the constant superintendence of the whole creditors. In his character of distributor of the estate, he acts not as the English assignee does, but as judge, in the first instance, subject to the review of the Court of Session. It is his business to bring up the bankrupt for examination before the sheriff of the county, to make proper states of the affairs, to state objections to the claims of the creditors, to rank the creditors on the fund, and to strike the dividend; and objections to his proceedings in these respects are discussed and determined summarily on petition to the Court of Session. When the time appointed for a final distribution comes, the creditors themselves determine whether the bankrupt is entitled to a discharge, or whether he is to be left to the remedy of the common law, the cessio bonorum, under which, without being discharged of his debts, he is relieved from imprisonment.

This system of bankrupt law has been established by a series of temporary or (if the expression be allowable) experimental statutes, and the subsisting Act is of the same description. To the wise precaution of proceeding thus gradually, it is owing that the Bankrupt Law of Scotland has reached its present excellence, and that practical wisdom and convenience have been kept so steadily in view in regulating the administration of this most difficult department. Instead of attempting at once to form a complete system, the progress of the institution has been slow and gradual, no improvement having been adopted till the course of experience naturally led to it. In reviewing the steps of these proceedings, it is pleasing to observe the happy combination of legal knowledge and mercantile experience that characterized all the consultations in which those laws were digested. Among the lawyers who took a share in the deliberations, there were men of eminent talents and profound knowledge; while those who acted as the deputies of the merchants were men of large views and great candour, who, though as traders they wished the system of English and Scottish law to approach as nearly to similarity as possible, were strongly impressed with the superiority of some of our own institutions. From the papers which are in my possession, there appear, throughout a series of consultations of nearly thirty years, a candour and unanimity in all the proceedings, and a sincere wish to combine, for the public benefit, the knowledge, experience, and foresight of the two professions.¹

In the revisal of our code of Bankrupt Law, which is now depending, and the result [18] of which I hope to be able before the close of this work to state, we shall in our turn be able to derive benefit from the new institutions and improvements introduced into the English system. And there is every likelihood that, by this course of legislation, progressive, candid, liberal, and free from national jealousy, we shall in both countries have the advantage of a code well adapted, and with the proper discriminations, to the occasions and to the jurisprudence of either nation.²

¹ This spirit would never have been maintained in all its vigour, had it not been for the exertions of Sir Ilay Campbell, lately Lord President of the Court of Session. When, upon the expiration of the first sequestration statute, a formidable opposition was made to its renewal, he was selected by the merchants, on account of his long experience, his eminent talents, and extensive knowledge of the law, to defend the Act, and the interests of the merchants, which seemed to be involved in its fate; and amidst the pressure of other important duties, he devoted much of his attention to the improvement of this branch of the law.

² [For a continuation of the history of the Scots Law of Bankruptcy, see the author's Commentaries on Recent Statutes (a supplement to the present work), chap. v., where there is a full commentary on the Act 2 and 3 Vict. c. 41, the bankrupt statute next in order of time. It continued in force till 1856, when it was superseded by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, the provisions of which will be noticed in their proper place in the course of the work.]

BOOK II.

OF THE SEVERAL KINDS OF ESTATE, WHICH MAY BE ATTACHED FOR DEBT.

[19] IN distinguishing the funds which, by law, may be attached for the payment of debt, two questions chiefly demand attention:—1. What part of the acknowledged estate and effects of a debtor is to be considered as responsible for debt, and open to the diligence of his creditors? and, 2. By what criterion are creditors to distinguish the right of their debtor in cases of ambiguous possession? Without being too curious about minute divisions of the subject, I shall, in distinct chapters, explain the several sorts of estate which may be made available to creditors.

The general rule is, that all the acknowledged property of a debtor is available to creditors, and may, by the operation of legal diligence, be converted into money, and applied in payment of debt. The property of land and other heritable subjects, whether of the nature of a perpetual estate or of temporary endurance, liferents, reversionary rights, servitudes, leases, faculties, and powers, may all be affected by the diligence of creditors, subject to certain exceptions, restrictions, and conditions. Incorporeal rights also, as heritable bonds, bank and Government stock, shares in public companies, patents, literary property, and debts, are responsible to creditors, under certain restrictions; and, finally, moveable property, wares, merchandise, money, may be applied by creditors to answer the debts of the owner. In the common course of life, and especially in a trading country, the great foundation of credit is the mass of commodities of a perishable nature which pass through a trader's hands, and form the subject of his dealings. But it is not unnatural to consider property in land as first in importance; and it may lead to a more systematic arrangement of the subject to take—

1. Estates in land, and connected with land.
 2. Incorporeal rights not connected with land.
 3. Moveables.
-

PART I.

OF ESTATES IN LAND, AND CONNECTED WITH LAND.

ACCORDING to the prevailing spirit of modern law, land is considered as a commercial property. While the rules of its succession are clear and uniform, all undue restrictions on alienation are discountenanced, and the rights of creditors in regard to it are ample and of ready access.

With one signal exception in the case of entails, the rules and proceedings of the [20] law of Scotland relative to this sort of property are simple, just, and efficient.¹ The obstructive wisdom of more modern times, called into action on occasion of political convulsion and rebellion, but with effects as salutary for the purposes of trade as if devised in the true spirit of commercial policy. The forms of voluntary alienation and security are plain, simple, and intelligible; the modes of execution by creditors are prompt, effectual, and equal in process and in operation; and although it has been doubted by some whether there ought to be, in public records, a complete disclosure of the state of a man's property as charged with debt, while by others it has been suspected that our system of records is fast tending to a state of inextricable confusion and practical uselessness, the fact is, that the whole landed property of Scotland is registered in volumes deposited in the Register House, and exhibiting at one view, to those desirous to purchase land, houses, or other heritable subjects, or meaning to lend money on the security of such property, or desiring to have a correct notion of their debtor's land estate as a ground of general credit, the extent of that estate, the conditions under which it is held, and the securities which may already have been created over it.

LEASES are inferior rights in land, with respect to which, although the same means of information do not exist, knowledge sufficiently accurate may be obtained to regulate the credit of the owner. Leasehold property is not recorded in a public register; but no lease of which the term exceeds a year can be effectual unless it be in writing, followed by possession, so that by inquiry at the tenant the whole conditions of the lease may be known.²

SERVITUDES on land are rights of a definite and known description; and, whether as burdens on the debtor's property, or as privileges augmenting its value, they may, on careful inquiry, be discovered by creditors.

CHAPTER I.

OF PROPERTY IN LAND, AS RESPONSIBLE FOR DEBT.

ALL the land of Scotland, so far as it belongs to individuals, is vested in them either in superiority or in property. The former, called DOMINIUM DIRECTUM, is available to creditors, as entitling the holder to draw feu-duties, or to reap occasional advantages on the entry of heirs, or of purchasers, or of creditors; or as giving a right to the elective franchise if the holding is immediately under the Crown, and the land extends to forty shillings of old extent, or £400 Scots of valued rent. The latter is the more valuable right of actual occupation and exclusive use, called by our lawyers DOMINIUM UTILE. Either of these rights may

¹ [Notwithstanding the excellence which the Scottish system of land rights had attained when the author wrote, important improvements were effected by the Legislature in 1847, 1848, 1858, 1860; and these, with others, were consolidated in one statute in 1868, by the Act 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101. Nor does it appear that the simplification of titles and the procedure relating to land has yet reached its furthest point.]

² It has been proposed to a certain extent to introduce a system of registration applicable to this sort of property. Whether such a proposal shall be adopted may perhaps be explained in the Appendix to this work. It may only be observed in the meanwhile, that amidst the advantages proposed to be attained, the increase and complication of records would prove a serious evil. [By 20 and 21 Vict. c. 26, certain classes of leases for not less than thirty-one years may be recorded in the Register of Sasines, so as to be effectual against singular successors in the lands without possession.]

be sold for the benefit of creditors, or attached by diligence; and although it is not necessary to enter here into the doctrines relative to the titles by which those rights are held, a short view of the leading principles which rule the transference of this sort of property may not be misplaced.

SECTION I.

OF THE VASSAL'S ESTATE, OR DOMINIUM UTILE.

[21] This is the most valuable estate in land known in the law of Scotland, though of less dignity in the scale of feudal importance. In the transference of land, the act of delivery, which is the badge of transference, is very peculiar in its form. In Scotland, in ancient times, land and houses were delivered by an actual entry of the acquirer into the possession; but for many ages past, the delivery of a part symbolically for the whole—of a little earth and stone of the lands for the lands themselves—has been established as the only legitimate mode of delivery. This symbolical delivery, or improper investiture (in the language of the Feudists), is with us called INFECTMENT, or SASINE, and has entirely superseded the proper investiture, or real delivery of the land itself. It is evidenced only by a notarial instrument, which stands connected with the whole system of registration, by which land rights in Scotland are kept so clear; and actual possession of land, without sasine, is quite unavailing to pass the property.¹

Sasine, the modus transferendi of land, is obtained either directly under the precept of a feudal proprietor, himself infeft, or indirectly from that person's feudal superior on his resignation; or by assignation, voluntary or judicial, to a warrant for infeftment not yet executed, in consequence of which assignation the warrant may be executed in favour of the assignee; or, on the devolution of the right to an heir, according to the established law of succession, when the feudal superior grants his warrant for renewing the feudal investiture by sasine to the creditor or to the heir.

The instrument by which alone this requisite of sasine is established is itself made entirely to depend for its efficacy, against purchasers and creditors, on the act of registration within sixty days.² This system of registration will deserve particular attention hereafter. The expediency has been questioned, the practicability doubted as applicable to a country where many extensive and complicated money transactions take place; but the rules of this act of completion are chiefly deserving of observation. See below, in the Fourth Book. See Index, voce Voluntary Security.

The right, whether voluntary or judicial, which is first duly completed by sasine recorded, carries the property. Although the purchaser of a feudal subject shall have entered into possession of the lands, and paid the price, a creditor of the seller, or the trustee for the whole body of his creditors, adjudging or receiving a voluntary conveyance from the bank-

¹ In Stewart v Sandieman, 1771, n.r., a person had bargained for a house, and received possession; but the conveyances were not completed when he failed, unable to pay the price: the seller was found entitled to withhold, as in an uncompleted bargain. One judge (Lord Monboddo) was of opinion that the conveyance was complete, as possession had been delivered. The other judges were quite clear of the rule—'No sasine, no delivery of land;' and that, till delivery, the bargain was voidable, for failure to pay the price. [By 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, it was made unnecessary to proceed to the lands to give sasine; but infeftment was effectually obtained by producing to a notary public the warrants of sasine and relative writs, and expeding and recording in the Register of Sasines a notarial instrument, setting forth that sasine had been given in the form prescribed. Since 1858 it has been sufficient to record the conveyance itself in the Register of Sasines, with warrant of registration thereon, or even parts of it, as directed by the granter; or in some cases a notarial instrument setting forth the right of the disponent or person in right of the conveyance. 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101.]

² [It is competent to register a conveyance, notarial instrument, or instrument of sasine, at any time during the life of the person in whose behalf infeftment is taken. 8 and 9 Vict. c. 35, sec. 3; 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 142.]

rupt, and obtaining and recording the first infeftment, will acquire a preference, leaving the purchaser to his dividend as a personal creditor merely.

Even where the seller himself has not taken sasine, so that his right is only personal, this personal right is not conclusively transferred without sasine. If a second disponee, or the general creditors, on the seller's bankruptcy, obtain and record sasine before the right of the first disponee is so completed, they will take the property preferably to such first disponee, provided the title of the seller (as explained in the next paragraph) be so connected as to accresce to the previous conveyance.¹

Where a conveyance to land is granted by one who is not himself infeft, with pre- [22] cept, in consequence of which the disponee takes sasine, that sasine is ineffectual while the granter continues uninfeft; but a subsequent infeftment of the granter will complete the right of the disponee, it being held in law to accresce, or, by a retrospective relation, to accede to the previous conveyance. If, therefore, two conveyances shall have been granted, and both disponees are infeft, and the second, in order to make good his right, shall infeft the disposer, this infeftment will avail his competitor, and complete his previous infeftment.²

Among the general creditors of a proprietor of land not infeft, and where none of the competitors have obtained infeftment, the final settlement of the competition cannot be imagined to take place on such imperfect right; so that the question whether the first disposition would carry the preference never can occur. The trustee for the whole creditors, or some individual, would proceed to complete the feudal right by which the preference would be regulated.

SECTION II.

OF THE ESTATE OF THE SUPERIOR, AS AFFECTED BY CONDITIONS IN THE FEUDAL GRANT.

The effect of CONDITIONS in the feudal grant, from the superior to the vassal, may be of importance to creditors in two views: First, The creditors of the superior may have to dependence of the process, but now he was of the opinion of the last interlocutor; and we both thought that, notwithstanding that opinion, if one having a personal right should assign it, and thereafter be infeft, and then grant a second disposition, and infeft that second disponee, he would be preferred to the first. But he said, that if the second disponee should first acquire his disposition, and then infeft his author, the first disposition would be preferred. But I doubted of this last, because infefting the author vested the property in him, whereof he could not be denuded by the personal disposition. But in this case the author's infeftment would have accresced to Blackwoodhouse, since both he and Chatto were infeft, but erroneously' (1737, Elchies' Notes, ii. 103, 104).

¹ It was at one time doubted whether the conveyance of a right to lands merely personal did not fully carry the personal right, which was all that belonged to the seller. When this question first occurred, the Court was of opinion that an assignation to an uncompleted real right was not effectual in competition with a right completed by infeftment (Brown v Smith, 1676, M. 2844). But opinions altered upon the question, and a simple conveyance, without sasine, came to be held completely to denude a disposer whose right was merely personal (Rule v Purdie, 1710, M. 2844; Sinclair v Sinclair, 1733, M. 2848). The question, however, came again to solemn trial in the well-known case of Bell of Blackwoodhouse. At first, judgment was pronounced finding that the conveyance to the personal right was a complete transference, and preferable to a subsequent adjudication even when completed by sasine; but upon a petition and answers, a hearing in presence was appointed, and afterwards informations. The judgment was altered, and 'the second conveyance, being an adjudication, was preferred, in respect infeftment was expedite upon the same, the other remaining personal' (Bell v Gartshore, 1737, M. 2848, 5 B. S. 198, 2 Ross' L. C. 410). It was a point, however, which was thought to be attended with very great difficulty. Elchies was against the decision, and some other judges. Elchies says, in reporting the decision, 'Me et quibusdam aliis renitentibus;' and he adds: 'Arniston avowed that he had several times changed his opinion on this question even during the

But any doubts which were entertained before the above decision are now held to be settled; and according to the doctrine in this case of Bell, the law is laid down by Erskine, that no conveyance of a personal right to lands can so divest the disposer as to prevent him from granting a posterior deed that may, by prior sasine, be made the preferable. Ersk. ii. 7, 26.

² Henderson v Campbell, 1821, 1 S. 103. This doctrine requires attention in bankruptcy, for it may happen that a measure taken for the general behoof may rear up unexpectedly the security of a creditor, which otherwise would have been unavailing. [See below, B. iv. ch. i. sec. 1, § 3; B. iv. ch. i. sec. 2, § 4; B. vi. part ii. ch. v. sec. 11, § 1.]

inquire concerning the efficacy of such conditions and clauses in securing or in discharging the pecuniary rights of superiority; or, Secondly, The creditors of the vassal may have to [23] determine whether there be not vested in their debtor a real right, which the conditions of the charter may be ineffectual to defeat.

The right of the superior may be made available to creditors as a fund of payment, either (1) in consequence of affording a freehold qualification; or (2) by means of the annual duties; or (3) by the incidents, casualties, and fines which may fall to the superior.¹

I. ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.—The estate of superiority comprehending this right may be sold by creditors, and in particular circumstances it is of great value in the market. It consists of a clear right, as immediate vassal of the Crown, in any estate of the value of forty shillings of old extent, or of £400 Scots of valued rent.² But it is not the object of this inquiry to discuss the nature of that elective franchise, but to inquire into the pecuniary interests of the superior, in so far as they depend on the condition of the feudal grant.

II. FIXED RENTS.—These fixed rents are now either feu-duties or blench-duties, the latter being nominal, and mere acknowledgments of superiority; the former sometimes equivalent to a full permanent rent for the lands.

III. INCIDENTS OR CASUALTIES.—The casualties which are of importance in the present day are nonentry, relief, and composition for an entry.

1. NONENTRY DUTIES are due to the superior on the fee becoming vacant by the death of the vassal last infeft; and the duties payable are: 1st, The feu-duties in feu-holding, or the retour-duties or valued rent in blench-holdings, or £1 Scots for every £100 Scots of valuation in converted ward-holdings, previous to citation in the declarator; and 2^d, The real rents of the lands after citation. This last, being a severe penalty, is avoided by any reasonable ground of excuse for delaying the entry, and is generally compounded for the usual duties.³ The superior's action for making effectual his preference is a declarator of nonentry, grounded on his sasine. The heir is called for his interest.⁴ The conclusions of the summons are: 1st, To have it declared that the lands, from a particular term, have been in nonentry; 2^d, That the retour-duties or feu-duties of the same belonged from that time to the pursuer; 3^d, That the pursuer has right to poind the ground of the lands for the said duties until the heir's entry, and for a year's rent for relief. Decree declaring the nonentry entitles the superior not only to his remedy for the past, but also to enter into possession of the lands thenceforward, and to have the ordinary remedy of a proprietor against tenants and intromitters for the actual rents.

2. RELIEF is the duty which is paid to the superior for a renewal of the feu to an heir, and is generally taxed in the grant at double the amount of the ordinary duties. Where it is not so taxed, it would appear that a sum equal to a single year's duties, paid along with the duties of the year, is the legitimate charge.⁵

3. COMPOSITION for an entry to a singular successor is a charge of more importance. It

¹ The superior is secured in his feu-duties by his own charter and sasine; the vassal's right forming a burden on the superior's, under condition of payment of the feu-duties contained in the reddendo. But of this hereafter, in treating of the superior's preference in competition.

² See Wight, c. 2, p. 158, and Bell, on Elections, p. 46. [The qualification to vote has been entirely changed, first by 2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 65, and again by 31 and 32 Vict. c. 48. Feu-duties of the value of £5 a year still afford a county qualification.]

³ Robin v Drummond, 1823, 2 S. 359, where there was a doubt, and depending litigation, between the claims of two persons as vassals. [Preston v E. Dundonald's Crs., 1799, Hume 770; Hill v Kid, 1812, Hume 771; Hill v Merchant

Maidens' Hospital, 1816, Hume 771; Marshall v Mather, 1835, 14 S. 30; Wallace v E. Eglinton, 1836, 14 S. 599.]

⁴ The apparent heir of the person last infeft, it is said, need not be called, where the action proceeds on a defect in the title of a singular successor. But that seems doubtful, and the better practice is to call him where he is known. Haig v Forbes, 1821, 1 S. 9, note. [It is not necessary, though it is usual, to call the heir, when the vassal has alienated his feu, and the disponent is in a position to take an entry at once. Mags. of Dundee v Kidd, 1829, 7 S. 801; Mackenzie v Mackenzie, 1838, 16 S. 1326; Scott v Falconer, 1863, 1 Macph. 1164; Mags. of Hamilton v Swim, 1854, 16 D. 437; Bell's Prin. 709.]

⁵ [See Prin. 716.]

amounts to a full year's rent of the subject, where it is not taxed by the charter.¹ This is a payment which is not to be regarded as a feudal casualty, but as a composition [24] resulting out of the statutes by which superiors have been forced to enter creditors and purchasers, contrary to the original spirit of the law of feus.²

The right of relief and composition due to the superior arose out of the nature of the feudal grant. By the original principles of the feudal law, the grant was personal. Neither heirs nor creditors had the least right to ask a renewal of the grant, and the gradual admission of the heir was secured or accompanied by a payment to the superior, which at first was valuable, at last fell to a double of the feu-duties or retour-duties of the land; while a stranger could obtain a grant only by personal favour, or at a high price. The admission of heirs into the destination was held to entitle the heir to demand an entry, but to import no discharge of the relief or fine; and where the destination was made to assignees, it was held that the superior was, by his contract, bound only to enter the vassal or his assignee, but not to change his vassal after he had once entered.³ The first interposition of the Legislature was in behalf of creditors. In 1469 it was provided, relative to execution on the brieve of distress, that 'the oure lord sall ressave the creditour, or ony uthir byar tenande to him, thay payande to the oure lord a ziere's mail, as the lande is set for the tyme.'⁴ This is confirmed by 1669, c. 18, where it is declared, that 'by several Acts of Parliament, and constant practick of the kingdom, there is one year's rent of all lands, etc., apprized, due and payable to the superior of the said lands and others, before he can be holden to enter and infest the compriser;' and the same is enacted as to adjudication. Although voluntary purchasers were not, under those laws, entitled to force an entry, they accomplished it by means of a bond, on which they adjudged. But on the successive rebellions which agitated Scotland in the beginning of the eighteenth century, the policy was adopted of breaking the spirit of clanship, by destroying the influence and power of feudal superiors, and extending the power of alienation. By 20 Geo. II. c. 50, it was provided, that any heir served and retoured to, or any one who shall purchase or acquire from, the proprietor last vest and seized, shall be entitled to force an entry from the superior by horning and other diligence, 'provided that no superior shall be obliged to give obedience to such charge, unless the charger at the same time shall pay or tender to him such fees or casualties as he is by law entitled to receive upon the entry of such heir or purchaser.'⁵

AMOUNT OF THE YEAR'S RENT.—Under these statutes doubts have been moved, both as to the rents to be included and as to the deductions to be made in reckoning the amount of the composition.

In a land estate it was held that the superior was entitled to demand a year's rent, as the lands were let to tenants at the time, deducting feu-duties, public burdens, and annual burdens, imposed with the superior's consent.⁶

To houses built in a village on ground feued the same rule was applied, with the

¹ It was held not sufficient to exclude the superior's demand for the full rent, that the original grant bound the superior to enter heirs or successors (Thomson, May 22, 1810, F. C.; M'Lachlan v Tait, 1823, 2 S. 267); although in the disposition preceding the charter the words were, 'each heir or singular successor,' the charter bearing 'cujuslibet hæredis vel successoris.' [But if taxed in the charter, the benefit is not lost by omission in charters by progress (Stewart v Russell, June 3, 1813, F. C.); and an obligation to enter for a taxed sum may even be constituted by the superior's titles (Learmonth v Govrs. of Trinity Hospital, 1854, 16 D. 580). Where the lands are in the occupancy of the vassal, the actual value of the lands is the measure of the composition. Lord Blantyre v Dunn, 1858, 20 D. 1188.]

² [See per L. J.-C. Hope in Stirling v Ewart, 1842, 4 D. 684; per L. Brougham in same case, aff. 1844, 3 Bell's App. 128; Edin. Gas-Light Co. v Taylor, 1843, 5 D. 1325.]

³ Stair, ii. 4, 32. Lady Carnegie v L. Cranburn, 1663 (4th point of the case), M. 10375; Ogilvie v Kinloch, 1673, M. 10384.

⁴ 1469, c. 36. Acta Parl. vol. ii. p. 96, c. 12.

⁵ 20 Geo. II. c. 50, secs. 12 and 13. [This power to enforce an entry was extended by 10 and 11 Vict. c. 48, sec. 86; substantially re-enacted by 32 and 33 Vict. c. 116, sec. 4.]

⁶ Aitchison v Hopkirk, 1775, M. 15060, 5 B. S. 613, Hailes 612. This case was decided after careful inquiries into the practice, 1st, as to lands; and 2d, as to village property.

additional deduction of a reasonable sum for repairs to the houses and other perishable subjects.¹

Property subfeued as building ground in a city opened a question of unusual importance, in consequence of the extension of Edinburgh over lands held in feu, and subfeued to builders. The point had been raised and discussed by the anonymous commentator on Stair (who is understood to have been Lord Elchies), p. 175, and was judicially determined in the case cited below, where it was decided by Lord Meadowbank, after great consideration, and his judgment affirmed by the Court, and by the House of Lords, that nothing more is demandable than the subfeu-duty.² It remains to be determined what shall be the effect of a subfeu for an elusory feu-duty, or one under the true value, in consideration of a price, which may be called a grassum. This point was questioned in the case cited above, Anderson against Marshall, but it was compromised. It has again been raised, and may be determined in time to be noticed in the end of the book.³

Teind.—In calculating the year's rent to be paid to the superior, the vassal is entitled to deduct the value of the teind; but a doubt arose whether, where the teinds were valued, the superior was entitled to insist on limiting the deduction to the valued teind, or whether the vassal might not follow the common rule of deducting one-fifth of the rent as the value of the teind. On the course of practice, as sanctioned by a decree in 1819, the Court recently held the vassal entitled to deduct one-fifth, notwithstanding the existence of a decree of valuation.⁴

Superiority.—An adjudger of a superiority is bound to pay only the feu-duty.⁵

Heirs of Entail and Corporations.—Doubts may arise in various cases, where the vassal comes either in an ambiguous character, or with peculiarities not contemplated in the original contract. Thus: 1. An heir of entail may be viewed either as a disponee or as an heir. The institute, who is not heir of line, appears to be entitled to no character but that of a singular successor, bound to pay a year's rent; a substitute, who is also heir of the original investiture, is entitled to enter on a mere duplication of the feu-duty.⁶ But it remains unsettled whether a substitute, not an heir of the original investiture, is to fall under the former or the latter rule, the superior not being entitled to have that point fixed in the original charter on the entail.⁷ 2. As a superior, where a corporation acquires right to a feudal estate, would, by entering the corporation as vassal, cut off all his future casualties, it has been held that he cannot be compelled to do so,⁸—leaving it as a matter for private compromise how the corporation is to remove the objection, whether by naming

¹ Anderson v Marshall, 1824, 3 S. 236. See the above case of Aitchison.

² Cockburn Ross v Govrs. of Heriot's Hospital, 1815, 18 F. C. 393, 3 Bligh 707, 6 Pat. 640.

³ [The effect of a subfeu for a large price, with elusory feu-duties, is to give to the superior a right to the feu-duty, with the interest of the grassum. It is not yet settled whether the superior is to have any casualty falling to his vassal from a sub-vassal in the year of the vassal's entry' (Prin. 721). Campbell v. Hamilton, 1832, 10 S. 734; see Lord Blantyre v Dunn, 1858, 20 D. 1188.]

⁴ Reid v Fullarton, 1819, n. r.; Thomson v Simson, 1825, 4 S. 224.

⁵ Monkton v L. Yester, 1634, 1 B. S. 201.

⁶ M'Kenzie v M'Kenzie, 1777, M. App., Sup. and Vass. 2, Hailes 760.

⁷ D. of Argyle v E. Dunmore, 1795, M. 15068. [The superior is bound to enter the heir of the former investiture, in terms of a new entail, on payment of relief, only reserving his right to claim a year's rent on the entry of the first substitute who is not heir of the former investiture. Mackenzie, cit.; M. Hastings v Oswald, 1859, 21 D. 871. But when the superior has once received payment of the composition of a year's rent from any heir under the new investiture, this operates as an enfranchisement of all the subsequent disponees, who become entitled to be entered on payment of relief only. Stirling v Ewart, 1842, 4 D. 684; aff. 1844, 3 Bell's App. 128. Adv.-Gen. v Swinton, 1854, 17 D. 21. See also Lockhart v Denholm, 1760, M. 15047; Duke of Hamilton v Baillie, 1827, 6 S. 94.]

⁸ Hill v Merchant Maiden Hospital, Jan. 17, 1815, F. C. [Hamilton v University of Glasgow, 1716, Robertson's App. 172; E. Mansfield v Gray, 1829, 7 S. 642; Campbell v Orphan Hospital, 1843, 5 D. 1273 (where an entry to the office-bearers of a corporation, on payment of a composition without any reservation or stipulation, was held to entitle the corporation to complete a title by adjudication in its own name, and to discharge all claim for future composition); Gardner v Trinity House of Leith, 1845, 7 D. 286; Learmonth v Trinity Hospital, 1854, 16 D. 580.]

a trustee to hold for the corporation, or by stipulating to pay an entry on every revolution of a certain term of years.

OF THE EVASION OF CASUALTIES, AND THE REMEDIES.—The casualties of superiority are liable to disappointment, (1) by the vassal or purchaser contenting himself with possessing on the personal right, without taking an entry from the superior, or completing the feudal right by sasine; (2) by conveying the personal right, the purchaser not completing his right by sasine, but keeping the precept open, and selling again with a similar assignation; and (3) by subfeuing, by which the dominium utile may be transferred, without any immediate necessity of coming to the superior for an entry.

To preserve against these evasions this valuable part of the superior's right, various conditions have been introduced into the feudal contract, and various devices used to secure the entry of heirs and singular successors with the superior, and to prevent alienation by means of subfeus. The efficacy of such conditions next deserves attention.

[26] There appears in the books¹ a report, which seems to support the doctrine that a superior is not bound to enter a disponee whose author was not entered, unless the relief duties shall be paid for that author as if he had entered. The Court has again and again taken occasion to deny that decision as reported, and to recommend that it should be publicly understood that no such determination was given. It is, indeed, not law.

RETENTION OF CHARTER.—Superiors sometimes attempt to retain their vassal's charter, and refuse to deliver it till sasine be taken and recorded. This was incidentally held to be an illegal practice, unless in so far as the vassal approved or acquiesced.² But more recently the Court, proceeding on professional usage in cases of this sort, gave their sanction to the device, on the sole ground of practice.³ At the same time, it will be observed that the effect of such a device against third parties would be very questionable. If it were to happen, for instance, that a person, after having purchased land, and having had his charter made out, should fail, and that on sequestration the trustee for his creditors should offer to the superior full payment of the price, it appears that he would have right to demand delivery of the charter, with the precept unexecuted, so as to complete his title under the judicial conveyance to the precept.

STIPULATIONS.—But the chief reliance is placed on particular STIPULATIONS and CONDITIONS in the feudal grant. With respect to these, it is obvious that unless the condition can be made effectual as a real burden, the superior must trust to the personal obligation of his vassal, and to the remedy which he may have as a creditor on such obligation. The first point, then, to be ascertained is, What are the requisites of a condition by which the vassal's right shall be held as qualified in the hands of his creditors, or of purchasers?

1. Personal Obligations.—A mere obligation on the part of the vassal to enter within a certain time, by taking sasine on the charter, or not to dispone before he has himself entered, or not to subfeu so as to disappoint the superior of an entry, or not to sell till he has first offered the land back to the superior, can have no effect against third parties—purchasers or creditors. These are obligations merely personal, and can serve only as the ground of a personal action.

2. Conditions of Grant.—But if, instead of being thus expressed, the stipulation shall be made a condition of the grant, it may have a very different effect. It will qualify the vassal's right so long as that right remains personal; and it will qualify even the feudal

¹ Gordon v Grant and Lumsden, 29 June 1814, F. C.

² Stewart v Burnside, 1794, Bell's Fol. Ca. 75; M. 15027.

³ M'Ritchie v M'Donald and M'Neill, 1801, 2 Ross' L. C. 165, [where it is shown that this case is misapprehended by the author. It has been decided that a superior is not bound to grant to an heir an assignable charter, on which a stranger may be infeft without paying composition. Mags. of Musselburgh v Brown, 1804, M. 15038. See Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, vol. ii. 1054, 1055. A charter 'to heirs and assignees' means to assignees before infeftment, and does not of itself oblige the superior to receive as vassal a disponee from one infeft, without payment of composition. Stair, ii. 4. 32; Ersk. ii. 7. 5, notes. Hamilton v Dunn, 1853, 15 D. 925.]

right, so as to be effectual against purchasers and creditors, provided the condition shall enter the instrument of sasine, and so appear in the record. This, as to a clause of pre-emption, seems to have been taken for granted in one case;¹ and in another, more recent, the doctrine was confirmed, though doubts were entertained by the House of Lords, which leave the question still open.²

Mr. Erskine seems to hold, that without a clause of irritancy, the condition will not avail.³ But this doctrine seems to be questionable. Lord Stair entertains no doubt of the efficacy of the clause of pre-emption (or of the more sweeping clause de non alienando), by [27] force of the provision merely. On strict feudal principles, they are effectual as conditions of the grant, without a compliance with which the superior is not bound to give an entry to the heir of his vassal: and even if the breach of the condition is by a subfeu—though to a certain extent it will be effectual—yet the lands, by descending to the heirs of the vassal, will at last fall into nonentry; and so the necessity will recur of coming again to the superior, who will not be bound to grant an entry, unless the conditions of the grant have been complied with. There is a distinction between the feudal contract of superior and vassal and the prohibitions of an entail. In the former case the vassal's right cannot long subsist without his being compelled to recur to the contract with the superior; and the obligations incumbent on the vassal by the contract are conditional, and may be insisted on by the superior before he will consent to renew the title. In the latter there is no contract affording an immediate and direct remedy, but a perfect fee is bestowed on the heirs of entail, which will be effectual, if not 'irritated and resolved.'⁴

3. Conditions not recorded.—When the condition is omitted in the infeftment, and of course does not appear in the record, it will not affect third parties, neither purchasers nor

¹ See below, Preston v Lord Dundonald's Crs., p. 27, note 6.

² Campbell of Blytheswood v Dunn, 1823, 2 S. 299. In that case a feu-contract was entered into, under condition that there should be no subfeu, that any conveyance to be granted should be presented for confirmation within twelve months, and that this conveyance should be made out by the agent of the superior. The Court held these conditions effectual in an action of declarator by the superior against the vassals. The case went to the House of Lords; and, on the motion of Lord Gifford, was remitted back (1 W. and S. 690) to have the opinion of the whole judges. (See 6 S. 679.) But the parties did not proceed further.

³ Ersk. ii. 3, 13; and again more fully at title 5, sec. 28, where he says, 'that, by our feudal rules, a clause declaring any sale of the lands that shall be made by the feuar, without offering them first to the superior, to be null, is not of itself sufficient to invalidate the sale, unless there be also a clause irritating the feuar's right in that event.'

The authority on which Erskine relies for this doctrine is Stirling v Johnston, 1757, M. 2342, 5 B. S. 223. Of that case I may observe, that it is very inaccurately reported in the Fac. Coll., vol. i. p. 14. The question arose with a stranger purchaser, and the condition was not inserted in the sasine. It occurred to me formerly that this decision determined only the point, that in whatever manner the condition becomes effectual, it can have no operation against purchasers unless it shall be entered on the record. But the notes of Lord Kilkerran justify Erskine's statement of the result. [This case is condemned as objectionable in every particular in Tailors of Aberdeen v Coutts, 1834, 13 S. 226; rem. 1837, 2 Sh. and M'L. 609; 1840, 1 Rob. 296. Although a distinction is said to exist in regard to conditions in feus between those which are in their nature continuous and permanent, and have a natural and proper connection with the subject of the grant, and those which oblige to the performance of a single act, the former being (it is said) capable of being made real burdens, though not expressly declared to be such (see Shaw's ed. p. 750, note a; Bell's Prin. 861), the cases show that all conditions must be made real by the use of terms clearly expressing the granter's intention that they shall affect the subjects, and not the grantee and his heirs only. The only difference is, that in the former case this intention is more easily inferred. See Tailors of Aberdeen v Coutts, cit.; Clark v Glasgow Insurance Co., 1850, 12 D. 1047; aff. 1854, 1 Macq. 668. Baird v Mitchell, 1846, 8 D. 464; 1851, 13 D. 982. Campbell v Dunn, supra.]

⁴ The clause of pre-emption is sometimes so conceived as to give to the superior the power of taking the subject at an appointed sum, as in the case of Annandale, and in Sir C. Preston's case; but when used at all of late years, it is as a mere privilege of having the refusal on the same terms with others. 'That it shall not be lawful, etc., to sell, alienate, or dispose the said subjects, etc., to any person, until they have first offered to sell the same to me or my foresaids, at the like rate they might get from any others' (2 Juridical Styles, 21). A difficulty may arise in the construction of the modern form of the clause, as the price is to be fixed by public competition at auction; and the sequestration law expressly requires the sale to proceed by auction (54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 52). Perhaps the Court, on a petition, would interfere to fix the upset price; and an offer to the superior at that rate would seem to make the sale valid. [The heritable estate of a sequestrated bankrupt may now, subject to certain restrictions, be sold by private bargain. See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, secs. 114, 115. See below, p. 28.]

creditors' adjudgers, pursuing a judicial sale of the estate: and therefore a singular successor, purchaser, or creditor may adjudge, unaffected by the condition; or an application by the superior on such a clause of pre-emption, to have the lands struck out of the sale, will be ineffectual.¹

4. Declarator.—If the lands be in nonentry, and the condition not expressed in the titles, the superior may, in a declarator of nonentry against his original vassal, conclude that the vassal shall be decerned so to make up his titles as to give effect to the condition; and the right will accordingly be made effectual by decree of declarator, entitling the superior to refuse an entry on other terms.² Where the title is so given, the condition will appear in the record, and so be effectual against strangers.

If the lands were feudally held under infeftment not containing the conditions, the creditors of the vassal so holding will not, after his death, be affected by such decree of declarator, but will be entitled to adjudge and bring to sale the lands, to the disappointment of the superior.

5. Although the fee be full, the superior may bring an action of declarator, in order to have the condition inserted in the future titles; but there is no obvious remedy by [28] which he may establish the condition in the titles before the next entry of an heir. Certainly the declarator alone can have no effect on the rights of creditors.³

STIPULATION LAWFUL.—But it is not enough that the stipulation is expressed conditionally, and that it makes its appearance in the sasine and in the record: it is further necessary that it be a legitimate stipulation. There were two conditions formerly much in use in feudal contracts, viz. that the vassal should be liable in the casualty of marriage, and that he should not sell without the superior's consent. These were abolished by Act of Parliament immediately after the Rebellion 1745;⁴ and considering the words of the Act, it was natural to contend that clauses of pre-emption and prohibitions to subfeu were also prohibited. But it has been settled that these clauses do not fall under the Act.

I. CLAUSE OF PRE-EMPTION.—This is a stipulation in favour of the superior of a right to have the first refusal of the lands, should the vassal be inclined to sell. Erskine is of opinion that a clause of pre-emption is effectual, notwithstanding the Act.⁵ And after a very full discussion of the question on several occasions, this opinion seems to have been fully admitted as law.⁶ The practical effect of this clause may deserve some attention. If

¹ So it would have been held in Sir R. Preston's case, had the right to the lands, on the one hand, been other than a mere personal right; or, on the other, had the condition not been entered in the titles. The opinions of the Court went very decidedly to this conclusion. See below, note 6.

² See the case of Sir R. Preston, infra, note 6.

³ Perhaps inhibition may be thought a good protection against future creditors, but would certainly leave the estate open to the adjudication of prior creditors.

⁴ 20 Geo. II. c. 50, sec. 10. 'And whereas there are certain lands in Scotland held by the tenure of feu, cum maritagio, or with clauses de non alienando sine consensu superiorum, it is hereby enacted, etc., that in all time coming, from and after 25th March, the casualty of marriage consequent on such holdings, and all such prohibitory clauses restraining the power of alienation, be taken away and discharged; and it shall and may be lawful, in like manner as is hereinbefore directed, etc., and to apply, etc., for an additional feu-duty,' etc.

⁵ B. ii. tit. 5, sec. 28: 'It would seem that such clause continues effectual, notwithstanding the statute, as it is quite different from a clause de non alienando.' See the next note.

⁶ 1. Mr. Cochran, a feuar of Kirkbrae from Sir George Preston, granted a bond, that whenever he or his heirs should think fit to dispose of the subject, they should offer it to Sir George or his heirs for £307, 13s. 4d., [but he was not infeft.] The feu came into the person of the Earl of Dundonald; and on his affairs becoming embarrassed, an action of nonentry and declarator was raised for having the lands declared in nonentry, the titles made up under the condition, and the condition inserted in the charter and infeftment. There was a great deal of discussion on the efficacy of the bond, particularly as affected by the 20 Geo. II. But the Court decerned in the nonentry, and found that the tenor of the backbond in question ought to be inserted in all the subsequent titles and investitures of this piece of ground. Sir Charles Preston v L. Dundonald, 1781, M. 6569.

The effect of this decision, in a question with the vassal himself, was to hold the right of Lord Dundonald in nonentry qualified by the condition, and to give the superior the future benefit of the bond as a real qualification of the feudal grant.

2. The creditors of Lord Dundonald having brought an action of judicial sale of his estates, a warrant was issued for selling Kirkbrae. An application was then made by Sir Charles Preston to have those lands struck out of the sale, and his right to redeem them for the sum of £307, 13s. 4d.

the offer to the superior is to be made at a particular sum, the interests of parties may be [29] easily settled. The superior will be entitled, on offering that price, to have the lands struck out of a judicial sale or sequestration of the vassal's estate; or, by interdict, to interrupt a private sale, and afterwards by declarator to acquire the lands. But, on the other hand, the superior's creditors can make no use of the right, other than as augmenting the value of the superiority on a sale, unless the vassal be under the necessity of selling. If the offer is conditioned to be made to the superior at the same price as to others, it may be difficult to extricate the rights of parties.

II. PROHIBITION TO SUBFEU.—This may be considered as equally legitimate with a clause of pre-emption, being a condition, not for preserving the superior's influence, against which the Act was directed, but for maintaining and rendering effectual a valuable pecuniary interest. It is a stipulation that the vassal shall not have it in his power to alienate the feu, otherwise than by a conveyance with the proper warrants for holding only of the superior.

If such a clause be expressed only as a condition, a feu-right granted by the vassal will be effectual while the right of the vassal stands. It will fail only when the necessity arises of coming to the superior for an entry on the death of the vassal. The superior may declared. The Court found 'that the right of pre-emption claimed by Sir C. Preston, in virtue of the backbond, is not a real burden on the lands of Kirkbrae, and consequently cannot be effectual against creditors; and therefore, that these lands must be sold for payment of the debts of Lord D.' An appeal was entered, and the House of Lords remitted to the Court of Session, 'to find whether the backbond given by Charles Cochran, 30th June 1750, as mentioned in the pleadings, is not a real burden on the lands of Kirkbrae, it having been found by the interlocutor, 20th December 1781, that the tenor of the backbond and obligation libelled on ought to be inserted in all the subsequent titles and investitures of the piece of ground in question, which, by the decree of the Court of Session, in a process of nonentry, remains in the superior's hands, together with the maills and duties thereof, and will so continue aye and until the lawful entry of the righteous heir; and also to find whether the terms of the said backbond, supposing it a real burden, are not sufficient to entitle the appellant (Sir R. Preston) to a pre-emption' [4 Pat. 331]. The Court of Session pronounced judgment: (1) That Cochran the vassal's right never was completed by infestment; (2) That, as a personal right, it was qualified by the condition in the backbond; (3) That the creditors could attach only that personal right so qualified; and (4) That the backbond never was entered in the title, as ordered; and therefore it was unnecessary to determine what effect, if inserted, it would have had. The words of the judgment are: 'The Lords find that Charles Cochran, who granted the backbond in question in favour of Sir George Preston, had only a personal right to the lands of Kirkbrae, which never was completed by infestment, either in his favour or in that of his successor, Lord Dundonald: Find that the said backbond never was inserted in the titles of the said lands, though ordered to be so by the interlocutor of this Court in 1781; therefore, find it unnecessary to determine whether, if the backbond had been so inserted in the titles, and infestment had followed, it would or would not have constituted a real burden on the lands: But find that the personal right in Charles Cochran and his successor, Lord Dundonald, did remain qualified by the condition in the said backbond in favour of Sir George Preston; and that the adjudication led by the creditors of Lord Dundonald can only attach the said personal right, subject to the said condition: Find that such interest as Lord Dundonald has in said lands is properly comprehended in the summons of sale; and therefore find that Sir Robert Preston has now right to redeem said lands, on payment of the sum of £307, 13s. 4d., mentioned in said backbond, and decern accordingly.' Sir R. Preston v E. of Dundonald's Crs., 1805, M. App. Pers. and Real, No. 2.

Although the judgment does not determine the effect of the backbond, and so the point is not precisely decided, yet the judges, in delivering their opinions, had no doubt of the efficacy of such a condition, if inserted in the titles; and L. Armadale, in particular, stated that his father-in-law, Lord J.-C. M'Queen, and Lord J.-C. Miller, were of opinion that such clauses constituted a real burden.

3. In Irving v M. of Annandale, 1767, M. 2343, the Court had in the same way decided that a clause of pre-emption does not fall under the Act of 20 Geo. II. And although this decision was, in Farquharson v Keay, 1800, M. App. Clause 3, thrown into doubt by an observation from the bench, the judges approved of the decision in Irving's case, in the opinions delivered in Sir R. Preston's case; and, in its turn, this decision of Farquharson and Keay was held questionable. [The cases cited, and that of E. of Mar v Ramsay, 1838, 1 D. 116, imply that the clause of pre-emption is not a contravention of the Act, although the question is said by Lord Corehouse to remain a matter of doubt. Tailors of Aberdeen, cit., 1 Rob. 321. See Lumsden v Lorimer, 1841, 3 D. 1199; Lumsden v Stewart, 1843, 5 D. 501. The usual form of the clause simply gives the superior a right to have the subjects on the same terms as may be offered by another; and the proper mode of giving effect to such a condition is pointed out in Montgomerie Bell's Lectures on Conveyancing, i. 579. See also Shaw's edit. p. 750, where it is suggested, apparently by Mr. Bell himself, that when the sale is by auction, the superior may get intimation to attend and bid at the sale, receiving a deduction of the difference between his bidding and the next highest offerer. Professor Montgomerie Bell's method is much preferable.]

refuse; and so, the lands being in nonentry, the superior may, by decree of declarator of nonentry, destroy the subvassal's right. In the new town of Edinburgh, grants are generally made with a condition against subfeuing, and with a precept for a public holding only. But it is common for the vassal to sell with an alternative precept, and the feuar confirms the purchaser without any difficulty. A title so made up is quite unexceptionable in itself, though liable to the danger above pointed out.¹

If the condition be further guarded with irritant and resolute clauses, it seems that the subfeu may be challenged even before the necessity for a new entry with the superior arises.

GROUND-ANNUAL.—When the prohibition to subfeu is effectually created as a real burden on the right of the vassal, it is an important question, How the vassal can make the best advantage of the ground, where it is intended for building? This is done in two ways. Either he sells for a price the area and house built on it, and giving a precept for holding of the superior only, he leaves the purchaser to make up his title by entering with the superior;² or he constitutes a ground-annual or reserved rent by a form of grant, proceeding on the principle of a burden by reservation. In constituting a title to property [30] with a ground-annual, the grant is by a precept à me, to force the purchaser to enter with the superior. The disponent is burdened with the duty to the superior, and a sum to be paid annually to the disponent and his heirs or assignees; and this annual payment is declared to form a real burden on the land, which the disponent is to have right to recover by pointing of the ground. Generally a security for the ground-annual is constituted by procuratory and infestment.³ While a right of this nature is left merely on the condition and declaration of a real burden entering the infestment, there may be some doubt both as to the form of transferring, and the remedy for forcing payment of the annual duty; but where it is completed by an infestment in security, the right seems to be real beyond all question, with all the remedies which are applicable to an annuity secured on land.⁴

SECTION III.

LIMITED ESTATES IN LAND DEPENDING ON DECLARATIONS OF USES, OR ON RESERVATION OF BURDENS, OR OF FACULTIES.

These are conditions directly intended to limit or restrain the right to the land, as in a question with the person whose right is qualified, or with purchasers from him, or with creditors. It may be stated generally, that such limitation depends on one of two principles,—either on the effect of a condition qualifying the conveyance, or on the effect of a reservation out of the conveyance of part of the original right of the granter, there being in either case vested in the granter, or in another, a jus quæsitum sufficient to ground an action.

¹ [A disposition with an alternative precept not being intended to create a permanent base right, is not an infringement of a prohibition against subinfeudation (Colquhoun v Walker, 1867, 5 Macph. 773), which may also be referred to with regard to the effect of an irritant clause in guarding such a prohibition.]

² Sometimes in practice titles are made up on such a precept, as if it were an alternative precept; ex gr., by base infestment confirmed. Such a title is vicious.

³ This is by contract. The proprietor, or vassal disponent, in consideration of the ground-annual and other prestations, and with and under the burden thereof, disposes, etc., declaring the annual duty redeemable at twenty years' purchase any time within ten years, and twenty-five years' purchase thereafter; and grants a procuratory for resigning, to be held burgage, under burden of the ground rent. Then the purchaser binds himself to pay the ground-annual while not redeemed; and, in security, disposes with procuratory of resignation for burgage-holding.

⁴ [But, in the ordinary form of constituting a ground-annual, the first disponent remains personally liable for the ground-annual even after he has sold the subjects, in addition to the real burden on the subject. Small v Miller, 1849, 11 D. 495, revd. 1853, 1 Macq. 345; Gardyne v Royal Bank, 1851, 13 D. 912, revd. 1853, 1 Macq. 358; King's Coll. of Aberdeen v Hay, 1852, 14 D. 675, 1854, 1 Macq. 526; Elmsley v Brown, 1855, 2 Macq. 40.]

ART. I.—OF THE SETTLEMENT OF ESTATES IN TRUST—LIMITATION OF USES AND PURPOSES.

In many situations it is difficult to arrange or dispose of property without having recourse to the creation of a trust, that there may at once be compliance with the forms of feudal conveyancing, and a free exercise of the power of administration, for the accomplishment of the ends in view. This expedient is especially made use of for securing estates to unknown, or unborn, or very numerous parties—for distributing in shares, varying with circumstances, the property or the price of an estate—for dispensing with, or getting rid of, the inconvenient and unbending forms of ordinary conveyancing, calculated for common transactions of daily intercourse, but frequently unfit for anomalous, eventual, and mingled interests.

It is the object and operation of trusts, as applicable to lands and other feudal subjects, that in the person of the trustee there shall be vested a legal estate, so limited, and yet so complete, that, while the conditions annexed to it, or implied in its constitution, create a separate estate or interest, which forms a burden or condition on the trustee's right, the active powers of administration, or of transference, for the accomplishment of the intended purposes, are, in the person of the trustee, at once unembarrassed and free, and capable of being exercised with perfect safety to those in whom the radical interest resides. In [31] proportion as these objects are fully attained, the trust may be considered as perfect or otherwise.

The particular occasions for the employment of this expedient are: the settling of marriage contracts; the arranging of family settlements; the fixing of a plan for the administration of large estates, which shall not require, or shall exclude, the interference of the proprietor; the facilitating of the sale and distribution of land, or its price, among heirs or creditors; or, finally, the settling of a bankruptcy, with provisions for the benefit of the creditors, and a discharge of the debtor.¹ A system of operations by which arrangements so various and opposite may be accomplished, is of great importance in the practical jurisprudence of Scotland. And the points to be considered are: (1) The constitution of the trust; (2) The estate vested in the trustee; (3) The estate remaining in the granter, or vested in those for whom the powers are to be exercised; (4) The administration of the trustees; and (5) The extinction of the trust and reinvestment of the truster, or final conveyance to those who have the reversionary right.

I. CONSTITUTION OF THE TRUST.—Trust is referable to a combination of two contracts—Deposit and Mandate; the estate not being in the trustee for any use or purpose of his own, and the administration being ruled by the directions given by the maker of the trust. And this is a point of chief importance to be observed, that the object in view is not the beneficial interest of the trustee, but some purpose to be accomplished, in which a third party is interested,—an object to be attained by means of the interposition, the activity, sometimes the peculiar discretion, of the party selected. These points may be laid down:—

1. A trust cannot be constituted in the person of another without his consent, to the effect of obliging him to do any act, however innoxious to himself, or easy to be done.²

2. A failure in the nomination, the non-acceptance of the trustees, the death of the trustees named, or of one named sine quo non, or of any of the number named as quorum, will defeat the trust, where the power to be exercised is inseparably connected with the nomination.³ It will bar, or bring to a close, the administration, even where the interests

¹ The more particular consideration of trusts for insolvency will be resumed in the last book of these Commentaries.

² Yet it was held that one named as trustee without his knowledge, and in whose favour sasine was taken, relying on his acceptance, was bound to grant the deed necessary for denuding, providing he was freed from all warrandice, and relieved of expense. Dallas v Liechman, 1710, M. 16191.

³ In the case of Hepburn (p. 31, note 4), the Court interfered, even where there was a discretionary power to be exercised. But in Dick v Ferguson, 1758, M. 7446, 16206, where

which form the object of the deed are still to be maintained.¹ But it will not extinguish interests in third parties intended, at all events, to be raised by the deed, and to subsist independently of the particular administration. It is held in such a case that the mandate was meant absolutely to be available to those whose interest is in contemplation;² and the radical right is to be made effectual against the granter's heirs (or the trustees, if so destined) by adjudication,³ while the Court of Session will supply what is necessary in the way of administration.⁴

3. Not only the death, but the incapacity, or even (where it essentially abridges his [32] power or fitness for the office) the bankruptcy of a trustee, will defeat a trust, or bring it to a close, so far as that person is concerned.⁵ But it forms no incapacity to act as a trustee that the person named is a married woman, though the husband has undoubtedly a power to prevent her acceptance of an office attended with responsibility.⁶ The nomination of a woman as a trustee seems to fall with her marriage; but where the appointment is made before marriage, and the truster survives that event, and is aware of it, without altering the nomination, he is held to continue it intentionally.⁷

4. Non-acceptance on the part of the trustees may defeat the trust, or at least the course of administration projected. But to abstain from acceptance is not to decline the trust, and a trustee so abstaining may afterwards assume his place.⁸ Where the trust, however, relates to an estate to be vested in the trustees by infestment, it would rather seem that a refusal to allow his name to be included in the infestment would be equal to a refusal to accept; and the infestment completed, with the omission of the name of any of the trustees, would, prima facie at least, be taken as proof of their non-acceptance.

5. Where trustees are named in a marriage contract, for the purpose of protecting the interests of the wife and children, the dissolution of the marriage—though it has the effect there was a discretionary power in the trustees, the exercise of which was necessarily combined with the nomination, the trust was held to fall.

¹ See Stoddart's case below, note 7. See also Drummond v M'Kenzie, 1758, M. 16206. Practically, it is an advisable precaution, where a majority of the trustees are named as a quorum, that the number of trustees accepting should be defined by a declaration of non-acceptance on the part of those who decline, or who even in the meanwhile abstain from acting, reserving in this last case power to resume their place afterwards.

² Campbell v Campbell, 1752, M. 14703, 16203.

³ See Gavin v Kirkpatrick, 1826, 4 S. 629, N. E. 637. [Dalziel v Dalziel, M. 16204, App. Trust 1; Black v Lorimer, 1821, 1 S. 521, N. E. 481; Crawford v E. Dundonald, 1838, 16 S. 1017; M. of Ailsa v Jeffray, 1859, 21 D. 492; Gordon's Trs. v Harper, 1821, 1 S. 185, N. E. 175.]

⁴ The Court formerly interfered by naming a trustee, to act with all a trustee's powers. So in Hepburn of Humby's Crs. v C. of Tarras, 1699, 2 Fount. 60. The course afterwards was to name only a curator bonis (M'Dowal's case, below, next note; Grant, 1790, M. 7454). See also Wotherspoon, 1775, M. 7450. More recently it has been the practice to authorize a factor to take all necessary proceedings. In Alexander, 1824, 2 S. 745, N. E. 621, on the trustee's having declined, a factor was named, with power to carry the trust into effect. And in Busby's, 1823, 2 S. 176, N. E. 157, the Court, on a search of precedents, granted the special power there required to a factor to make up titles to certain heritable subjects. [In L. Melville v Preston, 1838, 16 S. 457, aff. 2 Rob. 45 (see 14 D. 1056); M'Aulgan, 1841, 3 D. 1263; and Glasgow, 1844, 7 D.

178, trustees were appointed by the Court. But in general the Court refused to exercise such a power, if it belonged to it. Lindsay v Lindsay, 1847, 9 D. 1297; Nicholson, 1850, 12 D. 911; Ferguson v Marjoribanks, 1853, 15 D. 645; Melville, 1856, 18 D. 788. A judicial factor was generally and may still be nominated. But under 30 and 31 Vict. c. 97, sec. 12, the Court is empowered to nominate trustees where trustees cannot be nominated under any trust-deed, or when any sole trustee has become insane, or incapable of acting by reason of physical or mental disability. Trustees so nominated cannot assume new trustees, unless such power is expressly conferred upon them by the Court (sec. 13).]

⁵ In M'Dowal v M'Dowal, 1789, M. 7453, a trust was held to fall by the bankruptcy of the surviving trustee, where the interest of parties did not require its continuance, although, as a general proposition, bankruptcy was not held necessarily to defeat or terminate a trust. [Robertson v Lamb, 1829, 7 S. 573; Cumming v Hogg, 1834, 12 S. 508; Cowan v Crawford, 1837, 15 S. 398; M'Pherson, 1840, 3 D. 315; Miller, 1854, 16 D. 358.]

⁶ Darling v Watson, 1823, 2 S. 607, N. E. 519. Here it was also held, that where a husband and wife are named trustees, they are, quoad hoc, separate persons having separate votes. See also Stoddart's case, next note.

⁷ Stoddart v Rutherford, 30 June 1812, F. C. The point of a wife's capacity to be trustee was here fixed, and a distinction drawn between this and the case of tutory: the husband held to have power to bar acceptance, and the supervening marriage taken for granted as defeating the nomination.

⁸ See above, the case of Darling, note 6. [As to elective trustees, see Adam v Grieve, 1867, 5 Macph. 284.]

of restoring the wife and children to their separate persona standi—will not extinguish the trust;¹ nor will the death of such trustees during the marriage leave the wife and children unprotected.

6. Trustees may effectually be appointed not only by name, but by descriptive reference; and such reference may be either to office, as in nominating the trustees of a public charity,² or to an assumption or appointment by those expressly named, or to nomination by a stranger, or to the legal line of succession of the trustees named.

II. ESTATE IN THE TRUSTEE.—Estates were of old, in Scotland, vested in trust, chiefly in the disastrous days of rebellion and civil war, when, before engaging in any dangerous enterprise, a landowner made over his estate to a confidential friend, to be restored after the danger was over. In this use of trusts the parties necessarily confided in the honour and fidelity of the trustee. The secret compact could not be disclosed; and that equity on which the Prætorian jurisprudence in Rome interfered to enforce the duties of persons similarly entrusted (though for very different purposes), afforded the only ground of judicial interposition with us. This was the case of trust proper, in which Lord Stair says, ‘there is neither bond, condition, nor promise of reversion, or obligation to denude’ (Stair iv. 6, 1). [33] The progress was much the same in England, the confusions during the wars of York and Lancaster having given rise to the frequent use of trusts in that country. There the statute of 27 Henry VIII., called the Statute of Uses, had at one time nearly established the legal estate of the cestui qui use, and brought the whole of this department of jurisprudence under the administration of courts of law. But it was found necessary to have recourse to equity, and in this way the jurisdiction in trusts forms a great branch of that of the Court of Chancery. In Scotland, without any general statute to declare the legal estate of the truster, the gradual operation of our combined system of law and equity, with the aid of our public records, has led to the establishment of a safe, clear, and regular system of trusts, in which the rights of all parties may be vested in the trustee, as in deposit, with perfect security to those interested, and resting upon rules which guide the determinations of our courts with the same precision and uniformity as in other cases.

Taking a general view of this subject, the estate in the trustee will be found to stand in one of three situations: (1) An estate ex facie absolute, with no other than a verbal engagement by the trustee; (2) An estate vested in the trustee by a conveyance in absolute terms, the conditions and purposes of the trust being expressed in a separate deed; or (3) An estate expressly in trust, the purposes of the trust and the rights of those for whose benefit it is designed being stated as conditions and qualifications of the estate vested in the trustee.

1. The first of these cases was the most frequent when this expedient came to be used, in order to conceal or cover an estate from danger of forfeiture. But out of those trusts so many inextricable questions arose,³ and there was so much danger of fraud, that in 1696 provision was made by the Legislature against such arrangements. In the 25th chapter of the Acts of that year, on a preamble that ‘the entrusting of persons without any declaration or backbond of trust in writing from the person entrusted, are occasions of fraud,’ it was enacted, ‘That no action of declarator of trust shall be sustained as to any deed of trust made for hereafter, except upon a declaration or backbond of trust lawfully subscribed by the person alleged to be the trustee, and against whom, or his heirs or assignees, the declarator shall be intended, or unless the same be referred to the oath of the party simpliciter.’⁴

Under this Act, the only points which have required the determination of the courts

¹ Hill v Hunter, 1766, M. 16207.

² [Edin. Royal Infirmary v Lord Advocate, 1861, 23 D. 1213.]

³ See the case of Higgins v Callendar, 1696, M. 16184.

This case was the more immediate occasion of the statute.

⁴ 1696, c. 25. This Act also contains an enactment against blank bonds. See post, vol. ii. index, voce Blank Bond.

are these:—1. Where the trust arises, not from the act or conveyance of the truster, but results from the interference of the trustee (as negotiorum gestor, for example), the Act does not apply.¹ The principle of the Act cannot be extended to such a case. 2. It is not of itself sufficient to exclude the rule of the Act, that the trust arises from the deed of a party different from him who claims the benefit of the trust.² 3. The Act is in full observance to exclude a proof by parole, even though some circumstances of real evidence may support the plea.³

The effect of the trust, when it is proved by written acknowledgment, or by oath, and is not established by the words of the conveyance itself, is personal, so as not to limit the real estate created by sasine in the trustee, or to be effectual against purchasers from [34] the trustee,⁴ or against his creditors adjudging.⁵ But this holds only where the estate is vested in the trustee. While it continues a personal right (as where infestment has not been taken on the trust-deed), the condition of trust, though personal, will limit the personal right effectually against purchasers and creditors, if insisted in before their right is completed. The beneficial interest may also, by means of declarator or by registration, be established as a real qualification of the trust-estate.

2. It is not now the practice to constitute a trust otherwise than by backbond, or by an express trust-deed limited in græmio. Where the conditions and purposes of the trust are expressed in a BACKBOND, they are, in so far as the extent and limits of the beneficial estate is concerned, not exposed to the doubts which are incident to proper trust; and in all questions with the trustee and his heirs they are effectual limitations of his right. Even with purchasers or creditors they will effectually qualify the personal right. But if the real estate be vested and complete in the trustee's person, they will not operate as conditions or qualifications of it, unless the backbond be recorded. By statute, all reversions (or rights to redeem an estate conveyed in absolute terms) are directed to be recorded in the Register of Sasines and Reversions, without which they are to have no effect in limiting the absolute right.⁶ And under these statutes, backbonds of trust will qualify the absolute estate in the trustee.

3. Where the conveyance of the estate is expressly a DISPOSITION IN TRUST for certain uses and purposes, and the precept and procuratory are so conceived, the completion of the title in the person of the trustee by sasine recorded with its conditions, while it vests the fee in him, leaves to the persons for whose behoof it is intended an effectual and secure estate, or jus crediti, as a real burden on the trust-estate. The consequences of this are important. 1. The creditors of the trustee have no right to attach the trust-estate for the trustee's debts. The estate in him is, in its nature and origin, a limited and qualified estate: it is, in regard to his own creditors, a mere formal right—a deposit for the benefit of others; and the estate in all its forms, and even the proceeds of it, if sold while they can be identified (as bills or bonds of the purchaser, lands exchanged or excambed for the original trust-estate, etc.), belong exclusively to those having right under the trust, and can neither be attached nor divided by the trustee's creditors. 2. The maxim of law, that a fee cannot be in pendente, is satisfied by the vesting of the fee in the trustee; so that, for persons yet unborn, or otherwise incapable of holding the fee, an effectual contin-

¹ Spruel v Spruel and Crawford, 1741, M. 16201. [See Lindsay v Barmcotte, 1851, 13 D. 718.]

² See Duggan v Wight, 1797, M. 12761; aff. in House of Lords, 1797, 3 Pat. 604.

³ Duggan's case, above. [Leckie v Leckie, 1854, 17 D. 77; Seth v Hain, 1855, 17 D. 1117. As to the case of accidental or fraudulent destruction of the declaration of trust, see Chalmers v Chalmers, 1845, 7 D. 865.]

⁴ Anderson v Dempster and Dudgeon, 1702, M. 10523; and other cases in Dict. voce Personal and Real.

⁵ At one time it was held that adjudgers stood in a different situation from purchasers; that they took only tantum et tale, as the subject stood in the debtor, and so were subject to the personal obligation incumbent on him. Thomson v Douglas, Heron, and Co., 1786, M. 10229, 10299; corrected in Ross of Kerse, 1792, M. 10300; and Wylie v Duncan, 1803, M. 10269.

⁶ See 1459, c. 27; and 1617, c. 16. Keith v Maxwell, 1795, Bell's Fol. Ca. 234.

gent right may be constituted in the meanwhile, which in due time may be completely available.

4. The trust-estate cannot be considered as fully created, until the right is so vested in the trustee as to denude the maker of the trust, and so prevent his creditors, or others deriving right from him, from attaching anything but the reversionary interest, after the purposes of the trust are fulfilled. This, in land estates, can be accomplished only by the same feudal act of sasine by which the trustee's right, if a real creditor or purchaser, would have been completed and rendered effectual against all deriving right from the granter.¹

5. The trust-estate may be vested, and very conveniently so, in one person, subject to the administration of several trustees. A numerous body is fitter to deliberate than to act. But the common method of creating trusts is by a deed expressly in trust, or qualified by a [35] backbond, the trust being in either case made to qualify the fee. The estate must in this case be conveyed to the whole trustees, and vested in them all by infestment, in order to enable them effectually to act. Where there is a power to assume new trustees, the conveyance may be so arranged, as either to make the original trustees hold the fee, at the disposal of the deliberative voice of the whole; or to vest it in the united body of trustees. Where on any change the old trustees are to retire from the office, they must be denuded of the trust-estate. They may either denude spontaneously; or being expressly bound in the trust-deed, or under an implied obligation, so to do, an adjudication may be led against them, or their heirs, if the trust be so destined.

6. Where, by the failure of the trustees named and vested with the estate, the trust falls, this effect takes place either absolutely, or, if there be interests beyond, the Court will interfere to preserve them. And this is done, either (1) by appointing a curator bonis; or (2) by a declaratory adjudication in favour of a new trustee suggested by the parties; or (3) by a decree of declarator of trust containing a warrant to the superior to enter the person having the radical or equitable right.² Those measures may be pursued by adjudication on a charge against the trustee's heir; or, where the conveyance is strictly personal, or the heir is incapable or unwilling to interfere, by declarator of trust, without any charge.

III. THE BENEFICIAL ESTATE UNDER THE TRUST.—The conveyance by which the trust estate is created in the person of the trustees, while it vests in the trustees a formal feudal estate, does so only for the purpose of enabling that estate to be more effectually held separate from the right of the original owner, for the accomplishment of the purposes of the trust, and for satisfying the interests raised in third parties. The two points essential to be considered are, the radical right still remaining in the granter, and the separate or beneficial interest raised for others.

1. The RADICAL RIGHT in the granter of the trust may be viewed in relation to his prior and to his subsequent creditors.

(1.) Prior Creditors.—In relation to his already existing creditors, his trust-deed will be good against them only where the granter is solvent, or the beneficial interest to be raised is onerous, and where the trust-conveyance is a fair and honest conveyance completed before those creditors have proceeded to attach the estate. The first branch of the Act of 1621, c. 18, to be afterwards commented on, affords a remedy against trust-conveyances, where the trust is gratuitous and the granter insolvent.³ The second branch of the same statute gives a remedy where the prior creditors, having already begun to attach the estate,

¹ See below, Index, voce Voluntary Securities.

² An example of a declaratory adjudication, calling the representatives of the trustee, and all having interest, will be found in the case of Drummond v M'Kenzie, 1758, M. 16206; and an example of the declarator of trust in Dalziel v Dalziel, 1756, M. 16204. [The object may now be accomplished by a vesting order, obtained on application by summary petition under the Trusts Act, 30 and 31 Vict. c. 97, secs. 14, 15. Where the trust-deed contains a destination of the estate to the heir of the last survivor, the heir may make up a title by service as heir of provision, and convey to the beneficiary. In practice, a title is frequently made up in this form.]

³ See Comm. on this Act in the 6th book, below.

are barred by such a conveyance.¹ Where the granter becomes, or can be rendered, bankrupt within sixty days of the recording of the sasine, a remedy of another kind is given by a later statute;² and finally, wherever fraud can be fixed on the transaction at common law, it will be reducible, and creditors, whether prior or subsequent, will have the benefit of the estate.³

But where none of those statutes apply, and there is no fraud at common law, the trust-deed will be effectual to its peculiar purpose, wherever the beneficial interests raised to third parties are legitimate, though inconsistent with the claims of the prior creditors. Wherever the trust-right is not inconsistent with the claims of those creditors, they may insist on having admission to the benefit of the trust. So, where a trust-deed is made for the payment of certain creditors, and to return the reversion to the granter, or to hold it for [36] his heirs under such a destination as will not deprive him of the fee or disposal of the reversion, the trustees, in accounting to those having the reversionary interest, will be entitled to credit for debts paid under proper measures of diligence; or creditors doing diligence to attach the fund, will be entitled to a share.

(2.) Posterior Creditors.—As to creditors whose debts arise subsequently to the trust: 1. If the trust be such as to leave no fee in the truster, his subsequent creditors will have no share in the trust-estate. 2. Where a trust is created for payment of prior debts, and the conveyance of the residue to certain persons, in such shares as the truster shall appoint, it is held that subsequent creditors may be introduced by a supplementary trust-deed, or that the trustees making advances to the truster have right to withhold the estate till indemnified.⁴ And so, 3. A trust created for the purpose of paying off debts, and raising money for certain purposes, was held to leave in the truster so much of his original estate,⁵ as to authorize the trustees to take credit in accounting for having, in the course of their administration, paid a creditor holding certain bills due by the truster.⁶

2. The BENEFICIAL INTEREST raised to others, is in its nature a jus crediti. It is secured to them, on the one hand, by preference over the creditors of the trustee, who can take no share of the trust-estate in competition with the beneficial interest, provided the declaration of trust is properly made a real burden on the fee vested in the trustee; and on the other, it is made effectual against the creditors of the truster, by the real right vested in the trustee for their behoof, excluding the truster and his creditors.

This beneficial interest may be of liferent or of fee; and the doctrines of liferent and fee are here applicable, not changed by the intervention of the trust, but in some respects facilitated, and allowed to operate more effectually by means of it.⁷

The persons in whom this interest is vested, or for whom it is to be held, must be clearly ascertained, otherwise the heir-at-law will continue to have right. But whether it is sufficient to point out such persons by reference to the will of another, has been much doubted; and the doubt has been rested on this footing, that while no one can make a will which depends entirely on the will of another, there must in every trust be a responsibility by the trustees, at the call of some one having a distinct interest; an incontrollable power of disposition, being ownership, not trust.⁸ It has been held, however—1. That where the reference can apply only to one single person, or to one settled line of succession, it will be good;

¹ See Comm. on the 2d branch of Act 1621, book 6.

² See Comm. on the Act 1696, c. 5, below, book 6.

³ See E. of Rosebery v M'Queen and Cowie, 1823, 2 S. 443, N. E. 394.

⁴ Turnbull v Turnbull's Trs., 1822, 2 S. 1; revd. 1825, 1 W. and S. p. 80. [See Wright v Harley, 1847, 9 D. 1151.]

⁵ The radical right in the truster is still held so far to subsist, where the deed is for the granter's behoof in reversion, that his creditors may adjudge validly, by directing their diligence against the truster, notwithstanding the feudal right in the trustees. Campbell v Crs. of Campbell of Ederline, 1801, M. App. Adjudication, No. 11. See Lockhart v Wingate, 19 Feb. 1819, F. C., as to the effect of a trust-deed on the elective franchise. [M'Millan v Campbell, 1834, 7 W. and S. 441.]

⁶ Pagan v Eaton, 1823, 2 S. 125, N. E. 117.

⁷ See below, chap. i. sec. 5.

⁸ See in England the case of Morris v The Bishop of Durham, 9 Vesey 400.

as a reference to the Statute of Distributions in England.¹ 2. That where there is reference to an event which leads to uncertainty or inextricability, the trust no longer can subsist, but the true heir takes the right.² 3. That it is competent to leave the nomination of the person who is to take succession, to a particular person,³ or to the trustees.

[37] As to the nature of the right thus bestowed upon third parties,—

1. As a mere jus crediti, this beneficial (or, as it is sometimes called, equitable) interest is not a jus in re, or real estate in the land, entitling those interested to maintain any real action, as of maills and duties.⁴ It gives only a personal action against the trustee, to execute the trust or to denude.

2. This jus crediti may be effectually conveyed as a personal right, by settlement,⁵ or by an assignation which, if duly completed, will be preferable to a subsequent adjudication of the estate, as vesting in the assignee the beneficial interest.⁶

3. Where the beneficial interest affects heritable estate, which the trustees are directed to convey over to the person holding such interest, or which they have a discretionary power so to convey, the jus crediti is to be held heritable in succession; while it is to be regarded as moveable in succession, if the trust-estate be moveable, or if the subjects have been actually converted into money; and as it seems, the jus crediti is also to be held moveable, if the beneficial interest is a share of the estate after it shall be converted into money.⁷

4. Where the beneficial interest is taken in favour of creditors, and the trustee is infert for the creditors enumerated in a list, the right conferred is a real right in security, and will subsist while the debts are unextinguished.

As to the extent of the estate, where trustees are vested with lands for certain persons or purposes, or have a sum entrusted to them for realizing the intentions of the granter, the implied effect of the trust is to carry the rents or interests to the purpose of the deed. But this always must be a questio voluntatis, depending on the words or plain intendment of the trust-deed.⁸

¹ Bellenden v E. of Winchelsea, 1825, 3 S. 530, N. E. 367.

² Dick v Ferguson, 1758, M. 7446. See observations on this case by Lord Gifford in Hill v Burns in H. L., 2 W. and S. 88. [The power of disposition is also subject to important limitations in two particulars by statute: (1) By 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98, accumulations of income are prohibited for any longer period than the life of the granter, and twenty-one years thereafter or during the minority of persons in being (extended to heritable property by 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, sec. 41). (2) By 31 and 32 Vict. c. 84, sec. 17, no liferent interest can be created, except in favour of persons in life at the date of the disposition.]

³ Murray v Fleming, 1729, M. 4075, where a husband disposed his land estate to his wife in liferent, and any of his blood relations whom she should name by a writ under her hand, in fee. She did name one after the husband's death, and the heir was unsuccessful in challenging the disposition. Orichton v Orichton, 1826, where also the power was given to the wife of the granter of the trust-deed, 4 S. 553, N. E. 561.

See also Snodgrass v Buchanan, 1806, M. App. Service of Heirs, No. 1.

Campbell v Campbell, 1738, M. 3195, 4076, 13004.

Hill v Burns, 1824, 3 S. 389, N. E. 275; aff. 14 April 1826, 2 W. and S. p. 80.

⁴ Drummond v M'Kenzie, 1758, M. 16206, 2 Pr. of Eq. 12. Here the trustee died, and left the beneficial interest unexecuted. It was held incompetent for the holders of that interest to bring an action of maills and duties.

⁵ Gordon's Trs. v Harper, 1821. In this case the beneficial interest devolved on Robert Gordon, to whom, on majority, the trustees were appointed to 'denude of the lands.' They put him in possession, but he made up no titles, and a competition arose between trustees named by him in a deed of settlement, and the heirs of the original truster, who pleaded that, Robert Gordon not having made up titles, his right to the lands fell. It was held that the beneficial interest was a jus crediti fully vested in Robert Gordon, and effectually conveyed by his settlement. 1 S. 185, N. E. 175.

⁶ M'Dowal and Selkirk v Russell, 1824. This was a competition between an assignee to the beneficial interest, and the trustee for the general creditors of the cedent, specially adjudging and making up titles to the subjects. 'It was observed from the chair that there is a material distinction between this case and that where a party having the beneficial interest in the trust was the granter and original proprietor—that the trust is in that case merely a burden on the right, but that where there is no original title, and the right arises from the trust-deed alone, there is only a jus crediti. In this opinion the rest of the judges concurred.' 2 S. 682.

Smith v Leitch, 1826, where one holding a conditional fee executed a trust-conveyance of it after the condition was purified. 4 S. 659, N. E. 665.

⁷ Burrell v Burrell, 1825, 4 S. 314, N. E. 317. [See, as to Constructive Conversion, M'Laren on Wills, chap. xi. The subject is too extensive for discussion in a note.]

⁸ See E. of Stair v Trs., 1826, 4 S. 483, N. E. 488, where

IV. ADMINISTRATION OF THE TRUST.—The powers to be exercised by the trustees depend on the terms of the appointment; or are implied in the nature of the trust, and the legal capacities of the trustees.¹

1. The object of the trust must be legitimate; and all that is now allowed of those [38] MORTIFICATIONS which were once so frequent in an age of superstition and religious bigotry,² is accomplished by means of trust; as endowments for universities, hospitals, and charities of various kinds. Lands and other heritable subjects are for such purposes vested in trust, to be held by the trustees in feu or blench; and such trusts are effectual where the purpose is intelligible, and capable of being executed. Nay, a trust of this sort has been sustained where the general purpose only has been indicated, and the particular destination left to the discretion of the trustees.³

2. The trust will be effectual to sustain future or contingent interests, or those of persons not yet existing; and the fee in the trustees will be effectual to all intents, as if those persons were actually in existence, or as if their right were already purified.

It is on this account that trust-deeds are made use of so much in family settlements and in marriage contracts, where, if the simple conveyance alone were used, the purposes of the arrangement would find an obstacle almost insurmountable in the maxim, that a fee cannot be in pendente.

3. The trustees may be invested with power to accumulate profits for particular purposes or destinations; to sell lands and apply the price; or to realize funds and purchase estates: and their powers and duties will in general depend on the terms of their appointment. But wherever the will becomes inextricable, or where it is intended for too distant a contingency, it will be ineffectual at common law,⁴ or barred by a statute made on the view of the difficulties raised on the will of the late Mr. Thelluson.⁵

In general it may be laid down, as to the power of sale and distribution: (1) That, where trustees are instructed generally to sell property, they may use their discretion in selling by auction or private sale; (2) That, where the sale is intended for the purpose of paying off the debts of the granter insolvent, or where the estate plainly turns out insolvent, the trustees cannot legally pay at their will to the first creditor who makes a demand; (3) That, where the trust is for general management and economical arrangement, or for family distribution or settlement, the trustees are entitled, as the granter himself would have been, to pay to the creditor first demanding payment, primo venienti, where such payment is made in bona fide;⁶ (4) That, where the trustees are judicially called on by a creditor to pay his demand, they cannot in preference pay another without having ample funds for the payment of the creditor bringing his action;⁷ and (5) That, even where the call of creditors is extrajudicial, but such as plainly to indicate a shortcoming in the funds, the trustees will probably be held bound to suspend their interests of a sum to be laid out in buying land held to go with the principal. Templar and Lady Montgomerie v Graham's Trs., 1826, 4 S. 460, N. E. 466, a similar question as to the rents of estate during a contingency. [Infra, p. 38, note 1.]

¹ [In Milne's Trs. v Cowie, 1853, 15 D. 321, trustees were held to be entitled to take into consideration letters written by the truster on the subject of the trust.]

² 1587, c. 29.

³ Hill and others v Burns, 1824, 3 S. 389, N. E. 275; aff. 14 April 1826. This was a trust of moneys to be distributed to the charitable institutions established or to be established in Glasgow and its neighbourhood, at the discretion of the trustees. 2 W. and S. 80. See also Crichton's case, supra, p. 36, note. [Murdoch v Mags. of Glasgow, 1827, 6 S. 186; Black's Trs. v Miller, 1836, 14 S. 555, aff. 2 S. and M'L. 866; Dundas v Dundas, 1837, 15 S. 427; M'Leish's Trs. v

M'Leish, 1841, 3 D. 914; Mags. of Dundee v Morris, 1858, 20 D. (H. L.) 9, 3 Macq. 134.]

⁴ See M'Nair v M'Nair, 1791, Bell's Oct. Ca. 546.

⁵ 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98. It seems very doubtful, however, whether this Act applies to Scotland. [See note, supra, p. 36.]

⁶ Ranken v Gairdner, 1741, M. 16201, where the general doctrine is delivered in absolute terms.

In Alison v E. of Dundonald's Trs., 1793, M. 16211, it was held that trustees in a family settlement may pay primo venienti till interpellated by legal diligence, and that they are not under any necessity of bringing a multiplepoinding. The chief question was, whether a private extrajudicial demand was a sufficient interpellation to impose on the trustees the duty of bringing a multiplepoinding; and it was held not to be so.

⁷ See the above note.

payments till in a multipoleinding the order and safety of the course of payment be judicially settled.

In those trusts which are intended for the investment of money in land, either to be entailed or settled on particular persons, the words and plain intendment of the deed give the law of the trust.¹

[39] In all cases of trust, the trustees must strictly maintain their neutrality, and make a complete and thorough separation between their fiduciary and their private character. So, 1. In accounting for their intromissions, they must not only keep exact accounts,² but they can take credit only for what they have actually paid.³ 2. They cannot avail themselves of rights which they have purchased, though such rights might otherwise have entered into competition with those having interest in the trust.⁴ 3. In selling the trust-estate, they cannot also be purchasers.⁵

In their administration of the trust, a demand made against a debtor to the estate cannot be met by setting off a debt due to the debtor by the trustees who make the demand. There is no concursum debiti et crediti. Neither is there concurrence where a trustee demands a private debt from one who is a creditor under the trust. But where a demand is made by trustees for a debt due to the trust-estate, it may be met by a debt due under the trust to the defender. Again, where the debtor of the trustee is called on to pay a private debt, and being a creditor under the trust, and the trustee the sole intromitter, there is room for doubt whether there may not be compensation.⁶

Trustees acting within the line of their trust will render the trust funds responsible; but personally they will not be liable to an action except on the ground of delict or quasi delict.⁷ They will not in sales be held to give their own warrantice, except from fact and

¹ [See E. of Stair v E. of Stair's Trs., 1827, 2 W. and S. 414, 614; Templar v Graham, 3 W. and S. 47; Campbell v Campbell, 1838, 16 S. 1251; Macpherson's Trs. v Macpherson, 12 D. 486, 1 Macq. 243; Dickson's Tutors v Scott, 1853, 16 D. 1; Farquharson v Farquharson's Tr., 1866, 4 Macph. 831.]

² Gourlay v Dumbreck, 1710, M. 16192.

³ E. of Craufurd v Hepburn, 1767, M. 16208. See also Maxwell v Maxwell, 1667, M. 16166; Rae v Glass, 1673, M. 16171; Sinclair v Maxwell, 1708, M. 16186.

⁴ Wright v Wright, 1712, M. 16193. [Hamilton v Wright, 1842, 1 Bell 574.]

⁵ See M'Kenzie v York Building Co., 1793, as decided by reversal in House of Lords, 13 May 1793, 4 Dow 379, 3 Paton 378.

See Smith v Robertson, 1826, 4 S. 442, as to an accountant employed under an extrajudicial trust, and afterwards in a sequestration; Drew v Paterson, 1825, 4 S. 259, N. E. 264, as to a commissioner on a sequestrated estate; and Jeffrey v Aitken, 1826, as to creditor selling under his bond, 4 S. 722, N. E. 728. [See also Taylor v Watson, 1846, 8 D. 400; Gillies v MacLachlan, 1846, 8 D. 487; Fraser v Hankey, 1847, 9 D. 415; Brown v Burt, 1848, 11 D. 338; Thorburn v Martin, 1853, 15 D. 845. For the same reason, trustees are disqualified from borrowing from the trust-estate even on heritable security—Perston v Perston's Trs., 1863, 1 Macph. 245; and generally from entering into any contract in which the trustee's individual interest may conflict with his duty—Aberdeen Ry. Co. v Blaikie, 1854, 1 Macq. 461.]

⁶ In Hay v Brown, 1825, 4 S. 344, N. E. 348, a difference of opinion on this point took place on the bench. A trustee died, and his representative pursuing for a debt due to him, the defender pleaded set-off on a debt owing to him from the trust, the deceased having had the sole intromission with the funds. The Court held there was no concurrence, Lord Alloway dissenting.

⁷ [In M'Clymont v Hughes, 1827, 5 S. 321, and Kennedy v Wightman, 1827, 5 S. 792, one trustee was held liable for the intromissions of a co-trustee. And see M'Nair v Broomfield, 1830, 8 S. 968; Moffat v Robertson, 1834, 12 S. 369; Blair v Paterson, 1836, 14 S. 361; Urquhart v Brown, 1843, 5 D. 1142; M'Millan v Armstrong, 1848, 11 D. 191; Ogilvy v Lady Boswell, 1850, 12 D. 940; Ross v Bogie, 1850, 13 D. 44. Trustees were found liable for funds intromitted with by their factor in Syme v Charles, 1830, 8 S. 741; Seton v Dawson, 1841, 4 D. 310; and for money paid to a curator bonis, who had not extracted the warrant of his appointment or found caution, Donaldson v Donaldson's Trs., 1833, 11 S. 740. In the following cases—Ainslie v Henderson's Trs., 1835, 13 S. 417; Home v Pringle, 1837, 16 S. 142, 2 Rob. 384; Cameron v Anderson, 1844, 7 D. 92; Home v Menzies, 1845, 7 D. 1010—trustees were held not liable for the intromissions of a factor, under an exempting clause in the deed, nor where he was reputed solvent; nor, in Clyne's Trs. v Clyne, 1848, 10 D. 1325, in special circumstances.

On the other hand, in Morrison v Miller, 1827, 5 S. 299, under special circumstances trustees were held liable for loss, by refusing to invest in Government stock, although acting under the advice of counsel. On appeal, the case was compromised. In Wellwood v Ross, 1831, 9 S. 790; Mayne v M'Keand, 1835, 13 S. 870; and Pollexfen v Stewart, 1841, 3 D. 1215, trustees having power to invest the trust funds in the purchase of lands, were held personally liable for having invested them in the purchase of feu-duties, teind-duties, and other unauthorized securities. See also Thomson v Campbell, 1838, 16 S. 560; Bon-Accord Marine Insurance Co. v Souter's Trs., 1850, 13 D. 295; Thomson v Christie, deed. Nor can action be raised, or decree insisted for against them, except as trustees, and of course as under a responsibility limited to the estate in their hands.

V. EXTINCTION OF THE TRUST, AND REINVESTMENT IN THOSE HAVING RADICAL RIGHT.—When the purposes of the trust are accomplished, the trustees are bound to denude. This may be enforced by Declarator of Trust and Adjudication. It does not take place ipso jure, because, on the one hand, the formal right, the feudal conveyance, must be completed. The feudal casualties fall by the death of the trustee who is the vassal, and the estate must stand transferred on the record. On the other hand, something most likely is to be done; expenses paid; indemnity given against responsibility; advances reimbursed, and so forth; in security of all which the trustee may retain the estate.¹

ART. II.—OF ESTATES BY RESERVED BURDEN.

The fee may be burdened with a sum to be paid to the granter; or with an annuity to be paid to him periodically; or with a sum payable to a third party. This is called BURDEN BY RESERVATION, or REAL BURDEN.

The creditors of the burdened disponee cannot attach his right otherwise than under [40] such burden; provided the burden be definite in its amount, and either the right be still personal, and the burden clearly expressed as a condition of the grant; or the feudal right be charged with the burden, so that it may distinctly appear in the infestment on record.

The person in whose favour the burden is created, has a real right which his creditors may attach. But these rights being of the nature of securities for debt, will be discussed under that department.²

ART. III.—OF FACULTIES OR POWERS TO BURDEN LAND WITH DEBT.

There may be reserved, in a conveyance to land, a Power or Faculty, to be exercised by the granter or by another, to burden the estate with debt; and under this power a burden may effectually be created on the estate conveyed, provided it be definite in extent, and appear upon the record. Whether the fee is to be enjoyed by the disponee free from the burden, must remain in suspense until the exercise of the power on the one hand, or the death of the person who holds that power on the other; and if, in the meanwhile, the creditors of the disponee should attach the property conveyed, they must take it subject to the condition of the power to be exercised.

The reserved faculty may constitute an estate attachable either, 1st, by the creditors of the person to whom the faculty is reserved, or for whose behoof it is created; or, 2dly, by the creditors of the person in whose favour the power has been exercised. But it is requisite to this that the faculty should be properly constituted.

I. A FACULTY RESERVED TO THE GRANTEE, is an estate which, during his life, and while not yet exercised, his creditors have a right to adjudge, to the effect of attaching the fund at the disposal of their debtor; for he is bound to do justice by exercising the faculty in their favour.³ The diligence of creditors will be excluded by the legitimate exercise of the faculty

1852, 1 Macq. 236. Observe also that trustees who, acting within their powers, take up bank stock or shares in any partnership estate, become liable as partners to the creditors of the company as individuals, and not merely qua trustees. Lumsden v Buchanan, 1865, 3 Macph. H. L. 89, 4 Macq. 950; Graham v Western Bank, 1866, 4 Macph. 484.]

¹ Watt v Greenfield's Trs., 1825, 3 S. 544, N. E. 376; see also Carse v Carse, 1666, M. 16165. [Henderson v Norrie, 1866, 4 Macph. 691.]

² See below, Index, voce Burden by Reservation.

³ Hope Pringle v Hope Pringle, 1677, M. 4103; Elliot v Elliot, 1698, M. 4130. In the former case the bond was personal, and subsequent to the faculty; in the latter the debt was prior, and could not in itself be held an exercise of the faculty. Ruscoe's Crs. v Blair, 1723, M. 4117.

in favour of a third party; provided the deed in exercise of the faculty is completed before the diligence, and is a due exercise of the faculty.

1. As there can be no real burden upon land which is not definite in extent, and which a creditor or purchaser cannot know how to extinguish, the reservation of a faculty can form a real burden only when it appears upon the record. During the life of the disponent the faculty itself forms a real burden on the right of the disponee; and every creditor of his, or purchaser from him, knows that, to the extent allowed, it may be exercised hereafter. But while no exercise of the faculty appears on record, the creditors of the disponent during his life, and the creditors of the disponee after the disponent's death, are entitled to suppose the faculty unexercised.

2. But it is not sufficient that the record should give notice of the sum and of the name of the person for whom the faculty is intended. It is further requisite, that the real right remaining by reservation in the disponent or his nominee, shall be transferred by a voluntary conveyance made real by sasine, or by adjudication duly completed.¹ It was at one time [41] invariably stipulated in the reservation or creation of the faculty, that the power should be exercised by means of an infestment of wadset or of annualrent, etc. But although for a long course of practice conveyancers have used a form of expression quite general, reserving or conferring a power to burden the estate to a certain extent, this power must be exercised by such a conveyance as shall not only give notice of the name of the person in whose favour it is exercised, but transfer to him the real right. It may appear to be anomalous, and contrary to feudal principles, that a disponent who divests himself, or a third party who never was feudally invested, should have power to grant a precept on which infestment may proceed. But the principle is this, that the conveyance to the disponee is limited by a condition, viz. That the disponent shall still retain the power of constituting a real security

¹ Faculty reserved to burden an estate, being exercised by a mere personal deed, not made real by infestment during the granter's life, cannot compete with an infestment granted by the person whose right was burdened with the faculty before the personal deed was made real. Ogilvy v Ogilvie, 1735-7, M. 4125; Elchies, Faculty, No. 1.

On this case, Lord Elchies says in his notes: 'This reclaiming bill against the interlocutor 26 June 1735 was delayed from time to time, partly till the other question between the parties upon the relict's consent to the disposition to Gardener were likewise reported, and partly because of the importance of the point of law,—viz. the effect of a reserved faculty to burden where either the creditor or the sum was indefinite, that is, where either it was not the burden of a particular debt already existing, or then created. Kilkerran's difficulty was, that though the debts were not real, yet, if the faculty was real, which he thought it was, the bonds might be made real by diligence, and would be drawn back to the date of this faculty; and he thought this was a reservation of a part of the fee to the extent of this sum. Arniston seemed to think this faculty real, and that this was a reserved estate, effectual against singular successors; but then he thought that if he did not exercise it during his life by granting infestments, the bonds granted by him could only be preferred to singular successors of the son, according to the dates of their diligence, and therefore was for adhering. I agreed that it was a reserved estate, but not a reserved fee, or part of the fee of the lands, since the whole fee was in the son, who was the only vassal; and that reserved estate was no stronger than the like estate created (if the father was not before proprietor), as in the case of the Sinclairs and of the Romes, quoted in the papers (and in this Arniston agreed with me); for both of them might grant infestments, but the infestments would be preferred only according to their dates with the creditors, or singular successors of the son, the fiar: that if this faculty was real, any exercise of it after the father's death was inhabile, at least would only be preferred according to their dates, otherwise they behoved to be preferred to all singular successors, quandocunque the creditors in them should adjudge. At last, without a division, the Lords adhered.'

In the subsequent case of Scotsraig, the Court held that a faculty to burden, conceived in the most plain and express terms, so as to make every personal deed, in exercise of that faculty, however latent, to become a real burden, is repugnant to law; and such latent deed will be no real burden, nor the possibility of such a deed an encumbrance sufficient to entitle a purchaser to retain any part of the price. Crs. of Douglas of Scotsraig v Stewart, 1737; Elchies, Faculty, No. 3.

In the case of Henderson's Children v Crs., 1760, the children, as creditors of the disponent, were held preferable only according to their diligence. M. 10179.

In a question with the widow of a son claiming her terce, a daughter of the disponent was held not to be a real creditor under a faculty reserved to the father, the deed being merely personal by which she was to have the benefit of the faculty. Montier v Baillie, 1773, M. 15859.

See also Hill v Hill, 1774, M. 10180.

The decision in the case of Boquhan and Cunningham (see p. 42, infra), which is opposite to these, is not approved of. See M. 4133; Elchies' Notes, 131. [See Hyslop v Maxwell, 1834, 12 S. 413, as to the distinction between the exercise of such a faculty to the effect of creating a real burden, and the exercise of it for the purpose of regulating succession.]

over the lands, by his own act, or by that of another appointed by him, and named in the deed.¹

Mr. Erskine says, that if the deed in which the faculty is reserved express not only the sum, but the person in whose favour it may be exercised, a personal bond in favour of that person by him who is entitled to exercise the power, is a sufficient exercise of it to create a real burden;² and his reason is, that the purchaser may thus know both the extent of the debt and how to extinguish it. This opinion, however, may be questioned. The true doctrine seems to be that which has already been laid down as applicable to the ordinary case.³

It may be doubted what should be the effect of an objection, in point of form, [42] fatal to the sasine by which the faculty is exercised. It would probably be held to cut down the right of the person in whose favour the faculty had been exercised, and to give admission to the personal creditors of the disponer doing diligence by adjudication, although the entry of the sasine on the record might be said to give full notice of the burden.

A bare adjudication, without a charge, and merely with its recorded abbreviate, does not seem to be sufficient to constitute the real right in the creditor under the faculty.

II. A FACULTY TO BE EXERCISED BY A THIRD PARTY has a very different effect from that which is reserved to the disponer himself. Before the disponee's right is completed by sasine, the disponer's creditors undoubtedly may, in this case as in the other, attach the estate disposed, and become by their diligence preferable to the disponee and all others. But after the disponee's right is completed, the creditors of the disponer can have no title to adjudge the faculty vested in a third party, unless it be a mere trust in that person for the disponer's benefit.

III. EFFECT OF FACULTY IN COMPETITION.—After the death of the granter of the faculty, or of him on whom the power is conferred, a competition may arise between the creditors of the disponee and the person (or his creditors) in whose favour the faculty has been exercised. In such a competition, the rules seem to be these:—

1. If no real right be created, and on record, at the death of the disponer, or of him who has the power, the faculty, in a question with real securities, or complete conveyances proceeding from the disponee, is to be held as still unexercised, and by the death extinguished; and so the whole estate is an unburdened fund of the disponee.⁴

¹ Ersk. ii. 3. 21.

See the case of Anderson v Young and Trotter, 1784, M. 4128.

The difficulty in feudal law was here disposed of in a case where the purchaser of lands took the titles to another person in trust, with power to the purchaser to burden, sell, etc., without the trustee's consent.

² Ersk. ii. 3. 50.

³ [Lord Ivory, in his note to the passage, appears to adopt the author's view.]

⁴ Lord Kilkerran, in his remarks on the case of Boquhan and Cunningham (see next note), says: 'In this judgment the Lords were not unanimous. It was observed that, a century ago, all such faculties were quite ineffectual unless exercised specifically by burdening the lands by infertment, inasmuch that even no personal action lay against the disponee to the personal creditor of the granter. In process of time the Lords did, it is true, ex equitate, so far remit this rigorous construction of such faculties as to give personal action; but to give the personal creditor of the disponer a preference appeared to be without foundation, as it was without precedent. An assignation of the faculty by a personal deed is no exercise of the faculty: it may have been intended as such by the granter, but an intention is nothing when not habilely executed, and such assignee is still no more than a personal creditor. Now, had the Lords found that the granter's bare contracting debt was an exercise of the faculty, and thereupon found even the personal creditors of the granter preferable to infertments from the disponee, the ground of the decision might have been understood, though not approved of; but this middle way of finding the faculty exercised to the effect of giving preference to (over) the disponer's (disponer's) personal creditors, and not also to (over) his real creditors, was what several of the Lords could not approve.

'It is an agreed point, that a faculty to burden or a faculty to alter is a real right; but it is quite a different question, What rights granted in consequence of such faculty are real? Now, as such faculty is a real right, it follows that no infertments granted by the disponee can defeat the granter's power to burden or alter. Yet this is to be understood with a limitation; for though an infertment at any time in the granter's life will be preferable to an infertment by the disponee, though prior; and an infertment from the granter, though not taken upon his precept till after his death, will be preferable to an infertment from the disponee, if posterior thereto;

[43] 2. If the person in whose favour a faculty has been exercised has not taken sasine, or if the deed in exercise of the faculty is personal, and no steps have been taken to make the debt real, it may be questioned whether he has any preference over those who are personal creditors of the disponee at the disponent's death? It was found, in the case quoted below, that there was such a preference.¹ But the judgment is not approved of. Lord Kilkerran, in reporting the case, seems to deliver his own opinion in stating the opinion of the minority against the judgment.² The true doctrine appears to be, 1st, That the exercise of the faculty, though by personal deed, makes him in whose favour it is exercised a personal creditor of the disponee. Thus, it has been fixed that a deed containing precept of sasine, though no sasine has been taken, is a good exercise of the faculty against the disponee;³ and this holds even although the expression of the faculty should be to burden with wadsets or annualrents.⁴ 2dly, That the mere contraction of personal debts by the holder of the faculty is an exercise of a power to contract debt, and grant security therefor;⁵ and even where the faculty is in common form, the contracting of debt is held a presumptive exercise of it:⁶ so that diligence used upon such rights, in order to realize the burden, even after death, if first completed, will be effectual to give a preference. But, 3dly, That where the question is between the mere personal creditors of the disponent and those of the disponee, there seems to be no good principle upon which the former can have preference.⁷

yet if, at the granter's death, there is no infetment from him on record, the creditor or singular successor of the disponee, obtaining infetment on the faith of the record, will be preferable to any infetment that may afterwards be taken upon the granter's precept, which lay latent at his death; and were it otherwise, the security by the records would be wholly frustrated.

'And upon this ground it was that, anno 1736, in the case of Ogilvie of Coul, the Lords preferred an infetment by a son, the disponee, to the creditor of the father adjudging after the father's death, though the son's disposition was with the burden of a faculty to the father to contract debt to the extent of the said creditor's debt. In like manner, anno 1737, a bill of suspension being presented by the purchaser of the estate of Scotsraig against the creditors on this ground, that he was not in tuto to pay the price—for that, by a reserved faculty in his author's right to burden the lands with a certain sum, he might be in hazard of eviction—the Lords, in respect his author was then dead, and no exercise of the faculty on record, "remitted to the Ordinary to refuse the bill."

¹ A father disposed his estate to his son, reserving a faculty to burden the lands with 10,000 merks Scots; and in his second contract of marriage he exercised this faculty, by providing a sum to the children of the marriage, declaring it a burden on the lands, and assigning the faculty to the children. The son contracted many debts, some real, some personal; and after his death a competition arose between a daughter of the second marriage and the real and personal creditors of the disponee, for the price of the lands sold judicially. The Lords all agreed that the 10,000 merks was not a real burden, and that therefore the son's real creditors were all preferable; and yet they found the daughter preferable to all his personal creditors, who had done no diligence to affect the estate. Crs. of Boquhan v Cunningham, 1739, M. 4135; Elch. Faculty, No. 5.

² It resolves into these considerations, that faculties which at first were ineffectual unless exercised by infetment, came afterwards to afford a personal action, which can be no ground, however, of preference; that an assignation of the faculty is no exercise of it, and in no shape betters the condition of him in whose favour the exercise is made, or makes him other than a personal creditor; that although a faculty is a real right during the disponent's life, the creditors of the disponee may, immediately on his death, secure the estate from any exercise of the faculty, latent, and not appearing on the record; and that, to give consistency to this decision, it should have been fixed as a general rule, that the granter's personal creditors entitled to be considered as objects of the exercise of the faculty, have a preference over even the real creditors of the disponee. See above, for these notes of Lord Kilkerran, p. 41, note 4. The remarks of Lord Elchies on the case will be found in note 7.

³ Hamilton of Silverton, 1624, M. 4098.

⁴ Pringle v Pringle, 1677, M. 4103.

⁵ Crs. of Ruscoe, 1723, M. 4117.

⁶ Elliot of Sunnyside v Elliot, 1698, M. 4131.

⁷ In his notes on the case of Cunningham v Crs. of Boquhan, 1739, Elchies' notes, Faculty No. 5 (see above, note 1), Lord Elchies says: 'The Lords agreed that Miss Cunningham, upon the personal bond, in exercise of the faculty, had no real right upon the subject, nor was she preferable to the real creditors of the son. But they found her preferable to the personal creditors who had done no diligence (no more than she had) to affect the estates, which to me appeared a very new and odd decision; that in competition of creditors merely personal for the price of lands, none of whom had any real right in the lands, or used diligence for affecting the same, should yet be preferable one of them to the rest, since the law knows no privileged debt upon lands other than what are real. Arniston put his opinion upon this, that the reserved faculty was an implied prohibition to the son to contract debts in prejudice of the faculty; and the President seemed inclined to carry that observation further—to be a sort of inhibition to the lieges to lend to the son, in prejudice of the faculty. But Arniston would not carry it so far. But I own the whole went far beyond the reach of my poor understanding.' 11 December, adhered, 7 to 6. Vide Crs. of Dr. Ogilvy, 1737. See above, note 4, p. 41, for Lord Kilkerran's remarks.

3. The right of the creditors of the person to whom the faculty is given to attach [44] that faculty after his death, can scarcely be permitted to ground a real preference, to the exclusion of the donee's creditors. To carry this right of attachment beyond the life of the person holding the power, without any diligence begun during his life for rendering the subject litigious, seems a great stretch, since the faculty appears by the death to be extinguished, and the land disburdened. And even where there has been an intention of exercising the faculty, but it has been done only by a personal deed, it does not appear that diligence is competent after death. This is still clearer where the deed (as a personal bond) is anterior to the disposition, and so exclusive of all idea of an intention to exercise the faculty.¹

SECTION IV.

LIMITED ESTATES IN LAND DEPENDING ON DEEDS OF ENTAIL.—COMMENTARY ON THE ACT 1685, C. 22.

Of all restrictions on the commerce of land, and on the rights of creditors to attach the property of their debtor, the most important, and the most inexpedient and oppressive, are those which arise from entails; and it is sincerely to be hoped that, ere long, some safe course may be devised for restraining the exorbitant effects of the entail law of Scotland, and for introducing some limitations, consistent at once with the rules of justice and with public policy.² But the present inquiry is limited to the law as it exists.

Deeds of entail are designed to preserve the descent of estates in a particular line of succession, by means of prohibitions, restraints, and conditions; while the full right of a proprietor is, in all other respects, conferred on the persons successively taking under the deed. The law judges differently of the effect of such deeds, as against the heirs who succeed under them; and against strangers who, as purchasers or creditors, acquire the property from the person in the present right of the estate. The former are held, by their acceptance, to undertake the obligations imposed;³ against the latter there are not, at common law, any unquestionable means of giving efficacy to such conditions. Neither inhibition,⁴ nor interdiction, nor even the double clause of irritancy and of resolution, were sufficient at common law to secure this object; and although in the case of Stormont, and in others,⁵ decisions were pronounced favourable to the efficacy of entails, it was found necessary to remove all doubts by a statute, which should, on the one hand, give efficacy to entails, and, on the other, make it an indispensable condition of their efficacy, that creditors and purchasers should have full notice. This is the statute 1685, c. 5; and on its provisions the effect of the limitations imposed in deeds of entail depends.⁶

By this statute it is declared,—

(1) That 'it shall be lawful to His Majesty's subjects to tailzie their lands and estates, [45]

¹ In the case of Rome's Ors., in 1719, M. 4113, it was found that an adjudication led after the disponer's death, upon a personal bond, was not competent to hurt the right of an onerous purchaser from the donee; but there, indeed, the real right was established in the purchaser before the leading of the diligence, and consequently the diligence might be found insufficient upon another ground than that of incompetency.

² [This has been in part carried into effect by the statute 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36.]

³ The effect of a breach of the injunction in grounding a claim of indemnification is at present under consideration in the case of Ascog [4 W. and S. 196], and in the Queensberry

cases, as remitted by the House of Lords. [4 W. and S. 254; and see Bruce v Bruce, ibid. 240. Judgment for the defenders in all the cases.]

⁴ Bryson v Chapman, 1760, M. 15511, 5 Br. Sup. 940; and L. Ankerville, 1787, M. 4882.

⁵ V. Stormont v Ors. of E. of Annandale, 1662, M. 15475, 13994. See Stair ii. 3. 237; also Craig v Craig, 1712, M. 15494, Rob. App. Ca. 110.

⁶ [That is, in the case of deeds of entail executed prior to the recent conveyancing statutes. A direction to record the deed in the Register of Tailzies is now equivalent to the insertion of the statutory prohibitions, followed by clauses irritant and resolute. 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 14.]

and to substitute heirs in their tailzies, with such provisions and conditions as they shall think fit, and to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolute clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell, annailzie, or dispoise the said lands, or any part thereof, or contract debt, or do any other deed whereby the same may be apprized, etc., declaring all such deeds to be in themselves null and void, etc. :’ (2) That ‘such tailzies only shall be allowed, in which the foresaid irritant and resolute clauses are insert in the procuratories of resignation, charters, precepts, and instruments of sasine :’¹ (3) That ‘the original entail shall be once produced before the Lords of Session judicially, and their authority interposed to it :’ (4) That a ‘record be made in a particular register book, to be kept for that effect, wherein shall be recorded the names of the maker of the tailzie, and of the heirs of tailzie, with the general designations of the lordships and baronies, and the provisions and conditions contained in the tailzie, with the irritant and resolute clauses subjoined thereto, to remain in the said register ad perpetuam rei memoriam :’ (5) That being so insert, the ‘same shall be real and effectual, not only against the contraveners and their heirs, but also against their creditors, apprizers, adjudgers, and other singular successors whatsoever, whether by legal or conventional titles :’ and (6) That the omission of the provisions and irritant clauses in the rights under which any of the heirs enjoy the estate, shall be a contravention, whereby the estate shall devolve to the next heir of tailzie ; but the same shall not militate against creditors, or other singular successors, contracting bona fide with the person who stood infest, without having the said clauses in the body of his right.

Two main questions arise for consideration under this Act, wherever creditors are desirous of attaching an entailed estate : viz. (1) Whether the restraining words of the entail comprehend the debtor, and are such as to exclude the diligence of creditors ? and (2) Whether the forms have been duly observed which the statute has required for rendering effectual the prohibitions of an entail ?

I. RESTRAINING WORDS.—The general rule is, that the right of an heir of entail is that of a full proprietor, in every particular in which he is not effectually fettered and limited ; and that all words of restriction are subject to strict interpretation.

1. The prohibitions and limitations (commonly called the fetters of an entail) are directed to three several objects : (1) Against selling the estate ; (2) Against the contracting of debt ; (3) Against any alteration of the order of succession. And in the practice of conveyancers, clauses are framed for each of these purposes. The entailer may have sufficient confidence that his heirs will not voluntarily sell the estate, or alter the line of succession, but he may think it still necessary to prevent them from contracting debt so as to endanger the entail ; or he may have full reliance on the solvency of the heirs pointed out in his destination, so as to have no fear for the disappointment of his intentions, provided he can prevent them from selling the estate or altering the succession ; or he may think his entail secure against sale and insolvency, and in danger only from an alteration of the line of succession. And as the prohibition of these several acts may each in its turn form the sole object of an entailer, in perfect consistency with unrestrained freedom as to the others, it has been settled that fetters cannot be extended by implication from cases expressed to cases not expressed. It may happen that, owing to the carelessness or ignorance of the conveyancer, those purposes may have been confounded in a deed of entail ; and the manifest purpose of the entailer may appear fairly to include, under any of the conditions, the others,—the prohibition to alter the succession, for example, being necessarily a prohibition against selling, of which the [46] necessary effect is to alter the succession. But the rules are : 1. That from one limitation another is not to be inferred ; from cases expressed, no prohibition is to be extended to acts not expressed. 2. That the restraining words shall be clear, and that, although there are no technical words, or voces signatæ, by which alone the prohibition can effectually be expressed, the act prohibited must at least be directly specified, either in express and intelligible words, or in words of which the fair and obvious construction shall include the particular act as by substantive prohibition.¹

¹ See Denham v Stewart, H. L. 17 Feb. 1737, 1 Cr. St. and Pat. 233.

The result is, that in order to make an entail effectual against creditors, it must contain an express prohibition against contracting debts so as to affect the estate, otherwise the creditors will not be excluded. It will be no bar to creditors, that their diligence will necessarily have the effect of defeating the destination of the estate which the heir is prohibited from altering; neither can they be obstructed by a prohibition to sell.

II. IRRITANT AND RESOLUTIVE CLAUSES.—It is, under the statute, necessary that the words of prohibition shall be accompanied by an irritant and a resolutive clause, clearly directed, each of them, to that particular prohibition. The CLAUSE IRRITANT declares the debts, when contracted, to be void and null.² The CLAUSE RESOLUTIVE annuls the right of the heir of entail who shall disregard the prohibition.³

III. PERSONS AGAINST WHOM THE RESTRAINTS ARE DIRECTED.—In order to have operation against any one holding the estate under the entail, it is indispensable that the limitations or fetters should be expressly and clearly pointed against such person. But this is not the sole difficulty which has attended the question as to the efficacy of prohibitions.

1. With regard to the INSTITUTE, who, as donee, takes the estate by direct conveyance, and is in no sense to be considered as an heir,⁴ the first difficulty is, whether, under the statute, he can be subjected to the restraints of the entail otherwise than by a personal engagement implied from his acceptance. The words of the statute, in declaring how far the restraints shall be effectual, are applied only to 'heirs.' The power given is, to tailzie lands, and 'to affect the said tailzies with irritant and resolutive clauses, whereby it shall not be lawful to the heirs of tailzie to sell,' etc.; and in thus providing, the Legislature, it is said, did enough, since the entailer has it in his power, in making an entail, to fulfil any wish he may have to include the person whom he first calls, by making him an heir of tailzie, and himself the institute. But it is now settled, that, notwithstanding the limited expressions of the statute, the institute may, as such, be effectually placed under the restraints of the entail, provided the expressions to this effect be clear and unambiguous.

2. Holding, as the Court of Session seems pretty uniformly to have done, that the institute may be included, provided he is expressly and unambiguously declared so to be, [47] it has been much doubted whether any of the general expressions used in such deeds be sufficient for this purpose. The points settled are: 1. That under the term 'heirs' the institute is not included. 2. That under the term 'member of tailzie' he is not included. 3. That the combination of these expressions, conjunctively or disjunctively, does not include the institute. 4. That he is not, by implication from other parts of the tailzie, to be construed within the restraints; and that this rule being once settled, it is not now to be got rid of by

¹ For the doctrine of construction of entails, see Campbell's Heirs v Wightman, 1746, M. 15505; Elch. Tailzie, No. 29. Sinclair v Sinclair, 1749, M. 15382; Elch. Tailzie, No. 36; 1 Cr. St. and P. 459. Cuming Gordon v Gordon, 1761, M. 15513. Scott Nisbet v Young, 1763, M. 15516, 2 Pat. 98. Stewart v Home, 1789, M. 15535. Bruce v Bruce, 1799, M. 15539. M'Laine v M'Laine, 1807, M. Tailzie, No. 14. Brown v C. of Dalhousie, 1808, M. Tailzie, No. 19. Henderson v Henderson, 21 Nov. 1815, Fac. Coll. D. of Roxburgh, in H. L. 17 Dec. 1813, 2 Dow 149. Queensberry case in H. L., 5 Dow 297 and 1 Bligh 340. Elliot v Potts, H. L. 14 Mar. 1824, 1 Sh. App. Ca. pp. 16 and 89. Barclay v Adam, in H. L. 15 May 1821, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 24. M'Kenzie, 1823, 2 S. 331, N. E. 293. Nisbet, 1823, 2 S. 381, N. E. 339. [For a fuller exposition of the rules of construction applied to the technical clauses of entails, reference is made to Mr. Duncan's Digest of Entail Cases, and to the 32d chapter of the editor's treatise on Wills and Succession. See Lang v Lang (Overton), 1 D. 98, and the cases raised under sec. 43 of 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, particularly the Kintore and Halkerton cases, 4 Macq. 520.]

² Baillie v Carmichael, 1734, M. 15500; Gardner v Heirs of Tailzie of Dunipace, 1744, Elchies, Forfeiture, No. 18. See Rob. App. Ca. pp. 110, 117, for the case of Riccarton; and compare p. 117 with the report of Lord Kilkerran in the case of Dunipace.

³ Hepburn's Crs. v his Children, aff. in H. L. 7 Dec. 1758, 2 Pat. 17; Kemp v Watt, M. 15528; Bruce of Tillycoultry, 1799, aff. 4 Pat. 231. See also Elliot of Stobs, 19 May 1803, F. C.; and in this case observe what Lord Chancellor Eldon says, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 93.

⁴ Ersk. iii. 8. 31.

nice, thin, and shadowy distinctions.¹ But, 5. That where the prohibitions are distinctly pointed against the institute, and the resolute clauses against the persons and heirs, it will be sufficient to comprehend the institute.²

3. Where the prohibitions are directed only against heirs, it may, in particular circumstances, be doubted whether the first person who is to enjoy the estate under the tailzie is an heir, and so subject to the restraints, or only an institute, and thereby exempt from them. 1. Where the person first taking is a proper conditional institute, it is held that he is not comprehended under the term heirs of tailzie.³ But, 2. Where the destination is successively to one after another, although all that precede in such destination should predecease the entailer, the person taking by such substitution is not a conditional institute. So, where one named his eldest son as institute, whom failing his second son, whom failing his daughter, and the sons died before the entailer, and the daughter on his death came to succeed immediately in the place of the institute, she was not held to be a conditional institute, and as such exempt, but considered as a substitute and heir of entail.⁴

4. Where the maker of the entail gives the first place to himself, it has been held that words of disposition are not sufficient to give the person taking after him the character of institute.⁵

5. Till lately it was held almost uniformly, that whatever might be the effect of prohibition against institutes or heirs of entail, yet by no device or clause of prohibition could the maker of an entail withdraw his estate from the diligence of his own creditors, or prevent even his future debts from affecting the estate, while he continued to hold the fee. But in the House of Lords this doctrine has undergone a very careful revisal and investigation, and the result is very important. 1. It has been admitted as a point fixed, that the entailer cannot make a gratuitous settlement of the estate so as to bind himself and exclude his creditors. 2. On the other hand, holding it as also settled that the institute may be bound [48] although not mentioned in the statute, it has been considered that a mutual entail, or an entail for a money consideration, is equivalent to a purchase with an entail by the purchaser, and effectual against the proprietor as institute who has entered into this onerous bargain. On these principles the case of Agnew was determined.⁶

¹ In the Duntreath case, where the expression was 'heirs,' the House of Lords determined 'that the appellant being fiar or disponee, and not an heir of tailzie, ought not, by implication from other parts of the deed of entail, to be construed within the prohibitory, irritant, and resolute clauses, laid only upon the heirs of tailzie.' Morr. Dict. p. 4411. See notes of this case as decided in the Court of Session, Hailes, p. 298. Observe particularly the opinion of Lord Pitfour.

In Steel v Steel, 12 May 1814, aff. 27 June 1817, where the expression was 'heirs and members of tailzie,' a similar decision was given, 5 Dow 72, 6 Pat. 322.

See also Wellwood v Wellwood, 1791, Bell's Oct. Ca. 191; Wellwood v Preston, 1797; Miller v Cathcart, 1799. [Observe, however, that where a truster directs his trustees to make a strict entail containing prohibitions directed against the 'heirs of entail,' the Court will require the fetters to be applied to the institute, and also to conditional institutes. Seton v Seton, 1854, 16 D. 658; Forbes v Forbes, 1853, 15 D. 809.]

² Syme v Ranaldson Dickson, 1799, M. 15473; Douglas & Co. v Glassford, 1823, 2 S. 487, N. E. 431, aff. 1 W. and S. 323. [Baugh v Murray, 1834, 12 S. 279; Maxwell v Logan, 15 S. 291, aff. M'L. and Rob. 790; Campbell v M. of Breadalbane, 2 Rob. 109; Brown v M'Gregor, 3 S. and M'L. 84.]

³ Menzies of Culdares v Menzies, 1785 and 1803, aff. 20

July 1811, 5 Pat. 522. Here the dispositive clause was, 'I hereby, under the condition, etc., and failing of heirs-male of my own body, sell, annailzie, and dispose to Captain Alexander Menzies, during all the days of his lifetime, etc., and to the said James Menzies, my great-grandchild, and the heirs of his body,' etc. James Menzies was held a conditional institute, not under limitations directed against heirs of entail. [Maxwell v Maxwell, 1817, Hume 875.]

⁴ M'Kenzie v M'Kenzie, 24 Nov. 1818. See 1 Sh. App. Ca. 150. See also Menzies of Culdares v Menzies, above note.

⁵ Gordon v M'Culloch, 1791, M. 15465, Bell's Oct. Ca. 180. See also Livingstone v L. Napier, 1762, M. 15418.

⁶ The families of Vans and of Agnew were united by the marriage of John Vans of Barnbarroch, and Margaret Agnew, only child of Robert Agnew of Sheuchan. The marriage was at first disapproved of, but the lady's father was afterwards reconciled to it, and a postnuptial but onerous contract was made between Mr. Agnew and Mr. Vans, whereby Mr. Agnew agreed to advance £3000 to Mr. Vans for liquidation of his debts, and also to settle a large personal estate on him and his wife. Mr. Vans, in consideration thereof, executed a mutual entail along with Mr. Agnew of both their estates on the same series of heirs, Agnew giving, etc. to John Vans and Margaret Agnew, and the longest liver of them two, and the heirs of entail named, the lands and estate of Sheuchan; for

Except in the case of mutual and onerous entails, the prohibitions are ineffectual against the creditors of the entailer. If the entailer's debts exceed the value of the estate, it may be brought to a judicial sale, according to the forms hereafter to be explained. If they are such as only to encumber the estate, the only remedy is by an application made to Parliament for authority to sell as much as may be sufficient for paying off the debt. The execution of these Acts is committed to the judges; generally to the Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lord Chief-Baron.

REQUISITES OF EFFECTUAL ENTAILS.—It is not enough to protect an estate from the diligence of creditors, that the lands should be settled by a deed of entail, of which the restraining expressions are clear, and the irritant and resolute clauses correct, and duly pointed against the person to be restrained. It is further necessary that the forms pointed out in the Act 1685 be complied with.

The following points have been settled under this statute:—

1. The original deed of entail must, in order to bind third parties, be produced judicially, and recorded in the register of entails, whether it was made prior or posterior to the statute.¹ It is not enough that charter and sasine have followed on the deed of entail, and that the prohibitions in this way appear in the record of sasines;² nor is it even enough that the charter be recorded.³

2. The entail, though recorded in the register of entails in terms of the Act, has no [49] effect against the creditors of the heir-at-law, unless it has been completed by infestment;⁴

which causes, and for the sum of £3000 paid by the said Robert Agnew to the said John Vans, etc., the said John Vans gave, etc., in favour of himself and the said Margaret Agnew his spouse, and the longest liver of them two, whom failing to the other heirs of tailzie, etc., his lands and estate of Barnbarroch, etc. The deed contained the proper irritant and resolute clauses, directed against John Vans and Margaret Agnew, as well as the heirs, etc. The entail was duly recorded 1755, but no sasine passed till 1775. The entail was drawn by Lord Braxfield; and the opinion of Lord President Campbell, while at the bar, was in favour of the efficacy of the entail. In an action of declarator to have it found and declared that the entail did not affect or exclude the debts of the entailer, John Vans, the Court of Session decided that the entail was not effectual to exclude the creditors. Stewart v Agnew, 1784, M. 15435.

A private Act of Parliament was then passed to authorize the sale of a part of the estate in order to pay Vans' debts, and certain lands were sold. But after thirty years, the heir of entail, who was a minor and abroad, having arrived at majority and come to Britain, took an appeal to the House of Lords, who, having remitted the case for reconsideration, the Court of Session confirmed their former judgment. Stewart v Vans Agnew, 2 June 1818, F. C.

It was on a new appeal taken against this judgment that the discussion alluded to in the text took place in the House of Lords, when the judgment of the Court of Session was reversed, and the entail declared effectual to protect the estate against the future debts of Mr. Vans. 14 July 1822, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 320. [See also Sharp v Sharp, M. 4299; Shaw v Shaw, 1715, M. 15572, aff. Rob. 203; Paul v M'Leod, 1828, 6 S. 826; Dickson v Cunninghame, 7 S. 503, aff. 5 W. and S. 657.]

¹ [Broomfield v Paterson, 1784, M. 15618, and 14 S. 1033; Ross v Drummond, 1844, 3 Bell 87; E. of Eglinton v Montgomerie, 1842, 4 D. 425, aff. 2 Bell 149.]

² Philp v E. of Rothes, 1758, M. 15609; E. of Rosebery v Baird, etc., 1765, M. 15616; L. Kinnaird v Hunter, 1761, M. 15611; Irvine of Drum v E. of Aberdeen, 1776, M. 15617, App. Tailzie, No. 1. All these judgments were affirmed in the House of Lords.

Debts were contracted by an heir of entail infest, but before the entail was recorded in the Register of Entails. The entail was then recorded; and in a question between the creditors proceeding to attach the estate, and the next substitute, the estate was held attachable. Smollet v Smollet's Crs., 1807, M. App. Tailzie, No. 12. See below, p. 49.

³ Irvine v E. of Aberdeen, 1776, supra. [Grahame v Grahame, 8 S. 231, aff. 5 W. and S. 759; King v E. of Stair, 6 D. 821, aff. 5 Bell 82; Stewart v Stewart, 5 Bell 139. It is an obvious corollary of the rule that the whole entail must enter the Register of Tailzies, that an entail effectual against creditors cannot be constituted by reference to another deed containing the conditions and restraining clauses. Cathcart v Gammell, 1852, 1 Macq. 363; and see Lord Forbes v Gammell, 1858, 20 D. 917.]

⁴ This will be found well illustrated in two important cases reported in Bell's Ca. pp. 166, 179.

The first case is that of Douglas of Kelhead v the Crs. of Sir John Douglas, 1765, M. 15616. Sir William Douglas, who was absolute fiar of the estate, made an entail to himself in life-rent, and his son, afterwards Sir John Douglas, etc., in fee. This entail was recorded regularly, but no infestment was taken upon it. Sir John entered to the possession, and continued in it as apparent heir for many years. He contracted much debt, and his creditors adjudged the estate, were infest, and raised an action of judicial sale. An application was made by a substitute in the entail to have the lands struck out of the sale, but the Lord Ordinary refused to do so; and the cause having been stated in memorials to the Court, was solemnly decided in the same way.

Russell, Ross, etc., v Crs. of Ross of Kerse, 1792, M. 10300.

and even the admission by the creditors that they knew of the entail, will not defeat their diligence.¹

3. As the creditors of the heir-at-law may attach the estate, notwithstanding a recorded entail, while it continues a personal deed; so, on the other hand, if, in the sasine taken on the entail, the conditions have been left out, or even if they have been inserted only by reference to the conditions in the deed of entail, and not verbatim inserted, creditors will not be barred.²

4. How far an estate may be availably attached by the diligence of creditors, or imperfect securities completed in competition with those having a jus quæsitum under uncompleted entails, has given rise to several questions. And the principles have, in no small degree, been disturbed by attention to certain loose conceptions which are said to have been entertained by conveyancers and practical lawyers, and relied on by the country, favourable to creditors, and hostile to the rights of heirs of entail. This is a bias not unnaturally arising from the wish to find some practical remedy against the severe restraints by which, against reason and equity, our law of entails forbids even the most moderate family provisions. But it is perhaps one of the worst ways of working a reformation [50] in jurisprudence to give sanction to practical facilities, which are never beyond the reach of doubt, but which yet serve to hide the evils of the law. More correct views appear to have been adopted in the House of Lords in the Sheuchan case, and also to have been entertained by many eminent lawyers in the Court of Session; the substitutes under an entail being regarded as creditors entitled to particular remedies against the defeasance of their jus quæsitum, and as engaged on the ordinary principles of competition, in a rivalry with creditors of the ordinary description. To explain the principle of this doctrine, let it be considered that creditors of the ordinary description either trust to real security or rely on general credit. In the former case, they have such benefit as the property on which they are secured, voluntarily or by diligence, may afford them: in the latter, they take the rights of their debtor, such as they are, with all the limitations and qualifications to which they are subject; and with the benefit of the laws, which guard against fraud by gratuitous alienations, or by undue preferences granted to particular creditors.

Hugh Ross was absolute fiar of Kerse, and infekt. He made an entail to his eldest son, etc., with prohibitions to sell and contract debts, and with irritant and resolute clauses. The entail was duly recorded, but no sasine was taken upon it. The entailer died, and his son—although he made up titles by general service as heir of line, and also by special service to other subjects—possessed Kerse without making up any titles, and without taking sasine. His creditors adjudged upon charges to enter heir in special, and raised a judicial sale. The object of the question was to clear the title of the purchaser, and enable him to pay safely. The papers in Douglas's case were reprinted by order of the Court, and the case was fully argued. The Court found the tailzie no bar to the sale. In pronouncing this decision, the Court seemed to be unanimous, and the grounds upon which they proceeded are resolvable into the following propositions:—1st, That an entail, while personal, is qualified with the conditions and limitations which it contains; for every personal right must thus be subject to the conditions under which it is granted. 2^d, That it follows from this proposition, that where the heir of entail has no other right, his creditors, who can reach the land only by the entail, cannot, while it continues personal, attach the lands, if the limitations strike against debts. 3^d, That while the right continues personal, the creditors of the granter, or those of his apparent heir, or of the heir of entail, if alioquin successurus, may attach the land, because no encumbrance can be effectual against land to burden or destroy a former sasine, unless by infektment, to which, in the case of entails, is super-added the necessity of recording the deed in a particular register. 4th, That creditors may, where there are several rights in the debtor's person, take which they please, and render it effectual by their diligence, the first infektment deciding the preference. 5th, That the old distinction stated between purchasers and adjudgers, viz. that adjudgers must take their rights tantum et tale, as they stand in the debtor, subject to all the burdens with which his right is attended, was pushed too far. And, 6th, That the very terms of the Act 1685, in requiring the conditions to enter the infektment, imply that no entail can be secured against creditors or purchasers, unless infektment has been taken.

See also the case of Auchindachy, M. 10971, Bell's Oct. Ca. 8, 199, aff. in H. L., 3 Pat. 317.

¹ Cuthbert v Paterson, 23 Feb. 1787, 2 Pat. 377.

² In Lord Maxwell's case, effect was given to the entail as at least forming an obligation on him who was selling, and so effectual against a buyer from him while in nudis finibus contractus. Kilk. 539. But private knowledge has no effect against creditors doing diligence. Crs. of Murray Kyninmond, 1744, M. 15380, Elch. Tailzie, No. 26.

But under those rights, a creditor, especially on general credit, is still liable to certain disappointments—by the sale of the debtor's estate; by the constituting of securities for money borrowed; by the diligence of other creditors; by diligence in implement of obligations to convey: and unless the substitutes holding a jus quæsitum under an entail are to be denied all remedy for implement of their right, they also by their diligence may defeat the right of ordinary creditors on general credit, and get the start of them in various ways. They may apply to have the entail recorded, if that be wanting to its efficacy: they may compel the heir in possession to complete his right by infeftment. Thus, in all cases where there is a jus crediti, the creditor is entitled to his legal process; and where there are opposing rights, the competitions should be determined by the priority of the completion of the real security. This brings the matter to a simple principle universally applicable to all cases of competition. But it has been urged against this conclusion: 1. That there is thus an unjust favour shown to substitutes over other creditors, since the act by which the real security is completed is instantaneous, while the process by ordinary creditors is tedious. 2. That it has long been held as settled law, that a person lending money to an heir of entail in possession, but without having completed the entail, has a right to attach the estate at any time, even after the entail is completed, insomuch that it has been held an advantage to such creditors to have the entail completed, as excluding others, but saving their right; and on the faith of this, immense sums have been lent to heirs of entail. Even were such understanding and practice uniform, it might be a subject of regret that innocent and confiding creditors should suffer. But this never can be sufficient to establish the rule, if in point of law it is groundless. The opinions of some of our greatest lawyers of the last age, in consultations which I have seen, is quite adverse to this supposed general understanding, although undoubtedly it does appear that other lawyers had held a different opinion.

On looking to the statute which has been supposed to support the alleged general understanding, two cases are distinguishable. 1. The general case of an incomplete entail, whether by want of infeftment, or by want of recording in the register of tailzies; with regard to which it is enacted, that the requisites of the statute being complied with, the entail shall be effectual not only against the contraveners and their heirs, but 'against creditors, comprisers, adjudgers, and other singular successors whatsoever,' whether by legal or conventional titles. 2. The other case is a special one, where the heir of entail is infeft, but has omitted from his infeftment the irritant and resolute clauses, in which case the entail is not 'to militate against creditors and other singular successors, who shall happen to have contracted bona fide with the person who stood infeft in the said estate, without the said irritant and resolute clauses in the body of his right.'

Two cases have occurred relative to this doctrine—the case of Smollet, and that of [51] Sheuchan.

In Smollet's case, titles were made up under the entail, and the heir was infeft, and contracted debt before recording the entail; and after the entail was recorded, the creditors adjudged the entailed estate, now in possession of the next heir of entail. And an action of judicial sale having been raised, one farm was sold, the price of which was sufficient to discharge the debts. The purchaser raised the question as to the validity of his title, and it was held good; in other words, the creditors of the heir in possession, although their debts stood on his general credit at the time the entail was completed by registration, were held entitled to adjudge the estate from the substitutes.¹

¹ Smollet's Crs. v Smollet, 1807, M. App. Tailzie, No. 12. Although here the judgment was unfavourable to the entail, the opinions of the judges who were against the decision seem to be law. They held the creditors contracting on general credit, to trust their money to the personal faith of their

debtor, exposed to all the risk of sales, securities, and other spontaneous acts on the one hand, and to adjudication and all sorts of diligence on the other; that the substitutes were proper creditors under the entail, entitled to enter into competition; and that while the personal creditors have the whole

In the case of Sheuchan the same question occurred with little variation. It was a mutual entail in 1757, proceeding on a contract, by which it was provided that the debts which Mr. Vans then owed should not be affected by the deed. The entail was immediately recorded, but there was no infeftment in the entail till the year 1775; and debts were contracted previously to the sasine, but after the recording. The Court of Session in 1784 held 'that the estate of Barnbarroch was affectable by the debts of John Vans at the time of his death.' And afterwards, on remit from the House of Lords (2 June 1818), they confirmed their former judgment. The House of Lords 'found the estate affectable only, (1) by the debts due by John Vans at the date of the deeds of tailzie, and which remained due at the time of his death,'—this was under the special stipulation of the deed; and (2) by such other debts of the said John Vans as had become real charges upon the said estate before the infeftment of 20th May 1775.¹

5. If the debtor's sole right be derived from the entail, the conditions will be effectual against him and his creditors, though not recorded, provided infeftment have not followed on the entail.²

[52] DILIGENCE COMPETENT TO CREDITORS.—It has been doubted what diligence is competent, during the heir's possession, to creditors who are affected by the restraints of the entail.

1. It seems to be quite indisputable, that the rents may be arrested as they fall due; and that the fruits may be poinded, where the land is in the heir of entail's natural possession.

2. It has been doubted whether the liferent right of the heir may be adjudged, and whether a judicial sale and sequestration of the rents be competent. It is said that this would be against all the views which commonly dictate the conditions of an entail, and inconsistent with that family dignity connected with the land which the prohibition to contract debt is intended to secure, by preventing the estate from being possessed by another than the heir of entail. It is said, besides, to be exceedingly difficult to perceive how there can be an adjudication with infeftment, much more a sale followed by infeftment, without incurring the irritancy of alienation; since it is scarcely enough to say, that there is no alienation as to the subsequent heirs, that there is alienation as to the heir in possession only, and that he is barred personali exceptione from objecting to any proceedings artillery of the law at their command, it is under this limitation, that they shall complete their security while yet the lands are not bound in the fetters of the entail. This opinion had the support of Sir Ilay Campbell, President of the Court, who particularly referred to his whole course of experience as consistent with this doctrine.

¹ Stewart v Vans Agnew, H. L., 1 Sh. App. Ca. 320. See the opinions of Lord Chancellor Eldon and Lord Redesdale in Sandford on Entails, p. 375. As to the debts incurred after the date of the entail, and to which the special stipulation did not apply, and those which were incurred afterwards, and while yet the right remained personal, the ground of the Lord Chancellor's opinion was thus expressed: 'Although the debts incurred between the date of the contract and the infeftment of the heirs of entail in 1755 were personal obligations, yet, if adjudication had been led on them before that infeftment, it appears to me they would be prior rights. But I do think that, as soon as infeftment was taken for the heirs of entail upon the onerous contract, their right became preferable to all personal debts contracted after the date of the entail, and which had not before that infeftment been rendered real charges by adjudication.'

The whole doctrine here laid down has been contested in a pamphlet published by Mr. Swinton, entitled, 'Remarks by Archibald Swinton, Esq., Writer to the Signet, 1824.' The defect in the argument of this paper appears to be, that the analogy is attempted to be run too closely between an entail and an interdiction. If it be granted to Mr. Swinton that an entail operates merely as an interdiction, his argument is good; but Mr. Swinton forgets that the heirs of entail have also a jus crediti under the irritant and resolute clauses.

Mr. Sandford, in his Treatise on Entails, has also contested the doctrine of the decision in the House of Lords, p. 124; but his reasoning is not satisfactory.

² See the cases of Douglas, etc., in a preceding note.

In the following case the deed had not been recorded: Denholm of Westshiells v Baillie, 1781, as reversed in H. L., 1 Pat. 113. Kilkerran, 545-6, states as the principle of this reversal, that as infeftment had not followed, the creditors could not plead that they had contracted on the faith of the records, and so could not object to their being bound by the clauses in the entail as if recorded. See the case of Crs. of Carleton v Gordon, 1743; Elchies, Tailzie, No. 51. Syme v Dewar, 1803, M. 15619.

In the following case, sasine had not followed: Chisholm v McDonald, 1800, M. App. Tailzie, No. 6.

having that effect. But it is held, notwithstanding, that the right may be adjudged.¹ Nay, it is also held that the heir in possession may voluntarily grant an effectual security over his liferent right by bond of annuity and infestment, provided the conveyance contain a declaration that it is not to affect the property or injure other heirs or substitutes.²

RIGHT OF HEIR OF ENTAIL TO WOODS, ETC.—Although the right of an heir of entail seems in many respects to be similar to that of a liferenter, in others it is stronger, partaking of the nature of a fee. Thus, in the case of a common liferenter, liberty will not be given to cut even sylvæ caducæ, unless they have been laid out into allotments for cutting.³ But an heir of entail may cut woods, or dispose of them if ripe for cutting, under certain restrictions,—the cutting ceasing with his life; what is uncut at his death being pars soli, descendible, as part of the entailed estate, to the next substitute.⁴ The rents or price suffer a corresponding division: the price of what is cut before his [53] death goes to his executors; the price of what is not cut till after, goes to the next substitute, and may be attached by his creditors.⁵ Under the heir's right as fiar, it has been thought that creditors can attach the faculty of cutting the timber, or by means of diligence take the uncut timber and bring it to market: at least the woods usually allotted for cutting will in such a case be regarded as part of the liferent use and produce of the estate, and subject to diligence. If the heir of entail's right to cut wood depended, as sometimes has been said, on his power of administration, it might fairly be argued that he alone could

¹ Creditors have been found entitled to adjudge even the fee of the estate itself, valeat quantum valere potest. This was decided in a case peculiarly strong. The estate of Colvill was held by the bankrupt under a strict entail, which forfeited the right of the heir in possession and all his descendants, if the estate was allowed to be attached for debt. A creditor adjudged the estate, and the debtor petitioned the Court, representing the inevitable consequences of this diligence, and stating that it was in truth a device used by one of the substitutes, in collusion with the adjudger, to obtain the estate by the debtor's forfeiture. But the Court held that creditors were entitled to adjudge their debtor's estate whether it was entailed or not. Colvill, pet., 1779, M. 168.

Surely this decision is not to be approved of, and would not be repeated were such a question to occur again. See the case of Niven v M'Farlane, 20 Nov. 1799, n. r. (alluded to below, chap. 2, sec. 2, § 8), where the Court did not entirely disregard the defence of the bankrupt, who refused to assign his lease on pretence that it contained an irritancy; but an inquiry was made into that fact before proceeding. In the case of Johnston, 4 Feb. 1813 (same page), the Court refused to order the bankrupt to sign a conveyance of the lease.

² Sir W. Nairn v Gray, 15 Feb. 1810, F. C. [Bontine v Graham, 1837, 15 S. 712.]

³ See below, p. 61.

⁴ The following cases illustrate some points of the doctrine: Hamilton, 1757, where the substitute in vain offered the price, to save the trees.

Pringle v Scott of Gala. The question was argued, Whether an heir of entail had a power of selling the woods on the entailed estate, so as to entitle the purchaser to continue the cutting after the seller's death or forfeiture? The Court found, 'that the disposition to the woods did subsist for no longer than for the granter's lifetime;' but afterwards they found, that 'if the woods were ripe for cutting at the time of the seller's death, the deed is still a good and subsisting deed.' Against this judgment a petition was presented, but the cause was amicably settled. July 1730, Session Papers, Advocates' Library.

In the subsequent case of Lord Cathcart, the heir of entail had sold all the growing timber on the estate, both planted and natural, with liberty to cut it at any time before the year 1767. The Court found that none of the planted trees could, in virtue of this contract of sale, be cut after the death of Sir James Shaw, the seller and heir of entail; and in respect it was alleged by the pursuer, and not denied by the defender, that the natural woods sold by Lord Cathcart were not fit for cutting at the time of Sir James Shaw's death, therefore they reduced the said contract. L. Cathcart v Sir John Stewart Nicholson Shaw, 1755, M. 15399.

This was not a negative determination or opinion, that the trees might have been cut before the death of the heir of entail. That question was not determined, and there was no occasion to decide it, since the contract was not acted on till after the heir of entail's death; and so what was actually decided was sufficient to preserve the planted wood.

In the later case of Veitch of Ellick, it was decided that the right of the purchasers was at an end the very instant of the heir of entail's death, and that they were obliged to account for the wood cut between the moment of his death at London and the time when it was known in Dumfriesshire, where the estate lay, though it was not alleged that the woods were not ripe for cutting.

In M'Kenzie and Shaw v M'Kenzie, 1824, the Court seemed to hold: 1. That they have a jurisdiction to interfere, at least in extreme cases, to prevent destruction and waste. 2. That the heir of entail lies under certain restraints, as, first, Not to cut unripe wood; secondly, Not to cut ornamental and shelter wood. The Court ordered a minute to be put in by consent, stating the limits of the right claimed; and, on such minute, allowed the cutting to proceed in terms of it, under inspection of neutral persons. 2 S. 775, N. E. 643. [See these cases commented on, and the subject considered generally, in Paul v Cuthbertson, 1840, 2 D. 1286.]

⁵ M'Leod v Sir John Stewart's Crs., 24 June 1721, n. r.

exercise the faculty of cutting the timber;¹ and that although the creditors might take the benefit of that timber when cut, or of any contract for cutting it, they could have no right to exercise this power themselves. At any rate, creditors should have no right to cut any wood except that which is designed for timber; not the ornamental trees, which are as part of the estate or mansion-house.

The heir of entail may work mines, minerals, stone-quarries, etc., and his creditors will be entitled to the benefit of them. But it does not appear to have been decided whether the creditors of an heir of entail can explore the lands, and open such mines or quarries.

It has been held, that an heir of entail cannot pull down the mansion-house for the purpose of exposing the materials to sale, nor can his creditors do so.²

There are other important questions of power under the restraints of entails, which will find a more fit place under the subjects to which they more immediately relate. Such are, questions as to powers to grant leases,³ and questions as to provisions to widows and children.⁴

SECTION V.

LIMITED ESTATES OF LIFERENT AND FEE.

[54] Fee, as a relative term contradistinguished from LIFERENT, is the estate to which a person is entitled after the death of one who has the use of the property during his life. But fee, as an absolute term, is taken to express the full right of property, without any immediate reference to a subsisting liferent.

LIFERENT is a right conferred either by the law itself, or by deed, to enjoy the use, possession, and fruits of property, during the life of the person favoured, or of another.

Liferent and fee, while subsisting together, are mutual restraints on each other, and so are necessarily both of them limited estates, conferring on each of the holders relative rights. But not only does a liferent not exclude a fee: it implies the existence of a fee independent of it.

Liferents, where properly constituted either by legal construction or special deed, are effectual burdens on the right of fee; and creditors attaching the fee can bring the estate to sale only under burden of the liferent.

Liferents are either conventional or legal. The conventional are by reservation, or by constitution; the legal are Terce and Courtesy.

I. OF CONVENTIONAL LIFERENTS.

Among conventional liferents the chief distinction is between reserved liferent, and liferent by grant to another.

I. LIFERENT BY RESERVATION is created by a conveyance, transferring the fee or property of land, but reserving to the granter the use and enjoyment of the property during his life. It does not require sasine to be taken on the conveyance in order to constitute the liferent in this case. It rests on the original sasine as still by force of the reservation subsisting. And the right depending on the original infeftment unexhausted, it is in law considered

¹ The cutting down of planted timber, for gain or for payment of debt, might be a very questionable act, if the point could be held as open. See p. 51, note 4. And so it appeared to Lord President Blair in Gordon's case, 1811, 14 F. C. 161.

² Gordon v Gordon, 24 Jan. 1811, 14 F. C. 161.

³ See afterward, vol. i. pp. 66, 70.

⁴ See afterwards, Index, voce Marriage Contracts.

rather as a fee limited than as a new liferent. On this principle, the liferenter by reservation can enter heirs and purchasers.¹

II. LIFERENT BY GRANT TO ANOTHER is constituted by deed of conveyance, completed by sasine duly recorded; and the title of the liferenter depends on a sasine duly registered, as in other alienations of land.² Liferent by grant depends entirely on the words of its creation. There are not, indeed, any voces signatæ by which alone the liferent can be created. But where land is conveyed, the meaning at least must be clear and obvious, that the right is intended to be restricted to liferent, otherwise it will be held a fee.

Where the words used are clearly descriptive of a liferent, as 'to A. B. in liferent,' or 'for liferent use allenary,' or 'liferent alimentary use only,' they are never held to convey a fee, unless in circumstances where there would otherwise be no fee existing. But such a necessity may occur in consequence of the maxim, that the fee of an estate cannot be in pendente. The law will not endure the absurdities which would follow such suspension of the fee. Thus, if a superiority were disposed in terms not comprehending a fee, there would be no superior, and the vassals could not be entered. If the dominium utile were so conveyed, the superior would have no vassal; so that, where the former owner of the estate had [55] contracted debt, his creditors could not reach it, because there would be no one from whom it could be adjudged. To avoid these absurdities, law construes a fee where the words strictly seem to imply only a liferent, though sometimes the fee, which thus ex necessitate juris is implied, is only fiduciary or in trust.³

When, coupled with such a liferent, the fee is so conferred that it cannot vest in the person for whom it is designed, there may ex necessitate juris, or by operation of the deed, be a fiduciary fee till the person having the beneficiary right can take; but the fee vests the moment that by possibility it may. So an estate to a father in liferent, for liferent allenary, and to his eldest son in fee, is held by the father in fiduciary fee till his son exist, and then the fee is with him;⁴ or an estate disposed in trust, with a strictly limited liferent, and a suspensive disposition of fee, is held in fee by the trustees till the purifying of the condition, when it instantly vests as a jus crediti against the trustees.⁵

¹ Ersk. ii. 9. 42. Formerly he was allowed to enter heirs only, though in Craig's time his power extended to all vassals. Now it seems to be settled that he may enter both heirs and purchasers, the interest of the fiar to object being taken away by 20 Geo. II. c. 50, sec. 12, which compels the superior to admit singular successors. [A liferenter by reservation appears also to be entitled to the custody of the title-deeds. Bowes v Fergus, 1831, 10 S. 164. See Prin. 1040, 1055.]

² Ersk. ii. 9. 41.

³ See this doctrine well explained in M'Intosh v M'Intosh, 28 Jan. 1812, F. C. See below, p. 55, note 6.

⁴ See below, p. 55.

⁵ Wellwood's Trs. v Wellwood, 1791, Bell's Ca. 191: The deed was to the granter 'during all the days of his life; and failing of him by decease, to my heirs, etc., aftermentioned.' This was considered as suspending only the exercise, not the vesting, of the right of fee. See opinion of Lord Braxfield particularly.

M'Dowal and Selkirk v Crawford's Trs., 1824, 2 S. 682, N. E. 574. Here there was a trust-deed. Certain furniture, etc., 'together with a tenement of houses, to be liferented, used, and possessed by Margaret Buchanan, my spouse, during all the days of her life, while she remains my widow only; but on her death or second marriage, if she survive me, or at my death, if I survive her, my said furniture, etc., and the said tenement of houses, to go to and be the absolute property of the said George Crawford; whom failing, etc. Declaring that, on my death, and the death or second marriage of my wife, etc., my trustees shall be bound to denude themselves of the said tenements, etc., in favour of my said sons in their order.' In 1793 the granter died. In 1797 George assigned his share in security of a debt. He became a bankrupt, and was sequestrated in 1811; and the widow died in 1818. The chief question was, Whether George's interest was a jus crediti vested by the purifying of the condition, and transmissible by assignation? The Court held it to be so; and in deciding thus, they considered his right to be a fee vested and transmissible.

Smith v Leitch, 1826, 4 S. 659, N. E. 665, aff. 1829, 3 W. and S. 366. Here there was a trust-deed 'for behoof of E. Ironside, my wife, in case of her surviving me, in liferent for her liferent alimentary use allenary during the time of her life, and of her continuing my widow; and after her death, or in case of her entering into another marriage after my death, then for behoof of George Leitch, my brother, and his heirs and assignees in fee, in case he shall survive me, and shall be in life at the time of the death or second marriage of the said E. Ironside; and failing the said George Leitch by decease, etc., then I appoint the said trustees to hold, etc., in trust for behoof of James F. Leitch, etc., in fee, in case he shall be in life at the time of the death or second marriage of the said E. Ironside; and failing the said James F. Leitch, by decease before me, or prior to the death or second marriage of the said

Conventional liferent commonly forms a part of the provisions in marriage contracts and family settlements. And the following seem to be the chief points:—

1. A liferent is frequently created in marriage contracts in favour of the wife, instead of leaving her to her legal liferent of terce. This is generally called a LOCALITY; and the lands Locality lands, from the localling or apportioning of particular lands for the use of the widow. The wife, by this liferent right, is saved from the danger of the defeat of her terce by the alienation of land during the husband's life, and from the necessity of legal proceedings after her husband's death, for settling her proportion; but she takes the risk of the produce of the locality lands.

2. In marriage contracts and family settlements it is also common to create a species of right called conjunct fee and liferent—CONJUNCTIVA INVESTITURA—having in contemplation the interests of husband and wife, or of parents and children.

[56] With respect to HUSBAND and WIFE.—1. Where property is vested in conjunct fee and liferent; where it does not come from the wife or her relations; and where the destination does not peculiarly favour her or her heirs, and distinctly intimate a preference in her behalf, the husband is proprietor or fiar, and his creditors are entitled to attach the subject under the burden of the wife's liferent:¹ the creditors of the wife, after the husband's death, can affect only the liferent.² 2. If the subject come from the wife or her relations, and the expression is not such as clearly to intimate a preference in favour of the husband, the wife is fiar, the husband liferenter: the husband's creditors cannot attach the fee,³ while the wife can grant no conveyance, nor her creditors attach her right, otherwise than with a full reservation of the husband's liferent. But it is a sufficient destination to give a fee to the husband, if the subject is taken in conjunct fee and liferent, and the heirs of the marriage in fee.⁴ 3. If the wife's heirs are preferred in the destination,⁵ the fee is held to be in her. 4. The wife is fiar on her survivance, where the fee is destined to the survivor.⁶ 5. Where the destination is to husband and wife, and the survivor and their heirs, it was doubted whether their heirs did not mean only the heirs of the marriage. But this opinion did not prevail: the fee was held to be in the surviving wife and her heirs.⁷ It would, however,

E. Ironside, then I appoint the said trustees to hold, etc., in trust for behoof of Andrew Leitch, my nephew; whom failing, for behoof of my sisters,' etc. George and James F. Leitch survived the truster. They predeceased the widow, who never married a second time; and Andrew Leitch having, as thus succeeding to the fee, made a trust-disposition, died also before the widow. On her death, a competition arose between Andrew Leitch's trust-dispensee and the sisters of the granter of the original settlement. The Court held the fee to be in Andrew Leitch, and transmissible when he made his trust-conveyance, as vesting by the purifying of the condition.

¹ Stair ii. 3. 41. Johnston v Cunninghame, 1667, M. 4199, Ersk. iii. 8. 36. Edgar v Sinclair, 1713, M. 4201.

Even the husband's heir is held fiar on the wife's survivance. And so his creditors will be entitled to affect the fee under the burden of her liferent.

² Rig v Rig, 1562, M. 4197.

³ Wordie v Sampson, 1750, M. 4207; Sinclair v Anderson, 1771, M. 4241, Hailes 450; Paterson v Balfour, 1780; Frazer v M'Gilvray, 1794, M. 4212; Robertson's Crs. v Mason, 1795 M. 4491; Turnbills v Turnbull, 1822, 2 S. 1; Muirhead v Paterson, 1824, 2 S. 617. See Blair's Crs. v Blair, 1736, 1 Cr. and St. App. 251.

⁴ Watson v Johnston, 1766, M. 4288, Hailes 82. [See Madden v Currie's Trs., 22 Feb. 1842, 4 D. 749. The case of Watson v Johnston seems not to support the doctrine for which the author cites it, having been decided on the ground that the subjects belonged to the husband nomine dotis. See report in 5 B. S. 927, and per Lord Benholme in Myles v Calman, 12 Feb. 1857, 19 D. 408. See further, Cameron v Young, 28 June 1837, 15 S. 1205; Fisher's Trs. v Fisher, 19 Nov. 1844, 7 D. 129. However strong the tendency may be in dispositions to husband and wife, in conjunct fee and liferent, or in conjunct liferent (not allanarly), and to the children in fee, to hold the fee to be vested in the husband as the dignior persona, it is now well settled that such a destination in a conveyance by one of the spouses leaves the fee with the granter, unless the subjects are meant to be tocher, or an intention to transfer the fee is very plainly manifested. Myles v Calman, cit.; Mac-kellar v Marquis, 4 Dec. 1840, 3 D. 172.]

⁵ [Or her assignees, or if she has a power of disposal. Drover v Maxwell, 1709, M. 4240; E. Dunfermline v E. Callender, 1676, M. 2941, 4244; Porterfield v Grahame, 1777, M. 4277.]

⁶ Ferguson v M'George, 1739, Elchies, Fiar, No. 5, notes, p. 136; M. 4202; 5 B. S. 664. Riddels v Scott, 1747, M. 4203, 14878; Elchies, ut supra. Both these are cases of bonds for borrowed money. L. Boyd v King's Advocate, 1749, relative to a lease, M. 4205.

⁷ Ferguson v M'George, 1739, supra. [Macgregor v Forrester, 13 April 1834, 1 S. and M. L. 411; Burrowes v M'Farquhar's Trs., 6 July 1842, 4 D. 1484; Fisher's Trs. v Fisher, 19 Nov. 1844, 7 D. 129. But it seems to be otherwise when the destination is to the survivor and the heirs of the marriage, because they are the husband's heirs. Neilson v Murray, rather appear (at least where the subject belongs to the husband, or the money by which it is purchased comes from him), that while the husband lives he may alienate, or his creditors attach.¹ And, 6. Although the wife will be held as fiar, cæteris paribus, where the subject flows from her, yet if it has come into the communion as tocher, it will require the strongest expressions of preference in her favour to vest her with the fee.²

In rights taken to PARENT and CHILD, the parent is in general held as proprietor or fiar; the child's right being considered only as a spes successionis, and so postponable to the parent's creditors.³ But this rule suffers the following exceptions: 1st, where the children are in existence, capable of taking the fee, and the right is taken to the parent in liferent, and the child or children nominatim in fee; ⁴ 2d, where the right bears an express limitation [57] of the parent's interest to a liferent, as by the expression 'for liferent use allenarly' (only), or 'for liferent alimentary,' where these words are not coupled with words importing a fee.⁵ 3d, Even where the children are not yet born, if the right be taken to the parent 'for liferent use allenarly (only), and the children in fee,' in such case, ex necessitate juris, the property is held to be in the parent till the existence of the children. There being no one alive capable of taking the fee, and the law requiring a fiar, a constructive fee in trust for the fiar in spe is held to reside in the parent; but creditors have no right to it—it is merely fiduciary. If a trust be established for the parent's liferent and children's fee, the fee is in the children.⁶ But, 4th, where the children are in existence, and the destination is to the husband and wife in liferent, and the children by name in fee, reserving to the parent in whom the original fee resided the power of burdening and disposing of the property, the fee is held to be in the parent.⁷ And, 5th, the parent may make a destination to his children

1732, 1 Cr. and St. 65; Lord Fullerton in Mackellar v Marquis, 4 Dec. 1840, 3 D. 172. See also Scott v Maxwell, 22 May 1850, 12 D. 932, aff. 1 Macq. 791.]

¹ Kilkerran in Ferguson's case, supra; Reid v Forrester, 1804, n. r.; Pringle v Richardson, 1806, n. r.

² Bruce Henderson v Henderson, 1790, M. 4215, aff. 3 Pat. 686; Ersk. iii. 8. 36. See Lord Pitfour's opinion in Watson v Johnston, supra.

³ Wilson v Glen, 14 Dec. 1819, F. C. Here the disposition was to husband and wife, and the longest liver in conjunct fee and liferent, for their liferent use allenarly, and to their son nominatim, his heirs, etc., in fee. Sasine was taken in these terms: The son, after his parent's death, possessed the lands without completing titles otherwise than by the original sasine. A question arose between his heir and the heirs of his father, turning on the point whether the fee was in the father or the son. The Court held the fee to be in the father.

See also the following cases:—Children v Crs. of Frog, 1735, M. 4262; confirmed 1741, by Lillie v Riddel, M. 4267; Cuming v L. Advocate, 1756, M. 4268; Cuthbertson v Thomson, 1781, M. 4279; Robertson v D. of Athole, 1806, M. App. Fiar Absolute 1; Pollock v Pollocks, 1806, M. App. Provisions to Heirs 6; Lindsay v Dott, 1807, M. App. Fiar 1; Shanks v Kirk-Session of Ceres, 1797, M. 4295; Maxwell v Grieve, 1822, 1 S. 509; Kennedy v Allan, 1825, 3 S. 554. [Gordon v Mackintosh, 8 Dec. 1841, 4 D. 192, aff. 4 Bell 105; Edward v Shiell, 12 Feb. 1848, 10 D. 685; Forrest v Forrest, 26 May 1863, 1 Macph. 806.]

⁴ [Mackintosh v Mackintosh, 28 Jan. 1812, F. C.; Macgowan v Robb, 29 Mar. 1864, 2 Macph. 943.]

⁵ Falconer v Wright, 1824, 2 S. 633, N. E. 537.

⁶ See, for the doctrine of this paragraph, the case of Newlands v Newlands' Crs., 1794, M. 4289, Bell's Ca. 54, 7 2; aff.

1798, 4 Pat. 43, 3 Ross, L. C. 634. See also Thomson v Thomson, Bell's Ca. 72; aff. 14 Dec. 1812, 1 Dow 417, 5 Pat. 654. See also the cases quoted in those reports: Watherstone v Rentons, 1801, M. 4297; Gordon v Allan, 1801, n. r. The words must be clearly taxative. Lindsay's Children v Dott, 1807, M. App. Fiar 1; Robertson v D. of Athole, 1806, supra. See further, Seton v Crs. of Seton, 6 Mar. 1793, M. 4219. And see the principle of fiduciary fees ex necessitate juris well explained by Lord Meadowbank, and his communication of Lord J.-C. M'Queen's opinion on the point. M'Intosh v M'Intosh, 1812, 16 F. C. 493. [See Logan v Maxwell, 20 Dec. 1836, 15 S. 291; aff. 1 Aug. 1839, M'L. and R. 790. Barstow v Stewart, 18 Feb. 1858, 20 D. 612. Martin's Trs. v Milliken, 24 Dec. 1864, 3 Macph. 326. As to the principle of this rule of construction, see Montgomerie Bell's Lectures 783. As to the effect of a trust, see Mein v Taylor, 8 June 1827, 5 S. 757, aff. 23 Feb. 1830, 4 W. and S. 22; Ewan v Watt, 10 July 1828, 6 S. 1125; Ross v King, 22 June 1847, 9 D. 1327; Ramsay v Beveridge, 3 March 1854, 16 D. 764. But it is only a continuing trust, i.e. one which provides for the retention of the subjects in the hands of the trustees till the fee emerges, which has this effect. A direction to trustees to pay or convey to a parent on liferent and children on fee gives the parent a fee. Hutton's Trs. v Hutton, 11 Feb. 1847, 9 D. 639; Ferguson's Trs. v Hamilton, 13 July 1860, 22 D. 1442, aff. 4 Macq. 397.]

⁷ Turnbolls v Turnbull's Trs., 1822, 2 S. 1. See also Cuming v King's Advocate, 1756, M. 4268. [Baillie v Clark, 23 Feb. 1809, F. C.; Dickson v Dickson, 1780, Hailes 865. But a mere faculty to dispose of the fee conferred on a liferenter whose right is constituted by grant does not convert the liferent into a fee. Morris v Tennant, 3 June 1853, 15 D. 716, aff. 6 July 1855, 27 Jur. 546; Sprot v Pennycook, 12 June 1855, 17 D. 840; Alves v Alves, 8 Mar. 1861, 23 D. 712.]

by name successively in liferent allanarly, and their heirs in fee, to the effect of creating a succession of liferents with fees merely fiduciary.¹

II. OF LEGAL LIFERENTS.

The legal liferents are Terce and Courtesy.

I. TERCE.—The Terce is a liferent, given by law to the widow of an heritable proprietor who has been married to her for year and day, or has had a living child by her;² provided she has not accepted of a special provision. It extends to one-third of all lands; of teinds, if vested by separate infeftments;³ and of heritable securities, in which, at the time of her husband's death, he stands vested as of fee by infeftment.⁴ This liferent, given by the law, is grounded on the obligation incumbent on a landed proprietor to make a reasonable provision for his wife, according to that condition of life in which she has been during her marriage.⁵ And, consistently with this, the legal provision ceases where a settlement has been made and accepted of; unless the deed shall bear expressly⁶ that the wife shall have [58] right to the Terce as well as to the conventional provision. This rule holds even where the conventional provision is out of an estate in another country, and where the contract or settlement is foreign.⁷ To discharge the terce, however, the wife must accept of the conventional provision, either in the marriage contract, or by accepting or acquiescing in a provision by separate deed; and this in the full and fair knowledge of her rights.⁸

The necessity of the widow having a house in which to reside, has given rise to the question: Whether she has not right to a terce of the mansion-house; or at least, where there are two houses, to the use of one of them? In one case, the Court held the widow entitled to a terce of the mansion-house and garden.⁹ But in a subsequent case this was

¹ Allardice v Allardice, 1795, Bell's Fol. Ca. 156. See the doubts and scruples stated by Sir Ilay Campbell, lest this should create a dangerous innovation in the law of Scotland. [It is competent to constitute or reserve a liferent interest in moveable estate in favour only of a party in life at the date of the deed constituting or reserving such liferent; and where any person of full age, and born after the date of the deed, is in right of moveable estate in liferent in virtue of a deed dated after 31 July 1868, such moveable estate belongs to him absolutely; and if it is in the hands of trustees, they are bound to make it over to him. The date of testamentary deeds for this purpose is taken to be that of the granter's death, and the date of a contract of marriage is held to be the date of the dissolution of the marriage. 31 and 32 Vict. c. 84, sec. 17. The author treats more fully of fee and liferent in the Prin. secs. 1707 sqq., 1951 sqq.]

² [The rights of surviving spouses are now the same whether the marriage has lasted a year and a day or not. 18 Vict. c. 23, sec. 7.]

³ C. of Dunfermline v E. of Dunfermline, 20 July 1627, 1628, M. 14707, 15840; Moncrieff v Tenants of Newton, 1667, M. 15844, 15733; Belschier v Moffat, 1779, M. 15863. [Arbuthnott v Arbuthnott's Trs., 1805, Hume 294.]

⁴ Carruthers and Maxwell v Johnston, 1706, M. 15846. A real lien, as in a burden reserved, depending on the sasine of the disponee, seems, however, to afford a terce to the widow of the creditor. See below, p. 57.

⁵ This obligation is not held as discharged by the terce, for it may be entirely inadequate. See Thomson v

McCulloch, 1778, M. 434, Hailes 797. See also below, p. 58, note.

⁶ This might seem to be a natural consequence at common law of the principle on which the terce is grounded. But a statute was required to settle the point.

The question arose in the case of Lady Craigleith v Lady Prestongrange, 1681, M. 15845, and this case was referred to Parliament by the Court; but Parliament did not think themselves authorized to pass a declaratory law. Therefore they sent the case back to the Court, and passed the Act of 1681, by which it was enacted, that 'where there shall be a particular provision granted by a husband in favour of his wife, either in a contract of marriage or some other writ, before or after the marriage, the wife shall be thereby secluded from a terce out of any lands or annualrents belonging to her husband, unless it be expressly provided in the contract of marriage or other writ containing the said provision, that the wife shall have right to a terce by and attour the said provision conceived in her favour.' 1681, c. 10. See Sir G. M'Kenzie's Obs. 460.

⁷ Lothian v Ross (Ross v Aglionby), 1797, M. 4631, App. Foreign 5, as revd. 1797, 3 Pat. 621; Jankouska v Anderson, 1791, M. 6457; C. of Findlater v E. of Seafield, 1814, F. C. [Nisbett v Nisbet, 24 Feb. 1835, 13 S. 517; Keith's Trs. v Keith, 17 July 1857, 19 D. 1040.]

⁸ [Cowan v Kerr, 15 Dec. 1830, 9 S. 188; Douglas, Heron, & Co. v Cant, 1783, M. 11461; Belschier v Moffat, supra; Hope v Dickson, 17 Dec. 1833, 12 S. 222.]

⁹ Montier v Baillie, 1773, M. 15859.

much and justly doubted.¹ In that case it was even doubted whether, where there were two mansion-houses, the widow could claim terce on either.²

The EXCEPTIONS from the terce are not reducible to any uniform principle. The following, however, seem to include all the cases in which the estate of an heritable proprietor is not liable for terce:—1. Superiorities in relation to feu-duties as well as casualties.³ But it might admit of question whether this would hold in the cases of whole cities feued out, as Greenock or Paisley.⁴ 2. Rights of reversion, as unfit subjects of aliment to a wife, since they produce no annual profit.⁵ 3. Patronage, for a similar reason.⁶ 4. Coal, as being the consumption of the principal subject itself.⁷ 5. Leases, as not feudal subjects. 6. Burgage subjects afford no terce,⁸ for which no very satisfactory principle has been assigned. Subjects, although situate beyond the burgh, provided they hold burgage, are exempt from terce; which was found with regard even to a land estate.⁹ On the other [59] hand, subjects within burgh, not holding burgage, are liable to terce.¹⁰ Terce is given of tenements in burghs of barony.¹¹

The husband's infeftment as of fee, as it subsists at the time of his death, is both the measure and the security of the wife's terce.¹² But, 1. It must be a real and substantial fee, not nominal or in trust.¹³ 2. The wife comes not in as a purchaser, but her right is a part of the husband's original sasine. 3. Although, in strict terms, the husband has no infeftment in a burden reserved in his favour, but the sasine of the disponent is his security, yet, according to the spirit of the rule, a terce seems to be due from such an heritable debt, as well as from an heritable bond: the disponent's sasine is the sasine of the creditor.¹⁴ 4. It is of no consequence whether the lands have descended from an ancestor, or have been acquired by the husband himself. The rule in courtesy is different. 5. The terce is not excluded by any right merely personal: and so, while the husband has full power to alienate or burden his land during his life, infeftment must have followed, before the right of either purchaser or creditor can exclude the terce.¹⁵ And the purchaser may retain the price of

¹ Mead v Swinton, 1796, M. 15873.

² There was no occasion to decide the point, for the one house had been built with the design of pulling down the other. [Mr. Shaw's edition (p. 608) says that the rule in Logan v Galbraith, 1665, M. 15842, 'seems better, that no pro indiviso right can be insisted on.' See Prin. 1598, 1603.]

³ Stair ii. 6. 16; Ersk. ii. 9. 49. Lady Dunfermline v E. of Dunfermline, 1628, M. 15840.

⁴ In Lady Dunfermline's case, the Court proceeded chiefly on the practice, and were unwilling to introduce a new usage, where the lady was, besides, sufficiently provided. [In Nisbett v Nisbett's Trs., 24 Feb. 1835, 13 S. 517, the Court refused to disturb the general rule, that no terce is due from feu-duties even where the husband had by a single transaction feued out the greater part of his estate shortly before his death.]

⁵ Stair ii. 6. 16; Ersk. ii. 9. 49. M'Dougal v M'Dougal's Crs., 1801, M. App. Terce 2.

⁶ But patronages have been held as legitimate subjects of conventional provisions to widows by way of locality. Lady Forbes, 1758, as revd. 18 Feb. 1760, 2 Pat. 36; D. of Roxburgh v Duchess, 25 June 1818, F. C.

⁷ Bank. ii. 6. 11. Lady Lamington v Lamington, 1628, M. 8240; Belschier v Moffat, 1779, where the coals were let on lease, M. 15863, and Hailes 838. But have not widows from a going coal sufficient for their own consumption? [See below, p. 61, note 7.]

⁸ Craig ii. 22. 34; Stair ii. 6. 16; also Stair i. 4. 23; Bank. ii. 6. 11; Ersk. ii. 9. 49. But observe the ambiguous terms which these lawyers make use of. [This exception from terce no longer exists. 24 and 25 Vict. c. 86, sec. 11.]

⁹ Lowthian v Aglianby, 1801, M. App. Annualrent 2, aff. 4 Pat. 464, where terce was found not to extend to a land estate held burgage.

¹⁰ Rose v Fraser, 1790, M. 15867.

¹¹ Park v Gibb, 1769, M. 15855, Hailes 306.

¹² So the terce is a preferable burden on the estate in the hands of a purchaser, where it has been sold by the heir, and the title completed before the widow's service to her terce. Boyd v Hamilton, 1805, M. 15874. See p. 58, note 1. [Nor is it barred by reduction of the husband's infeftments on the ground of informality, not affecting his radical right to the subjects. Rose v Fraser, 1790, M. App. Terce 1.]

¹³ And so, where an infeftment was to a father in liferent, and his son in fee, with power to the father to sell, and contract debt, this being held radically a fee in the father, the son's widow, on his death, during his father's life, was refused a terce. The question arose with the Crown, as in right of the father, by forfeiture for his rebellion in 1745. Cuming v King's Advocate, 1756, M. 15874, 5 B. S. 843.

¹⁴ [The author, in the Prin. 1598, expresses a different opinion in regard to burdens by reservation, which appears, from a note in Mr. Shaw's edition, p. 807, to proceed on the words of the brieve, 'vestitus et sasitus ut de feodo;' the right being also transmissible by assignation and general service.]

¹⁵ Campbell v Campbell, 1776, 5 B. S. 627; M'Culloch v Maitland, 1788, M. 15866. This was established so early as 1532, Crichton v Hamilton, M. 15835.

lands till the terce be satisfied.¹ So it is not sufficient to defeat the terce, that resignation in favorem has been made and accepted by the superior;² though an instrument of resignation ad remanentiam would exclude the terce, as completing the feudal conveyance to the superior. So the exercise of a faculty to burden will not exclude the terce, if infeftment have not followed.³ And finally, the terce is not excluded by a creditor adjudger, who has given a charge on his adjudication to the superior. This question our lawyers of the seventeenth century seem to have held extremely doubtful.⁴ But at last it was determined in the widow's favour on a hearing in presence, and this has been since held for law.⁵ 6. The terce is excluded or diminished by heritable securities on which infeftment has followed. If the security has been granted by way of absolute disposition, the terce is not totally excluded, but the disposition is taken only as a burden to the extent of the debt really meant to be secured.⁶ The debt is, however, enlarged, and the terce diminished, by new bonds extending the security as eiks to the reversion.⁷

[60] The widow will have redress against any fraudulent contrivance or neglect by which the infeftment of the husband has been lessened. Thus, the husband cannot divest himself in favour of the heir, reserving only his own liferent.⁸ So a fraudulent delay to take infeftment will not avail the husband's heir; although doubtful cases of mere delay will not entitle the wife to relief.⁹ Mr. Erskine is of opinion that the redress in these cases is only by a personal action, and that onerous creditors will be preferred:¹⁰ and this seems to be law.

Although the terce is provided by law for the widow, it does not necessarily follow that her claims shall in all cases be restricted to a third of her husband's estate. Against his creditors, indeed, she will have no available claim beyond the third; but against his heir she will be entitled to claim an additional aliment.¹¹

SERVICE AND KENNING TO THE TERCE.—The widow's right to her terce is vested by her service as tencer; a decree of the sheriff, proceeding on the verdict of a jury impanelled in virtue of a brief from Chancery.¹² The effect of this is to give the widow a pro indiviso right of possession, and to vest in her a third of the rents from the term after her husband's death. It is not necessary in order to confer on her a preference; the preference of the terce depending not on this proceeding, but on the husband's sasine.¹³ But without the service her right does not transmit to her heir on her death.¹⁴

¹ In Boyd v Hamilton (p. 57, note 12), the Court held 'a purchaser entitled to retain a part of the price during the subsistence of the right of terce, which is a preferable claim.'

² Dirleton, indeed, seems to hold a contrary doctrine; but he is well refuted by Stewart. Dirleton and Stewart, voce Terce, p. 309; De Resignationibus, pp. 250-262.

³ Montier v Baillie, 1773, M. 15859.

⁴ Dirleton states it as a doubt, and Stewart resolves it in favour of the compriser, p. 309. And it was accordingly so decided, Hunter v Douglas, 28 Jan. 1715, M. 15850.

⁵ Carlyle v Crs. of Easter Ogle, 1725, M. 15851; Ersk. ii. 9. 46.

⁶ Thus, terce found due from lands absolutely disposed, but qualified by a backbond, deducting only the debt in the backbond. Bartlet v Buchanan, 21 Feb. 1811, 16 F. C. 200.

⁷ Bartlet v Buchanan, 27 Nov. 1812, 17 F. C. 14.

⁸ Balfour, xcv. § 13; Craig ii. 22. 27; Dirleton, voce Terce; Stair ii. 6. 16. M. of Annandale v Scott, 1711, M. 15848, determined on a hearing in presence.

⁹ Carruthers v Johnson, 1705, 1706, M. 15848. [Bell v Halliday, 8 Dec. 1825, 4 S. 289, where the widow was held entitled to compensation from the heir for lands sold by him before her terce lands were fixed.]

¹⁰ Ersk. ii. 9. 46.

¹¹ Thomson v McCulloch, 1778, M. 434, Hailes 797. Here the estate yielded £240 of rent, but the husband had been infeft in no more than gave a terce of £40. The eldest son and heir, in an action for aliment, was held to plead no good defence in saying that, 'having a legal provision of terce, the widow was entitled to nothing more.' [Blake v Bates, 19 Dec. 1840, 3 D. 317; Ferguson v Logan, 1809, Hume 5; Macgregor v Ballantine, 1818, Hume 8.]

¹² This brief is directed to the sheriff to inquire and assign to the widow her reasonable third of the lands, etc., in which her husband died last vest and seised as of fee. The jury is thereupon impanelled to try, (1) whether the claimant was the lawful wife of the deceased, and (2) in what lands the husband died infeft as of fee. To these two questions an answer is given by the verdict, which specifies also the first term after the husband's death as that from which the widow's right is to commence. The sheriff subjoins a decree conformably to that verdict, and ordains extracts.

¹³ See Boyd v Hamilton, supra.

¹⁴ M'Leish v Rennie, 1826, 4 S. 485, N. E. 491. [See Stair ii. 6, 15; Ersk. ii. 9, 55. 'It has been well observed, that this decision would require to be reconsidered.' Prin. 1602. More's notes on Stair, p. 218. The case cited will now probably be followed.]

The appropriation of a particular portion of the estate to her is accomplished by the process of KENNING to the terce, which proceeds before the sheriff, and the widow's right is completed by delivery of earth and stone, and an instrument of possession.¹

The widow's claim, as against creditors selling the estate, may either be, 1. For a third share of the price of the lands, or of the sum if the subject be an heritable bond, to be secured to her in liferent; or, 2. For the actual possession, as a burden on the purchaser; or a third of the rents, or of the interests. In the former case, her service is a sufficient title to enable her to join in the conveyance to the purchaser. When she claims possession, she must be kenneled to a particular portion of the estate, or at least that portion must be set aside for her by agreement or arbitration.

II. COURTESY, or CURIALITY.—The husband, as administrator of the goods in communion, has, JURE MARITI, a right during the marriage to draw the rents of his wife's heritable property of all descriptions. After her death, where there has been a living child, the husband's right is converted into a liferent, by the COURTESY of SCOTLAND, in all her heritage, as contradistinguished from conquest. These two rights may be considered separately.

1. The JUS MARITI is not a liferent in the husband, but the power of administering [61] the wife's estate, reaping the fruits, and taking the rents during the subsistence of the marriage. The husband's creditors have the power of attaching the rents of the wife's estate for his debts; but the principle on which this attachment proceeds seems very questionable. The husband's right is not, strictly speaking, prospective, but attaches in the moment of the existence of the rents, fruits, etc., as moveables falling under his jus mariti, which carries all moveables. On this ground, the proper diligence by creditors seems to be arrestment for affecting the particular rents. If the creditors, desirous of a more comprehensive diligence, should proceed to adjudge the jus mariti, they may find their diligence come into competition with arresting creditors, such adjudication being competent only as the diligence applicable to a right having tractum futuri temporis. On the validity of such an adjudication, however, our lawyers differ. Erskine seems to regard the adjudication as ineffectual.² Sir James Stewart thinks it will be good.³ Bankton also lays it down expressly, that the jus mariti may be adjudged;⁴ and in an argument by Lord Kaimes, after his method, in a question respecting the adjudication of an office, he seems to favour the same opinion.⁵ In one case, the Court held an adjudication of the husband's interest in the wife's lands to be good.⁶ And in a later case, where the question occurred in the shape of competition with arresting creditors, such adjudication was held an effectual form of attaching the rents, though, in the peculiar way in which the adjudication had in that case been led, it was bad.⁷

Where the jus mariti is excluded, the husband's creditors have no right to the accruing rents; nor will they be allowed to profit by an evasion of this exclusion, contrary to the nature of the settlement which confers the right.⁸

¹ [This does not enter the Register of Sasines. Jur. Styles i. 327 (4th ed.); Shaw's Bell's Com. 808, note.]

² See Ersk. i. 6. 12; Ersk. ii. 2. 6; Ersk. ii. 12. 6.

³ Ans. to Dirleton, voce Jus Mariti, p. 174.

⁴ Bankt. iii. 2. 38, vol. ii. p. 219.

⁵ Select Dec. p. 220.

⁶ Menzies v. Crs. of Gillespie, 1761, M. 5974. There, an adjudication on a bond by husband and wife was found null, in so far as it proceeded on the wife's bond as being void; but was sustained on the husband's bond, in so far as it adjudged his interest in the rents during the marriage.

⁷ Calder v. Steel, 19 Nov. 1818, F. C. Certain creditors of John Sommervill had adjudged his wife's estates as if they had belonged to the husband, with all right, title, etc. Subsequently to this, other creditors arrested the rents as they fell due; and on a competition, the Court held, that although it was competent to adjudge the husband's interest in his wife's estate, the adjudication led in that case could not so affect the future rents of the wife's estate as to stand against the arrestments, and therefore preferred the arresting creditors.

⁸ Palmer v. M'Conochie, 11 Dec. 1816, F. C. Lands were settled on a daughter in liferent for her liferent use alienarily, and her children in fee, excluding the jus mariti. The daughter and her husband made up titles, not in terms of the destination, but in simple and absolute terms, by precept of clare constat, and sold the lands for a perpetual heritable annuity, taken payable to her and her husband for his interest, and her heirs. The husband became insolvent, and his creditors claimed his life interest in the heritable annuity. The

2. The COURTESY or CURIALITY seems to be of the nature of a proper liferent in the husband. He takes the rents not merely by force of the jus mariti, which absorbs each accruing moveable as it vests in the wife, but he enjoys the estate and rents as a liferenter. This is, in truth, the counterpart of the Terce, though it differs from it in many essential points. It is indispensable to this right, 1. That there shall have been a living child born of the marriage, who is heir of the wife, or who, if surviving, would have been entitled to succeed :¹ 2. That the wife shall have succeeded to the subjects in question as heir either of line, or of tailzie, or of provision ; in contradistinction to conquest, or property acquired [62] by purchase, donation, or other singular title.² It is not easy to see a good principle for this distinction ; and some of our best lawyers (as Lord Pitfour and Lord Braxfield) have declared that they can discover no good reason for the distinction.³ But they all agree that it is a fixed point not to be touched. 'Servate terminos quos patres vestri posuere,' is Lord Pitfour's answer to doubts suggested on the point. It is sufficient if the wife be alioquin successura, although she has her direct title as dispositive : she is held as taking in such case præceptione hæreditatis.⁴ 3. It is requisite that the wife shall, at her death, have been infeft.⁵

As the courtesy comprehends only heritable subjects vested by infeftment in the wife, at her death it is, of course, liable to diminution by every burden vested by infeftment ; and so far it resembles terce. The difference between the rights is, that while terce suffers diminution only by debts and burdens completed by infeftment, courtesy is accompanied by a general responsibility for all the wife's debts. But the husband has relief against the wife's executors for such of her debts as are personal.⁶

Courtesy vests ipso jure ; the husband, without any form of law, merely continuing his possession. The criterion of preference is his wife's infeftment.

III. EXTENT AND EXERCISE OF THE LIFERENTER'S RIGHT.

In concluding this subject of liferent and fee, it may be observed, that in all cases, whether the liferent be reserved by one who was formerly full proprietor (which is the most favoured species of liferent) ; or be constituted by grant ; or flow from the legal effect of marriage, as the courtesy or terce ; the right of the liferenter is merely that of possession and ordinary administration during his own life.⁷ The only way in which creditors can avail themselves of it, is either, by the diligence proper to moveables, to attach the rents or fruits as they arise ; or by adjudication, to get into possession ; or at least to put themselves in a condition to apply for a sequestration under the common law during the liferenter's survivance ; or, by judicial sale, to bring the liferent to market and convert it into money.

The general rule respecting the use and possession to which a liferenter is entitled, and of the benefit of which his creditors may by diligence avail themselves, is, that he may take every use which is possible, and requisite to the full enjoyment of the subject, without consuming the substance.⁸ He may, for example, reap the fruits, natural and industrial, but

Court held the husband's creditors not entitled to the annuity during his life.

¹ See Ersk. ii. 9. 53. [The test of viability is, that the child has been heard to cry. Robertson v Robertson, 22 Jan. 1833, 11 S. 297.]

² Hodge v Frazer, 1740, M. 3119, Elch. Husb. and Wife 13 ; Paterson v Ord, 1781, M. 3121, Hailes 879.

³ See 1 Hailes 458 ; 2 Hailes 879.

⁴ Primrose v Crawford, 1771, M. App. Courtesy 1, Hailes 458. [Knight v Robertson, 1798, M. 8815.]

⁵ [But it has been held sufficient, even if the infeftment be irregular, provided the defects in her title were such as might have been remedied in her lifetime. Hamilton v Boswell, 1716, M. 3117 ; Fraser, P. and D. Rel. i. 639 ; Bell's Prin. 1606.]

⁶ Monteith v Monteith, 1717, M. 3117. [The husband is liable for the interest only of his wife's personal debts to the extent of the rents accruing to him by his courtesy. See Fraser, P. and D. Rel. i. 643.]

⁷ Leases fall on death even of liferenter by reservation. Frazer v Middleton, 1794, M. 8256, 7849. [So also feus. Redfearn v Maxwell, 7 March 1816, F. C.]

The fiar and liferenter generally concur in granting a lease for an absolute term, which is useful to both, and beneficial for the country.

In England, where an estate for life is constituted, it is generally accompanied by a power to grant leases, in order to prevent the determination of the tenant's right on the death of the lessor.

⁸ [Thus, in a liferent of a mixed subject, such as a stocked not destroy or alienate any part of the subject itself; and so, as minerals and coal are properly a part of the subject, not regenerating like fruits, a liferenter has no right to them without a special grant, even where they are opened and in a course of being worked.¹ But though this be the general rule, yet, wherever the minerals are let on lease, and it is [63] plainly the intention of the granter of a liferent that it should include the rents, this intention will be effectual.²

As to Woods, the liferenter has no right to cut those which do not spontaneously grow again, as Firs. The liferenter (unless a liferenter by reservation³) has no right to cut even silvæ cæduæ, when not laid out in annual cuttings or hagg, though in use to be cut and sold once in twenty-five or thirty years. And although the wood should become ripe for cutting during the liferent, he has right to cut only what may be necessary for the use of the estate,⁴ after making due communication to the fiar, and with the privilege to him of designating the trees fit to be cut.⁵ But copse-wood laid out in annual allotments for cutting is like a part of the regular profits of the land,⁶ and the liferenter may continue the cutting.

Liferenters may take coal, or stone, or timber, from going mines, quarries, and silvæ cæduæ, for the use of the estate under liferent.⁷

The liferenter may in competitions claim the value of his liferent, but he cannot be compelled to take the value instead of the actual enjoyment of the right.

IV.—EXTENT AND EXERCISE OF THE FIAR'S RIGHT.

The estate of the fiar can be available to creditors only under burden of the liferent. And the fiar and his creditors can demand no use which may disturb even the amenity of the liferenter's possession. They are not entitled to cut growing timber, even under that limitation.⁸

SECTION VI.

LIMITED ESTATES BY MEANS OF CONJUNCT RIGHTS.

CONJUNCT RIGHT, or common property among strangers, is established sometimes by accident, sometimes by design. Thus heirs-portioners succeed to land in equal shares pro farm, the liferenter is bound to keep up the stock substantially of the same kind, value, and extent as when she got it; and her representatives are only liable for material differences. Rogers v Scott, 19 July 1867, 5 Macph. 1078.]

¹ Stair ii. 3. 74; Ersk. ii. 9. 57. A liferenter by marriage contract was held not entitled to let a lease of limestone rock, or to work it for sale. Swinton v Duchess of Roxburgh, 1 Feb. 1814, F. C. If the minerals be let on lease for a rent, it seems doubtful whether the yearly accruing rent is not the liferenter's. But the better opinion seems to be that it is not, such rent being in truth the conversion of the fiar's right. Yet see the question as to woods, above.

² So a general liferent of all heritable and moveable subjects held to include rents of a lease of minerals. Waddel v Waddel, 21 Jan. 1812, F. C. In a question of bona fides as to the rents or price of what had been worked, the Court sustained the bona fides of the liferenter as entitling her to keep those rents; but this was admitted with some difficulty. D. of Roxburgh v Duchess, 17 Feb. 1815, F. C.

³ See Ferguson v Ferguson, 1737, M. 8235; Elchies, Liferenter, No. 1.

⁴ Stair ii. 3. 74. Lang v D. of Douglas, 1752, M. 8256; Elchies, Liferenter, No. 6. And see the case of the Kinneil woods there referred to. [Hamilton v Hamilton, 21 May 1723, Rob. App. 43.]

⁵ Dickson v Dickson, 1823, 2 S. 152. [Dingwall v Duff, 4 Dec. 1833, 8 Mar. 1834, 12 S. 216, 541.]

⁶ Ersk. ii. 9. 58. See also Ferguson v Ferguson, supra.

The question solemnly tried in the case of Seton of Touch, where the Court had at first, without opposition, allowed the creditors of the liferenter to sell coppice-wood, which had not been cut for thirty years. But, on the fiar appearing, this decree was recalled, and the Court held the liferenter entitled only to cut wood so as to yield a constant yearly income. Gray v Seton, 1789, M. 8250, Hailes 1067. See Dickson's case, supra, note 5. [Eiston v Eiston, 10 June 1831, 9 S. 716; M'Alister's Trs. v M'Alister, 27 June 1851, 13 D. 1239.]

⁷ In the Duchess of Roxburgh case, 7 Jan. 1816, F. C., she was held entitled to work the lime for the use of the locality lands, and this although first opened by herself. This was acquiesced in.

⁸ See Ersk. ii. 9. 56. Tait v Maitland, 1825, 4 S. 247.

indiviso, and while the subjects continue undivided, are common proprietors. So, when persons engaged in a scheme of merchandise, or manufacture, purchase jointly the houses, lands, mines, ships, etc., which are necessary for carrying on their adventure, they are common proprietors of them.

[64] Property naturally divisible may, by succession or by purchase, become common, and by convention may be made indivisible; while that which is by nature indivisible may, in point of right, become separate instead of common property. For any of the joint proprietors may insist for the separation of his share, and dissolution of the community, unless the condition of his right, or his own agreement, or the occasion which led to the community, bar the proceeding. The right, in such cases, extends only to a share, after the debts to which the property is liable are discharged.

In order to bring common property to a division, application may be made to a court to distinguish the shares, if the subject be naturally capable of division.¹ If the subject be not naturally divisible, the object of the application is, to enforce one or other of the following alternatives:—Either that the defenders should dispose of their shares at a certain price, or take the pursuer's share at the same rate; or that the whole should be exposed to sale, and converted into the divisible form of a price or sum of money.²

The creditors of a joint proprietor, after using the proper diligence for acquiring to themselves the rights of their debtor, may take proceedings, as he himself might have done, for having the property divided or sold.

Sometimes an estate in land, or a bond for money, or even moveable property, is taken with a destination, out of which disputes arise relative to the interests of the parties as common or separate.

1. Where the conveyance is made simply 'to two or more persons and their heirs,' or to them 'in conjunct fee,' this forms a case of community or common property.

2. When an infeftment is granted (or a bond taken, or a lease made) to two or more, 'in conjunct fee and liferent, and to their heirs,' the right of each is not only a right pro indiviso, but is burdened with the eventual liferent of the other, and can be sold, burdened, or adjudged, only under that qualification.³

3. Where it is to two 'jointly, and the survivor and their heirs,' each has a fee which his debts will affect: the survivor becomes sole fiar;⁴ but the right thus bestowed seems to be of the nature of a mere destination. Either of the parties may onerously dispose of, or grant securities over, the subject, which will be effectual notwithstanding the destination to the other; or his creditors may adjudge it, and so defeat the right of the associate.

4. Where it is 'to two jointly, and the heirs of one of them,' the one less favoured is a bare liferenter: the other is fiar, and not only cannot be gratuitously disappointed, but cannot even by onerous conveyance be deprived of his right. Ersk. iii. 8. 35.

¹ For the case of heirs-portioners, the very old form of a Brieve of Division still subsists. It is directed to the sheriff: a jury is named under his authority to measure and lay off the shares, and by lot they are appropriated to those interested. The matter is commonly arranged extrajudicially by referees.

² Stair i. 7. 15, and 16. 4; Bankt. i. 8. 40; Ersk. iii. 3. 56. Milligan v Barnhill, 1782, M. 2486, Hailes 897. This was the case of a brewhouse, of which the original proprietor had sold one-half pro indiviso. The action was to enforce the alternative. Defence.—No man is to be compelled to part with his property except for the public benefit. The defence was repelled. [Stewart v Simpson, 26 Nov. 1835, 14 S. 72;

Bryden v Craig, 4 Feb. 1837, 15 S. 486; Brock v Hamilton, 27 Jan. 1852, 19 D. 701, note.]

A proceeding of this kind, for dividing the property of ships, is well known in Admiralty. The judge either orders a sale, or, on a judicial minute by the parties, adjudges the share of the party willing to sell to belong forthwith to the other.

³ Brown, 18 Nov. 1789, n. r. The rule here was applied to a lease, where the landlord's right, as assignee of one of the tenants, was restricted on the cedent's death; the other, as liferenter, acquiring right to the whole.

⁴ Bisset v Walker, 1799, M. App. Deathbed 2, where rights to land so taken were held to vest a fee in the survivor not requiring service to complete it.

CHAPTER II.

OF LEASEHOLD PROPERTY AS RESPONSIBLE FOR DEBT.

LEASEHOLD property is of great and growing importance. The farmer of modern times [65] is a person possessed of skill, industry, and capital, which he is willing to apply in the cultivation of land belonging to another, provided he have full assurance of the stability of his right during a period sufficient for bringing back the proper returns; and of indemnification for his improvements, if it should happen that the lease should be prematurely brought to a close.

In the contract of lease, on which this sort of property depends, as regulating the respective estates of the landlord and of the tenant, the landlord furnishes land, and all the necessary accompaniments of houses, offices, fences, and drains, to adapt it for residence and cultivation; while the tenant, on his part, furnishes the capital, industry, and skill which are necessary to make the land produce its increase. And this mutual contribution is made for the raising of a gross produce to be divided between the parties (after defraying necessary charges), in the largest proportions to each, which their respective means and situations afford—the highest rent to the landlord, the largest profit to the farmer; with security to each in the undisturbed enjoyment of his peculiar estate.

In contemplation of the events which are chiefly in view in the present inquiry, two questions suggest themselves as important to be settled: 1. What assurance does the law give to a tenant against the insolvency and creditors of his landlord; or against purchasers of the estate; or substitutes in a deed of entail? And, 2. What are the rights of which the creditors of the tenant may on his insolvency avail themselves?

SECTION I.

EFFECT OF LEASE AGAINST PURCHASERS OF THE LAND—AGAINST CREDITORS—AND AGAINST HEIRS OF ENTAIL.

The security of a tenant depends on a statute passed in the fifteenth century, whereby 'it is ordanit for the sauftie and favour of the puir pepil that labour the grunde, that they and all uthers that hes takyn or sal tak landis in tyme to cum fra lordis, and has termes and zieres thereof, that suppose the lord sel or analy their landes, that the takers sal remayn with thare tackis on to the ische of their termes, quhais hand at ever thai cum to, for sic lik male as thai tuk them of befor.'¹ It is settled in the construction of this statute: 1. That it applies to all leases, both agricultural and urban.² 2. That the lease must be in writing.³ 3. That there must be a rent stipulated,—this being both requisite in the nature of a lease, and taken for granted in the statute; but it is not necessary that the rent be an adequate consideration for the right to possess.⁴ 4. That the tenant must be in posses- [66] sion; this being the sasine of a lease, and the sole indication by which purchasers or creditors may with certainty know of the existence of the tenant's right.⁵ 5. That the lease must have a termination, or ish, as it is called in the books; and so, indeed, the Act itself declares, in describing the tenants to be protected as those 'who have terms and years,' and in declaring the protection to continue 'on to the ische of their terms.' The construction of law is, that a lease which does not express the term of endurance is, in so far as purchasers

¹ 1449, c. 17; 2 Act Parl. p. 35, c. 6.

⁴ Ersk ii. 6. 24.

² Ersk. ii. 6. 27. Waddel v Brown, 1794, M. 10309.

⁵ Stair iii. 2. 16. Wallace v Campbell, 1750, M. 2805, 2809;

³ Skene, 1637, M. 8401; Kiell v Johnston's Tenants, 16 July 1636, Durie 817; Lieth v Stewart, 1776, Hailes 174.

Ersk. ii. 6. 25.

or creditors are concerned, granted only for a year; or, at furthest, for such time as is necessarily implied from the words of the lease.¹

SUBSECTION I.—COMPLETION OF THE TENANT'S RIGHT.

In competition with a singular successor in the lands, the contract gives no real right, but only action on the warrandice against the landlord.

1. A lease becomes a real right in the land, operating like an alienation, to the exclusion of singular successors, from the moment of the tenant attaining possession. By the Roman law, the rule was: 'Emptorem fundi necesse non est stare colono cui prior dominus locavit.'² In Scotland, of old, it was common, in order to make the right of the tenant real upon the land, to insert a precept of sasine in the lease, so that the tenant might be infeft; and if the question had occurred at that time, whether a tenant, without having completed his real right by sasine, could have opposed an onerous purchaser, there could have been no doubt that his right would have been held merely personal, and consequently ineffectual. The statute has substituted possession for sasine, conferring on tenants in possession a real right; and under it, a tenant, not having attained and continued in possession, is, in competition with singular successors, purchasers, or creditors adjudgers of the landlord's estate, merely a personal creditor under the contract of location; just as, in a contract of sale of land, the vendee is a personal creditor prior to his sasine.³ Many cases are to be found in the books settling this question beyond all controversy.⁴ If, therefore, the creditors of the landlord adjudging, or a purchaser from the landlord, should find it for their benefit to refuse implement of the lease, the tenant, not being in possession, is entitled to no preference.⁵

2. One acquiring right, not from the landlord, but as assignee or as subtenant from the original tenant, completes his real right by possession, as the original tenant did; and thus having obtained his right, is secure against the landlord and his singular successors on the one hand, and against the cedent's creditors on the other hand, provided that assignees and subtenants are admitted by the original lease, or that, where they are excluded, the landlord makes no exception to the transference in question.

[67] 3. Where the original tenant has granted a sublease, and afterwards assigns his right as principal tenant, the assignment is truly of the surplus rent only; and uplifting the rents, or intimation to the subtenant, completes the real right.⁶

¹ Redpath v White, 1737, M. 15196; Scott v Strattons, 1771, M. 15200, Hailes 404. Held, indefinite ish good against heirs, ineffectual against purchasers.

² Cod. lib. iv. tit. 65, l. 9.

³ The analogy generally referred to in illustration of the effect of possession in completing the tenant's right is sasine. But there is this difference, that sasine once taken, continues to operate; possession taken and lost, is ineffectual.

⁴ So early as Lord Durie's time, we find a decision in which a competition had arisen between a tenant and an appriser. 1st, The Court was of opinion that the tenant, having obtained possession before the appriser had made his right real by infeftment, was clearly preferable, and the lease effectual. 2d, But it having turned out that the sasine of the appriser was taken before the tenant had entered to the possession, the Court preferred the appriser. Wallace v Harvey, 1627, M. 67.

In this and the subsequent cases, it is proper to observe that a question of considerable importance in competitions is included, viz. whether creditors holding heritable securities by infeftment on heritable bonds, or by adjudications, are to be considered as having a right exclusive of a tenant; or whether this right is not rather of the nature of a burden, leaving the proprietor's right and administration, to the effect of giving possession to the tenant, unimpaired. But this is a question to be treated afterwards.

⁵ [See M'Lean v Cameron, 1796, 3 Pat. 474.]

⁶ This doctrine is first laid down by Lord Kilkerran, in reporting the case of Wallace v Campbell, M. 2809 (above, p. 63, note 5). He says, 'that in a case where the assignee cannot attain the actual possession, the civil possession, by uplifting the rents, comes in its place; or if such assignee should be considered only as an assignee to the maills and duties during the currency of the tack, it must, as other assignments, be completed by intimation to the tenant.'

This principle ruled the case of Sime's Tr. v Fidler, 1806, 13 F.C. 554. Sime borrowed from Fidler £1000, and gave bond for it with a subset of a farm which he held from Lord Arbuthnot (under burden of a previous subset to Davidson), and an assignment to the surplus rent payable by Davidson. Fidler uplifted the surplus rents for several years; afterwards Sime became bankrupt, and the trustee on his sequestrated estate sold the lease. Fidler then claimed the balance of his

4. Where a tenant not prohibited has assigned, the assignation is not effectually completed by intimation to the landlord without possession.¹ But the possession of the assignee may be civil as well as natural; and therefore, if his subtenant hold the lands under a written lease, it will be enough.² The only difficulty is the ostensible ownership from continued possession where the cedent is subtenant. This would be fatal in Moveables; but the tenant's right in Land has two points—written title and possession—without the union of which there is no legal ground of credit or of reputed ownership.

5. In assigning a sublease, intimation to the principal tenant is not sufficient.³

6. It has been questioned whether a tenant already in possession, receiving a pro-[68] rogation of his lease beyond the term originally stipulated, is to be held, while the original term is unexpired, as in possession of a real right, or only as a personal creditor, with respect to the prorogated term. This question has been decided in two cases against the tenant, and on just principles.⁴

debt unextinguished, and the trustee resisted this, and maintained that no preference was constituted. The question was, whether payment of the rents by the subtenant to the creditor holding this right completed the assignation to the surplus rent, so as to raise a preference. Lord Glenlee found Fidler 'had a preferable right to the tack in question, and the proceeds thereof, to the extent of the balance of debt due to him.' Lord President Campbell said: There have been sundry questions as to completing assignations of tacks, and it was settled in Hardie Douglas's case that possession is the proper course. Now here is all the possession which the case admits of, viz. possession of the subrents. Lord Hermand, same view. Lord Newton had always a difficulty about completing real lien on a lease, without putting creditor into possession.—Doubt whether there be possession here. Lord Armadale agreed with the President. Petition refused.

¹ The case of Yeoman v Elliot and Foster, 2 Feb. 1813, 17 F. C. 149, is reported so as to give an impression that the Court held mere intimation to the landlord, and entry in his rental book of the assignee's name, to be sufficient to complete the transference. The following observations on that case in the former edition of this work, drew the attention of the Court to the subject:—

'It deserves to be reconsidered whether intimation ever is a completion of an assignation, except when it is made to a custodier of moveables, converting him thenceforward into a custodier for the assignee, or to a debtor discharging the claim of the former creditor, and substituting the assignee in his place. So the assignation of a lease, where there is a sublease, is well completed by intimation to the subtenant, because it is truly only an assignation of rents, and the subtenant is the debtor. But there seem to be no termini habiles for intimation to the landlord, to the effect of transferring a lease. And the argument that otherwise there are no means of borrowing money on the security of a lease, is fit only for the Legislature.'

In the subsequent case of Brock v Cabell (see next note), the judges of the Second Division denied Yeoman's case as an authority for the above doctrine, and referred to the words of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor to show that the decision went on the sublease and possession, as the only possession which circumstances admitted, having been held as good civil possession by the assignee.

² Brock v Cabell, 1822, 2 S. 52, N. E. 46. Tenants of a bleachfield borrowed money from the Glasgow Bank, on an assignment to their lease ex facie absolute. The Bank intimated their assignation to the landlord, and were to give a sublease to the debtors, on which they might continue their possession; but the sublease was not authenticated, nor did it specify any rent. The Court held the assignation incomplete to bar the general creditors of Newbigging and Company, and this chiefly on the invalidity of the sublease to sustain the possession as for the assignees, and under their authority.

See Russell v L. Breadalbane, 1822, 2 S. 62, N. E. 54, under appeal.

³ Such an assignation was loosely supposed to have been held as completed by intimation to the principal tenant in Hardie Douglas v Hay's Crs., 1794, M. 2802. But no such judgment was pronounced; and in Yeoman v Elliot and Foster, 2 Feb. 1813, F. C., that case was said by Lord Balgray to be incorrectly reported.

⁴ 1st, In the case of L. Cranstoun's Crs. v Scott, where the new lease was granted three years before the expiration of the possession under the old lease, the Court found 'that the tack was not good against creditors, in respect the tacksman did not attain possession of the lands set, by virtue of the tack quarrelled, prior to the dates of the infestments in favour of the real creditors, etc.; and therefore sustained the reasons of reduction in so far as concerned the interest of the said creditors, reserving action to the said Thomas Scott against the Lord Cranstoun upon the personal obligation.' 1757, M. 15218.

2d, In the case of the Crs. of Douglas of Dornock v Carlyles, 1757, M. 15219, where the tenant, holding a lease for twenty-one years, obtained a prorogation of it from year to year till certain sums were paid to the tenant, the original term expired; and during one of the years of the prorogation, the question arose, whether the tenant's possession was effectual to make the prorogation for the subsequent years good against the creditors. The Court found that it was not.

There is one case apparently establishing an opposite doctrine from that of the above cases, but the decision proceeded not upon the simple question. The competition was between a tacksman and a purchaser; but, 1st, The purchaser had been informed of the existence of the lease by the seller; and 2d, The sale was made on deathbed, without consent of the heir, who, being liable in the obligation of warrandice in the lease, was by such a sale, if held good against the tenant, materially injured; and upon this ground the Court proceeded. Richard v Lindsay, 1725, M. 15217.

In concluding on this point, it may be observed, that the difficulty in completing the rights of assignees of leasehold property is chiefly felt in those cases where it is desirable to give a power of borrowing money on the security of the tenant's right. The improvement of the country, and the safety of manufacturers, frequently come to depend on this resource; and although Courts have, in the above cases, gone as far as the principles of law will allow, in order to support the credit and resources of the tenantry, this is not without considerable danger of another kind, since it is not possible, under such ambiguous and secret transactions, for general creditors to know how far their debtor's leasehold property is unburdened. It has been proposed to facilitate these operations, with due attention to the general credit of tenantry, by introducing a record for exhibiting, as in feudal property, the state of leasehold rights. Whether this proposal shall be entertained by the Legislature, and with what precautions, I may be able perhaps to state in the Appendix to this work.¹

SUBSECTION II.—DURATION OF THE LEASE.

A lease must have a definite term of duration to be effectual against purchasers of the land, or the creditors of the landlord adjudging. But it is a question of no easy solution, to what length of time such term may be prolonged. In many parts of the country, landholders have no better right than a lease for a great number of years; and villas and pleasure-grounds are frequently laid out in reliance on leases of such endurance as may seem to give to the possessor at least the full enjoyment during his life. Such leases are effectual against the granters and their heirs; but their efficacy against singular successors has been doubted where the granter holds his land under prohibitions against alienation.

1. When no prohibition exists against alienation, or the granting of long leases, it does not appear on what ground of law a stranger purchaser or creditor can object to the efficacy of a lease, however long, provided, in terms of the statute, the lease be certain. It is a sort of [69] land right, different from that which is enjoyed under a feudal grant, but still a right of a legitimate kind, clearly effectual against the heirs of the granter; and of which, by possession and the written lease, third parties may be as well aware as if it were recorded in the Register of Sasines. Whether, in policy, there may be any reason to discountenance the creation of a sort of middle right, which may lead in the end to a new constitution of land rights in Scotland, is a question which, in the present inquiry, it would be out of place to consider. It has also been questioned, whether an unlimited proprietor can, by leases, affect the future and contingent right of subsequent purchasers or creditors? But there is no case in which any such limitation has been established, as to deny efficacy to a long lease. Doubts have been thrown out occasionally, and an opinion in one case given, unfavourable to the effect of a long lease against a purchaser; but nothing amounting to a decision has ever been pronounced on the point.²

2. Where there is a prohibition, however, in a deed of entail properly constituted, it will be effectual to hinder a lease of long endurance.

First, Even where the prohibition is general against ALIENATION, it has been held that this extends to long leases,³ as being a species of alienation; and this in questions with inhibitors, in cases of forfeiture, and under the law of deathbed. In the discussions on this subject as applicable to leases, the only reconciling principle which, in the House of Lords,

¹ See 20 and 21 Vict. c. 26; infra, p. 78.

² Houston's case in ranking of Jordanhill, 1752, Kilk. 395. The case of Fraser of Belladrum, 1758, M. 15196, was not such a decision. If the Court of Session proceeded on such ground, it certainly was not so held in the House of Lords. In the case of L. Hopetoun, 17 Nov. 1763, there was no lease for more than nineteen years, but merely an obligation to renew every nineteen years.

³ See Leslie v Orme, 1779, M. 15530, but especially the statement of the case after a careful investigation into Lord Thurlow's papers, by Lord Redesdale, 2 Dow 112, and again 1 Bligh 510.

appeared amidst the difficulties fit to be adopted, was to hold all leases as alienations, unless in so far as may be necessary for reaping the full profits of the estate; and to inquire, with a view to the application of the prohibition, what is fairly to be deemed within the necessary or useful power of administration, and so in legal construction to be conceded to heirs in possession, for the enlargement of their powers against the strict words of such prohibitions, as if a clause of power was introduced, giving authority to grant leases necessary for good cultivation.¹ This general principle still leaves the question, What shall be taken as the proper criterion by which to determine what is within the implied power?

On this subject it may be observed: 1. That a lease for a very long term of endurance, though at an adequate rent, has been held an alienation.² 2. That in the case where a lease of a thousand years was questioned, there was no occasion to determine the point, as the lease was objectionable on another ground.³ A lease for a hundred years has been considered as an alienation: a lease of ninety-seven years was held to be so in the Queensberry cases under the Neidpath entail:⁴ afterwards, a lease for ninety-nine years in the Bal- [70] bedie case;⁵ and one for fifty-seven years in the case of the March leases. Perhaps, according to the principle finally assumed, a lease of nineteen years is alone to be relied on under a general clause prohibiting alienation; although a lease for twenty-one years seemed on one occasion incidentally to be supposed effectual. Leases for thirty-one years seem to be effectual only as improving leases under the 10 Geo. III. c. 51.⁶

Secondly, But it has been much questioned, whether, under a prohibition to DISPONE, the same sort of exception can be taken as under a prohibition to alienate. Here the great ruling principle has, in all the cases decided by the Court of Session, prevailed with our judges, that no prohibition which is to limit the powers of the heir of entail as a fiar can be admitted by inference or implication;⁷ but a distinction has been taken in the House of Lords, holding the general doctrine established by the uniform course of entail law in Scotland, only to bar an inference from one prohibition to another, but not to exclude a rational construction of the prohibitory clause; which must be held effectual, if clear and intelligible. Both in this way, and also on the force of the authorities respecting the use of the word Dispone, that word has received a construction equivalent to alienation.⁸

3. Where a lease has been granted for a term of years beyond that which is permitted by the entail, it would rather seem that, on this sole objection, the lease would be reducible only in so far as the power had been exceeded;⁹ and, at all events, where a lease is granted nominally for a longer term, but of which no more is to run after the date of the lease than the permitted term, it is good.¹⁰

¹ This principle, after many varying determinations in simple cases, and much uncertainty, was finally adopted in the Queensberry cases. And the principles of the doctrine will be found largely explained and illustrated by Lord Chancellor Eldon, in the reports of those cases. See D. of Queensberry's Executors v D. of Buccleuch, 7 March 1816, F. C.; as in H. L. 10 July 1817, 5 Dow 293. Again, same case, 5 Feb. 1818, F. C.; in H. L. 2 July 1819, 1 Bligh 339; and see 6 Pat. 466, 819.

² D. of Queensberry's Trs. v L. Wemyss (Neidpath entail), decided in H. L. 10 Dec. 1813, 2 Dow 90, 5 Pat. 758; as explained in deciding the Roxburgh feus, ib. 206.

³ Turner v Turner, in H. L. 1 July 1812, 1 Dow 423. See L. Elgin v Wellwood, on a special permissive clause. 1 Sh. App. Ca. 44.

⁴ See above, note 1.

⁵ Henderson and Brown v Sir John Malcolm, in H. L. 18 May 1814, 2 Dow 285. See also Sir W. Elliot v Potts, 14 March 1821, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 16 and 89.

⁶ Stirling v Walker, 20 Feb. 1821, F. C.; Sir M. Malcolm v Bardner, 1823, 2 S. 410.

⁷ Sir W. Elliot of Stobbs v Potts, 1814, 17 F. C. 588; Hamilton v M'Dowal, 1815, 18 F. C. 302; D. of Queensberry's Executors v D. of Buccleuch, 1818, 19 F. C. 466.

⁸ In the case of Elliot v Potts, 14 March 1821, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 16 and 89; and of the Buccleuch Leases, July 1819, 1 Bligh 339, 6 Pat. 466; Colquhoun Stirling v Walker, 20 Feb. 1821, F. C.

⁹ The only case in which the question has been discussed, was one in which the lease was greatly objectionable on many grounds, and especially as being a lease of the whole entailed estate. The lease was reduced entirely, both in Mordaunt v Innes, 9 March 1819, affirmed; and in the D. of Gordon v Innes, 1822, 2 S. 32, N. E. 28. But the opinions of the Court seem at least to leave the question open, in a case where the sole objection was length of endurance.

See Sir M. Malcolm v Bardner, 1823, 2 S. 410.

¹⁰ Agnew v M'Niven, 23 June 1813, F. C.

Where the entail contains a general prohibition against alienation, or a restraint on the power of leasing, there is commonly added, as a regulator of that prohibition, a clause of power to let leases beyond the ordinary duration on particular conditions. But there is also a statute conferring powers; and to a certain extent it controls all such prohibitions, originating frequently in the shortsightedness of individuals, and imposing restraints hostile to the improvement of the country. About half a century ago, the restraints of deeds of entail pressed so heavily on agricultural improvement, that a statute was passed,¹ conferring certain powers on heirs of entail in possession, however strictly fettered by the deed, enabling them to grant leases for improvement under certain limitations. The leasing powers conferred by this Act are: 1. Power to grant leases for thirty-one years; or for fourteen years [71] and a life; or for two existing lives, provided the tenant shall be taken bound to enclose certain proportions of the farm, within certain terms, and the whole within the period of the lease. And, 2. Power to grant, for the purpose of building, leases for any number of years, not exceeding ninety-nine, provided no more be leased to one person than five acres; and that the lease shall be voidable, if not built on to a certain extent. Two restraints, however, are imposed: one, that the statute shall not authorize a lease of the manor-place, offices, garden, etc.; another, that the rent shall not be under those of former leases, and without grassum, foregift, or benefit direct or indirect.

SUBSECTION III.—OF RENT.

The rent payable to the landlord forms an important object of inquiry, both when considered as a part of the estate of the landlord attachable by his creditors, and when considered as a burden on the right of the tenant. Rent is that portion of the produce of lands, or its value, which remains for the landlord, after all the outgoings of cultivation are defrayed, including the profits of the capital employed, according to the ordinary rate of profit of agricultural stock. Loosely speaking, but not correctly, rent also is held to include the remuneration for capital expended on houses, drains, etc. Rent ought to alter with the value of the produce of which it is a part; and this is sometimes thought to be sufficiently studied in stipulating a corn rent. But it is so only when a rateable proportion is taken. While the rent is fixed, though payable in corn, the produce of the farm, it bears hardest on the tenant when he is least able for it. In bad years his produce may be below the average, and he must buy corn with which to pay his rent. The landlord, on the other hand, suffers in cheap years, when the rent falls below his necessities. To do justice to both,—to give to the tenant, on the one hand, that confidence and independence which are necessary in order to encourage improvement, steady industry, and enterprise; and on the other, to guard the landlord from the sudden changes in the value of farm produce, and thus to banish uncertainty and the necessity for arbitrary and humiliating interferences in the way of occasional abatements,—the matter should be so regulated, that the yearly rent, or a considerable part of it, should be ruled by the fiars of such grain or other produce as the farm is likely to yield, and in the proportions likely to be raised; and a maximum and minimum should be fixed, above or below which the augmentation of the money conversion, or its diminution, should not go.²

In contemplation of insolvency, it is a material question whether it be competent, as against purchasers or creditors, or heirs of entail, to stipulate that the rent shall be absorbed

¹ 10 Geo. III. c. 51: An Act 'to encourage the Improvement of Lands in Scotland, under Settlements of strict Entail.' [Amended by 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, and 31 and 32 Vict. c. 84.]

² These principles have guided many of the judicious arrangements framed for extensive estates by Dr. Coventry, professor of agriculture, and in the appendix to Mr. Robert Bell's Treatise on Leases. In the last edition, his son has collected some very valuable practical information and precedents of subleases. See vol. ii. p. 187. [A grain rent may be converted into a money rent by the actings of the parties. Baillie v Fraser, 1853, 15 D. 747.]

in the payment of debt; or to reduce it to an inconsiderable sum, and take a grassum at the beginning of the lease?

I. STIPULATED RETENTION OF RENT.—At one time leases seemed to have been much used as securities for loans of money; and many decisions relative to their effect are to be found in the books between the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the eighteenth centuries: after which time the use of this sort of security probably yielded to the prevailing form of securities by heritable bond. It would appear,—

First, That a lease to subsist till a debt shall be paid, is not effectual against singular successors, as all leases must have a certain termination.¹ An exception was at one time admitted to this rule, where there was a surplus rent over the interest, by the applica- [72] tion of which the debt would some time or other be extinguished, so as to bring the lease to an end.² But this was altered, and the lease held to be ineffectual, the termination of the lease being uncertain.³

Second, That although it is competent to a tenant to retain the rents, in order to enforce performance of the landlord's counter-obligations contained in the lease,⁴ a tenant cannot acquire, either by separate bond or contract, or even by a stipulation in the lease itself, a right to retain the rents against singular successors, in extinction of debt or payment of interest.⁵

Third, That a lease may indirectly be so arranged as to afford a good security to the tenant for the interest of a loan, or even for the principal. The rent may be fixed arbitrarily at any sum which the parties choose to appoint; nor have purchasers or creditors any ground in law for insisting that the tenant shall pay a fair and adequate rent. Coming in the place of the landlord, they can take only such right as he has by his contract reserved; unless they can object to that contract on the bankrupt laws, or as against a prohibition to alienate. The parties may, on calculation, settle a rent, and fix a period, which will afford to the lender full security for his interest, and a gradual extinction of his principal.

Fourth, That as the tenant must be in possession upon the lease, in order to make his right real, he can claim no preference on a prorogation of which the term has not commenced.⁶

II. OF GRASSUMS.—The power of a proprietor to let leases at low annual rents, taking grassums, does not appear to be under any restraint, either in relation to the right of a subsequent purchaser; nor even in relation to substitutes in an entail, unless the entail contain special limitations of the power, or prohibitions against alienation.

1. As to PURCHASERS, the Act 1449, c. 17, not only contains no limitation on the power to fix the rent, but seems to sanction the lease as effectual against third parties, whatever may have been the rent stipulated, 'for sik like male as thai tuk them of befor.' The only limitation is, that it shall not be a rent entirely elusory; which seems to be a fair construction of the statute, as applying expressly and giving efficacy only to leases having an ish and a male.⁷

2. As to LANDS UNDER ENTAIL. It is in this situation that the practice of taking

¹ Thomson v Reed, 1664, M. 15239; Peacock v Lauder, 1674, M. 15244; Douglas of Dornock's Crs., 1757, M. 15219.

² Oliphant v Currie, 1677, M. 15245; Cockburn, etc. v Sampson, 1698, M. 15247.

³ Factor on Auchinbreck v M'Lauchlan, 1748, Kilk. 534; Elchies, Tack, No. 14. Robertson v Spalding, 1754; Elchies, Removing, No. 8, notes, p. 405.

⁴ Walpole and Alison v M. Beaumont, 1780, M. 15249; Morrison v Pattullo, 1787, M. 10425; Bell v Lamont, 14 June 1814, F. C. [But the tenant's claims must not be illiquid, and more favour is shown to the plea at the end than during the currency of the lease. See Hill v Gordon, 1834, 13 S. 88; M'Rae v M'Pherson, 1843, 6 D. 302; Dickson v Porteous, 1852, 15 D. 1; Sprott v Morrison, 1853, 15 D. 376; Dods v Fortune, 1854, 16 D. 478; Loundes v Buchanan, 1854, 17 D. 63.]

⁵ Stair ii. 9. 29. Ross, 1626, Durie 266, where an opinion given by the Court, that a discharge of the rent to the tenant, in extinction of debt, would not avail against singular successors. Ersk. ii. 6. 29. M'Tavish v M'Lachlan, 1748, M. 1736; L. Cranstoun's Crs. v Scott, 1757, M. 15218. Here there were two questions: 1. Whether a power given by a separate deed to retain rents for relief of obligations, undertaken for the landlord, was effectual against creditors? and, 2. Whether a lease prorogating a former, and containing a similar power, was effectual, no possession having as yet followed? The power to retain was held not effectual after sequestration; as to the others, see above, p. 65, note 4.

⁶ L. Cranstoun's Crs. v Scott, 1757, M. 15218; Douglas of Dornock's Crs. v Carlyles, 1757, M. 15219.

⁷ Ersk. Prin. ii. 6. 10; Ersk. ii. 6. 27; Bankt. ii. 9. 1.

grassums has most prevailed. Under strict entails in Scotland, the proprietor had in [73] general such slender means of providing for his family, his widow and children, that it became a very common practice to raise a fund by means of grassums taken from the tenants with great diminution of the periodical rent. This, especially when combined with a power of granting leases of long duration, threatened the utter impoverishment of heirs of entail; but it has now been placed, by the determinations of the House of Lords, on the true footing, and a great ruling principle applied to guide the determination of the several cases. Three cases may occur:—

1. If there be no prohibition to diminish the rental, or to alienate, the same rule must apply as to the case of purchasers: there can be no objection under the entail taken against a lease, whatever rent, not elusory, may be stipulated.

2. If there be a prohibition to alienate, although there may not seem to be much danger of evil arising from the diminution of the rents in a lease of moderate duration, yet it is an important question, and of some difficulty in construction, whether it be lawful to cast the transaction in a form which will deprive the succeeding heir of any part of the proper rent, which is the fair produce of the estate; so as to bring, by anticipation, into the pocket of the granter of the lease what ought to have been spread over all the years of it as a rent? Something of this has been mingled in the argument in most of the cases of leases of long duration, as tending to make up the character of alienation. But applied strictly to the question of grassums, the principle adopted is, that the heir of entail in possession has no right to take to himself a greater benefit from the estate than he leaves to be reaped by his successors, whether that benefit be derived from an anticipation of rent in the shape of grassum; or from varying rents, excessive at first and inconsiderable afterwards; or in whatever shape of bonus, or otherwise, it may be taken.¹

3. In order to counteract the general prohibition against alienation, an express power is frequently granted to give leases, under condition of not diminishing the rental. If the prohibition be against diminution of the rental generally, it seems to be considered as having reference to the state of the rental under the last lease; so that any augmentation which circumstances may admit of, may be taken as grassum. But a prohibition to let leases below the just rent or avail for the time, is a bar to the taking of grassums, as forming in all cases truly deductions from the proper rent. This, after a series of the most learned and ingenious arguments which perhaps ever distinguished the discussion of any legal difficulty, the House of Lords have finally settled.²

Wherever the prohibition against diminution is fixed expressly to certain limits, it is sufficient if those limits be adhered to. The power of the heir in possession is unrestricted beyond that point; and he may take grassums, and dispose of them at his will, in so far as there is any augmentation beyond the limits assigned.³

SUBSECTION IV.—OF MELIORATIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS.

The improvements and operations by which the productive powers of the soil are aided, or the necessary facilities to cultivation afforded, properly are incumbent on the [74] landlord, to be replaced by an annual payment on the part of the tenant. The yearly return made by the tenant for such improvements, whether of drains, fences, farm offices, ¹ See this question of grassums, in all its relations, largely discussed in the House of Lords, and the above stated principles settled in the Queensberry leases, 1 Bligh 339–534, 5 Dow 297. See also D. of Hamilton v Scott Waring, 21 May 1816, as decided in H. L., 2 Bligh 196.

² See the Queensberry cases, ut supra, note 1.

³ Wellwood v Wellwood, 1823, 2 S. 475, N. E. 423. Here the restraint was against letting tacks 'at a smaller yearly rent than 3 bolls of oatmeal, at 8 stone weight per boll, for each acre so to be set.' But this allowed the heir in possession to take a grassum of £12,000 on a lease for 999 years. This was held good against the heirs of entail. An heir of entail claiming the bond for £12,000, as truly rent, which ought to be reconverted into rent for the benefit of the substitutes, it was held a bond good to the heir of entail to whom it was granted, and his heirs.

See E. of Elgin v Wellwood, 1821, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 44.

etc., is not, strictly speaking, rent, as already observed. But it may appear that, as such return is paid to the landlord along with the rent, a part at least of the capital expended on improvements ought to form a burden on those who successively derive the benefit.

1. It has been fixed, however, that an heir of entail, under restraints against alienation and the contraction of debt, is not at common law entitled to burden the estate, or succeeding heirs, with the expense of improvements.¹ But the same statute which authorized the granting of improving leases, gave also power to heirs of entail to burden the succeeding heirs of entail to a certain extent with this expense. This was the statute 10 Geo. III. c. 51. By sec. 9 et seq. of this Act, on observing certain precautions, giving certain notices, and lodging with the sheriff-clerk the vouchers of payment, the sums expended on improvements are allowed to form a burden on the succeeding heirs, to the extent of certain proportions of the rents of the estate. But, 1. The precautions enjoined must be observed with the most scrupulous accuracy, else the benefit of the Act is forfeited, and the rule of the common law will guide the decision. 2. The sum expended will not ground any adjudication against the entailed estate. And, 3. While it forms a debt personal against the heir, it is declared by sec. 15 that this claim shall be preferable over every other creditor of the heir in possession, in competition for the rents.

2. Where there is no entail, expense laid out by the proprietor can ground no claim against singular successors; but where the tenant is to make the improvements, and the lease bears that he shall receive a consideration at the close of the lease, this will be effectual against singular successors.²

SUBSECTION V.—EFFECT OF LOCAL CUSTOM.

But although a lease in writing, containing such terms clearly expressed, will be deemed effectual against purchasers and creditors, how shall particular claims and rights of the tenant, arising not under the written lease, nor from the general law, but from local custom, be disposed of? If, for example, it should be the custom of a particular district that the tenant may remove the houses on the farm, or all that can be removed, and claim the value of what he leaves, will that affect a singular successor? In a case of this sort, the Court, distinguishing between a local usage and a verbal bargain or understanding as to a particular farm, held the stranger bound by the former.³ But serious doubts have been raised to what extent conditions implied from usage can be sanctioned? In the House of Lords, after very ample discussion, on two occasions, relative to the disposal⁴ of the straw [75] of the way-going crop, the lease was held as the rule of the contract; not to be extended by any implied assent to local usages.

SECTION II.

OF THE TENANT'S ESTATE, AS AVAILABL TO CREDITORS OR ASSIGNEES.

The permanency of the tenant's estate is of great consequence to the agricultural interests of Scotland; and absolute security on this point is the only certain encourager of

¹ Dillon v Campbell of Blitheswood, 1780, M. 15432; Farquhar v Webster, 1792, Bell's Oct. Ca. 207; Taylor v Bethune, 1792, Bell's Oct. Ca. 214; Todd and Moncrieff v Skene, 1823, 2 S. 113, N. E. 104, aff. 26 June 1825, 1 W. and S. 217. [Ross v Hawkins, 1848, 10 D. 1288; Mackenzie v Mackenzie, 1849, 11 D. 596.]

² Arbuthnot v Colquhoun, 1772, M. 10424; Maxwell Morri- son v Patullo, 1787, M. 10425. [Such obligations also transmit against the landlord's general representatives. M'Gillivray's Exrs. v Masson, 1857, 19 D. 1099.]

³ Bell v Lamont, 14 June 1814, F. C.

⁴ D. of Roxburgh v Robertson, 28 June 1816, F. C., revd. in H. L. 2 Bligh 156; Gordon v Robertson, 1825, 3 S. 656, N. E. 458, revd. in H. L. 19 May 1826, 1 W. and S. p. 115; honest industry, spirited exertion, and the fearless application of capital in the cultivation of the land. While yet tenants were entirely dependent on the will of their landlords for the continuance of their possession, no system of cultivation could be followed. The rotation of crops, of which the average produce is necessary to indemnify the original outlay, could not be depended on, and was not studied or understood. The science and art of agriculture may almost be said to commence with the permanence given to the right of the tenant; and although this department of the law of Scotland has not yet arrived at perfection—the delectus personæ implied in leases being still a cause of great uncertainty—perhaps, on the whole, considering the intimate relation of landlord and tenant, as much relaxation has been given to the landlord's privilege as well can be expected in a matter so nearly connected with the comfort of his own possession of his lands.

LIMITATION OF TENANT'S ESTATE BY DELECTUS PERSONÆ.—By the law of Scotland, the landlord is held to select his tenant with an especial view to personal qualifications. In this delectus personæ he is considered as having two objects in view: 1. To procure good security for his rent; and, 2. To be assured of the skill and fidelity of his tenant as an agriculturist, and of his peaceable disposition as a neighbour and a tenant.

In Scotland as well as in England, a lease is regarded as an absolute estate for years. But in England this has more effect in colouring the whole doctrine of the law relative to the assignable nature of a lease than in Scotland. In England, so absolute is the tenant's right, that his creditors may take the lease under a commission of bankruptcy, although it should bear an express provision against the tenant's assigning without the landlord's consent.¹ The landlord's remedy is, by stipulating for re-entry on the tenant committing an act of bankruptcy; or that the farm shall be actually occupied by the tenant, and that he shall actually hold the lease, and 'depart with no part of it.'²

By the law of Scotland, the bias inclines the other way. Instead of the lease being held in the general case to be assignable, it is considered as naturally exclusive of assignees, in being granted with a particular respect to the personal qualities of the tenant; insomuch that it is necessary to have a declared, or at least an implied consent, that the creditors [76] shall have right to enter upon the lease, or to sell it, in order to entitle them to do so.

1. HEIRS.—Originally, in Scotland, the delectus personæ implied in leases was so strong, and the leases so strictly personal, that the right was not held descendible even to HEIRS, unless they were expressly mentioned in the lease. But the whole spirit of the law, and the nature of the connection between proprietors and their vassals and tenants, is now changed, and a freer interpretation of the contract of lease has been introduced. Heirs now succeed in leases without any special mention of them.³

2. ASSIGNEES.—In agricultural leases of ordinary duration, the connection which subsists between landlord and tenant, and the annoyance which a landlord may suffer from a disagreeable neighbour, still continue the delectus personæ so strongly as to require an express destination to ASSIGNEES, in order to make effectual a voluntary transference without consent of the landlord.⁴ The more slender connection which subsists between the landlord and the

Ogilvy v Gruar, 1770, Hailes 364. Bell on Leases i. 331, note. [See Hunter v Miller, 1863, 1 Macph. H. L. 49, 4 Macq. 560.]

¹ This settled in Doe v Carter, 8 Term. Rep. 57, where the whole question is amply discussed. This determination was approved of by the Master of the Rolls in Weatherall v Gearing, 12 Vesey 513; and very recently the same doctrine delivered in King's Bench, Doe v Bevan, 1815, 3 Maule and Selwyn 358. The principle of these cases is so narrow as this, that the statute execution of a commission of bankruptcy is no breach of covenant by deed of the tenant, to which alone the stipulation applies, or that the exclusion of assignees is not the exclusion of assignees by law.

² See cases in preceding note, and Doe v Clark, 8 East. 185.

³ Ersk. ii. 6. 31.

⁴ Erskine has said that marriage is a virtual or legal assignation of a lease, and that as the marriage is indissoluble, the lease falls: Ersk. ii. 6. 31. But this is not law. The marriage is not an assignation of a lease. As heritable property, it does not fall under the jus mariti, although the accruing fruits do.

In Hume v Taylor, 1734, Elchies, Tack, No. 2, the Court held a lease to be void on the woman who held it being married. But that decision has not since been approved of. See Elliot v D. of Buccleuch, 1747, M. 10329; and accord-tenant of a house or urban tenement, with the many accidents that in a lease for years may render it necessary for the tenant to leave the house, and desirable for both parties that he should have a power of assigning, have been held to justify an opposite inference in such leases, and to give an implied power to the tenant to assign;¹ which yields, however, to the implied prohibition against assigning for a different purpose or sort of habitation.² The cases stand thus opposed: In agricultural leases of ordinary duration there is an exclusion of assignees, unless the contrary be stipulated; in urban, there is an admission of assignees, unless excluded.

Assignment differs from sublease mainly in this, that the landlord who accepts of an assignee passes from all claim against the cedent, and takes the assignee as sole party in the lease; while a sublease has no effect to discharge the principal tenant.³

3. SUBTENANTS.—The above doctrine holds relatively to SUBTENANTS. They, as well as assignees, are excluded in agricultural leases, unless an express stipulation to sublet,⁴ or a destination to heirs and subtenants, be in the lease; and they are admitted in the [77] case of urban tenements, unless expressly excluded.⁵

4. LONG LEASES.—The rule is reversed in leases of long duration. Such leases are generally improving leases, and the tenant is supposed to be induced to risk somewhat on the faith of the possession being assured to him during the whole term. On this ground the right both of assigning and of subletting is implied, unless expressly excluded.⁶ And the express exclusion of the one will not exclude the other.⁷ The ordinary duration of agricultural leases is nineteen or twenty-one years; and although there has not been laid down any precise rule by which to determine what in this class of questions is to be deemed a long lease, the term of thirty-eight years has been held sufficient to confer the implied power. It has also been implied in liferent leases.⁸

5. EXCLUSION OF ADJUDGERS.—But although there is an implied exclusion of voluntary assignees in agricultural leases, an express exclusion of assignees is requisite to prevent creditors from attaching the lease by legal diligence.⁹ Such express exclusion of assignees will in all cases, whether the lease be of short or of long endurance, prove fatal to the dili-ingly, in Gillon v Muirhead, 1775, M. 15286, the Court sustained a lease granted to a man and his wife, and the longest liver, as not made void by the surviving wife's subsequent marriage. Affirmed 3 Pat. 681. [It would seem that, where recognition by the landlord is relied on, such recognition must be express. Gray v Low, 1859, 21 D. 293.]

¹ In a lease of urban tenements, the Court found the rule of exclusion not applicable. 'Several of the Lords, however, were of opinion, that there is often no less an electio personæ in the tack of a house than of land.' Aitchison v Binnie, 1748, M. 10405. Those judges appear from Elchies to have been Arniston, Drummore, Murkle, Shewalton, and Elchies himself. Elchies, Tack, No. 13, notes, p. 444.

This determination was confirmed, Anderson v Alexander and Mather, 10 July 1811, 16 F. C. 327.

² In certain cases of urban tenements, a delectus personæ seems as natural or necessary as in an agricultural lease—as in the case of a shop, tavern, etc., having a particular character; and although perhaps it was better to bring the whole to a general rule, leaving the parties to regulate the matter by special agreement, there is one case in which an alteration in the nature of the possession, coupled with a personal objection to the assignee known to the tenant, were sufficient to exclude the assignee. Gordon v Crawford, 1825, 4 S. 95, N. E. 97.

³ Skene v Greenhill, 1825, 4 S. 25, N. E. 27. See also

Low v Knowles, 1796, M. 13873. [Ramsay v Commercial Bank, 1842, 4 D. 405; Laing v Duff, 1845, 7 D. 556.]

⁴ Alison v Proudfoot, 1788, M. 15290. In that case, the general question was decided on a hearing in presence; and although some lawyers of high authority were dissatisfied with the determination, and doubtful of the soundness of the principles on which it rested, the decision has since been confirmed in a lease of nineteen years. E. of Peterborough v Milne, 1791, M. 15293; L. Cassilis v Dunlop, in a lease of twenty-one years, 5 Dec. 1806, F. C.

⁵ See above, note 1. In Anderson's case, the lessee of a house was allowed to sublet, the nature of the possession not being changed.

⁶ Simpson v Gray and Webster, 1794, M. 15294; Pringle v M'Laggan, 10 June 1802. [Leechman v Sievright, 1826, 4 S. 690. See also Leck v Fulton, 1855, 17 D. 408; Hood v Miller, 1855, 17 D. 411.]

⁷ Trotter v Dennis, 1770, M. 15282; Crawford v Maxwell, 1758, M. 15307; Ogilvie v Crs. of Fullarton, 1791, M. 15309.

⁸ See cases in the two preceding notes.

⁹ Stair ii. 9. 26; Ersk. ii. 6. 32. Elliot v D. of Buccleuch, 1747, M. 10329; Kinloch v Crs. of Fullarton, and Ogilvie v Crs. of Fullarton, 1791, M. 15309.

This proceeds on a principle somewhat analogous to that of the English law, as already stated, note 1, p. 72. [See Borrows & Co. v Colquhoun, 1 Macq. 691.]

gence of creditors.¹ Leases are sometimes made to the tenant, and his heirs and subtenants, excluding assignees. Where the tenant in such a case becomes a bankrupt, and at the desire of his creditors gives a sublease of the whole farm, it is almost the same with assigning the lease; but no objection can be taken to this on the part of the landlord.²

Leases which exclude assignees, commonly exclude subtenants also; and this exclusion is effectual to prevent a sublease to creditors without the consent, express or implied, of the landlord.

7. EXCLUSION PERSONAL TO LANDLORD.—Where an agricultural lease is taken 'to heirs,' or an urban lease is made to exclude assignees and subtenants, the exclusion is in law held to be absolute. It may be questioned, however, whether an assignment is in such a case null, or whether it is only subject to an objection on the part of the landlord. Erskine seems to consider such assignation as absolutely null, and incapable of transmitting any right to the assignee.³ If this doctrine be correct, the heir entitled under the destination to take the lease after the tenant's death, should have a right to challenge the conveyance to the assignee; and the lease should (with consent of the landlord) afford a fund of payment to the creditors of the heir. But the Court have decided on a different principle, and held the landlord alone entitled to challenge.⁴

[78] 8. CLAUSE OF EXCLUSION, UNLESS WITH LANDLORD'S CONSENT.—Where the lease contains a clause admitting assignees or subtenants, 'if approved of by the landlord,' or excluding them 'unless approved of,' an opinion formerly prevailed, that the landlord was under judicial control in the exercise of his discretion; that he was bound to assign his reasons for rejecting the tenant; and that he might be compelled, if his objections were frivolous, to admit him. In short, this was considered as a case in which both parties, contemplating the many justifiable causes that may arise on the part of the tenant for abandoning the possession, without renouncing the benefit of the contract, agree that, in accomplishing his purpose, the tenant is to meet with obstruction only if he should propose as tenant one whom, in equity and fair dealing, the landlord can hold exceptionable and unfit. Accordingly, it was at one time laid down, that in such a case the landlord 'was not entitled arbitrarily, or out of mere caprice, to withhold his consent.'⁵ And this doctrine, delivered in a book of authority, was long in practice held as the settled construction of this contract. But the doctrine, though confirmed by subsequent cases,⁶ is now entirely abandoned on

¹ See the above case of Elliot, Elchies' Notes 444. A lease for fifty-seven years, with an express exclusion, found not adjudicable. Cunningham v Hamilton, 1770, M. 10410.

See also below for the possibility of evading such exclusion by means of a manager, etc.

² Crawford v Maxwell and Crs., 1758, M. 15307; Trotter v Dennis, 1770, M. 15282; and Ogilvie v Crs. of Fullarton, 1791, M. 15309.

³ Ersk. ii. 6. 31.

⁴ Hay and Wood, 1801, M. 15297. Here, a lease to David Hay and his heirs, excluding assignees, was by David's son, after his father's death, assigned to his natural son. The son having died, Hay and Wood, as heirs-at-law, challenged the assignee's right. The Lord Ordinary and the Court held the clause of exclusion entirely in favour of the landlord; and as he did not concur with the tenant's heirs, the action was dismissed.

In the case of Deuchar v L. Minto and others, 1798, M. 15295, a similar judgment was pronounced by Lord Meadowbank, and confirmed by the Court; and it was only after the landlord appeared and concurred with the heir in the challenge, that the assignation was held bad. [Dobie v M. of Lothian, 1864, 2 Macph. 788; and see Murdoch v Murdoch's Trs., 1863, 1 Macph. 330.]

⁵ In the Dictionary of Decisions, vol. iv. p. 75, this report stands: 'The Lords found, that where the heritor's consent was made necessary to the assignation, he was not entitled arbitrarily, or out of mere caprice, to withhold his consent where the proposed assignee was in good circumstances, and otherwise unexceptionable.' D. of Roxburgh v Archibalds, 1785, M. 10412, note.

⁶ Sir Alex. Ramsay Irvine v Valentine, 1791. There a lease was granted by Sir Alexander to 'Valentine, his heirs and assignees, such assignees being always agreeable to and approved of by the said Sir A. R. Irvine, his heirs and successors, by a writing under his or their hands to that effect.' The endurance is 'for the space of nineteen years from and after his entry thereto; and which tack is to endure and continue after the expiration of the said nineteen years, for all the years and crops of the lifetime of the person in the actual possession of the said lands at the expiration of the said nineteen years.' Valentine possessed for some years under this lease, and becoming at last insolvent, a sequestration was applied for under the Act of the 12th of the King; and under this statute a trust-deed was afterwards executed, by which the trustees were empowered to dispose of the leases. At a meeting of his creditors the landlord attended and presided, full consideration ; and the landlord's power of exclusion under such a clause is held to [79] be absolute.¹

The creditors may insist on the tenant granting an assignation or sublease, with the chance of its being objected to ; for the old doctrine, which inferred forfeiture from the mere attempt to assign, is now exploded. If the lease, however, should contain not only an exclusion of assignees, but also a consequent irritancy of the tenant's right, it seems doubtful whether the creditors could insist on a thing so useless to themselves as an assignation, and so destructive of the right of the bankrupt.² The adjudication, and also the deed of conveyance to be granted by a bankrupt under the Sequestration Act (54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 29), is not hurtful to the tenant, being only effectual 'so far as he can safely convey.' Under the subsisting Act, then, there is no occasion for the precaution taken in a case under the former statute.³

when a resolution was taken to sell the lease. Previous to the sale, the landlord, in a letter to the trustees, said : 'I consent to an assignation of the lease, etc., on the following conditions : 1. That the tenant shall reside on the farm, and have no other residence and no other farm ; 2. That the tenant shall find security for five years' rent, and for the stocking of the farm ; and, 3. That certain regulations in cropping shall be observed.' When the lease was exposed to sale with these conditions annexed, nobody appeared to offer but the landlord himself, and evidence was brought to show that the competition was in this way prevented. The landlord bought the lease ; and after keeping it for some time in his own hands, let it to another tenant for nearly double the rent. Valentine having been absent during those proceedings, brought an action on his return against his landlord and the new tenant. Lord Gardenstone pronounced a judgment, finding 'that the conditions and restrictions proposed by the defender Sir Alexander Ramsay, and adopted by the trustees as articles of the public roup, were competent, fair, and rational ; and that the purchase made by the defender at the public roup was unexceptionable.' The Court, on reviewing this judgment, reversed it ; and this appears to have been upon the ground that the landlord, by the proposal of absurd and unauthorized conditions, had contrived to secure to himself an augmented rent at the tenant's expense. Lord President Campbell held incidentally, that the clause relative to assignees gave a discretionary, but by no means an arbitrary, power of refusal to the landlord, and that the conditions insisted on by the landlord were not justified by the discretion he had reserved to himself. Lord Eskgrove held that, by his presence at the meeting, the landlord had assented to the sale upon the original conditions of the lease. The judgment was, to 'sustain the reasons of reduction in so far as regards the landlord, and reduce, decern, and declare accordingly : find him accountable for the profits of the farm, etc., and find him and his tenant bound to remove at the next term.' The House of Lords affirmed the judgment. The only difference was in these two respects :—1. A reservation was inserted of all claims competent between the creditors and Sir A. R. Irvine against each other ; and, 2. 'As it appears that the said Robert Kinnear (the tenant) has not been heard for his interest, it is therefore ordered that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session to hear parties upon the said interest of Robert Kinnear ; and in respect that, in case of judgment passing in favour of Robert Kinnear, the privity and relation which may thereupon be found to subsist between Sir Alexander Irvine and Robert Kinnear may appear to make some difference as to the mode and form of redress which may be competent to the pursuer Alexander Valentine, it is further ordered and adjudged, that the consideration be in like manner remitted back, and that in the meantime the said interlocutor be reversed in so far as it finds Sir A. R. Irvine, and Robert Kinnear his tenant, must remove from the farm at Martinmas next, without prejudice, however, to any point which may arise thereupon ; and that with these variations the said interlocutor be affirmed.' H. L. 4 March 1793, Mr. Baron Hume's Sess. Papers, 3 Pat. 287.

¹ Muir v Wilson, 20 Jan. 1820, F. C. I was counsel in this case, and gave an opinion extrajudicially on it, conformably to the authorities in the books. When the question came to be discussed, Lord Alloway ordered it to be reported for the opinion of the Court, 'in respect that an opinion has prevailed for some time in this country, founded upon the authority of the cases D. of Roxburgh v Archibald, 5 March 1785 (Morr. p. 10412), and Sir Alexander Ramsay v Valentine, 29 July 1791, that when a lease excludes assignees and subtenants without consent of the landlord, this contemplation of consent so far alters the rights of parties, that the landlord must assign some reasonable cause for refusing his consent ; and a great deal has now been stated to shake the authority of these decisions as establishing that point ; and the Second Division of the Court, in the case of M'Kenzie v Learmont and Munro, not reported, has pronounced a decision directly contrary thereto. In order that this matter, of such importance to the landlords and tenants of this country, may be put to rest, makes avizandum with the case to the First Division of the Court,' etc. A good report of the case will be found in a note to the fourth edition of Mr. Robert Bell's Treatise on Leases, published by Mr. William Bell, p. 181. [See Ramsay v Commercial Bank, 1842, 4 D. 405 ; Wight v E. of Hopetoun, 1855, 17 D. 364 ; Stewart v Rutherford, 1863, 35 Jur. 307. Rule applied to a mineral lease for thirty years in D. of Portland v Baird, 1865, 4 Macph. 10.]

² The creditors of a bankrupt tenant, whose lease excluded assignees and subtenants, insisted for a conveyance to it. The bankrupt refused, on the ground that his lease would be forfeited. The Court was clear that he was bound to grant the conveyance, but that, if his lease contained a clause of irritancy, it would both be invidious in the creditors, and hurtful to their interests, to insist for it, and that it ought not to be allowed. An inquiry into the conditions of the lease was ordered. I believe the case was afterwards compromised. Niven v Macfarlanes, 20 Nov. 1799, n. r.

³ The judgment, after confirming the nomination of the

9. Where the creditors adjudge a lease that is open to diligence, or where in a bankruptcy such a lease is adjudged or assigned to the trustee, it may be doubted whether the creditors or the trustee are to be held as proper tenants, independently of any new contract of lease. 1. The landlord is entitled to insist for a tenant, who shall be liable for arrears and rent.¹ 2. When the creditors, by themselves or by the trustee, take up the lease and cultivate the farm, they are liable as tenants not only for the rent of the year which they possess, but also for arrears and all the obligations under the lease.² 3. Where they abandon [80] the possession, selling off the stocking, and leaving the farm uncultivated, the landlord may let to another tenant,³ and also at the same time claim on the estate for damage, if the new lease be at a lower rent; holding the bankrupt as his tenant, and proceeding on the maxim, 'In loco facti imprestabilis subsit damnum et interesse.'

10. POWER TO POSSESS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.—Although the creditors cannot directly acquire, either by assignation, or by sublease, or by legal process, where there is an express exclusion in the lease, it is important to inquire, whether they may not indirectly attain the same object?

1. Bankruptcy does not of itself annul a lease. The tenant, though bankrupt, may still continue in the possession, provided he pay the rent regularly, and perform the other stipulations of the contract.⁴ All that the landlord is entitled to do in case of his tenant's failure to pay the rent, is to have recourse to the hypothec, and the proceedings prescribed in the Act of Sederunt 1756.⁵ And as the tenant's capacity of acting still remains to him after bankruptcy, his creditors seem to be entitled, by agreement with him, to supersede their diligence, and allow him the use of the stocking, so as to enable him to possess the farm upon accounting to them for the profits,—a certain allowance being made to him for his subsistence.⁶

[81] 2. But where the tenant does not himself possess the farm, he will not be allowed trustee, and ordaining the bankrupt to dispoise, bears this exception: 'With the exception of the last alternative prayer for special powers over the lease for the benefit of the creditors, as to which, refuse the prayer of the petition, and under the said exception adjudge, etc., in terms of the statute.' Sequestration of Thomas Johnston, 4 Feb. 1813, F. C. [See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 102.]

¹ Nisbet's Tr., 10 Dec. 1802, M. 15268. Landlord found entitled to remove the trustee, unless he would pay not only present and future rent, but also arrears.

² Cuthil v Jeffrey, 21 Nov. 1818, F. C.; Sir W. Fairly v Nielson and Fulton, 1821, 1 S. 242. [Harvey v Haldane, 1833, 11 S. 872; and see Ferrier v Hector, 1822, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 159; L. Strathmore's Trs. v Kirkcaldy's Trs., 1853, 15 D. 752.]

³ See Lord Kilkerran's notes subjoined to Elliot v D. of Buccleuch, p. 397, M. 10333.

⁴ Crawford v Maxwell, 1758, M. 15307.

⁵ 'Where a tenant,' says that Act, 'shall run in arrear of one full year's rent, or shall desert his possession, and leave it uncultivated at the usual time of labouring, in these, or either of these cases, it shall be lawful to the heritor, or other setter of the lands, to bring his action against the tenant before the judge ordinary, who is hereby empowered and required to decern and ordain the tenant to find caution for the arrears, and for payment of the rent of the five crops following, or during the currency of the tack, if the tack be of shorter duration than five years, within a certain time to be limited by the judge; and, failing thereof, to decern the tenant summarily to remove, and eject him in the same manner as if the tack were determined, and the tenant had been legally warned in terms of the Act of Parliament 1555.' Act of

Sederunt, 14 Dec. 1756, sec. 5. [See 16 Vict. c. 80, sec. 29.]

⁶ When this question first occurred, the creditors of a bankrupt tenant consulted Mr. Lockhart (afterwards Lord Covington) upon the proper method to be followed for rendering the lease serviceable to them. The opinion delivered was, 'That as the lease excluded assignees, an assignation should not be granted, but that a person ought to be appointed manager or factor for managing the farm.' The creditors did not follow these directions exactly. They took an anomalous sort of half assignation in favour of a person who engaged to advance a sum of money; and the bankrupt himself, who had at one time been a baker in Canongate, resumed his trade there. The Court found that the letter conveying the lease to Henderson, the manager, was equivalent to an assignation, and therefore decerned in the removing. Jamieson Durham v Henderson and Livingston, 1773, M. 15283.

The tenant then came to reside on the farm, and got together, with the aid of his creditors, a sort of stock. He then presented a bill of suspension of the decree of removing, and a proof was allowed whether this was not collusive. The Court, on advising informations, suspended the decree of removing, upon the ground that, although by the lease assignees and subtenants were excluded, yet it was material justice to allow the tenant to possess, when assisted by his creditors. Jamieson Durham v Livingston, 27 July 1774. This was stated by one of the judges in the case of Laird, and who was one of the counsel in Jamieson Durham's case, to be the ground of the reversal.

In Laird v Grindlay, it was held, that when a tenant dies his heir may enter into the management for the benefit of the creditors; and that there is no necessity for the profits going to appoint a manager accountable to the creditors. This device was at one time thought to be sanctioned by the case of Jamieson Durham,¹ and it accordingly was held to be legitimate.² But it is now settled that a mandate of this sort, intended to give the creditors the entire benefit of a lease, under the administration of a manager, is to be regarded as a covered assignation;³ and, above all, it is held that the lease is forfeited by the tenant's absence from Scotland.⁴

3. Although creditors may, with the consent of the bankrupt or of his heir, elude the force of a common clause of exclusion, it would seem that there is no direct way in which they can force the tenant so to concur. They may do execution against his person, take his stocking and his crops, and oppose, on the ground of his dishonest retention of the lease, any application he may make for protection, liberation, or discharge; but there is no form of diligence by which the lease can in such a case be taken into their hands, or placed under a manager.

IRRITANCY ON BANKRUPTCY.—A declaration that the bankruptcy of the tenant shall infer a forfeiture of the lease, will in all cases deprive the creditors of the benefit of the lease, where they have not taken the precaution to avoid rendering the tenant bankrupt.⁵

to the tenant, since the heir may enter cum beneficio inventarii, and pay every farthing to the creditors. 1791, Bell's Oct. Ca. p. 296.

This doctrine was approved of in the case of the E. of Galloway v M'Hutcheon, 1803, though the case was finally decided upon peculiar grounds. See 5 Pat. 169. M'Hutcheon of Chang held leases from Lord Galloway, which had several years to run; and having planned great improvements, he applied for and obtained a renewal for twenty-one years. The tack excluded assignees and subtenants. M'Hutcheon died after two years' possession of the new lease, very greatly in advance for improvements, and with his affairs in disorder. His brother entered cum beneficio inventarii, to give the creditors, without risk to him, the whole advantage of the funds, and he named trustees for the benefit of the creditors. He possessed the farm by managers, giving up the whole profits to his brother's creditors. An action of removing was first brought by the landlord, and afterwards an action of declarator. A condescendence by the landlord was ordered, and upon the relevancy of the proof some difference of opinion took place upon the bench. The majority of the Court was earnest in having the former decisions followed out, and a point so solemnly fixed not again set afloat; but it was thought proper to let in all the light possible relative to the circumstances, and the proof was allowed. At advising the proof, it was held that the tenant, in entering cum beneficio inventarii, and giving over the profits to the creditors, used his own right not only legally, but laudably; that he was entitled to possess by a manager, since his own residence was not required; and that Laird's case was a solemn decision on the general principle, and ought not to be overturned, nor even lightly questioned. But afterwards M'Hutcheon came to an agreement with the creditors, who, in consequence of a sum of money, discharged his brother's debts, and then he entered into possession by his own servants. The case was finally decided, on the effect of this transaction, against Lord Galloway.

And in the case of Monro v Miller, 11 Dec. 1811, 14 F. C. 384, where the Court held the appointment of a manager to be ineffectual, the tenant having left the country, the opinion of the Court pointed towards a decision in favour of the creditors, if the tenant had really and bona fide returned to reside upon the farm and cultivate it.

The same determination, Watson v Douglas, 13 Dec. 1811, ib. 412. N.B.—This case decided on consulting with the First Division of the Court. Buchan Sydsenf v Todd, 8 March 1814, F. C.

¹ This case was quite misapprehended. The true circumstances are stated above, p. 76, note 6.

² In Laird v Grindlay, see Bell's Ca. 296; and in L. Galloway v M'Hutcheon, see above, p. 76, note 6.

³ Monro v Miller's Crs., 11 Dec. 1811, 14 F. C. 384. Here the tack excluded assignees and subtenants, legal as well as voluntary. The tenant went to England, and before he went granted a mandate to the trustee for his creditors, a skilful farmer, 'empowering him, as manager for me, to enter to and possess the lands, etc., you, in the first place, paying regularly the rent, etc., and fulfilling the other obligations incumbent on me as tenant; and any overplus or profits arising from the said land, you are to apply in extinguishing the debts due by me; and for any balance that may be over, you are to be accountable to me.' The Court, in respect of the desertion of the farm, and that the factory in question seems to be of the nature of a covered assignation, decerned in the removing.

⁴ See the above case of Monro, note 3; also E. of Dalhousie v Wilson, 1802, M. 15311; Watson v Douglas, 13 Dec. 1811, 14 F. C. 412.

⁵ Copland v Gordon, 7 Dec. 1805. Here there was an exclusion of assignees, subtenants, and the diligence of creditors, with a covenant 'that this tack shall at once be irritated and made void by the statutory or actual bankruptcy of the tenant.' The irritancy was found to be incurred by sequestration, and decree of removing was pronounced.

In Forbes v Duncan, the clause was in these words: 'It is further agreed, that the notour bankruptcy of the tenant shall be an ipso facto voidance of the tack.' A sequestration was awarded of the tenant's estate, and the Court held that decisive on the precedent of Gordon's case; and the sheriff having decerned in the removing, the Court refused to advocate. 2 June 1812, 14 F. C. 662.

It was in England held doubtful whether a stipulation

[82] But where the irritancy is stipulated on mere insolvency, the effect of it is rendered doubtful by the ambiguity of the condition. Nothing less than a proof of clear and undoubted insolvency in a declaratory action would suffice.¹

RETENTION FOR MELIORATIONS.—Where, in consequence of the tenant's bankruptcy, and a clause of exclusion or of forfeiture, the lease is forfeited, the creditors seem to be entitled to claim from the landlord the value of meliorations which may have been made in contemplation of possessing during the whole term, but which the tenant's misfortunes have now thrown into the landlord's hands.²

Where a lease is granted to a company, with an exclusion of subtenants and assignees, the bankruptcy of the company puts an end to the lease.³

POWER TO NAME AN HEIR.—Similar to the effect of an entail, is that prohibition which the clause excluding assignees and subtenants in a lease produces in the event of the tenant's death. It has been found that the effect of this clause is to prevent the tenant from naming an heir to himself without the consent of the landlord.⁴ It may be questioned whether the heir, who succeeds to the lease under such a clause, does not take it without incurring any passive title further than as he can be shown to have taken up a subject, which, as properly belonging to the predecessor, his creditors could attach. The stocking of the farm is, indeed, the fund of the creditors; so are all arrears due by subtenants; but with regard to future and accruing profits, have the creditors right to them—their debtor's right having expired with his life, like that of an heir of entail?⁵

[By the statute 20 and 21 Vict. c. 26, provision is made for recording in the Register could be effectual for the landlord's re-entry on the tenant's committing an act of bankruptcy on which a commission should issue. Philpot v Hoare, Ambler 480. But it seems now to be settled that such condition is available, as consistent both with law and with sound policy. Roe v Galliers, 2 Term. Rep. 133. It does not seem effectual, however, to stipulate in a lease for a term of years absolute that it shall not be seized under a commission. See d. p. Buller, J., loc. cit.

¹ Hog v Morton, 1825, 3 S. 617. [See Moncreiff v Hay, 1842, 5 D. 249; Young v Gerrard, 1846, 6 D. 347. See Stewart v Rutherford, 1863, 35 Jur. 307, where effect was given to a stipulation in a lease, that in case of personal misconduct by the tenant, of which the landlord should be the sole judge, he should be entitled to cancel the lease.]

² Morton v Lady Montgomery, 1822, 1 S. 383.

³ Campbell of Shawfield v The Calder Iron Co., 11 Dec. 1805. Campbell of Shawfield and 'David Muschet of the Calder Ironwork, for himself and partners,' entered into a lease, by which Shawfield 'let to David Muschet and his heirs, secluding assignees, legal or voluntary, and all subtenants, except with the proprietor's consent,' certain veins of iron-ore, etc. The Calder Iron Company, for whose behoof this lease was professedly granted, became bankrupt; and a new company having bought their works, Muschet became bound to supply them with ironstone from the veins contained in the lease. Security was offered for the rent. But Shawfield brought an action for declaring that Muschet, and the said Calder Iron Company, 'of which he was a partner, and for whom he took the lease,' had failed 'to implement the conditions;' and that therefore 'he, for himself and his said partners,' had forfeited the lease, and that the tack was extinct. The Court held the lease to be at an end by the bankruptcy of the company, and the necessity of their assigning to another, in order to take further benefit from it, which the lease expressly prohibits. Lord Armadale delivered a very clear opinion, that this was a lease to the Calder Iron Company, existing and carrying on business: that this company being now dissolved, by bankruptcy and the sale of the works, there was no longer a tenant; the lease was assigned: that this would have held in an agricultural farm, but that in a mining concern it was of still more importance who should manage the mines. Lord Meadowbank had some difficulty, as Shawfield could have held Muschet bound to the end of the lease; and it is not easy to find one bound and the other free. But he thought the opinion delivered extremely strong, and felt relieved from further anxiety by Muschet having gone to England and abandoned the lease. Lord President Campbell said the lease was inaccurate: in the preamble, an agreement with Muschet, for the use of the company, though in the dispositive clause, to him and his heirs. But the whole object of the lease made it a company concern, and the company possessed, and were really the tenants. The company, however, was now gone by bankruptcy and sequestration, and by the benefit being made over to another company. A general question has been raised as to the effect of a tenant's bankruptcy; but, without entering into that in the case of an individual, here the company, the tenant, is gone.

⁴ L. Minto v Dewar, 20 Nov. 1798; Col. Cunningham v Grieve, 1803, 1805, and 1806, M. 15298. See also Loudon v Adam, 1805, M. App. Tack, No. 10. [And it would seem that the landlord's interest is sufficient to protect the right of an heir-substitute in a lease against defeasance by act of the institute. Macalister v Macalister, 1859, 21 D. 560.]

⁵ It was contended in a case, Campbell of Melford v Gallanach, 11 July 1806, that the heir of a tenant under such a clause, being a substitute, was not liable as representing his ancestor. Lord Newton, in the Bill Chamber, refused his sanction to this plea. A petition was presented to the Court, but refused on a point of form, the Court regretting that the merits of the question could not be tried.

of Sasines leases granted for a period of thirty-one years and upwards, and not exceeding fifty acres (except mines and minerals), for the transmission thereof by succession, and for transference either by simple assignation, or by assignation in security or adjudication, or to a trustee under the Bankruptcy Act.

Probative leases, whether executed before or after the passing of the Act, of thirty-one or more years' duration, of heritable subjects, may be recorded in the Register of Sasines (sec. 1); and assignations either simple or in security, writs of acknowledgment as heir or general disponent, notarial instruments, discharges and renunciations, may also be recorded in the proper registers in which the leases themselves are recorded. Leases containing an obligation upon the granter to renew the same from time to time at fixed periods, or upon the termination of a life or lives, or otherwise, are to be registrable, provided they are to be renewable, so as to endure for thirty-one years or upwards (sec. 17). No lease executed after the passing of the Act, unless where the same shall have been executed in terms of an obligation to renew as above mentioned, and of date prior to the Act, shall be registrable where the name of the lands whereof the ground thereby let consists or forms a part, and the extent thereof, shall not be set forth, or where the ground let shall not be described by boundaries in the lease, and whereof the extent shall exceed fifty acres (sec. 18).

On being presented for registration, the writs are to be forthwith shortly entered in the Minute Book, and fully copied into the register, and redelivered to the parties with certificates, as in the case of recorded sasines. Leases under the Act, and binding as in a question with the granters, which shall have been recorded at or subsequent to the date of entry under them, are by virtue of such registration to be effectual against any singular successor whose infestment is posterior in date to the date of such registration (sec. 15). And the registration of all such leases and other writs is to complete the right under the same respectively, to the effect of establishing a preference as effectually as if the grantee or party in his right had entered into the actual possession of the subjects leased under such writs respectively at the date of the registration (sec. 16). And the same are in competition to be preferable according to their dates of recording (sec. 12). Reference is made to the statute in relation to the provisions respecting the transmission of registered leases by assignation and succession.]

CHAPTER III.

OF SUCCESSION IN HERITAGE AS AFFECTING THE INTERESTS OF CREDITORS.

By the law of Scotland, the right of creditors is not limited to the estate in possession [83] of their debtor. The creditors of an heir are entitled to adopt and prosecute their debtor's right of succession to the estate of his deceased ancestor; while the creditors of a deceased proprietor of land are entitled, after the death of their debtor, not only to follow his estate and attach it for their payment, but to hold the heir who takes the benefit of it as personally undertaking his ancestor's debts.

The former of these rights is accompanied with the adoption of all the privileges which the heir himself is entitled to exercise. The latter, in so far as it infers personal liability, suffers, in certain circumstances, a limitation to the precise amount of the ancestor's estate.

The discussion of these important rights will form the subject of this and of the next chapter. In this chapter will be considered: 1. The right of the heir's creditors, generally, to adopt and enforce his claim of succession ; 2. Their right to exercise the heir's privilege of challenging the ancestor's deeds made on deathbed to the heir's prejudice ; 3. Their right to exercise their debtor's other privileges as heir.

SECTION I.

OF THE RIGHT TO ADJUDGE THE ANCESTOR'S ESTATE FOR DEBTS OF THE HEIR.

The title of the heir to the feudal property of his ancestor is completed by sasine. But the heir must make his way to this final completion of his title, and establish his right to demand sasine, either by the verdict of a jury in a service, or by persuading the superior to recognise his right voluntarily in a precept of clare constat.

The title to heritable property not requiring infeftment is completed by service alone.

The estate thus vested in the heir, comprehending all the heritable property which can descend by the law of succession, is equally liable to the debts of the heir as if it were his own original estate ; with this difference, that during a certain time there is a preference given to the creditors of the ancestor over those of the heir.¹

But it is not entirely in the discretion of the heir to take up the succession, or to abstain from it, to the effect of disappointing his creditors. They have a right of themselves to adopt and enforce his claim of succession, even against his will ; to adjudge the estates as his, and to bring them to a sale for the payment of his debts. This right is established by a statute passed in the seventeenth century, on which, in considering the law of adjudication, a full commentary shall afterwards be given. In the meanwhile, it may be sufficient here to state the general policy of this Act, that is to complete the system of remedies in relation to succession ; introduced first with regard to the ancestor's creditors ; then extended to those of the heir ; and opening to creditors in both those situations access to the estate of the deceased. By 1540, c. 106, the creditors of the ancestor had access to his estate in the person of the heir ; by 1621, c. 27, the heir's creditors are declared to have [84] a similar right to attach the succession which falls to him : and the form of proceeding introduced by the former statute, for the benefit of the ancestor's creditors, is new-modelled, so as to suit this new occasion.

SECTION II.

OF THE RIGHT OF CREDITORS TO ADOPT THE HEIR'S CHALLENGE OF DEEDS ON DEATHBED. COMMENTARY ON THE LAW OF DEATHBED.

The right of creditors is not limited to the attachment of estates to which the heir's title is open. They have also a right to avail themselves of estates which have been alienated to his prejudice while his ancestor was on deathbed. And on this subject it may be proper to explain, first, the general doctrine of the law of deathbed ; and afterwards, the exercise of the right of challenge by creditors.

By the law of Scotland, the imbecility of a mortal disease is held so far to incapacitate a person from conveying, burdening, or disposing of his land-estate, and generally his property descendible to his heir, as to entitle the heir to challenge, and have such deeds declared null, if prejudicial to his interests. This is called the Law of Deathbed. The rule is well laid down in Regiam Majestatem, which, although not a genuine record of the law of

¹ This is established by statute 1661, c. 24, on which see a full commentary in Book IV.

Scotland, does contain some of the old rules of our jurisprudence, mingled with those of England; and among others, this has every appearance of being a text of Scottish law: 'Where a man in deadly sickness maketh an alienation, which in health he did not think of, the same is presumed to be done through trouble of mind, and not deliberately nor by good advice.'¹

This law has a double object: First, to protect the interests of the heir-at-law from the devices to which they may be exposed in the imbecility of the last illness of his dying ancestor; and secondly, to guard, by the operation of a general rule, the last stages of mortal suffering and weakness from the importunity of self-interested attendants. This last fear was chiefly excited, perhaps, by the prevailing arts of the clergy of the Romish Church, who, with all the opportunities of auricular confession and all the influence of superstition in their hands, held constantly in view the advancement of their order, and especially the aggrandizement of the Church, by the possession of territorial property. But this law also contemplated the dangers to which the heir and the ancestor were exposed from other sources more domestic, and which in our days are chiefly to be dreaded.²

It is a fault, not unfrequent among theoretical lawyers, to reduce every doctrine to a [85] single principle, as more simple, and more according to the law of nature; and in this spirit a contest has been maintained, in respect to the policy of the law of deathbed, whether it is referable to the interests of the heir or to the tranquillity of the dying ancestor. Lord Kaimes, on several occasions,³ has laboured to establish the interest of the heir as the sole object of the law; while our old lawyers seem rather to look to the tranquillity of the dying man as the purpose chiefly contemplated. But in practical jurisprudence, which has to deal with the mingled business of human life, any attempt to restrain the rules of law to the operation of too simple and uniform a principle is dangerous. In the present matter, both the principles which have been mentioned combine; and whatever may be thought of the expediency of the law,—whether, for the purpose of protecting against a possible danger, an unbending presumption ought to be established of evil design and importunity; or whether it were not better to leave every man to encounter the risks which nature has planted around him, trusting to the vigilance of the heir to detect and expose frauds,—it is impossible to deny that this provision of our jurisprudence, though lauded by our own lawyers and by others, is far from being perfect as a protection to the heir, but, on the contrary, is exposed to palpable evasions; while as a safeguard to the dying man it is perhaps still less effectual,

¹ Licet autem generaliter cuilibet liceat de terra sua rationabilem partem pro voluntate sua cuicunque voluerit in vita sua donare, in extremis tamen agenti hoc nulli hactenus est permissum. Unde præsumitur quod si quis in infirmitate positur quasi admortem terram suam distribuere cæperit quod in sanitate facere noluit hoc potius ex fervore animi quam ex mentis deliberatione eveniret. 2 Reg. Maj. c. 18, secs. 7 and 9.

² Lord Stair says: 'The main reason of this law hath been for the quiet and security of dying persons, against the importunity of husbands, wives, children, or other relations; and especially against the importunity of the Romish priests, who pretended a far greater interest and duty of mortification to pious uses than of leaving to heirs, not only as meritorious to expiate the sins of the donors' lives, especially of the more vicious persons, but also for obtaining constant prayers and supplications for delivering their souls out of purgatory. And therefore this is a most convenient and just law, when men, through any indisposition, continue in or about their houses, and are not seen to indifferent and unsuspect witnesses, that thereby they may be free from all importunity, seeing they can do no more but dispose of their share of their moveables, which is rarely of considerable value, moveable debts being deduced.' Stair iv. 20. 38.

VOL. I.

Dirleton, after likening a dying person to the carcase about which the eagles hover, says: 'Ex eo tempore igitur, quo æger sese domi abdidit, nec amplius in propatulo, foro, aut ecclesia sui copiam facit; licet ex morbo non decumbat, lento fortasse, eoque magis periculoso, dicitur, esse lecto ægritudinis et in extremis agere; et alienatione terrarum, aut rei alicujus hæreditariæ ei prorsus interdicatur.' Dirleton, voce Legitima Liberorum.

Of this consuetudinary law Lord Chancellor Eldon, in the House of Lords, said: 'It was held out that this was a personal privilege in favour of the heir-at-law—a regulation for his benefit alone. But in my opinion, this comes far short of the excellence of the regulation: it is also highly favourable to the dying man, that his last moments shall not be disquieted. It was perhaps at first intended to put a stop to the granting of legacies to the Church and to charities, which prevailed so much in those days. It now prevents the mischiefs that might arise from deeds obtained by besieging a person when near his death.'

³ L. Forbes' Daughters v L. Forbes, 1755, M. 3277.

more particularly in our days, when the whole power over the moveable succession, generally much more valuable, is open to such importunity.

In commenting on this law, it is fit to consider,—

1. The state or condition which the law holds to be Deathbed ;
2. The deeds which are challengeable ;
3. The various attempts to evade the law of deathbed ; and,
4. The exercise of the right of challenge on the part of creditors.

SUBSECTION I.—LEGAL CHARACTER OF DEATHBED.

While a person is in his ordinary state of health and capacity, and not a minor, nor cognosed as an idiot or madman, nor under interdiction, he is said to be in 'legitima potestate,' or in 'liege poustie,' and has the full and uncontrolled power of disposal of his property. The restraint on this power begins with the commencement of his mortal disease. From that moment law presumes him to be unable to resist importunity ; and on that account imposes restraints on the exercise of his disposing power,—raising a presumption that anything which he then does to the prejudice of his heir is the result of importunity alone. But this presumption is not absolute. There are two several counter-proofs, or indications of the existence of a strength sufficient for resistance, to which the rule yields. 1. By a statute of 1696, c. 4, the survivance of the granter during the space of sixty days 'is a sufficient exception to exclude the reason of deathbed ;' and, 2. At common law, if the granter [86] have, after the date of the deed, been at kirk or market unsupported, he is deemed vigorous enough to dispense with the protection of the law—he is held as still in liege poustie.

In establishing the challenge, the first point of inquiry relates to the nature and power of the disease. And although it is a question fit for the decision of a jury, whether the granter was, at the date of the deed, ill of the disease of which he died, yet there are some points of law here for the Court.

I.—NATURE OF THE DISEASE.

1. It is not enough to support the challenge, that the granter of the deed has not survived for sixty days ; he must have been actually sick of his last illness at the date of the deed.¹

2. Although labouring under sickness at the time of making the deed, this will not be held his mortal disease, if the granter should perish by an accident ; as a fall from his horse, shipwreck, apoplexy, etc.

3. Analogous to this is the case of death occasioned by a distinctly different disease from that with which the granter was afflicted at the date of the deed. Wherever the new disease is so clearly unconnected with the original complaint, that it can be regarded in the light of a supervening accident, it will not be sufficient to make out deathbed.² So a person ill of a disease of the prostate gland at the date of the deed challenged, having afterwards died in consequence of a severe bilious attack from irregularity, was held not to have been on deathbed when he made that deed.³

4. It may happen, however, that death was occasioned by a disease different from the original ailment, and yet there may be such a connection that it shall be held a continuance of the same illness from first to last. There are known to physicians many translatable or convertible diseases, which are apt to induce each other, or which may almost be considered as different stages of the same disease, though distinguished in Nosology by different characters

¹ [Cogan v Lyon, 1834, 12 S. 569.]

² [Thomson v Thomson, 1801, Hume 142. Spiers v Mackie, 1802, Hume 144. Lillie v Lillie, 1812, Hume 153. Gray v

Gray's Trs., 1813, Hume 144. Mackay v Davidson, 1828, 6 S. 367 ; 25 March 1831, 5 W. and S. 210.]

³ Paterson's Trs. v Johnston, in Jury Court, 1816, 1 Murray 71.

and symptoms. But without entering into any inquiry of this sort (which is fit matter of evidence by physicians), it is sufficient to say, that where the diseases are convertible, or found in close connection and relation with each other, or where the last disease is an ordinary consequence of the first, it will be sufficient to make out a case of deathbed.¹

5. It is not necessary that the disease of which the granter is ill shall be of a kind which physicians call mortal; nor is it even essential (notwithstanding the name of deathbed)² that it should be so severe an illness as to confine the patient to his bed, or to his chamber,³ or to interrupt business, sometimes called morbus santicus.⁴ It is sufficient that the person is in a state of manifestly disordered health, sickness, or decay; which, although not marked perhaps by any nosological character, is still distinguishable as an indisposition or illness continuing till death.⁵ Nor is it indispensable that the disease shall be of a medical [87] character: a surgical disease or accident will be sufficient, if death follow.⁶

6. Although it be not essential that the disease should occasion confinement, yet confinement, contrary to the granter's usual habit, is a strong circumstance in proof of the existence of illness; and the policy of the law confirms this, in so far as the state of a person who is withdrawn from observation cannot be discovered or easily proved.⁷

7. Sickness proved at the date of the deed, followed by death within sixty days, gives the presumption of continued illness.⁸ This question was formerly decided by the Court, and will be found stated either in the older decisions, in judgments on the relevancy, or in later reports in decisions on the proof. The question is now for a jury, under such directions in point of law as the Court may give.

II.—COUNTER PRESUMPTIONS, AND EVIDENCE OF LIEGE POUSTIE.

But supposing the disease to be established, and that the granter was under its influence at the date of the deed, and that it proved in the end mortal, what is evidence to remove the presumption?

There are, as already stated, certain counter indications of firmness and strength of mind admitted by law as counteracting the presumption that the granter yielded to importunity: 1. Survivance during sixty days; and, 2. Going to kirk or market unsupported.

I. COMMENTARY ON THE STATUTE 1696, c. 4.—The presumption established by statute as a counterbalance to that of deathbed, arises on the granter of the deed surviving the execution of the deed for the space of sixty days. This was introduced for the purpose of correcting the evil of the old law, by which, if the granter was ill of his mortal disease at granting the deed, and had not afterwards been at kirk or market, he was held to be on deathbed whatever might be the distance of time, unless it could be proved that he had recovered. The difficulty of such proof, and the inconclusiveness of the presumption of imbecility during so long a time, led the Legislature to give their sanction to the opposite presumption of strength and vigour sufficient, if the granter of a deed should outlive the space of sixty days subsequent to the execution of the deed.⁹ On a preamble that 'many

¹ See Hiddleston v Goldie, in Jury Court, 1819, 2 Murray 115, 120. [Weir v Knox, 1791, Hume 135; Brock, 1813, Hume 137; Black v Brown, 1816, Hume 154.]

² Shaw v Gray, 1624, M. 3208. See Stair iii. 4. 28.

³ Robertson v Fleming, 1622, M. 3290; Shaw v Gray, 1624, M. 3208; Black v Black, 1787, M. 3202.

⁴ Morbus santicus, properly speaking, is an illness so severe as to furnish a just excuse from the performance of duty or transacting of business; more strictly it is applied to incapacitating diseases. See Kaimes' conclusion in Laird v Kirkwood, 1763, M. 3315.

⁵ Primrose v Primrose, 1756, M. 3300. Old age, decay of constitution, gouty indisposition, held deathbed. Robertson v M'Caig, 1823, 2 S. 544, N. E. 474. Old age, no other complaint but a stuffing and cough, held not to be deathbed. [Tomison v Tomison, 1839, 2 D. 239.]

⁶ Dun v Duns, 1668, M. 3291; a case of a broken leg, afterwards amputated. Scotston v Drummond, 1694, M. 3297; a case of running sore in the leg, occasioned by accident.

⁷ Stair iii. 4. 28. See Dirleton, as quoted above, p. 81, note 2.

⁸ Stair iii. 4. 28; Ersk. iii. 8. 96.

⁹ The case which immediately preceded the Act, and out of which it seems to have arisen, was Gordon v Gordon, 1696, M.

questions had arisen concerning deeds done upon deathbed,' it was, by statute 1696, c. 4, enacted for clearing thereof: 'That it shall be a sufficient exception to exclude the reason of deathbed as to all bonds, etc., made and granted by any person after the contracting of sickness, that the person live for the space of threescore days after the making and granting of the deed; albeit during that time they did not go to kirk and market. But prejudice always; as of before, to quarrel and reduce the said rights and deeds, if it shall be alleged and proven that the person was so affected by the sickness the time of the doing the said [88] deeds, that he was not of sound judgment and understanding.'

The presumption of convalescence, or at least strength sufficient to resist importunity, is established by the mere elapse of time. The rule of computation of the term is of the greatest importance under this Act; and after full consideration it was finally settled, in a case where the deed was made at eight o'clock on 22d February, and the granter died on 22d April between ten and eleven in the evening, that the deed was ineffectual, as having been executed on deathbed. The ground of decision was thus expressed in the House of Lords: 'That the terminus a quo mentioned in the Act respecting deathbed is descriptive of a point of time (viz. the day or date of the deed) which is indivisible; and sixty days after is descriptive of another and subsequent period, which begins when the first is completed. The day of making the deed must therefore be excluded; and so the maker lived only fifty-nine days of the period required. Had he seen the morning of the subsequent day, the rule of law would have applied, Dies inceptus pro completo habetur, which makes it necessary ['unnecessary,' 3 Pat. 442] to reckon by hours.'¹

The date of the deed must be legitimately proved; and, 1. Holograph deeds do not, unless subscribed before witnesses, with a testing clause bearing the date, prove their own date. 2. If a false date be given to the deed to defeat the law of deathbed, it cannot competently be rectified by parole evidence.²

II. KIRK OR MARKET; COMMENTARY ON ACT OF SEDERUNT 29TH FEBRUARY 1652.—Although the granter of a deed should be sick at its date, and should die within sixty days, yet he is held to have been in vigour of mind sufficient to entitle him to make an unchallengeable settlement, if at the time of making it he was able to go about his ordinary duties at kirk or market. There are other proofs of capacity and strength of mind as good perhaps in many respects; but this has been adopted by the law as best answering its purpose, as a protection to a man after he has retired to his own house out of the observation of the world. And so appointed, it is required with absolute strictness; not left to discretionary decision on equivalents.

The law, then, holds the presumption of inability and importunity sufficiently refuted, if after the date of the deed the granter have made his appearance at kirk or market unsupported.

1. It is not necessary that he be seen both at kirk and at market: one is sufficient.³

2. The purpose of requiring the granter's presence on occasions so public, is, that his true condition may be open to the observation of impartial witnesses, instead of being confined to a few persons selected to favour the deceit. The rule on this matter has been declared in an Act of Sederunt of 29th February 1692, which has ever since been recognised as law.⁴

3299, where the Lords 'thought it hard to fix a deathbed so far back (as three years), and that it ought not to exceed a year.' 1 Fount. 720. In the hands of the Legislature this was reduced to the better term of two months.

¹ Contrast these cases: Sir John Ogilvie v Mercer, 1793, M. 3336, H. L. 1 Dec. 1796, 3 Pat. 434, where the death was on the 59th day; and Mitchel v Watson, 1801, M. App. Deathbed, No. 4, where the deed was dated 23d May at two o'clock: the granter died at one o'clock of the 22d July, the 60th day.

² Merry v Howie, 1801, M. App. Writ, No. 3; aff. in H. L. 5 Pat. 101. [See Gibson v Kennedy, 1813, Hume 150.]

³ Crs. of Balmerino v Lady Couper, 1671, M. 3305, 3292; Ragg v Forbes, 1725, M. 3314.

⁴ The Lords of Council and Session, taking to their serious consideration that the excellent law of deathbed, securing men's inheritances from being alienate at that time, may happen to 'be frustrate and evacuate, if their coming to church or mercate be not done in such a solemn manner as may give some evidence of their convalescence without sup-

In commenting on the declaration of the law as contained in this Act of Sederunt, [89] the preamble first deserves attention. It is there taken for granted that the object of requiring appearance at kirk or in market is to show 'convalescence.' The whole preamble is loosely and vaguely expressed; and this word in particular is too indiscriminately used, seeming to require in all cases that the person shall have recovered from his illness. The true principle of the presumption of deathbed is, that the disease is attended with such a degree of weakness as to expose the granter to importunity. It is against this that the law is intended to be a shield, both to the ancestor and to the heir. In refuting the presumption, there is room for a distinction of cases. If the disease be strictly morbis santicus, such a disease as is accompanied with incapacity (as acute fevers, phrenitis, etc.), there must be convalescence proved publicly; but if the illness be not of that description, then strength and vigour sufficient to carry the party to kirk or market unsupported form the only necessary points of evidence.¹

It is required that the granter shall appear 'without supportation or straining of nature.' The degree of support is a question for a jury, not of law for the Court; and little can be laid down in point of law to regulate such decisions.² It may, however, be observed, that there is a distinction to be kept in view, in all such questions, between the case of a man who is found freely and frequently going about his ordinary duties at kirk and market, and one who makes his appearance there on one particular occasion for the mere purpose of supporting his deed. It cannot be said that this last exhibition is necessarily a fraud, or that it is to be rejected as incompetent evidence of liege poustie. But at least the party will be required to exhibit himself in circumstances much less questionable than where his appearance at market is in the natural course of his occupations, or at church in his regular and accustomed way. In the latter case it will not invalidate the evidence that he receives occasional aid, while in the other case the same assistance may be sufficient to overturn the presumption intended to be raised of liege poustie. The rule is, that the granter shall be seen in the same condition, in so far as regards aid from others, as while in good health: and the rule in this respect is tightened or relaxed, as the act of going to kirk or market [90] is done in the ordinary course of business, or for the mere purpose of giving effect to the deed.³

portation or straining of nature: And seeing some may think it sufficient if parties, after subscribing such dispositions, come to the church at any time and make a turn or two therein, though there were no congregation at the time: And likewise, if they make any merchandise privily in a shop or crame, or come to the mercate-place when there is no publick mercate; and all this performed before their own pickt out witnesses, brought along by the party in whose favour the disposition is made, that the state and condition of his health or sickness may be as little under the view and consideration of other indifferent persons as can be: the occasion of which mistake might have been, that formerly there were public prayers, morning and evening, in the church in many places, to which those who apprehended any controversie might arise upon the validity of their dispositions were accustomed to come at the time of prayer; and some thought they might come to the church though there were no publick meeting thereat, since these publick prayers were not accustomed, and to take instruments of their appearing there: For remede whereof the Lords declare, they will not sustain any such parties going to church and mercate, where it is proven that he was sick before his subscribing of the disposition quarrelled as done in lecto, unless it be performed in the day-time, and when people are gathered together in the church or church-yard for any publick meeting, civill or ecclesiastick; or when people are gathered together in the mercate-place for publick mercate: And further declare, whensoever instruments are taken for the end foresaid, that the said instrument do expressly bear, that it was taken in the audience and view of the people gathered together as aforesaid, otherways the Lords will have no regard to the said instrument.'

See Lord Fountainhall's commentary on this Act in his note to the case of Crawford v Brichen, 1711.

¹ Crawford v Brichen, 1711, M. 3312; Laird v Kirkwood, 1763, M. 3315. Faichney v Faichney, 1776, M. 3316, has been reported as finding presence at kirk or market to be proof of convalescence. The true point of the case I take to have been, the want of that fair and unaided presence at kirk and market which gives proof of vigour to resist importunity. And accordingly this is the view of it given by Mr. Tait, 5 Br. Sup. 422.

² In illustration of such cases, a series of decisions from 1629 to 1787, collected in Morrison's Dictionary, pp. 3303 to 3318, will be found useful. See also Young v Scotts, 1777, 5 Br. Sup. 423. [Angus v Angus, 1793, Hume 137; Harvie v Reston, 1799, Hume 139; Smyth, 1812, Hume 148; Cowan v Cowan, 1817, Hume 142; Ormiston v Greig, 1821, 1 S. 14, note.]

³ See Stair iii. 4. 28. See Balmerino's case, supra, p. 84, note 3. Ersk. iii. 8. 96.

The Act of Sederunt requires that the appearance shall be public—in church or at market, while the people are assembled; and any instrument taken on the occasion (and so any proof offered) must show the act to have been done, and the appearance made, in ‘the audience and view of the people gathered together.’ Under this head, 1. It is requisite that the granter shall not only make his appearance, but in such a way as not to betray symptoms of weakness and support. So, if he appear in church for the purpose of attending worship, he must not enter when the service is half over, and leave the church before the end of it;¹ or if he go to market, he must not, in attempting to prove his independence, betray his weakness in being compelled to take the aid of those who attend him, in making any ordinary bargain. But, 2. He is not required either to attend during the service of the church, or to make bargains in the market. It is sufficient if he show himself at either place while there is a public resort of indifferent persons. So, a person walking through the market-place while market was held, to the house of one with whom he was to dine, was sufficient.² 3. What shall be held a market is matter of law for the Court, not otherwise for the jury than on the direction of the judge, and so subject to review on bill of exception or new trial. The Cross of Edinburgh was held to be a market-place;³ and appearance in the market-place of Dumfries was held sufficient, though not on the market-days appointed by statute.⁴ So, transacting business in the Commercial Bank of Aberdeen in Castle Street, where the regular market is held, and where there are daily stalls of vegetables, fruits, etc., for sale, and buying in two shops in the view and vicinity of the market-place, and walking through the market-place, were held sufficient, though not on the regular market-days.⁵ But whether other places of public assembly and resort are to be regarded as market, within the construction of the rule, does not seem to be conclusively settled. In an early case it seems to have been held that the going to an election meeting at Inverkeithing was equivalent to market.⁶ In another, a horse-race, where there was a conflux of people, but no regular market, was sustained.⁷ But in a recent case, a general county meeting, and a meeting of trustees of the roads of the county, were not held equivalent to market.⁸

III.—WHETHER EQUIVALENTS ARE ADMISSIBLE TO PROVE LIEGE POUSTIE.

It is an important question whether, although a person has not been at kirk or market, and has died within the sixty days, it is nevertheless sufficient to overturn the presumption of deathbed, that he has with vigour and ability gone about his ordinary business, in other resorts of public affairs. It will here be recollected, that while presence at kirk or market is not required by legislative enactment, but by a rule only of common law, in which a Court is to look rather to the principle and policy of the rule than to limit themselves to the strict [91] and literal construction of the words of it, as delivered in the books, or declared in the Act of Sederunt; yet it is also to be considered, that when a certain criterion has been sanctioned (though only by usage), and firmly fixed in the practice and understanding of the country, and where it is one with which it is easy to comply if the party be within the reach of the rule, it may be dangerous to relax it, so as to leave the matter on the uncertain footing of an arbitrary judgment to be formed concerning a man's state of health and mental vigour. The inclination of the law has been to give effect to these latter considerations, and adhere to the rule as rigidly as if it were a legislative enactment. Although, therefore, where a man is found going about his ordinary business, wrangling, and making

¹ See Faichney v Faichney, 1776, above, p. 85, note 1.

² Tailzeour v Tailzeour, 1787, M. 3317.

³ E. of Rosebery v Primrose, 1736, Elchies, Deathbed, No. 8, and notes, p. 115; M. 3322.

⁴ M'Cracken v Pearson, in Jury Court, 2 Murray 551.

⁵ Rait v Rait, 27 Nov. 1818, F. C.

⁶ Lady Scotston v Drummond, 1694, M. 3322.

⁷ Laird v Kirkwood, 1763, M. 3315.

⁸ Maitland v Maitland, 16 May 1815, 18 F. C. 253.

bargains in his own house or in shops, settling accounts, or writing out his settlement, sitting at table with strangers, doing the honours of his house, and accompanying his guests to their horses, going about freely, riding, walking, dancing, and whistling, walking on the streets of a town amid promiscuous population, or going to public meetings of a county, or of road trustees,¹ these may well be regarded as more clearly indicative of vigour of body and strength of mind, than the mere appearance in a market or at church; yet, in various cases, such indications have been rejected, the Court refusing to sustain equivalents instead of the settled criterion of kirk and market.² Unless, therefore, the defender can make out the place in which the granter exhibited himself, or did the act relied on, to be a church or a public market, in the construction already put on it in the cases above cited, he will not succeed in establishing his exception.

IV.—REFUTATION OF THE PRESUMPTION ARISING FROM PRESENCE AT KIRK OR MARKET.

The proof arising from presence at kirk or market unsupported, and without betraying the weakness and prevalence of his disease, is held decisive of the strength by law required for resisting importunity. It will overturn this conclusion, however, if it should be proved that the granter of the deed was, at the very moment, under the influence of his disease to such a degree, as to evince rather a design fraudem facere legi in his attempt to appear publicly, than the vigour of a man in sufficient health to be the protector of himself and of the just rights of his heir. Although, therefore, it will not be sufficient to prove that the disease was on him, or never abated, if it be not morbis santicus;³ yet if plain symptoms of a disease of this description should appear (as in Stair and Fountainhall's example of a man in the paroxysm of a fever running to market⁴), or if the weakness and depression of an ordinary illness should appear to exhaust the patient in this attempt, the deed will be reduced.⁵

SUBSECTION II.—DEEDS LIABLE TO CHALLENGE ON DEATHBED.

The general rule is, that no deed granted or act done spontaneously on deathbed, to the prejudice of the heir, directly or indirectly, will be sustained as effectual, if challenged by the heir, or by those in his right.

I.—DEEDS DIRECTLY PREJUDICIAL TO THE HEIR.

Deeds spontaneous, which directly alienate, or invade, or diminish, or burden the [92] estate descendible to the heir, whether affecting lands and houses, debt heritably secured, bonds excluding executors, heirship moveables, conquest provided to the heir, or any other inheritance descendible to him as heir, are reducible on deathbed.

Those deeds may be classed as deeds of Alienation, of Settlement, or of Discharge.

I. DEEDS OF ALIENATION INTER VIVOS are reducible by the heir, if made on deathbed in the following circumstances:—

Where the alienation is gratuitous, that is to say, without full consideration or value given for the conveyance, it is challengeable on deathbed.⁶

The converse does not hold, that where the deed is for an onerous consideration it is safe from challenge. The distinction ought carefully to be marked between gratuitous and spontaneous. Although the deed be not gratuitous, yet, if spontaneous, the heir is entitled

¹ All these circumstances occur in the cases referred to.

² Lowrie v Drummond, 1671, M. 3319; Crs. of Balmerino v Couper, 1671, M. 3295; Mountainhall's Daughters, 1683, M. 5320; Maitland v Maitland, 16 May 1815, F. C.; supra, p. 86, note 8.

³ Ormiston v Greig, 17 May 1821, F. C.

⁴ Stair iii. 4. 28; 2 Fount. 683.

⁵ See 1 Fount. 356; Stair ii. 4. 28; Ersk. iii. 8. 96. [Kyle v Kyle, 1825, 3 S. 641, N. E. 449.]

⁶ Ersk. iii. 8. 97.

to be relieved from it, however full a consideration may have been given for it. But this is a doctrine which involves some very nice and difficult questions. And,

1. A SALE of land is not safe from challenge on deathbed.¹ But it may be observed, 1. That if the price be inadequate, redress will be given to the heir as in a transaction prejudicial to him, in which bona fides cannot be pleaded. The heir will be entitled to have his land again on repayment of the inadequate price. 2. That although the price be adequate, the heir may be prejudiced by the sale, in consequence of the dismembering of his estate, etc.; and he will have redress on restitution of the price.² 3. That considerable difficulties arise in respect to the terms on which the heir is entitled to his challenge. If he be required to make restitution of the price before he can be allowed to reduce, this must frequently operate as a bar in his way to relief; and Mr. Erskine lays down the rule so broadly as to imply that the heir would not be required to pay the price where it had been dissipated gratuitously to strangers.³ But there must be a distinction of cases here; and, first, if the ancestor has died with the price unpaid, a bond granted for it, or bills in his repositories, the heir will have his challenge on discharging the price, or cancelling the bond or bills; and he will be entitled to have them for this purpose. Secondly, if the purchaser himself be the person favoured to the heir's prejudice, the reduction will be competent to the full extent.⁴ Thirdly, if the purchaser have granted bond or bill to younger children, etc., to the heir's prejudice, he should be held as in mala fide in the transaction; but although a sale in such a case was held reducible, the reducer was ordained to pay to the defender the just sums for which the alienation was made and truly disbursed.⁵ Fourthly, in all cases where money has been actually paid to the deceased, a debt is created for which his heir is by representation liable, and therefore the heir cannot be heard to reduce (unless in a case of collusion and fraud), without, as the condition of his success, indemnifying the purchaser. He will have his remedy on deathbed against the executors who may have been favoured,⁶ or any one to whom the price has been paid on deathbed to his prejudice; but his first step to redress is indemnification to the third party.

2. The creation of BURDENS and SECURITIES are truly alienations, and are reducible if to the heir's prejudice; as for raising a fund to benefit the younger children or others. The following cases may be distinguished:—1. If the security be granted for a debt already subsisting, and for which the heir is liable, it cannot be challenged on deathbed; although the debt secured was at the date of the deathbed deed a proper debt of the executry, and although the debtor was not bound to grant any deed of security.⁷ The heir's remedy here must be directed against the executors for relief. 2. If a debt arising by legitimate and necessary furnishings to the ancestor be so secured, the security will be unchallengeable; the heir's relief being reserved against the executry.⁸ 3. If the money be borrowed while the borrower is on deathbed, and dissipated, or given in donation to younger children or strangers, still the security would seem to be effectual to the lender; but the heir, as before, would have redress against those who have been benefited.

3. ASSIGNATIONS of bonds, whether secured on land, or heritable by destination, as bonds excluding executors, are reducible on deathbed.⁹

¹ See case of Gilbert, 1608, M. 3290.

² Ersk. iii. 8. 97.

³ 'A sale of lands executed by the proprietor in lecto is subject to reduction, though the purchaser should have paid full value for it, if the heir be hurt either by the bargain itself, or by the ancestor's dissipating the price gratuitously to strangers.' Ersk. iii. 8. 97.

⁴ Lindsay v Lindsay, 2 Dec. 1819, Hume 156, where an estate was conveyed on deathbed for a price to a second son. The sale was reduced. See also Campbell v Rankin, 1805, M. App. Deathbed, No. 5; 5 Pat. 573.

⁵ Richardson and L. Cranston Riddel v Sinclair, 1635, M. 3210.

⁶ [Gillespie v Gillespie, 1802, Hume 145.]

⁷ Darling v Hay, 1709, M. 3222. The Court distinguished well between the right of an inhibiting creditor and that of the heir.

⁸ Shaw v Gray, 1624, M. 3208. This was a security for drugs and medical attendance. Pollock v Fairholm, 1632, M. 3209; for malt furnished. Stair ii. 4. 30; Ersk. iii. 8. 97.

⁹ M'Kay v Robertson, 1725, M. 3244; Murray v Borthwick's Trs., 1797, M. 3237.

4. LEASES are in this question, as alienations, challengeable on deathbed, where they exceed the ordinary term of duration;¹ but where granted in the fair and reasonable exercise of a landlord's administration, they are not held reducible.² Where a grassum is taken from the tenant on deathbed, it seems to be challengeable, in so far as the money so raised is given to executors to the heir's prejudice; but it is very doubtful whether against the tenant any challenge can be maintained, to the effect of compelling him, without restitution of the grassum, to pay the full rent.

5. A bargain of sale of timber has been sustained as an act of ordinary administration.³

6. A discharge for an heritable debt, paid up by the debtor in bona fide, is good.⁴

II. SETTLEMENTS AND DISPOSITIONS MORTIS CAUSA are the peculiar objects of this protecting law; and this is the class of deeds on which questions of deathbed most commonly arise. As in alienations inter vivos onerosity is no defence against deathbed, so in this class of deeds the greatest rationality and moral obligation will not sustain the settlement.⁵ It is requisite, for its support, that the granter shall be placed under an obligation effectual in law, and which the heir may be compelled to fulfil. Bonds of provision, therefore, [94] however rational, are reducible when granted on deathbed,⁶ unless they be fortified by a legal obligation effectual against the heir.⁷

III. DISCHARGES OF HERITABLE DEBTS OR SECURITIES on deathbed are challengeable if gratuitous. Even if the discharge have proceeded on payment of the debt, the heir has his remedy against the executor, or any person to whom the money had been given.⁸ The only difficulty is on the point of fair administration, where the debtor insists on paying up the debt; or when, on bankruptcy, a dividend is paid, etc. In such cases there would seem to be no reduction on deathbed. It is not then a spontaneous act.

II.—DEEDS INDIRECTLY PREJUDICIAL TO THE HEIR.

Such deeds are reducible, if not as against third parties, at least in so far as the deceased has favoured others gratuitously by the transaction.

1. A voluntary alteration of a subject, converting it from heritable to moveable, is liable to challenge.⁹

2. If a deed prejudicial to the heir be made in liege poustie, though not delivered so as to become effectual till the granter was on deathbed, it rather seems to be unchallengeable, as being the completion of a purpose settled in liege poustie.¹⁰

3. Moveable bonds, legacies, provisions, etc., in so far as they are claimed against the heir, or made the subject of diligence by adjudication or otherwise against the heritable estate, or even so far as they may reduce the fund for payment of moveable debts to the prejudice of the heir, are challengeable.¹¹

¹ Christison v Ker, 1733, M. 3226; Elchies, Deathbed, No.

2. This was a lease for three nineteen years. Bogle v Bogle, 1759, M. 3235. This was a lease for thirty-eight years.

³ Sample v Sample, 1 June 1813, F. C. Here a lease was subsisting, and thirteen years were to run. The deceased renewed the lease for nineteen years, at an increased rent. It was sustained with great difficulty, but the validity of a lease of ordinary endurance was unanimously taken for granted.

⁴ Maxwell v Corrie, 1724, M. 3329. Here the distinction was drawn between the act of administration and the destination of the price to executors.

⁵ Brown v Thomson, 1634, M. 3200; Stair iii. 4. 29.

⁶ [Fairholme v Fairholme's Trs., 1856, 19 D. 178; Jack v Jack, 1857, 19 D. 747.]

⁷ See this question fully discussed in Logan v Campbell, VOL. I.

1757, M. 3230; Leslie v Leslie, 1747, M. 3229; L. Cranston Riddel v Richardson, 1637, M. 3212; Sir James Foulis v Foulis, 1721, M. 3223.

⁸ Edmonstone v Edmonstone, 1706, M. 3219. [Foreman v Foreman's Trs., 1829, 7 S. 704.]

⁹ Gillespie v Marshall, 1802, Hume 145, where an heritable bond was sold, and the money laid out on a promissory note. Reduction sustained.

¹⁰ Ersk. iii. 8. 98.

¹¹ Shorswood's Children v Shorswood, 1669, 1 Br. Sup. 597, presented this question;—not decided. I find, in perusing the consultations of our older lawyers, some difference on this point; Pitfour holding deathbed not to apply, others that it does.

¹² See above, case of Shaw v Gray, supra, p. 88, note 8, M. M

4. The heir may be prejudiced indirectly by a purchase of lands made on deathbed, with a destination to one not the heir-at-law. The fund here employed, however, is not previously heritable; and the heir suffers only in so far as he might otherwise have collated. But as that right belongs to him only as executor, this seems a case in which deathbed could not be pleaded.

5. Where the deed is in fulfilment of an obligation, which, had it not been so implemented, the heir would have been responsible for, the heir will be barred. So, where there is a previous obligation or provision in a contract of marriage, or where the deed is a security for debt due, or in implement of a sale concluded by minutes in liege poustie,—in all these cases the heir's estate may be affected by adjudication, or adjudication in implement, leaving him only his claim of relief. And so his challenge on deathbed, as against third parties, will be debarred.¹ But if the previous contract or obligation be not complete and binding, it will not support the deathbed deed.²

SUBSECTION III.—MEANS TAKEN FOR EVADING THE LAW OF DEATHBED.

[95] When it is recollected how unjust the restraint must often prove which the protecting genius of the law would extend over every person on deathbed, however secure against the assaults of importunity or selfishness, and how inconvenient and inexpedient the operation of such a rule must be in the case of foreigners having money secured in Scotland, it will not seem unnatural that various devices should have been attempted for evading the law. But those evasions have seldom proved successful. The policy of the law, as a protection not to the heir only, but also to the dying man, has prevailed over and baffled most of the attempts made to defeat it. And,

1. A power granted in a Crown charter to dispoise or contract debt on deathbed seems at one time to have been thought effectual to defeat deathbed; but it was held by Dirleton and other great lawyers of his day to be unavailing.³

2. Reservation of power to convey or burden in a settlement has been held ineffectual to bar the challenge where the conveyance is to the heir, and the power is not expressly reserved to be exercised etiam in articulo mortis, but only 'at any time in his life.' This is grounded on the presumption that such a reservation is meant to be consistent with law; in terminis habilibus juris, and so to except deathbed.⁴ And even where the reservation is to the full extent—namely, that the power is to be exercised etiam in articulo mortis—although collaterally the heir may be barred if the reservation be in a disposition to a stranger, the mere force of the reservation in a settlement on the heir will not validate a deathbed deed, 'since no man can reserve to himself that he shall have then solidity of judgment, without which he ought not to have power.'⁵

3. If by marriage contract a right is given to the heir, subject to provisions to be granted by the father at any time in his life or on deathbed, or if the heir accept of a disposition bur-

3208; E. of Leven v Montgomery, 1683, M. 3217; Cowie and Hardie v Brown, 1707, M. 3220.

¹ [A deed granted by a liferenter in the exercise of a power of disposal is not liable to challenge ex capite lecti. Morris v Tennant, 1853, 15 D. 716; aff. 27 Jur. 546. See as to powers exercised under the authority of deeds of entail, Newton v Newton, 1867, 5 Macph. 1056. A deed revoking the fetters of an entail is not challengeable. Miller v Marsh, 1853, 15 D. 823; 1855, 2 Macq. 284.]

² Campbell v Rankine, 1805, M. App. Deathbed, No. 5. Here a minute of sale was entered into, but deposited in neutral custody till called for by both parties. On deathbed a feu was granted, with an addition of £10 of feu-duty to the original price. The Court reduced the feu-disposition, and held the minute of sale not binding. 5 Pat. 573.

³ Irvine of Drum's case, 1 Fount. 479. See 2 Fount. 324-5.

⁴ Hepburn v Hepburn, 1663, M. 3177. But it is implied in dispositions to strangers that the power is reserved even in deathbed. Douglas v Douglas, 1670, M. 329.

⁵ Davidson v Davidson, 1687, M. 3255. See also Dirleton and Stewart, 8vo, 334, and p. 137. Bertram v Vere, 1706, M. 3250. [Clyne v Clyne's Trs., 1837, 15 S. 911; 1839, M'L. and Rob. 72. Miller v Marsh, 1855, 2 Macq. 284.]

dened with a power, the faculty may be exercised, and challenge on deathbed will be barred.¹ Although the heir's acceptance of a deed, with reservation of a precise power, will have effect when it can fairly be ascribed to his approving of the particular deed or act in the contemplation of the power reserved, yet, where the reservation is entirely general to do any deed on deathbed, to give it effect would be equivalent to a defeating of the law of deathbed.²

4. It has been attempted, but ineffectually, to retain power on deathbed by executing a deed in liege poustie, blank in the donee's name, and filling it up on deathbed.³

5. The total exclusion of the heir's right by a deed in liege poustie gives efficacy to a disposition on deathbed altering that settlement. For as the only title to challenge on deathbed belongs to the heir, this is a case in which he cannot allege that his interest is hurt, while the reduction of the new deed cannot benefit him.⁴ But,

6. Where the deed of exclusion in liege poustie contains a power of revocation, and [96] a new settlement is made on deathbed, a question of construction is raised. And, 1. Where there is an express revocation by separate deed or act, the heir's right revives, and with it the challenge on deathbed.⁵ 2. Even where the revocation is in the same deed with a new disposition differing from the liege poustie deed, but the revocation is not made expressly provisional, the same effect follows: the heir's right revives, accompanied by his title to challenge the deathbed deed.⁶ 3. Where the revocation, separate or in the same deed, is expressly made conditional, and the liege poustie deed declared to subsist if the other disposition should prove ineffectual, the heir will be barred of his challenge.⁷ 4. How far the same effect will be produced where the new disposition is in all respects similar to the liege poustie deed, is a question undecided.⁸ And, 5. Where the revocation is not express, but implied only from the deathbed deed, it has been held that the testator is to be regarded as having virtually declared the efficacy of the new deed to be a condition of the revocation of the old. This has been greatly doubted in point of principle; but it is held as a decided point not now to be shaken.⁹

7. It is not competent by the aid of a trust-deed, with reserved powers ('to alter, provide, etc., even on deathbed'), to dispose of heritable subjects by testament.¹⁰ Nor will a trust with such clauses confer a power to execute a conveyance (though in regular form

¹ Forbes v L. Forbes, 1755, as decided in H. L., M. 3284, 2 Pat. 8; Pringle v Pringle, 1765, decided in H. L. 29 Jan. 1767, M. 3290, 2 Pat. 130.

² Reeds v Campbell, 1728, M. 3327; Inglis v Inglis, 1733, M. 3327. Ersk. iii. 8. 99. [Morris v Tennant, 15 D. 716; aff. 18 D. (H. L.) 42, 27 Jur. 546.]

³ Pennycook v Thomson, 1687, M. 3243; Birnies v Laird of Polmaise, 1678, M. 3242, 3 Br. Sup. 325.

⁴ D. of Roxburgh v Wauchope, 13 Dec. 1816, 19 F. C. 238; aff. 3 Bligh 630, 6 Pat. 548.

⁵ Findlay v Birkmire, 1779, M. 3188.

⁶ Coutts v Crawford, 1795, M. 14958, Bell's Fol. Ca. 207. In the Court of Session the revocation was held to be provisional only, so that the heir's challenge on deathbed was still barred. In the House of Lords the case was viewed differently, and the revocation held to give admission to the heir, no longer excluded by a liege poustie deed. The case was remitted for reconsideration, when the Court of Session confirmed their former judgment, 3 Feb. 1801. But this decision the House of Lords reversed, on a ground on which the opinions of Lord Rosslyn, Lord Thurlow, and Lord Eldon, successively given, concurred,—namely, that the intermediate disposition was absolutely destroyed, and the right of the heir to claim the estate was again set up, opposed only by a deathbed deed. 14 March 1806, 3 Bligh 655–691, 5 Pat. 73.

The doctrine of that case was confirmed in Bately v Small, 2 Feb. 1815, F. C., the deed there being held not to qualify the revocation.

In Moir v Mudie, 1820, there was still another confirmation of the rule. Aff. in H. L. 1 March 1824, 2 Sh. App. Ca. 9. [Anderson v Fleming, 1833, 11 S. 612; Ker v Erskine, 1851, 13 D. 492; Whitelaw, 1809, 2 Sh. App. Ca. 13, note; Neilson v Stewart, 1860, 22 D. 646.]

⁷ See Lord Chancellor Eldon's opinion in Coutts' case, 3 Bligh 686.

⁸ Lord Chancellor Eldon in Moir's case (above, note 6) said: 'I give no opinion whatever upon the principles which might or might not rule the case, if the dispositions had been exactly the same.'

⁹ Rowan v Alexander, 1775, 5 Br. Sup. 423, Hailes 659. See 3 Bligh 662, 679, 680–1, 687.

D. of Roxburgh v Wauchope, 13 Dec. 1816, F. C., 3 Bligh 619, 5 Pat. 548.

¹⁰ Willock v Auchterlony, 1769, as revd. in H. L., 3 Pat. 659. See, for opinion of judges in Court of Session, Hailes 321. [Erskine v Erskine's Trs., 1850, 13 D. 223.]

as a deed inter vivos) on deathbed.¹ But where a trust is executed with a complete exclusion of the heirs-at-law, a power to declare uses on deathbed is effectual.²

8. A general obligation by the presumptive heir not to challenge any deed to be granted by the ancestor is ineffectual.³ But his assent to a particular deed or disposition, if fairly obtained, is good, on the principle already stated with regard to acceptance.⁴

The doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate it may be proper to consider afterwards in all its relations, rather than as confined to this case of deathbed.

SUBSECTION IV.—EXERCISE BY CREDITORS OF THE RIGHT OF CHALLENGE.

[97] In considering the doctrine of deathbed relatively to the rights of creditors, and their power to avail themselves of the heir's privilege to challenge a settlement on that ground, there are three points which deserve attention: 1. What heirs are themselves entitled to challenge on deathbed. 2. The title of the creditors to prosecute in the heir's place. 3. The effect of the heir's approbation of the deed in excluding his creditors.

I.—DESCRIPTION OF HEIRS ENTITLED TO CHALLENGE.

The general rule is, that the plea of deathbed is competent to the heir who, alioquin successurus, is entitled to be served but for the deathbed deed. So,

1. The heir-at-law, whether of line or of conquest, has the most undoubted title to maintain a challenge on deathbed.

2. The heir of investiture, whether by tailzie, marriage contract, or destination in the investiture, has the privilege, even against the heir of line called to the succession by the deathbed deed; on the principle that the succession, as settled by law or deed previously to deathbed, is not to be altered on importunity during that period of weakness.⁵

3. It does not alter the rule that the heir's right is constituted by personal deed, not completed by infestment.⁶

4. It is not enough, however, that a right of succession, which would have been sufficient if embodied in the investiture, remains in obligatione, or as mere matter of contract on the part of the ancestor. The remedy in such a case is by action on the contract, not by reduction on deathbed.⁷

5. The heir of line who has the right of challenge, will of course succeed to that privilege if it have not been renounced; but a remoter heir seems also to have the privilege in his own right, although the immediate heir should not have been injured by

¹ Ladies Kerr v Wauchope, 1806, 5 Pat. 559. The Duke of Roxburgh in 1803 made a trust settlement, after having in 1790 conveyed his estates to Ladies Kerr, with a power of revocation. On deathbed he gave directions to his trustees to pay legacies, and divide the residue among certain residuary legatees, but did not revoke the deed 1790. The ladies challenged on deathbed, and were successful.

² Bellenden v E. of Winchelsea, 1825, 3 S. 530, N. E. 367. Here the settlement gave the estates primarily to those entitled to succeed under the statute of distributions, which, by excluding the heir, gave full effect to a disposition on deathbed. [Brack v Hogg, 1827, 6 S. 113.]

³ Inglis v Hamilton, 1733, M. 3327; Elchies' Deathbed, No. 1. See above, p. 91, note 2.

⁴ See Murray v Murray, 1826, 4 S. 374. [Richardson v Richardson, 1840, 10 D. 872.]

⁵ Hepburn v Hepburn, 1663, M. 3177; Porterfield v Cant, 1672, M. 3179; Maxwell v Neilson, 1722, M. 3194. Ersk. iii. 8. 100. [Merry v Howie, 1806, 5 Pat. 101.]

⁶ M. of Clydesdale v E. of Dundonald, 1726, M. 3180.

⁷ Campbell v Campbell, 1738, M. 3195. See also Lord Monboddo's Cases, 5 Br. Sup. 651. Here the conquest during the marriage was by marriage contract provided to the children of the marriage in fee. The father bought an estate during the marriage, taking the right to himself, and his heirs and assignees; and on deathbed settled his whole property on his eldest son, under the burden of certain provisions. The Court held the privilege of deathbed not to be pleadable by the younger children, whose remedy was only by action. [Shaw v Campbell's Exrs., 1847, 9 D. 782; Leith v Leith, 1848, 10 D. 1137.]

the deathbed deed,¹ unless where the heir first succeeding has taken benefit, and approbated the deed.²

6. This is a privilege which the heir-at-law may, on apparenecy, and without completing his titles, plead.³ Whether the same right is enjoyed by the heir of provision, has been much doubted. It was held at one time that such an heir cannot exercise his privilege without completing his title.⁴ But an opposite opinion was held in the case of one, who, being heir of investiture, his title on apparenecy was considered as good.⁵

Where a title is necessary, it has been held that a general service to the person [98] last infeft will not entitle him to challenge on deathbed a conveyance of the estate.⁶

7. But if the heir die in his apparenecy, no right will be transmitted to his representatives or creditors. See below, Commentary on the Act 1695, c. 24.

II.—TITLE OF THE CREDITORS TO PROSECUTE IN ROOM OF THE HEIR.

While the heir lives, his right under his apparenecy, or in virtue of his service, may be exercised by creditors, either by adjudging his right, or even, as Erskine has laid it down, without any adjudication, by direct action libelling on their right as creditors.⁷ This seems to rest on the ground that the creditors may competently have a declarator that their debts should have free course to attach the estate unobstructed by the deathbed deed.⁸

III.—EXCLUSION OF CREDITORS BY THE HEIR'S APPROBATION.

The privilege is personal to the heir, and no one who comes in his right is entitled to object to the deed; not even the debtor in an heritable bond alienated on deathbed. The heir's approbation, therefore, confirms the deed. And it will be effectual even against creditors, unless the act of the heir is itself subject to exception.

Whether the deed have been truly ratified, is a question of evidence. And, 1. It is not enough that the heir have signed witness to the deed: he is not presumed to know the contents; or if he do, he is held to sign under the influence of feelings which will not bar his right—the principle of homologation ruling the question.⁹ 2. If the deathbed deed be a general disposition requiring to be completed by adjudication in implement, a question may arise as to the effect of the judicial proceedings for that effect.¹⁰ If, in the action of constitution, the heir should not defend himself on deathbed, it would operate as a ratification against which reduction might be competent, or otherwise, as the decree was in absence or in foro.

The doctrine of ratification Erskine places on the same footing with an absolute conveyance to the heir, and a reconveyance by him to the stranger.¹¹ But, 1. If the ratification be on deathbed, it is held ineffectual.¹² 2. If the heir be insolvent, and gratuitously assent or ratify, there will be a remedy to the creditors on the Act 1621, c. 18; or, 3. If the person

¹ Kennedy v Arbuthnot, 1722, M. 3198; Craigs v Maltman of Glasgow, 1739, M. 3199. The distinction between these cases was, that in the former the nearest heir was not prejudiced; in the latter he was. And it appears from Elchies, that in Craig's case some doubts were suggested of the decision in Kennedy's. The Court held it not right to alter so important a decision; but they held it safe to sustain the challenge, as the deed was in prejudice of the first heir as well as the second, that first heir being an infant. Elchies' Notes, p. 116.

² Irvine v Tait, 1808, M. App. Deathbed, No. 6.

³ Graham v Graham, 1779, M. 3186.

⁴ Edmonston v Edmonston, 1637, M. 16089.

⁵ See above, case of Graham. This was held against the opinion of Lord Braxfield, who considered him as a mere stranger, not having made up titles to the person last infeft.

⁶ See Graham's case, above.

⁷ Ersk. iii. 8. 100.

⁸ Crs. of Balmerino v Lady Couper, 1669, M. 3203.

⁹ Dallas v Paul, 1704, M. 5677; Ersk. iii. 3. 48. [Brodie v Brodie, 1827, 5 S. 835; Leith v Leith, 1848, 10 D. 1137; Murray v Murray's Trs., 1826, 4 S. 377.]

¹⁰ [Gardner v Gardner, 1830, 9 S. 138.]

¹¹ Ersk. iii. 8. 99.

¹² Cleuch v Leslie, 1744, M. 3182. [Hedderwick v Campbell, 1740, Elch. voce Deathbed, No. 13.]

favoured by the deathbed deed be a creditor of the heir's, and the heir's assent really operate as a preference to that creditor, the others will be entitled to challenge it, either on the Act 1696, c. 5, or at common law.

The creditors of the person who has granted the deathbed deed may suffer by it as much as those of the heir. But their remedy stands upon another footing than deathbed. They are entitled on the Act 1621, c. 18, to reduce the conveyance if gratuitous.¹

SECTION III.

OF THE RIGHT OF CREDITORS TO AVAIL THEMSELVES OF THE DEBTOR'S OTHER PRIVILEGES AS HEIR.

[99] There are other rights which belong to an heir, of which creditors may avail themselves: namely, 1. The right of an apparent heir to continue the possession of the ancestor; and, 2. The heir's right to demand a share of the moveable succession, where he is also one of the next of kin.

SUBSECTION I.—APPARENT HEIR'S RIGHT TO POSSESSION OF THE ANCESTOR'S ESTATES.

Although the right of the heir is not completed without service, and feudal estates require infeftment, yet even during apparenacy the heir has certain privileges by which his creditors may be benefited. An apparent heir is a person to whom the succession to an heritable estate has, on the death of the ancestor, opened either by disposition of the law, or by the destination of the subsisting investiture,² but whose feudal title is not yet completed.

1. He is entitled to enter at once into the natural possession of the estate.³ Where he is opposed by a disponent, holding only a personal right, he seems still entitled to his privilege,⁴ though that has been questioned. So far effect will be given to the doubt, that if the apparent heir's circumstances be such as to put in hazard the rents, the estate will be placed under sequestration till the disponent shall establish his title.

2. The apparent heir is now held entitled (though even that was considered once as doubtful) to levy the rents of the lands from tenants deriving their right from the ancestor. Where a claim for the rents is made by a disponent, it would appear, 1. That if the disposition be inter vivos, with an assignation to the rents, it will be a good title to exclude the apparent heir and his creditors; but, 2. If it be a deed of settlement still personal, on which no infeftment has followed, the apparent heir will not be excluded.⁵ Of those rents, such as were still unlevied during the apparent heir's life are held as part of his funds, and attachable by his creditors. But at one time it was conceived, that although the apparent heir had a right to levy the rents, his actual exercise of this right, by obtaining payment of the rents, was the only proper completion of his title; and therefore that those rents which he had not received were still to be considered as in hæreditate jacente of the ancestor, so as to devolve along with the land, on the next heir completing his title by service. But this opinion, though it regulated the judgment of the Court in one case,⁶ was completely overturned subsequently, and the doctrine finally established, that as the apparent heir has the undisputed right of levying the rents, the accidental interruptions he

¹ Crs. of Lindsay competing, 1714, M. 3204.

² M'Kie v M'Kie, 1741, M. 5289; Sir A. Ogilvie v Reid, 1727, M. 5242.

³ Stair iii. 5. 2.

⁴ See above, note 2.

⁵ See cases in note 2, supra. The only remedy in such a case to the disponent, will be by application for sequestrating the rents.

⁶ Hamilton v Hamilton, M. 5253, revd. 2 Pat. 137.

may meet with are not to alter the nature of his right; and what he is entitled to take is held as part of his funds, available to his executors or his creditors.¹

3. The apparent heir has right to cut the wood on the estate; but this right expires with his life. The timber then uncut is the heir's, and the benefit of any contract entered into for silvæ cæduæ will be his; not available to the creditor of the apparent heir, [100] with whom the contract was made.²

4. If the apparent heir do not himself owe debts, so as to give his creditors a right of adopting his interests in the succession, and choose to renounce the succession and abandon it to the creditors of the ancestor, of course the arrears falling due after the ancestor's death may, as a part of the hereditas jacens, be taken up by the ancestor's creditors.

SUBSECTION II.—OF THE HEIR'S RIGHT TO CLAIM A SHARE OF THE MOVEABLE ESTATE, WITH OR WITHOUT COLLATION.

The equal partition of the succession which prevailed in the Roman law, has place also in the law of Scotland in the succession of moveables.

But with regard to land, the policy of the feudal system has introduced a remarkable change. The sole right of succession has been conferred on the heir; while of the executry nothing was left to him but the heirship moveables, consisting of the best of certain articles of furniture, horses, military accoutrements, and so forth. These were given to him that he might not succeed to a mansion utterly displenished, or incur the disgrace of being found unprepared with horse and harness to attend his lord in the field.³ The heir is thus the exclusive successor to the land; the other nearest of kin the exclusive successors to the moveables; the portio legitima of the former being the heritage, the portio legitima of the latter the personal estate. But to the heir thus excluded from the moveables, provided he be also one of the next of kin, a privilege has been reserved of throwing the heritable estate into a common stock with the moveables, and demanding as one of the next of kin a share along with the rest. This privilege has, in the natural progress of wealth, come frequently to be of the first importance to the heir or to his creditors. The effect of it is to restore, as to the whole estate, the Roman rule of equal partition among all the nearest of kin, the heir taking his share as one of the number. And it takes place only where there is a moveable as well as an heritable succession, and where the heir, but for the heritage, would divide with the rest the moveable funds. In former times, while the land-estate was the only one of value, the preference of the heir to the land-estate was in general a most valuable right. But in our days the land-estate is often inconsiderable; while the shares belonging to the deceased in national establishments, in government and bank stock, or in public companies, his exchequer bills, his notes and bonds for lying money, the stock of commodities in his warehouse, his property in ships, and other moveables, may amount to an enormous capital, which in its legal description in point of succession is executry, and to a share of which, the heir, in his mere character of heir, has no right whatever.

In the succession to one whose moveable estate is valuable, two questions may be raised: 1. Whether the person who as heir is entitled to the land may reject it, and on collation claim his share of the moveable estate? And, 2. In what cases the person who takes the land is entitled to claim his share as executor, without collation or giving up the land?

¹ Stair ii. 3. 16, p. 207. This controversy was still unsettled in Erskine's time. Ersk. iii. 8. 58. See also Kaimes' Law Tracts, No. 5.

Houston v Nicolson Stewart, 1756, M. 2338, 5250; L. Banff v Joass, 1763, M. 5257, note. In both these cases the right was held to be with the executors of the apparent heir. And this was confirmed by a judgment of reversal by the House of Lords of the decision of the Court of Session in the above case of Hamilton, 8 April 1767, 2 Pat. 137.

² Taylor v Veitch, 24 June 1796, Sir Ilay Campbell's Sess. Pap. [See Paul v Outhbertson, 1840, 2 D. 1286.]

³ [The right to heirship moveables is abolished by 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, sec. 160.]

The consideration of these questions, and of the interest of the heir and of the executors in consequence of collation, will exhaust all that is useful in this matter.

I.—RIGHT TO COLLATE THE SUCCESSION.

[101] This is a right which by law belongs to the heir ab intestato (being himself one of the nearest in kin), where the deceased has left both an heritable and a moveable estate.

1. If the heir be also the sole executor, he is not required to collate in settling with the relict.¹

2. This right to collate holds not only in the direct and descending line of succession, but also in the collateral.² As, in the descending line, the eldest son may insist on collating with his brothers and sisters; so in the collateral, the elder or the younger brother, who as heir of line or of conquest has right to the heritable estate of a brother deceased, may insist on collating with the rest of his brothers and sisters who have right to the executry.

3. The heir of conquest as well as the heir of line has right to collate, and it may happen that two heirs may thus become entitled to a share of the moveable estate along with the executors—the heir of line and the heir of conquest. In this there is no inconsistency.

It has been doubted whether one of these heirs would be entitled to collate without the concurrence of the other. But the executors certainly cannot insist on a collation from both, where the privilege is claimed by one only.

It has also been questioned what share one of several heirs entitled to collate may demand of the executors, if all the heirs do not concur? It would seem that the heir thus collating comes to the division of the mingled succession, just as if that succession formed the only estate, and as if the executors and he were the sole heirs.

4. If the heir be not also one of the next of kin, he has no right by collation of the heritage to demand a share of the executry.³ The grandson by the eldest son is heir to the exclusion of his uncles, the younger sons of his grandfather; but he cannot collate and claim a share of the moveable succession with his uncles, for there is no representation in moveables, and he is not one of the next of kin. So, if one of two heirs-portioners die, her child cannot collate: he will take his mother's share of the heritage by representation, but his aunt is the sole executor, and as such is alone entitled to the moveable succession.⁴

5. There is no collation in heritable succession; among heirs-portioners, for example. So, where one heir-portioner receives a preference by deed of the ancestor, she is still entitled to her share of the residue of the heritable estate.⁵

6. The privilege of collation may be excluded by the will of the deceased, where he has the uncontrolled power of disposing of his moveables. If the ancestor have died intestate as to his land, but leaving a will ordering the disposition of his moveables, that will, if exclusive of the right of legal succession, bars the heir from collation. Thus, if the will bequeath legacies, and leave the residue to an executor or residuary legatee, or clearly bequeath the

¹ Trotter v Rocheid, 1681, M. 2375.

² Chancellor v Chancellor, 1742, M. 2379; Elch. Succession, No. 8.

³ Erskine states the opposite to be law, which it is not. Ersk. iii. 9. 3. His doctrine was overruled in M'Caw v M'Caws, 1787, M. 2383.

⁴ [But by 18 Vict. c. 23, sec. 2, it is enacted that, 'Where the person predeceasing would have been the heir in heritage of an intestate leaving heritable as well as moveable estate, had he survived such intestate, his child, being the heir in heritage of such intestate, shall be entitled to collate the heritage, to the effect of claiming for himself alone, if there be no other issue of the predeceasing, or for himself and the other issue of the predeceasing, if there be such other issue, the share of the moveable estate of the intestate which might have been claimed by the predeceasing upon collation, if he had survived the intestate; and daughters of the predeceasing, being heirs-portioners of the intestate, shall be entitled to collate to the like effect; and where, in the case aforesaid, the heir shall not collate, his brothers and sisters, and their descendants in their place, shall have right to a share of the moveable estate, equal in amount to the excess in value over the value of the heritage of such share of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, as their predeceasing parent, had he survived the intestate, would have taken on collation.']

⁵ Jack v Jacks, 1673, M. 2369.

succession to the next of kin as specifically under the will, the heir will have no right to demand collation. This power, however, of debarring collation, cannot be exercised to the prejudice of the legitim, where a will is made by the father, and the legitim is not discharged. For the father has no power to exclude the heir from his legitim.¹

II.—RIGHT OF THE HEIR TO SHARE THE MOVEABLES WITHOUT COLLATION.

The same character of next of kin which entitles the heir to collate, gives a right [102] to demand a share of the moveable succession without collation, either, 1. Where the person so claiming (not being heir alioquin successurus) takes the heritable estate of him whose succession is in question, not as heir ab intestato, but either as heir of provision or by conveyance; or, 2. Where he takes the estate not directly from the deceased, but from one more remote. But wherever the heir claiming a share of moveables is alioquin successurus, he must collate not merely the estate which he takes as heir of line, but everything forming the proper subject of descent to an heir of line, whether enjoyed by him in that precise character or not. It seems as if the law held the heir as in all cases bound to purchase the privilege of being admitted to a share in the moveables, by giving up all that he has received as heir, or præceptione hæreditatis, before he can take his place as an executor;² while one who is executor proprio jure, and holds not the exclusive character of heir, has a right already vested, of which he must be deprived before forfeiting his share of the executry. Thus,—

1. One who, although he holds the character of heir, takes nothing in that capacity, is entitled to his share as next of kin, without collating what he may have derived from a more remote ancestor; although it is by the death of him whose succession is in question that the succession opens to him. So, on the death of a father who is a mere liferenter by grant from another, his heir taking as fiar will not be required to collate in claiming a share of the executry. Again, where the deceased has not completed his titles, but possessed only on apparency, his heir, though it is by means of his death that the succession opens, and he takes in virtue of being his son, yet succeeds as heir of the person last infeft.³

2. An executor not being heir alioquin successurus, but taking the land by destination, was found entitled to enjoy his share as executor, notwithstanding his being also heir of provision to the land-estate.⁴

3. But if the person so claiming be heir alioquin successurus, although the legal title has been superseded by conveyance, he must collate. So, 1. An heir succeeding by disposition, in which the purchaser, to save expense, takes the land in liferent to himself, with power to burden, sell, or dispoise, and in fee to his son, must collate.⁵ 2. Where the heir receives the

¹ [Lord Panmure v Crockat, 1856, 18 D. 703.]

² [See Stewart v M'Naughton, 1824, 3 S. 250; Fisher v Fisher's Trs., 1844, 7 D. 129.]

³ Spalding v Farquharson, 11 Dec. 1812, F. C. Here the point seems to have been assumed without much argument. The question arose on the death of Daniel Spalding. His heir served, not to him, who never was infeft, but to his father David, the last infeft; and so, in claiming a share of Daniel's executry, he refused to collate. It was held that there was no reason for the plea of collation between the executors and the heir, as the heir claims the heritable estate which he has from one source, and his right as executor, along with the other executors, from a different source. This was adhered to.

Russell v Russell, 1822, 1 S., N. E. 435, note. Thomas Russell left a son and two daughters. He had, as apparent heir of his brother, succeeded to the farm of Foldhouse, but never made up titles. He died after ten years' possession, and a question arose of collation, Whether the son was entitled to a share of the moveables, without collating the farm to which his titles were to be made up, not to his father, but to his uncle? Lord Gillies held him bound to collate, but the Court reversed this judgment.

⁴ Rae Crawford v Stewart, 1794, M. 2384. Lord Braxfield, in a judgment confirmed by the Court, 'in respect that Mrs. Rae Crawford was not heir of line, but only heir of provision in a particular estate, which she takes under a deed of entail, found her entitled to her share, along with her brother and sister, without collating the tailzied estate.'

See D. of Buccleuch v E. of Tweeddale, 1677, M. 2369.

⁵ Baillie v Clerk, 23 Feb. 1809, F. C. The heir here was considered as having not the fee, but merely a spes successionis.

land by disposition from his ancestor, he is not held by this præceptio hæreditatis to have [103] acquired right to the executry without collation.¹ 3. It was supposed that succession under an entail, in which the heir is placed under trammels, raised an insurmountable difficulty in applying this doctrine; but the rule is held not to be disturbed by this peculiarity. The heir of entail, being also heir of line, cannot claim a share of the moveable estate without collation of the rents or value of his heritable right.²

4. But it has been said, that a distinction is to be made in the case of an heir-portioner claiming a share of the moveables: that she stands not in a state of exclusion, like the heir, from her share of the moveable succession, but has right as her portio legitima to a proportion of both estates; and that she cannot be deprived of her share of the moveables by a conveyance meant to better her condition.³ But this is a distinction which has not been confirmed. On the contrary, in a later case, the doctrine of Riccart's case has been denied;⁴ and, on the whole, it rather seems to be law, that the heir-portioner is bound to collate her own share.

5. If the estate to which the heir succeeds be real estate, situate in another country, he is bound to collate, in claiming as a Scottish executor, a share of the moveable estate in Scotland. Coming forward as a Scottish heir, to avail himself of a Scottish privilege, and to take something from the executors, they are entitled to insist that he shall comply with the condition annexed to the exercise of that privilege in Scotland, by throwing the real estate into the common fund, that equality may be preserved.⁵

But if he claim not as a Scottish executor, but under the English statute of distributions, the heir is not bound thus to collate.⁶

III.—MODE OF GIVING EFFECT TO THE SEVERAL RIGHTS IN COLLATION.

In contemplating the effect of collation on creditors, although the heir may dispense with his privilege, he cannot do so effectually in a state of insolvency to the prejudice of his [104] creditors. The liability of the executors to the demand of the heir, on the other hand,

¹ Murray v Murray, 1678, M. 2374. Here the heir held the land partly by succession, partly by disposition, from his father. He offered to collate the former, but refused the latter. The Court 'admitted him to a share with the other bairns, provided he communicate all that he had of the heritable estate by disposition or by succession.'

² Little Gilmour v Little Gilmour, 13 Dec. 1809, F. C. 449. [Anstruther v Anstruther, 12 S. 140, 14 S. 272; aff. 1 S. and M'L. 463, and 2 S. and M'L. 369. M. of Breadalbane's Trs. v M. of Chandos, 12 S. 309, aff. 2 S. and M'L. 377. The heir seems to have the option of either collating the specific estate or its value in money. Fisher's Trs. v Fisher, 1850, 13 D. 245.]

³ Riccart v Riccart, 1720, M. 2378. See observations of Lord Meadowbank on this case in Little Gilmour's case (above, note 2), F. C. 457.

⁴ Hay Balfour v Scott, 1787, M. 2379, 4617. In this case, on the supposition that the succession was to be regulated by the law of Scotland (see below, note 6), it was held that the eldest heir-female succeeding by destination without division was, in claiming a share of her uncle's moveable succession, bound to collate. 'The defender, Miss Scott, was not entitled to claim any part of the executry of her uncle David Scott of Scotstarvit, without collating his heritable estate, to which she succeeds as heir.' Lord Meadowbank, in his remarks on this question, above referred to, says: 'This, perhaps, is the most nice and subtle view of the case, but the answer is plain and obvious,' etc. See 3 Pat. 300.

⁵ Robertson v Macvean, 18 Feb. 1817, F. C. 297. The Court held, 'That James Robertson is not entitled to claim legitim, unless he collate such right as he has to the estate situated in the island of Jamaica, as well as the other provisions and possessions received by him as devolving upon him by the death of his father.'

⁶ In Hay Balfour v Scott (above, note 4), as decided in the House of Lords, the distinction drawn here between the heir's claim to English moveables, and to those situate in Scotland, was disregarded, and the case was determined on this principle, that the domicile and death of David Scott having been both in England, and the rule being, that the whole moveable succession, wherever situate, follows the person, and is regulated by the law of his domicile, the whole moveable succession was in this case English, and to be regulated by the law of England. The judgment of the House of Lords, as given in the Faculty Collection and in Morrison's Dictionary, is incorrect. The words of the judgment are these: 'That the said Henrietta Scott is entitled to claim her distributive share in the whole personal estate of her uncle, David Scott of Scotstarvit, in Scotland, without collating his heritable estate, to which she succeeded as heir, inasmuch as she claims the said share of the said personal estate, by the law of England, where the said David Scott had his domicile at the time of his death.' 11 March 1793. See 3 Pat. 300.

is one which gives to the heir not merely a personal claim for a dividend, but a jus in re—a real interest in the executry while extant and distinguishable.

Several situations may be distinguished as giving rise to questions relative to the rights which have just been considered; and,

1. Where collation is not required as the condition or consideration for the heir's admission to the privilege, there is little difficulty. The heir then takes his place from the first with the other executors, and his right is completed as theirs is. It is like the case of a succession entirely moveable, in which the whole of the next of kin are executors, and so entitled to confirmation. The late statute applies to the heir in such a case, as it does to the others, vesting the right ipso jure to the effect of transmitting it to his representatives;¹ and he is entitled to take out an edict and be confirmed, or to insist on being joined in the confirmation with the other next of kin.

2. Where the heir purchases his privilege by collation, the only difference seems to be that the heir shall first effectually renounce his preference, before he is entitled to his right as executor. It is only by massing the whole succession that he acquires right, as if there were no heritage, to confirm as executor with the rest. And it would appear that, from the moment he makes up his titles to the heritage, and disposes, he is entitled to assume and assert the character of executor: so that, if no application for an edict has been made, he may take out his edict for confirmation; and if opposed, his conveyance is a good reply. Or if the other executors have applied to be confirmed, he may appear and desire to be conjoined as one of the executors; and his conveyance of the heritage will entitle him to be conjoined.

The transaction is in general settled either by private contract or judicially:—

1. By PRIVATE CONTRACT the heir and executors, on a recital of their intention to divide the whole succession, reciprocally dispose and assign; the heir the heritable subjects, the executors the moveable funds; and bind themselves to complete titles, and make all necessary conveyances for accomplishing their purpose. If the title of the executors is not yet completed, there is no occasion for anything on their part but the admission of the heir to his place in the confirmation; and it lies with the heir to complete his title and grant the necessary conveyance for giving to the rest of the next of kin their proportions of the heritage. If the executors have already completed their right by confirmation, they must of course grant assignations, deliver a share of the moveables, and pay money to the heir, to the effect of equalizing their mutual rights. It would seem that from the moment of irrevocable declaration on the part of the heir, his right vests as executor; while the right of the executors is precisely of the same nature with that of a purchaser of land under missives of sale.

2. JUDICIAL SETTLEMENT of collation is by an action at the instance of the heir against the executors, stating his right to collate as one of the next of kin, and his offer to do so; and concluding, first, that his right should be declared; secondly, that the defenders should be ordained to produce all bonds, bills, account-books, etc., with a full state of their intrusions; thirdly, that on the heir completing his title, and disposing to the defenders their shares, they should be ordained to convey and pay over to him his share. There is commonly a conclusion that the defenders should complete their titles to the moveables; instead of which the heir seems entitled to conclude, that he should be found and declared entitled to confirm as one of the next of kin.

This faculty or privilege the creditors of the heir are entitled to exercise, and this is done without any adjudication or previous process.

¹ 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, sec. 1.

PART II.

OF INCORPOREAL RIGHTS, NOT CONNECTED WITH LAND, CONSIDERED AS A FUND FOR THE PAYMENT OF DEBT.

[105] NEXT to his property in land, a man's available funds in debts and moveables are of importance in the eyes of those with whom he deals. In England, debts are called Property in ACTION, or Choses in Action; Moveables, Property in POSSESSION. With us, the former is called INCORPOREAL RIGHT; the latter CORPOREAL, according with the language of the Roman law.

CORPOREAL property comprehends such subjects as are palpable to sense; INCORPOREAL, such as consist in legal right merely. Incorporeal rights may exist as connected with land; but at present the inquiry is limited to such rights not connected with land. These form often a fund of the greatest value to creditors, and to which chiefly they trust for their payment. They include: ordinary debts; debts which are connected with public establishments and government funds; rights of privilege or monopoly, as patent rights and literary property; rights which have for their object the restitution of property illegally or imperfectly alienated; rights which arise in the way of succession, testate or intestate. These are proposed to be discussed in the nine following chapters.

CHAPTER I.

OF ORDINARY DEBTS.

THIS class of incorporeal rights may be more conveniently considered afterwards, in discussing the rights of creditors as claimants against the estate of their debtor.¹

CHAPTER II.

OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS, AND OTHER PUBLIC DEBTS.

SECTION I.—GOVERNMENT STOCK.

THE National Debt is either funded or unfunded.

1. FUNDED DEBT is that towards payment of the interest of which certain funds are appropriated. At first, each loan was secured by the appropriation of particular taxes; [106] but on an extension of this enormous system, certain capital funds have been formed, the aggregate produce of which forms the general fund, out of which the interest of all the several debts of Government are defrayed,—a surplus being destined as a sinking fund for the gradual redemption of the principal. The right which the public creditor holds is merely to demand the interest or annuity, which is payable in the Bank of England; with a power to transfer his right with the greatest possible facility. The principal cannot be demanded, but the same effect is produced to the creditor by a sale at market; the employment of a stockbroker depending on the frequency of those sales, proceeding from the necessity or the speculation of the holders.¹ The statutes declare that the annuitants shall be possessed thereof as of personal estate.² And in a question respecting legitim in the Court of Session, this right was held as moveable.³ Nothing seems to have been appointed as to the diligence by which the right of the public creditor is to be affected. The Scottish diligence of arrestment, of course, cannot reach even the dividends due to the stockholder; and no other Scottish diligence but adjudication seems competent to carry the entire right. This is a form of diligence which appears to be competent where there is none other provided by law. But there is great difficulty in getting a transfer made at the Bank of England; for, by law, each transfer must be entered, and the entry signed by the person making the transfer, or by his attorney. And in the Act providing that the Court of Chancery or Exchequer may order a transfer by the secretary of the Bank, there are only three cases mentioned,—absence of trustee, bankruptcy, and lunacy.⁴

¹ See below, Book III.

2. UNFUNDED DEBT.—This debt may be constituted in a variety of ways. But the chief documents of it are Exchequer and Navy bills, which bear interest from their dates, or from six months after they are issued. These are undoubtedly moveable funds, and the right goes with the possession of the document. These documents confer a preference by certain statutes, which will afterwards demand attention.⁵

SECTION II.—BANK STOCK.

The important operations of banking are carried on partly by chartered companies, partly by private adventurers. In England, the latter have till lately been under restraint by the monopoly given to the Bank of England, that not more than six persons should be allowed to join in a private banking company. The peculiar sort of property called banking stock, is to be understood only of the shares of the public chartered banks. It is alienable, and may be attached by creditors directly or indirectly.

1. The BANK OF ENGLAND was incorporated in the reign of William and Mary, in consideration of a loan of a million and a half to Government. It is managed by a governor, deputy-governor, and twenty-four directors, elected by the general court of stockholders. By the 8 and 9 Will. III. the Bank was allowed considerably to augment its capital stock; and in consequence of repeated loans to Government, that stock has been allowed to be further enlarged, till at present the value of the stock, with the increase of undivided profits, amounts to more than twenty-five millions. The shares of this immense capital held by individuals are declared to be of the nature of personal estate, and to be transferred only by contracts registered in the books of the Bank within seven days, and on which the stock shall be transferred within fourteen days. The profits are divided half-yearly, and the dividends are payable at the Bank.

2. In SCOTLAND there are three⁶ public or national banks:—

[107]

¹ There are certain restraints on the traffic in this sort of property which will require attention hereafter. See below, Book III. [The transfer of stock is made by entry in the books of the Bank of England. The statutes 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Will. IV. c. 13, sec. 13, require persons to whom transfers of stock are made in the books of the Bank to underwrite their acceptances. Their neglect to do so does not entitle the transferrer to treat the transfer as a nullity. Foster v Bank of England, 8 Q. B. 705; Add. on Cont., 6th ed. 134.]

² 25 Geo. III. c. 32, sec. 7, and all the other Acts.

³ Hog v Hog, 1791, M. 5479.

⁴ See 36 Geo. III. c. 90; 12 and 13 Vict. c. 106, sec. 128. [See also 13 and 14 Vict. c. 60, secs. 22–26; 15 and 16 Vict. c. 55, as to mode of getting a title to stock by vesting order of the Court of Chancery; 26 and 27 Vict. c. 28, as to certificates of stock with dividend coupons attached; extended by 32 and 33 Vict. c. 104.]

⁵ 57 Geo. III. c. 34, 124; and 1 Geo. IV. c. 60. See below, Book IV. Of Privileged Debts.

⁶ [It is scarcely necessary to add that other banking establishments have since been incorporated by Royal Charter or Act of Parliament.]

(1.) THE BANK OF SCOTLAND was erected into a body corporate in 1695 by an Act of Parliament, which is among the unprinted Acts of that year, but is recited in 14 Geo. III. c. 32, and in successive Acts down to 44 Geo. III. c. 23. The fund is declared assignable, the transfers being entered in a book subscribed by the assignor and assignee: it is also disposable by will entered in the book of transfers, without confirmation. It is also declared, that the shares may be transmitted 'by adjudication or other legal conveyance, in favour of one person alienably, who in like manner shall succeed to be a partner in his predecessor's place; so that the foresaid sums of subscription may neither be taken out of the stock, nor parcelled among more persons by legal diligence in any sort to the diminishing or disturbing of the stock of the said company, and good order thereof.' It is also provided, that on bankruptcy or forfeiture, the governor and directors may order the bankrupt or forfeited person's share to be sold by public roup, after such intimations as are prescribed for the sale of bankrupt lands.¹ The Act does not contain any declaration respecting the condition of the stock as heritable or moveable. And in the only case in the books respecting it, the sole plea maintained was, that the holder being entitled only to dividends, the right, as having a tract of future time, was heritable. But this was not sustained.²

(2.) The ROYAL BANK OF SCOTLAND was established by a charter of erection, in pursuance of 5 Geo. I. c. 20. The stock was declared moveable, descendible to executors; but, at the same time, not liable to arrestment or attachment. And, by a by-law, no proprietor can transfer but in the presence of a Court of Directors, who may stop the transfer till he find surety for what he owes the Bank. The creditors of a stockholder of this Bank may by personal diligence indirectly force a sale, even should the words of the charter passed in fulfilment of the statute prevent direct attachment.

(3.) The BRITISH LINEN COMPANY was erected into a body corporate in the reign of George II. The shares of the stock are declared to be of the nature of personal estate, and to be transferable by certain forms. The charter was confirmed and enlarged in 1806 by royal charter. Nothing is said in the charter relative to the mode of attaching the stock.³

CHAPTER III.

OF RIGHTS UNDER POLICIES OF INSURANCE.

[108] THE subject of insurance shall be fully considered hereafter, in discussing the contracts out of which claims of debt arise. At present we look only to the right of which creditors

¹ Doubts having been entertained respecting the proper diligence for attaching the stock, the Bank took this course to try it:—Fairholme, on his bankruptcy, was due £3000 to the Royal Bank; and they adjudged his bank stock, with a view to sell it, for payment of this debt: but it was questioned whether this was a title so secure that purchasers would think it eligible. The Bank therefore called on the cautioner for Fairholme to pay up the debt, and he suspended, insisting on the benefit of the stock. The Bank stated that they could make no transfer, but (1) on a conveyance from the proprietor; or (2) in favour of an executor on production of his confirmed testament; and that no instance of a transfer on adjudication had occurred. The Court held the adjudication to be a good title, on which the Bank could transfer. The judgment therefore ordered the cautioner to pay, 'upon the

Bank conveying to him the bank shares which belonged to Fairholme, with such diligence as they have used for affecting the same, with warrantice from fact and deed; and found that, in consequence thereof, the Bank was bound to receive the purchaser or his assignee in Fairholme's place, with regard to the said shares, in the same manner as they are in use to do in other sales or transactions of their stock.' Bank of Scotland v Fairholme, 14 Feb. 1770, Hamilt. 46.

² Sir J. Dalrymple, 1735, M. 5478. See also, 1. As to the privilege of Naturalization, Macao v Officers of State, in H. L., 1 Sh. App. Ca. 138; and, 2. As to the designation of the stock by sterling or Scottish money, Fraser v M'Donald, 1821, 1 S. 223, N. E. 213.

³ [A banking company, indebted to the holder of stock for dividends, was held not liable for interest on those dividends

may avail themselves under the several policies of insurance, considered as a fund for the payment of debt.¹

Policies of insurance are used not only for protecting commodities exposed to sea-risk, but for indemnifying against fire, and providing a fund in the event of death. Insurances on lives form a valuable estate, to the benefit of which creditors may be entitled. An insurance against fire or sea-risk produces no advantage, and cannot be regarded as of any value to creditors, independently of a loss covered by the policy. But an insurance on life becomes more valuable by lapse of time, the premium of an uninsured life increasing with every year that passes, while a policy opened continues at the same premium after the lapse of ever so many years.

The value of a life-policy may accrue to creditors, either, 1. On the death of the person insured; or, 2. By the sale of the policy, while yet the risk is undetermined,—the purchaser continuing to pay the premium, and being entitled, on the death of the person insured, to the sum in the policy; or, 3. By treating with the insurance office for a renunciation of the policy.

Policies may be opened either by the person himself; or by a creditor in a lawful debt, the creditor having an interest in the life of his debtor, as affording part of his security and means of payment. After a policy has been opened by a person on his own life, it may be assigned to another for a valuable consideration, or even, as it would seem, gratuitously. But if a policy has been opened by a creditor for the interest which he has in his debtor's life, the interest expires with the payment of the debt, and the policy becomes void.² This is to be attended to in constructing securities for the loan of money; as the law of usury may perhaps apply where premiums are stipulated to be paid for keeping up the insurance, unless they be also useful in constituting an absolute estate, available to the debtor on payment of the debt.

CHAPTER IV.

OF PATENT RIGHTS AND LITERARY PROPERTY.

THE right of exclusive sale enjoyed under patents for useful inventions, and the property now secured by statute to authors of literary compositions, form estates available to creditors.

Of all things, the produce of a man's intellectual labour is most peculiarly distinguishable as his own; and the Patents, or the statutes on which Copyright now rests, are intended not so much to create a right, as to protect it against invasion. The right which a man has to the produce of his own mental labour, if sought to be referred to any of the ordinary sources of property, may well be grounded on occupancy and personal exertion; and it deserves [109] the support of law, as securing to the inventor the creations of his own genius, and as encouraging that most useful exertion of mind, by which manufactures are improved and enriched, or the stores of knowledge and intellectual improvement augmented. All admit the justice of thus protecting the right of an inventor or of an author, and are sensible of the public expediency of such encouragement. The only doubt which disturbs the doctrine, proceeds from the operation of the common right of property in things corporal; according to which, the purchaser of a machine or of a book may apply it to what use, or draw from it what advantage it may be calculated to afford, producing by the application of his own industry other machines or books exactly similar, and disposing of those by sale or by gift.

(Fraser v Morrice, 1826, 4 S. 770); and the Bank is entitled to retain stock in security of debt due to it by the stockholder (Burns v Lawrie, 1840, 2 D. 1348). This rule does not entitle the Bank to retain a wife's separate estate in security of the debts of her husband (Gairdner v Royal Bank, 22 June 1815, F. C.).]

¹ See below, Book III. Of Insurance.

² [The doctrine stated in the text is founded on the now exploded case of Godsall v Boldero, 9 East 72. See the more recent and authoritative decision in Dalby v India L. Ins. Co., 15 C. B. 365, as explained infra, voce Life Insurance.]

Confining the doctrine to the common law principles of property, those valuable interests which belong to the inventor might thus be outraged, or could be protected only by concealment of the principle on which the invention proceeds. Hence the compromise which has been made for the public benefit, by which the otherwise elusory right of the inventor is secured for a season, as effectually in relation to all possible exemplifications of the machine or book which he has made, as by the common law his right of property is secured in the individual machine or book which he has mechanically prepared; while, in return for this, the public receives the benefit of a full disclosure of the invention for their unrestricted use, after the term of exclusive privilege is expired.

SECTION I.

OF INVENTIONS SECURED BY PATENT.

PATENTS are granted by the king, under reserved powers conferred by the statutes abolishing the ancient and much contested practice of granting monopolies. Before the union of the crowns, this prerogative had in England been much abused, and in Scotland matters had gone much in the same course. The granting of monopolies furnished one source of power to monarchs whose affluence and means of rewarding fidelity or indulging favourites were exceedingly limited.

The abuses practised by the Duke of Buckingham, the favourite of James I., seem to have given the death-blow to this dangerous prerogative. After judicial proceedings against some of the creatures of Buckingham whose oppressions were the most flagrant, an Act was prepared by a Committee of the House of Commons, of which Sir Edward Coke, the great English lawyer, was chairman. This is the Act of James I., whereby, 1. All monopolies and letters-patent for the sole buying, selling, making, working, etc., of anything within the realm of England, are declared to be contrary to the laws of England, and utterly void and null. And, 2. A power is reserved to the king to grant letters-patent and grants of privilege for fourteen years or under, for 'the sole working or making of any new manufacture within this nation, to the true and first inventor of such manufacture, which others at the time of making such letters-patent and grants shall not use; so as they be not contrary to the law, or mischievous to the State, by raising prices of commodities at home, or hurt of trade, or generally inconvenient.'¹

The vicious practice of monopolies certainly did not cease on this Act.—It continued during the reign of Charles I., who granted many oppressive and scandalous patents.

In Scotland, during this prince's time, a statute passed in 1641, c. 76 (5 Act. Parliament. p. 496), declaring all such patents ineffectual. It proceeds on a preamble of 'the great hurt and prejudice sustained by sundry His Majesty's lieges, by the monopolies used [110] and exacted within this kingdom, and which have been conferred to the use of any particular person or persons, to the great hurt and prejudice of others His Majesty's lieges.' Then, after enumerating and recalling some particular patents, the law ordains the same, and all other patents of that nature, purchased or to be purchased, for the benefit of particular persons in prejudice of the public, to cease and be ineffectual.

¹ 21 James I. c. 3, sec. 6. This Act has always been held merely declaratory of the common law prerogative of granting patents.

This, with the declaratory Act of James I., settled the law as to the king's prerogative in this matter; and since the Union, the same law rules both parts of the kingdom.¹

The principle on which the reservation of the power to grant patents proceeds is public expediency: 1. The encouragement of invention by the prospect of reward to be derived from the profits of the exclusive privilege. And, 2. The benefit derivable by the public from the full knowledge and disclosure of the invention in its best state. And yet it is a curious circumstance, that it was not till the reign of Queen Anne that any proviso was inserted in the patent, that a specification of it should be enrolled in Chancery within a given time.

Patents for new inventions are granted for the encouragement and protection of useful discoveries, on condition of a full and fair disclosure of the nature of the invention, so that the public may profit by it after the time of the patent has expired. They may be granted either to extend over the whole of the king's dominions, or to extend to England, or Scotland, or Ireland alone. Distinct patents must pass for each: that for Scotland, under the Scottish seals. The application is made by petition to the king through the Secretary of State, accompanied by an affidavit that the petitioner is the true and first inventor, and that he believes the invention to be useful. This in England is referred to the Attorney-General, in Scotland to the Lord Advocate, who report to the king what is fit to be done. The patent bears as a condition: 1. That the specification shall be sufficient. 2. That it shall be made by instrument under hand and seal, enrolled in Chancery within a month.²

The right is useful as property in these respects: 1. It secures to the patentee the profits of the sale of the thing invented. 2. The privilege may be assigned in whole or in part. The patent generally bears a restriction not to be communicated to more than five. But the whole privilege may be sold.

¹ Astley v Taylor, 17 Nov. 1813, F. C.

² As to extending of the term, see Watson v Pears, 2 Camp. 294, where a proviso, that specification should be enrolled within a month after the date, which was 10th May, was held satisfied by an enrolment on 10th June. [New rules are established by the Act 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, of which the following are the chief:—1. Commissioners are appointed, to whom the petition for a patent, a relative declaration, and a 'provisional specification' are to be delivered, and to be referred by them to one of the law officers (secs. 6, 7). The law officer may take the aid of scientific or other persons; and if he be satisfied that the provisional specification describes the nature of the invention, he is to allow it, and give a certificate to be filed in the office of the Commissioners; and then the invention may, for six months from the date of the petition, be used and published without prejudice to any patent to be granted for it, and with provisional protection. But if the title or provisional specification be too large or insufficient, he may require it to be amended (sec. 8). 2. The petitioner, instead of a provisional specification, may file with the petition a complete specification, particularly describing and ascertaining the nature of this invention, and the manner of its performance (sec. 9). The petition is to be advertised for six months from the date of the application, the petitioner having the rights during this time of a patentee; and the invention may be used and published without prejudice to any letters-patent to be granted (secs. 9, 12). 3. When the patent is granted (instead of a condition for voiding it if the invention be not described and ascertained by the subsequent specification), it becomes void if not sufficiently described in the 'complete specification' (sec. 9). In case of protection being obtained, in fraud of the first inventor, his right is not thereby invalidated, nor by the subsequent use or publication (sec. 10). 4. The petitioner, after having obtained 'provisional protection,' may give notice of his intention of proceeding with his application, when the Commissioners are to cause his petition to be advertised, and persons having interest to oppose may lodge objections (secs. 11, 12). The law officer after hearing may, if he think fit, issue a warrant for sealing letters-patent by the Commissioners, setting forth their tenor and effect, with the necessary and usual restrictions and conditions (secs. 13–15). Nothing is to affect the prerogative in the granting or withholding of patents; and Her Majesty may direct the law officer to withhold his warrant, or prohibit any patent for which he has given his warrant from issuing, or direct the insertion of any special conditions in addition to or in place of any which would otherwise be inserted under the Act; and may direct any complete specification on which no patent has followed to be cancelled, in which case the protection obtained by filing it ceases (sec. 16). 5. After the sealing of the warrant, the letters-patent are to be prepared according to the tenor of the warrant, and the Lord Chancellor is to cause them to be sealed with the great seal of the United Kingdom; and so sanctioned, they are to embrace the United Kingdom, with the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, and may also include the colonies. In Scotland they are to be recorded in the Chancery Office (sec. 18). 6. All patents under this Act are subject to the condition of payment of stamp duties at the periods specified in the Act. The stamp duties payable in respect of letters-patent are further regulated by 16 and 17 Vict. c. 5. 7. Patents for warlike inventions may be purchased by the State, in which case they are kept secret, and no specification is filed. 22 Vict. c. 13.]

In distinguishing the cases in which patents are competent, I shall mark, 1. The nature of the invention that may thus be monopolized; and, 2. What sort of description is necessary in the patent.

I. PROPER SUBJECT OF PATENT.—It is worthy of particular observation that the word used in the statute is Manufacture—‘for working or making of any new manufacture.’ This has been judicially held to be a word used with great care and selection, to intimate that the proviso was introduced for the benefit of trade, and as applicable to a subject vendible.¹ The great doubt which arose upon the validity of a patent under these restrictive terms was, how far a mere principle, or even a method of operating or producing an effect, could be the subject of the patent? And, 1. It was held, that if the invention go only to the disclosure of a philosophical principle, not embodied in any manufacture, nor reduced to any practical result, but a mere element or rudiment of science, it will not be sufficient. Such, for example, [111] was the discovery of the expansive force of steam, which could not be the subject of patent; otherwise, every future invention proceeding on that principle would be comprehended. But the application of that principle to the construction of the steam-engine, the vendible matter or thing in which the principle is embodied, was a fit subject of patent. But, 2. If an effect be actually produced, the thing produced by that method is a subject for patent, although it may be erroneously described as a method of producing the effect; nor will the Courts act with so impolitic a degree of strictness as to throw impediments in the way of a patent, on account of such error in the mode of describing the invention.³ 3. Under the description of manufacture, the king may grant a patent for anything made by the hand of man: New articles or commodities produced; or new instruments or machines for producing new commodities, or commodities already known; or new applications, combinations, or compounds of old materials, whether substances or machinery, either to produce new effects, or old effects with new advantages in economy or in time, or in correctness and superiority of manufacture. A manufacture, as well described in a recent English case, is either a thing made which is useful for its own sake,—as a medicine, a stove, a telescope, etc.; or an engine, or instrument, to be employed in making some article known or new,—as a stocking-frame, or a steam-engine; or some new part or addition to a machine or engine, by which its operation or effect is improved.⁴

It is only for a new invention, however, and the disclosure of what the public has not hitherto used, or for the importation of an invention not before known or used in this kingdom, that a patent can be granted. So, 1. If not truly invented by the patentee (unless imported from abroad), or, though invented by him, if not then first disclosed by him to the public, the patent is bad. The merit of invention may be great, and the patentee may have been the acknowledged inventor: yet, if he has already disclosed the invention to the public;⁵ or used the article, though under another name, so that by that means the public have, or may have, acquired the knowledge and use of it; or if, by the accidental discovery of another from the suggestions supplied by the inventor,⁶ or by having formerly been published, though neglected among other things, the public has had the necessary knowledge or use of his invention, he can have no patent to protect it. The

¹ Bolton and Watt v Bull, 2 H. Blackst. 463, 482.

Hornblower v Bolton, 8 Term. Rep. 95.

These were both trials on the subject of Mr. Watt's improvements on the steam-engine. The Court of Common Pleas was divided in opinion, but the judges of the King's Bench were unanimous in favour of the patent.

² This point is well illustrated in the above-mentioned case of Bolton and Watt. See also Hadden v Pirie & Co., 1823, 2 S. 423, N. E. 376. [See Neilson v Baird, 1843, 6 D. 51; Gibson v Brand, 4 Man. and G. 179; Crane v Price, 4 Man. and G. 580.]

³ Mr. Watt had described his inventions in this way: ‘My method of lessening the consumption of steam consists of the following principles.’ [See Mintner v Wells, 5 Tyrwhit 163.]

⁴ The King v Wheeler, 2 Barn. and Ald. 349. [Lewis v Marling, 10 Barn. and Cress. 22; Hullet v Hague, 2 Barn. and Ad. 370; Saunders v Aston, 3 Barn. and Ad. 881.]

⁵ See Wood v Zimmar, Holt 58.

⁶ It is not settled how far experiments are using. See Hill v Thomson, 2 B. Moore 457.

consideration for the grant is the disclosure, but that is not true in the case supposed.¹ 2. The articles of which a compound manufacture is composed may have been known before, without furnishing any ground of objection to the patent. A new combination of old materials, either in mechanism or in chemistry, may be protected by patent.² But, 3. A patent may be had for an improvement or addition, as well as for a thing entirely new. If the patent is granted for a manufacture, however, of which any part is old, the whole must not be represented as new; otherwise it is void even as to what is new. For the consideration of the grant is the whole of what is stated; and it does not appear that the king would have granted it for only a part of what is specified as the discovery.³ What is new will not entitle the patentee to use the old still under patent; he must wait till [112] the old patent expire. But he may have a patent for what is new, and sell it.⁴ 4. The privilege is not necessarily confined to the first inventors. The first discloser of the invention, provided he is also a discoverer or importer of it, is the man to whom the public is truly indebted, and who on that ground is entitled to the benefit of the patent. So, 1. If one have discovered and brought into use what another has only discovered in his closet, the former is entitled to the patent, without distinguishing who was the first inventor, or whether the merit of the discovery may not have been due to both.⁵ 2. If one have imported a discovery from abroad, although he has no merit as a discoverer, he is, on the doctrine of the law of patent, entitled to the privilege.⁶ This is grounded on the words of the statute, which gives to the king the power of granting a privilege for any new manufactures 'within the realm.' Whether this would rule the case of a patent taken out in England for an invention disclosed in a specification then recorded, but for which no patent was taken out in Scotland, may be doubted. It would rather appear that this would be regarded as a publication within the realm, and the manufacture as therefore not new within the realm, to the effect of barring a patent for the manufacture in Scotland.⁷ If so, it does not appear how either the original inventor or a stranger could, after such publication, apply for a Scottish patent. Accordingly, in practice, this danger seems to be under-

¹ Tenant's case, Dav. on Patents 429; Bovill v Moore, ib. 399. [See also Brown v Annandale, 1841, 3 D. 1189, aff. 1 Bell 70. In Neilson v Househill Co., 6 March 1843, 2 Bell 1, it was laid down (reversing the decision of the Court of Session), that if use had been made of the invention, in the eye and in the presence of the public, it was not necessary that it should come down to the time when the patent was granted. In Neilson v Baird & Co., 1843, 6 D. 51, it was held that, however nearly experiments had approached to the discovery of the invention, they were unavailing to invalidate the patent, unless that discovery had been perfected and applied to public use. In Wilson v Black, 1847, 10 D. 1, and Templeton v Macfarlane, 1847, 10 D. 4, it was held to be no evidence of prior use that the invention had been employed in some manufacture different from that for which the patent had been taken out; nor if, while the patentee is perfecting his invention, his workmen should divulge it, and a partial use of it should thereupon take place.]

² Huddart v Grimshaw, Dav. on Patents 278. [It is now settled that an application of an old process or piece of mechanism to a new purpose, without any invention in the mode of applying it, is not the subject of a patent. Harwood v Great Northern Railway Co., 31 L. J. Q. B. 198. Here the Exch. Ch., reversing the judgment in B. R., decided against the validity of a patent for applying fish-joints to iron rails. A similar decision (against a patent for casting tubular boilers in one piece) was given in Ormsen v Clark, 32 L. J. C. P. 8, and in Ex. Ch. 291. See, on the question what amounts to an invention in the application of old processes, the judgment of the H. L. in Betts v Menzies (as to capsules for bottles), 31 L. J. Q. B. 233.]

³ This is well illustrated in the case of Brunton v Hawkes, 4 Barn. and Ald. 541, with regard to a patent for improvements in ship-anchors, windlasses, and chain-cables. See also M'Farlan v Price, 1 Starkie 199; Hill v Thomson, 2 B. Moore 424; Wallis v Smith, 5 Barn. and Ald. 439.

⁴ Ex parte Fox, 1 Ves. and Beames 67.

⁵ See Dolland's case in 2 H. Blackst. 487, as to the object-glass of a telescope, first discovered by Hall in his closet, but not only also discovered by Dolland, but by him disclosed to practical use.

See also Forsyth v Reviere, Chitty, Prerog. of Crown, 182. [Smith and Davidson v Wilson, 1857, 19 D. 691. By 5 and 6 Will. iv. c. 83, power is conferred on a patentee who has learned that, unknown to him, the invention, or part of it, had been known to or used by another before his patent, to apply to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for a confirmation of his patent, the Committee being empowered, on hearing all parties interested, to report to the Crown that such confirmation ought to be granted. See also 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, sec. 40.]

⁶ Edgebury v Stephens, 2 Salkeld 417; also Wood v Zimmar, Holt 58. [See, as to patents for foreign inventions, 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, secs. 25, 26.]

⁷ See Roebuck & Co. v Stirling, 1774, 5 Br. Sup. 522.

stood, and provision made against it, by allowing a longer time for the specification where it is intended to have a patent for both countries.¹

The article must be not only new, but useful.²

II. NATURE OF THE SPECIFICATION.—The above propositions rest on the condition implied, that the patent is conceded in the way of bargain for the public, that the inventor shall disclose the nature of the invention, so as in the first place to regulate and direct the energies and further invention of others, but chiefly in order to enable the public to profit by the invention with all its advantages on the expiration of the patent right. This is an important point in the law of patent. The disclosure is made in what is called the specification. The condition of the grant (formerly implied, now the express one) is, that the application shall be accompanied with such a specification as shall put the public in full possession of the invention. This specification is enrolled in Chancery.³ If the specification be not ready for enrolment when the application is to be made for the patent, the inventor may lodge a caveat, setting forth that he has made a certain invention, for which he wishes to obtain a patent; and praying that the ground may remain unoccupied, by withholding any patent from others until notice be given to the person lodging the caveat, calling on him for a specification of the nature of his invention. If there should in the meanwhile be another application for the same patent, the Officers of State will, on hearing the rival pretensions, [113] decide which of the applicants has the best right to the patent. The caveat remains on the books for a year, and may be renewed from year to year. The caveat does not serve as a patent. The inventor runs every risk of his invention being brought into use in the meanwhile, which would bar his patent or defeat it.

The proviso which, since the time of Queen Anne, has been inserted in letters-patent, is that 'the patentee shall particularly describe and ascertain the nature of his said invention, and in what manner the same is to be performed, by an instrument in writing under his hand and seal, and cause the same to be enrolled in the Court of Chancery within a specified time after the date of the patent.' The prohibition commences with the patent, and from the day of the date of the letters-patent. It must be enrolled within two months; though in particular circumstances the time is sometimes extended, especially when it is intended to apply for patents also in England and Ireland. The enrolment of the specification within the time is a condition subsequent, the failure of which is fatal to the patent.

The patent and the specification must precisely accord with each other. The specification may be more precise and explanatory; but unless the patent describes the invention consistently with the specification, and in terms sufficiently distinct, it is bad. In the former case the patent is challengeable, as proceeding on a statement of an invention different from that which the patent is to cover; and being false, it is ineffectual.⁴ In the latter case, it is too general to put the public on their guard.⁵

A specification is a description of the invention, its principles, method, and practical effect. It must be expressed in plain, unambiguous, and intelligible words; not omitting any part that is necessary or useful; containing nothing to mislead; specifying all the best modes and ingredients which are used by or known to the inventor; and, on the whole, such as, without further instruction or inventions of their own, will, after the patent is expired, teach mechanical men of common understanding to prepare the manufacture with a degree

¹ See below, of Specification.

² See Manton v Manton, Davis. 348; Walker v Congreve, before Vice-Ch. Leach; Brunton and Hawkes, 4 Barn. and Ald. 455.

³ In England the specification may be inspected in the Petty Bag Office; in Scotland, in the Chancery Office. It is an instrument enrolled for the use of the public, and which, on occasion of a trial requiring it to be produced, the Court will order to be delivered up on due precautions for its return. Bloxam v E. of Rosalyn, 1825, 3 S. 428, N. E. 300.

⁴ The King v Else, 11 East 109, note; The King v Wheeler, 2 Bar. and Alder. 345.

⁵ L. Cochrane v Smethurst, 1 Starkie 208, [where a patent for a lamp was described as 'an improved method of lighting cities, towns, and villages.'] of certainty which shall not require experiment in following the directions,¹ and shall give the same advantage in all respects which the inventor himself enjoys.²

On this footing it is held, 1st, That if to the necessary ingredients, process, or method, there be added in the description others unnecessary for the purpose, or to the effect of puzzling or misleading, the patent will be bad.³ 2^d, That if the specification contain materials which are quite well suited for the purpose, but more expensive or less beneficial than the inventor himself uses, he has not made a fair disclosure, and will lose his privilege.⁴ 3^d, That if any ingredient or method in the invention be omitted or concealed, the patent is bad;⁵ and this even although such ingredient or method be not necessary, but only useful, in facilitating the operation: for at the expiration of the patent the inventor and the world do not start equal.⁶ 4th, If there be any ambiguity in the specification, it will be fatal [114] to the patent: for example, in the patent for making hair-brushes, the patent described them as tapering; but the specification did not sufficiently explain how the brush was to be formed, having merely directed a method of manufacture by which the bristles were made of unequal lengths; and although the meaning of this might have been discovered at once by looking at the brush, yet the description was held so ambiguous, that working solely by that guide, one could not produce such a brush; and taking the specification, therefore, as the only rule of the privilege, the patent was held to be bad.⁷ 5th, That if several methods be specified, and some of them do not work, although the others be perfect, the patent will be void.⁸ 6th, That in a patent for an improved instrument, if the specification do not distinguish what is new in the invention, and what is old, the patent will be void. The discrimination must appear on the face of the specification; but this may be by reference made to the former specifications, or by the recital of the first patent in the second.⁹

What is already before the public cannot be the subject of a patent; and if the patent be for an improvement on an old machine, for which there is an existing patent, the inventor can make his improvement, if inseparable from the original machine, only after the expiration of the old patent, or by agreement with the patentee of the original machine.

While the public is entitled to all this fair disclosure, there is a degree of painful and distressing technicality which is too often destructive of all the hopes of fair profit which an inventor is entitled to expect. For it frequently happens, that the inventive genius which discovers the nature or the useful application of the principles of philosophy to the arts of life, is not always the fittest to describe in plain intelligible language the mode and details of the operation. It will be the duty of judges, therefore, so to deal between the public and the inventor, as not to encourage, on the one hand, substantially defective or fraudulent specifications; nor, on the other, to defeat the just rights of an ingenious man, and the fair returns of expensive experiments and loss of time, on account of some verbal incorrectness or technical blunder.¹⁰ On what is so entirely either matter of fact or matter of technical

¹ Arkwright v Nightingale, Dav. on Pat. 56.

² If by subsequent discovery the patentee improve his method, his original patent will stand subject to the imputation of concealment, which, if not refuted, will prove fatal. Boville v Moore, Davis. 401. [Campion v Benyon, 3 Brod. and B. 5; Felton v Greaves, 3 Car. and P. 611; Crossly v Beverley, 1 Mood. and M. 283. The description in the specification must be sufficient not only to enable a skilled workman to use the patented process, but also to show the public what they cannot use without infringing the patent. Morton v Middleton, 1863, 1 Macph. 718.]

³ Turner v Winter, 1 Term. Rep. 602. [Savory v Price, Ryan and M. 1.]

⁴ Boville v Moore, Dav. 398; and Turner's case, supra, note 3.

⁵ Wood v Zimmers, Holt's Cases 58.

⁶ Liardet v Johnson, 1 Term. Rep. 608, note; The King v Arkwright, Davis. 61.

⁷ The King v Metcalf, 2 Starkie, N. P. C. 249.

⁸ [Simpson v Holliday, L. R. 1 Eng. and Ir. App. 315, the Magenta dye case. The specification stated: 'I mix aniline with dry arsenic acid, and allow the mixture to stand for some time; or I accelerate the operation by heating it to, or near to, its boiling point, until it assumes a rich purple colour.' It was proved that it was necessary to apply heat in order to produce the colour; but evidence was given that a competent workman would apply heat. Held that the patent was invalidated by error in the specification.]

⁹ Harmer v Plane, 14 Ves. Jun. 130, 11 East 101.

¹⁰ [By statute, power has been conferred on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to allow specifications to be corrected, which by innocent mistake or ignorance have been knowledge or of common intelligence to practical men, though far removed from the habits of judges, the proper criterion is the verdict of a jury.¹

III. PERIOD OF MONOPOLY.—The time for which a patent may be granted is fourteen years; but in particular cases, where the inventor has been at great expense, or where the invention has peculiar merit, Parliament may interfere to prolong the time, as was done in the case of Watt and Bolton's steam-engines. Without legislative authority this cannot be done.²

IV. HOW THE BENEFIT IS COMMUNICATED.—Considered as an estate in the patentee, [115] available to creditors, the patent privilege may either be assigned or made the subject of diligence and attachment, or of sequestration.

1. By voluntary transference the privilege may, in whole or in part, be assigned. If the patentee do not wish to part with his right, he may grant licences to persons to use it. The patent contains a command that none shall, without licence of the patentee, in writing under his hand and seal, imitate or make addition to or subtraction from it; and such licences give right to maintain action of damages.³ The patentee may not only thus grant permission to others to manufacture the subject of the patent, but he may transfer by one general deed of assignment the entire right, accompanying the transfer with delivery of the patent. And so, indirectly, his creditors may take advantage of this power, by compelling the patentee to raise money for their payment. The only restraint on the alienation of a patent right is one imposed by the conditions of the grant itself, which has a proviso that the patentee shall not make any transfer or assignment of the privilege, or of any share of the benefit or profit thereof; or declare any trust thereof to or for any number of persons exceeding five; or shall open books for subscriptions to be made by any number of persons exceeding five; or shall receive money from more than five persons for the privilege; or act as a body corporate, or divide the benefit or privilege into any number of shares exceeding five: otherwise the patent to be void and ineffectual.⁴ This is a provision intended to enforce the provisions of the Act of 6 Geo. I. c. 18, which has yet been held an ambiguous and unintelligible Act. Probably some regulations touching this matter may be introduced during this session of Parliament, of which notice shall be given in the Appendix.

2. On bankruptcy, the privilege is a part of the estate taken under sequestration, referred to the trustee, and vendible for the benefit of the creditors, whether the bankrupt hold the entire patent, or a share, or only a licence.

V. NATURE OF THE RIGHT.—The benefit of the exclusive privilege is of the nature of an recorded erroneously; and for this purpose the patentee may, with leave of the Lord Advocate or Solicitor-General (on hearing parties who by caveat or on advertisement have appeared to oppose), enter a disclaimer of any part of the title or specification, or a memorandum of an alteration of them, not extending the right. 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 83; 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, sec. 39.]

¹ A very ingenious man had discovered certain improvements in the process of manufacturing sal ammoniac, and he obtained a patent for this manufacture. Another person was accused by him of having imitated or stolen his process, and he brought an action of damages. The question turned on the specification, and on the nature of the acts of the defender charged as invasions of the privilege. A most distressing succession of remits were made to professional men, chemists and others; and at last a proof after the old method of commission was taken, on which the Court pronounced judgment, finding the process not to have been duly described in the specification. When the cause came into the House of Lords, they sent it back to be remitted to the Jury Court for trial of the questions, 1. Whether the defender had made use of all or any, and which, of the alleged improvements described in the specification? 2. Whether any and what part or parts of that which is so described was or were known or used before the date of the letters-patent? And, 3. Whether the specification contains a particular description of the nature of the invention, and in what manner the same is to be executed, according to the true intent and meaning of the letters-patent? Astley v Taylor, 3 June 1817, F. C.; H. L. 25 June 1821, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 54.

² [By statute, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are empowered in special circumstances to grant a prolongation of the privilege for the further period of seven years. Notice must be given of the application by advertisement, in order that opposing parties may appear. See 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 83, sec. 4; 2 and 3 Vict. c. 67; 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, sec. 40.]

³ George v Wackerbach, Godson on Patents, p. 169.

⁴ [The restrictions on the number of persons to whom the benefit of a patent right may be communicated have been heritable right, as bearing a tract of future time; and adjudication seems to be the only diligence by which it can be affected.¹

Although one cannot have a patent for an invention which he has already disclosed for public use, he may prevent any person from vending a machine or manufacture as his, so as to take, without authority, the advantage of his personal character and credit as an artist.²

SECTION II.

OF LITERARY PROPERTY.

Analogous to the subject just discussed is Copyright, or Literary Property. Whether resting or not on any foundation of property by the law of nature, this right has been placed by express statute on a footing in which it has been attempted to reconcile the interests of the author with those of the public. And if in this the Legislature has not been perfectly successful, at least there seems to have been as near an approximation to the object in view as can well be expected.

Copyright is a valuable property, from which frequently a fund may arise of great importance to creditors. It rests now exclusively on statute; the great question having been settled with respect to an author's right at common law. But at the same time we must not lose sight of the original right of an author previous to publication; for on that may [116] arise several questions of no light importance, not only respecting the protection of an author's pecuniary rights, but in relation to the rights of his creditors to publish his manuscript productions.

I.—PROPERTY IN UNPUBLISHED WORKS.

An author has an undoubted right or uncontrolled power over his unpublished compositions. The ideas of a man's mind are so identified with himself, in respect of everything which can interest him or his friends, that whether they can be regarded as of pecuniary value in the way of property or not, he ought to be the sole arbiter of their fate, to authorize or to prevent their publication. If ever they are to be exposed to the public eye, the author ought at least to have full control over them before they are made up for publication, and actually submitted to public inspection. No man has a right to publish another's thoughts to the world, or to propagate their publication beyond the point to which he has given consent. His reputation is concerned, and he has a right to defend it by stopping the publication. Once committed to the public by printing, he is committed for ever: 'Reliqua rerum tuarum, post te alium atque alium dominum sortientur; hoc nunquam tuum desinet esse, si semel coeperit.' The author, then, ought to have reserved to him, till the moment of final and conclusive consent, the right of rejecting—the power of judging what it may be most useful, or creditable, or reputable to publish.

The question of a right to restrain publication may arise in several classes of cases.

I. PRIVATE LETTERS.—In relation to private correspondence, a very curious question has occurred, which has been viewed somewhat differently in this country and in England. It is not properly a question under the statute of copyright, otherwise the decisions in either country would be precedents equally in both. But it is of some importance to observe how this difference arises. In Scotland, the Court of Session is held to have jurisdiction, by interdict, to protect not property merely, but reputation, and even private feelings, from out-removed by 15 and 16 Vict. c. 83, sec. 36. See Addison on Contracts, 6th ed. 121.]

¹ [In Adv.-Gen. v Oswald, 1848, 10 D. 969, the judges in

Exchequer held that a patent right is personal property, and so liable to legacy-duty.]

² Wilkie v M'Culloch & Co., 1823, 2 S. 413, N. E. 369.

rage and invasion. In one respect the publication of private letters may outrage both ; and the question has been, Whether, where letters have been written and sent to a correspondent, the author, by sending them to his friend, authorizes him to disseminate them, or to publish them for gain? Now the purpose of the communication is quite different. It rather implies a veto on publication. Composition for the public and for the eye of a friend are in a different spirit. It is one of the great charms of epistolary correspondence, that one writes not under the awe of a misjudging world ; but throws out unscrupulously his genuine and undisguised sentiments, utters his most secret thoughts, and, with as little reserve as in the secrecy of his own chamber, expresses his feelings of affection, or his murmurs of disapprobation and of censure, in full reliance that they are confided to a friendly ear. By the publication of such effusions, confidential, careless, unthinking of consequences, a man may be wounded in the tenderest part ; his literary reputation hurt ; his character traduced. It is, accordingly, the understood or implied condition of the communication, the implied limitation of the right conferred, that such communications are not to be published. With these natural feelings on the breach of epistolary confidence, the determinations of the Court of Session have accorded.¹

[117] In England several cases have occurred of a similar nature.² But in all of them there has been an admixture of the question of property in the letters, as literary compositions under the Act, which would scarcely have entered into consideration with us ; and which suggests doubts whether, independently of such idea of property, the Courts would have interfered to grant injunction. But this matter rests now on a footing which brings it, in England, nearly to the footing on which it stands with us. 1. The injunction jurisdiction of Chancery seems to require property as its groundwork, for it has been doubted whether on any other ground, as of libel, an injunction could be granted. 2. Lord Hardwicke in Pope's case, and Lord Apsley in Chesterfield's, held that there was a species of property in letters, a joint property in the writer and receiver ; a special property only in the receiver, which did not authorize the invasion of the joint right of the writer. 3. Lord Eldon, in a case decided in 1818, entertaining great doubts whether, correctly speaking, there be such property, has yet expressed his determination to adhere to the decisions which fixed that point ; and has said, that although he is not 'to declare that I am to interfere because the letters were written in confidence, or because the publication of them may wound the feelings of the plaintiff, yet if mischievous effects of this kind can be apprehended in cases in which this Court has been accustomed on the ground of property to forbid publication, it would not become me to abandon the jurisdiction which my predecessors have exercised, and refuse to forbid it.'³ Where the publication of letters, however, is a breach of trust, the Courts of England restrain the publication ;⁴ and yet doubts seem to be entertained in England, whether letters falling into the hands of the assignees of bankrupts could be secured from publication by injunction.⁵ With us, I think, there would be no such doubt.

There are exceptions, however, to the author's right of restraining publication in such cases : As, 1. Where the purposes of public justice require the disclosure ; in which cases

¹ So it was held in Dodsley v M'Farquhar, in 1775, relative to the publication of Lord Chesterfield's Letters (5 Br. Sup. 509, M. App. Literary Pr. No. 1) ; and again, more solemnly, in Cadell and Davies v Stewart, 1804, M. App. Literary Pr. No. 4. But see 5 Pat. 493. Here letters written by the poet Burns to a lady whom he distinguished by the name of Clarinda, had been by her given to a bookseller of the name of Stewart, who published them. The children of Burns, as interested in his literary reputation, applied for a remedy, and after full discussion they were found entitled to an interdict.

² One case of Pope and Swift's correspondence, Pope v Curl,

2 Atk. 342 ; Thomson v Stanhope, Ambler 737. Another, of letters by an old woman under the influence of a weak attachment to a young man. Eaton's case, mentioned in 2 Vesey and Beames 27.

³ Gee v Pritchard, 2 Swanst. Rep. in Chancery 402.

⁴ So, in Eaton's case, supra, where a bargain was made for the delivering up of the letters.

And in the E. of Granard v Dunken, in Ireland, 1 Ball. and Beatty 209, where a relation living in the family had got possession of private letters, and threatened to publish them.

⁵ See Sir T. Plumer's opinion in Perceval v Phipps, 2 Vesey and Beames 28.

it is to be made under the order of a Court.¹ 2. There may be cases where one may be entitled to publish, as by authority of the party.²

II. PUBLICATION BY ACTING OR RECITING.³—Where the composition has been made public, not by printing or selling, but by recitation or acting, the person who for money gets access to the work as thus delivered, may be said to have purchased the property of those ideas and words which he can catch and remember. It has, however, been held that such communication is not to be taken as thus unreservedly given, but that only the right has been given to the pleasure derivable from hearing the composition.⁴

III. GIFT OR SALE OF MANUSCRIPTS.—Where compositions intended for publication, or [118] fit for it, by accident, or donation, or other title short of an authority to publish, come into the hands of another person, law protects the author in his right of reputation as well as in his proprietary rights.⁵

Thus it is not in literary property, as in the law of patents, that the circumstance of being already known or used gives a right to the public against the inventor. For though a book has been given out in manuscript, and extensively read and copied, still, for printing and publication, the author's right is entire.⁶

IV. BOOK PRINTED, OR IN PRINTER'S HANDS.—Such a work, not yet published, and still in the hands of a printer, seems to be in the same situation with the cases already discussed; for although the printer may have a lien over the book, he seems to have no right to publish it.⁷

Before leaving this subject, it may be proper to take notice of a peculiar feature in English practice (already seen to influence some of the cases quoted), which ought to be kept in view, and contrasted with our own.

¹ 'For the purposes of public justice' (Lord Eldon, Chancellor, has said), 'publicly administered according to the established institutions of the country, the letters must always be produced. I do not say that of justice administered by private hands.' 2 Swanst. 427.

² As in the above case of Lord and Lady Perceval v Phipps, in 1813, where Sir T. Plumer held the lady to have given Phipps authority to publish in his own vindication. 2 Ves. and Beames 19.

³ [A valuable species of composition, in the form of lectures publicly delivered, is exposed to the same sort of invasion as dramatic pieces. On this subject a statute was passed in 1835, which affects the right of lectures in particular situations; and it is important to observe the several cases which fall under that statute, and those which are still left to the common law. See the statute 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 65. There are in the statute express exceptions: of lectures already published with consent of the authors or their assignees, and of which the term of copyright has not expired; of lectures delivered without previous notice given to two justices of the peace, and of lectures delivered in any university, public school, or college, or public foundation, as to which the law is declared to remain the same as if the Act had not been passed. In practice, therefore, the lecturer's best protection will be found in the common law or in the ordinary copyright statutes. See Abernethy v Hutchinson, 1825, 3 Law Journal 209.]

⁴ So, one who took down Macklin's comedy of Love à la Mode in shorthand, was prohibited by injunction from publishing it. Macklin v Richardson, Ambler 694; Coleman v Walker, 5 Term. Rep. 245.

⁵ On this ground, in various cases, Courts have interfered. So, 1. In the case of Lord Clarendon's History, one copy had been lodged by his son in the Petersham Library, and another given to a Mr. Gwyane. The copy in the library was destroyed by fire, and Mr. Gwynne's copy was published. The question was tried at the instance of Lord Clarendon's heirs, and the donation of this copy was found not to give a right to publish. D. of Queensberry v Shebbeare, 1758, Burrow, vol. iv. p. 2330. 2. The same principle was applied where a person, having obtained an unpublished book, translated and published it. That was held to be a breach of confidence: for although, if the original had been published, there could have been no objection to a translation of it; yet, while the original remained still unpublished, the publication of the translation was held not to be justifiable. 3. Another question occurred between Mr. Southey and Sherwood. Mr. Southey, when a very young man, had gone to London with his poem of Wat Tyler, and after a negotiation with a bookseller, who declined to publish it, Mr. Southey left it in the bookseller's hands, where it remained forgotten (as it was said) for twenty-three years, when it was published by Sherwood; and Southey applied for an injunction against the publication, as injurious to his reputation, and without his authority. The principles which I have stated were fully recognised in that case; but the Lord Chancellor went on this ground, that there was so great a doubt as to the property of the work, it being incredible that it should have been left so long without some intention of alienation, gift, etc., and also so much reason on another account to refuse an injunction (in so far as the book was of a nature which a court of law would not have protected on an action for penalties under the Act), that the Court of Chancery could not interfere till the right was established at law. Southey v Sherwood, 2 Merivale 435.

⁶ See White v Geroch, 2 Barn. and Ald. 298.

⁷ [See Davis v Miller, 1855, 17 D. 1166, where a person who had sent a letter to a newspaper for publication was held entitled to countermand his order.]

Of all the judicial remedies against the invasion of an author's right, that of interdict in Scotland, or injunction in England, is perhaps the most valuable. It is, in cases where low booksellers alone are likely to invade, easier and better to prevent than to indemnify. But this sort of jurisdiction in England proceeds on the sole ground of property, and will not be exercised either where that property is questionable; or where, instead of property, the right is merely to have reputation protected; or where, although the property be clear, it is not such a property as at law, for the purpose of having damages or a valuable pecuniary right established, could be maintained.¹

[119] On these peculiarities of English practice, Wat Tyler and Don Juan, and every other infamous publication, seem to have free circulation by means of the English press.

In Scotland this question is disposed of otherwise: the principle adopted in English practice is not sanctioned. Even if property in the work be the sole ground of interdict, it is the proof of property alone (undistracted by any inquiry into the nature or value or subject of it) that with us guides judicial interference. For the uses to be made, or the abuses, of that property, the law provides another remedy, in administering which that particular use forms the true point of inquiry.

From what has now been stated, it is on the whole to be concluded, 1. That the right of the author in his unpublished work, whether intended to be published for profit or otherwise, is an exclusive right, which no stranger can interfere with to disturb or invade. And, 2. That creditors seem to have no right (except indirectly by the operation of personal execution) to insist on compromising their debtor's reputation by the publication of manuscript compositions.

II.—PUBLISHED WORKS.

Works which have already been published stand on a different footing from those which are still unpublished. The ideas which form the composition, the language in which they are clothed, are by the act of publication in the hands of the world. The question was difficult and interesting, whether at common law the right to multiply and make profit by the sale of works in this situation could be protected? When this question first occurred, the difficulty was of the same kind with that already taken notice of in relation to inventions. The book being published, and so by sale or gift transferred, the universal use of the contents for reading, reciting, transcribing, printing, etc., seem to be conferred. The question admitted of many doubts and much controversy. Both in England and in Scotland it was judicially tried. In England, the discussion was carried on in the several Courts for some years from 1768 to 1774. The question in King's Bench was decided in favour of the author,—namely, that he had a right of property at common law, and that he did not part with this right by publication. But this was reversed in the House of Lords, after the opinions of the judges were heard, who greatly differed.² In Scotland, this question had been tried twenty years before, and decided against the author's right;³ and the Scottish ¹ This doctrine was first introduced by Lord Chief-Justice Eyre. When Dr. Priestley sought damages for the injury done by the mob at Birmingham, one article consisted of certain manuscript volumes for publication. The answer was, that the doctor was in use to publish dangerous books; and the Chief-Justice said, that he would hold evidence to that effect good against the claim for indemnification. 2 Merivale 437.

In a case of Dr. Walcot (Peter Pindar), 7 Ves. 1, and in Southey's case, 2 Merivale 435, this doctrine was applied to injunctions.

See also Murray v Benbow, as to Lord Byron's Cain, Jacob 474, note.

See also the case of Lawrence v Smith in 1822, Jacob 471.

² A very interesting account of this great question will be found in 4 Burrow 2303, 2417.

³ Midwinter and others v Hamilton, 1748, M. 8295. On appeal, the case went off upon informality in the original summons.

Hinton v Donaldson, 1773, 5 Br. Sup. 508, affirmed on appeal.

It may be added that, in Cadell and Davies v Robertson, 1804, as determined in H. L. 16 July 1811, 5 Pat. 493, the author's right was held to depend entirely on the Act of Queen Anne.

determination came by appeal to the House of Lords at the same time with the English question. So that the law in both ends of the island was settled on this question.

The right thus resting solely on statute is defined by the Act of Queen Anne, as qualified by subsequent statutes.¹ The 8 Anne, c. 19, proceeds on a preamble that printers and others had taken the liberty of printing, etc. books and other writings, without the consent of the authors or proprietors, to their great detriment; and so it is enacted: 1. That the author of any book already printed, who has not transferred to any other the copy or copies thereof, or the bookseller, etc. who has purchased or acquired the copy or copies in order to print or reprint the same, shall have the sole right and liberty of printing such book [120] for twenty-one years. 2. That the author of any book already composed, and not printed or published, or that shall hereafter be composed, and his assigns, shall have the sole liberty of printing, etc. for fourteen years from the day of first publishing the same; to be, on the author's survivance, prolonged for other fourteen years. 3. That any printer, etc. printing, etc. such book, without consent of the proprietors thereof in writing, signed before two credible witnesses; or any one who, knowing the same to be printed without consent of the proprietor, shall sell, publish, etc., shall forfeit the book or books, and each sheet shall be damasked and made waste paper of, and he shall forfeit one penny for each sheet found in his custody, half to the king, half to the informer. By the second part of the Act it is provided, on a preamble that many persons may offend through ignorance, unless provision be made for ascertaining the property and consent of the author, that none shall be subject to the penalties or forfeitures unless the title to the copy of the book shall, before publication, be entered in Stationers Hall. There is also a provision that nine copies of each book shall be delivered for the use of certain libraries in England and Scotland.

To prevent the bad effect of the monopoly thus granted, provision was made: 1. As already said, That the privilege should endure only for fourteen, or at most twenty-eight years; and, 2. That if the price should be exorbitant, application might be made to certain judges to have it abated.

Under this Act it was first questioned, whether, admitting that at common law there was no exclusive right, the author's title to protection was to depend on his entry of his book in Stationers Hall? There could be no doubt that, to recover the penalties, this was necessary (by sec. 2). But it was held in England, that the general right of property, under the protection of common law remedies, by injunction, damages, etc., was vested by the Act itself from the moment of publication.² And although in Scotland the question was decided differently,³ this was reversed in the House of Lords; and it was held, 1. That no one is liable to be sued for the penalties under the Act, without an entry in Stationers Hall; 2. That the person having the right bestowed by the Act, is entitled to maintain a suit in order to prevent the violation thereof, by interdict, for the term or terms during which the statute has given them such sole liberty, although there should not have been such entry made before the publication.

The whole of this matter is placed upon a new footing by the Act 54 Geo. III. c. 156. This Act has three objects: 1. To confer a right on certain libraries to demand copies of each book printed for sale; 2. To declare the author's right for a certain time independent of any entry in Stationers Hall; and, 3. To extend the right conferred by the Act on authors of books already published, living at the time.

¹ [The statutes on this subject are: 8 Anne, c. 19; 12 Geo. II. c. 36; 15 Geo. III. c. 107; 34 Geo. III. c. 20; 54 Geo. III. c. 156; 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 110; 5 and 6 Vict. c. 45 (prints, engravings, etc.); 5 and 6 Vict. c. 100, and 6 and 7 Vict. c. 65 (designs); 7 and 8 Vict. c. 12 (international); ibid. c. 73 (engravings); 8 and 9 Vict. c. 57 (art unions); 10 and 11 Vict. c. 95 (colonies); 13 and 14 Vict. c. 104 (designs); 14 and 15 Vict. c. 8 (designs); 15 and 16 Vict. c. 12

(international); 21 and 22 Vict. c. 70, and 24 and 25 Vict. c. 73 (designs); 25 and 26 Vict. c. 68 (paintings, drawings, and photographs).]

² Tonson v Collins, 1 Blackst. Rep. 330; Miller v Taylor, 4 Burr. 2380; Beckford v Hood, 7 Term. Rep. 620.

³ Cadell and Davies v Robertson, 1804, revd. in H. L. 16 July 1811, 5 Pat. 493.

1. The first part of the Act orders that, after the date of the Act, eleven copies of every book, and of every volume thereof printed, on the paper on which the largest number or impression shall be published (except for the British Museum, which shall be the best), together with all maps and prints belonging thereto, shall be delivered on demand in writing to certain libraries; but not of any second or subsequent edition, unless it shall contain alterations; and if the alterations shall be published separately, a copy only of such alterations.

2. From the date of the Act, the author of any book or books composed, and not printed and published, or hereafter to be printed and published, and his assigns, shall have the sole liberty of printing, etc., for the full term of twenty-eight years; and if the author be alive at the end of that period, for the residue of his natural life, saving to the assignees the right of selling copies printed within the twenty-eight years, and also saving any agreement respecting this survivance term which may have been made between the author and [121] his assignees. And printers who shall print without the consent of the author or proprietor in writing, or persons who, knowing it to be printed without consent, shall sell or have in possession such book, without consent in writing, shall be liable to a special action on the case, or an action of damages in Scotland. And also, the offender shall forfeit and deliver to the author such books, or sheets thereof, and threepence for each sheet printed or published and exposed to sale, half to the king, half to the informer.

3. In order to ascertain what books shall from time to time be published, the title of every book demandable under the Act, published after it, shall, within a month after publication if in London, or three months if published elsewhere, be entered in the register book of Stationers Hall, open to inspection, under the penalty of £5, and forfeiture of eleven times the price of the book, to be recovered by those entitled to sue, and first suing for the same.¹

4. Authors of books not published fourteen years, and of which the authors were alive at the date of the Act, have the full benefit of it.

5. Penal actions are limited to twelve months.

[COPYRIGHT OF BOOKS.—The statutes cited by the author are repealed, and the law of copyright placed on a new footing, by 5 and 6 Vict. c. 45. It is enacted by sec. 3: 'That the copyright in every book which shall, after the passing of this Act (1st July 1842), be published in the lifetime of the author, shall endure for the lifetime of such author, and for the further term of seven years, commencing at the time of his death, and shall be the property of such author and his assigns; provided always, that if the said term of seven years shall expire before the end of forty-two years from the first publication of such book, the copyright shall in that case endure for such period of forty-two years, and that the copyright in every book which shall be published after the death of its author shall endure for the term of forty-two years from the first publication thereof, and shall be the property of the proprietor of the author's manuscript, from which such book shall be first published, and his assigns.' By sec. 4: 'The copyright which at the time of passing this Act shall subsist in every book theretofore published (except as hereinafter mentioned) shall be extended and endure for the full term provided by this Act in cases of books thereafter published, and shall be the property of the person who at the time of the passing of this Act shall be the proprietor of such copyright; provided always, that in all cases in which such copyright shall belong, in whole or in part, to a publisher or other person, who shall have acquired it for other consideration than that of natural love and affection, such copyright shall not be extended by this Act, but shall endure for the term which shall subsist therein at the time of the passing of this Act and no longer, unless the author of such book, if he shall be living, or the personal

¹ [Registration at Stationers Hall is by statute declared to be prima facie evidence of proprietorship of copyright. It seems that, in case of this prima facie title being disputed, it may be supported by other evidence, and that an assignment attested by two witnesses is not essential. Kyle v Jeffreys, 1856, 18 D. 906; 1859, 21 D. (H. L.) 8, 3 Macq. 611.]

[representatives of such author, if he shall be dead, and the proprietor of such copyright, shall, before the expiration of such term, consent and agree to accept of the benefits of this Act in respect of such book, and shall cause a minute of such consent (according to a schedule annexed to the Act) to be entered in the book of registry; in which case such copyright shall endure for the full term by this Act provided in cases of books to be published after the passing of this Act, and shall be the property of such person or persons as in such minute shall be expressed.]

Thus it appears that the statute confers or confirms the copyright of such literary works only as 'shall be published' either during the life of the author or after his death, or in which at the date of the Act there was still a subsisting copyright; the right extending, by secs. 17 and 29, to all the British dominions. In all other respects the right of authors is left unaffected, it being by sec. 28 declared that 'nothing in this Act contained shall affect, alter, or vary any right subsisting at the time of passing of the Act, except as herein expressly enacted.' The right of the author of any unpublished composition is thus left unaltered.

PERIODICAL WORKS.—By secs. 18 and 19, copyright in periodical works, such as encyclopædias, reviews, magazines, or works published in a series of articles, parts, essays, or portions of such publications, is secured to the proprietor or publisher, where the author has been employed and paid by such proprietor or publisher; but this only under the condition of not publishing for the term of twenty-eight years the article separately without the consent of the author; the property of the article being reserved to the author for the remainder of the term of copyright given by the Act to authors, and full power of bargaining with the publisher or proprietor for a right to publish separately during the twenty-eight years. The right of such periodical work is secured to the proprietor by entering in the registry the title of such work, or of any part published, after the date of the Act, of a work commenced previously, though then of the first publication, and the names and places of abode of the proprietor and of the publisher.

Under the former statutes, it was doubted how far, under the word Book, a literary composition consisting of a single sheet or part of a book, as a poem, song, etc., was a subject of copyright. But all these difficulties are removed by the second section of this Act, which under the word book includes 'every volume, part or division of a volume, pamphlet, sheet of letterpress, sheet of music, map, chart, or plan separately published.' It is also by this section declared, that under the words 'dramatic piece' shall be comprehended 'every tragedy, comedy, play, opera, farce, or other scenic, musical, or dramatic entertainment.'

The title of a periodical publication or newspaper was held under the former statutes to be a proper subject of copyright, as characterizing the particular publication,¹ that it cannot therefore be assumed by another without injury, although a similar title distinguishable may be assumed.² On this point nothing is said in the present statute, unless the words 'sheet of letterpress' be held to include a title; but there is at least nothing to sanction any alteration of the grounds upon which the former judgments were based.]

The questions which arise in respect to literary property under this statute generally turn on identity, Whether the identical work of the author has been invaded? In regard to an original work this can seldom present a question of any great difficulty; so peculiar in the conception or in the expression is every man's literary composition, and so small is the chance of similarity in any case of the kind.

1. Where, in encyclopædias or reviews, quotations have been made so extensive as to extract the whole value, or the most valuable part of the work of an author, this has been held to amount to invasion of the right, so as to entitle the author to protection.³

¹ Hay v Kirby, 8 Ves. 215; Keene v Harris, cited 17 Ves. 338; Constable and Co. v Brewster, 3 S. 152.

² See 8 Ves. 222.

³ So, under the old Act of Queen Anne, a question arose relative to Stuart's History of the Reformation, which had been almost verbatim inserted in an Encyclopædia, and it

2. But it is difficult to define what is fair quotation. The best method of settling such a question conclusively is by jury trial; when the jury, with the aid of such observations as the judge shall deliver relative to any mixture of law in the question, will declare what is fair and honest in such a case.¹

3. The substance of a book may be given in other words without being held an encroachment. So, also, an abridgment may be made; but in neither of these cases must the deviation or abridgment be only colourable. The substance must not be given in the author's words.²

4. In such questions, the great difficulty arises in regard to those works which proceed on and profess to deliver information which is equally accessible to all; as in the case of almanacs, directories, road-books. There is undoubtedly no property in the information itself, but there is in the labour of collecting and arranging it; so that if one, without surveys, or going to the original sources, publish the information collected by another, it is an encroachment. The piracy has generally been detected by the slavishness with which the very words of the original have been copied. Where there is this or any other indication that the information has been taken from the previous work, and not from the original sources, the statute will apply;³ and although the substance of both works may necessarily be [122] the same, the subsequent work will not escape the imputation of an unfair encroachment.⁴

5. The statute of Anne, in the enacting part, speaks only of book or books, although in the preamble it speaks of books or other writings. Under these words it was doubted whether a single sheet was a book. It was held in the affirmative.⁵ So a part of a book as a tale, printed and bound up with others.⁶

6. There may be copyright in part of a work without any right to the whole. The author of notes on a work which is itself beyond the term of monopoly, has property in those notes.⁷

7. There may be property in a title, and in the way of giving a book to the world. This is a very peculiar sort of right, not capable of being grounded on the same precise foundations with literary property under the Act, but rather on a sort of association with, or as an accessory of, that right. A periodical publication, as a magazine, review, or encyclopædia, published periodically or in parts, is in this situation. There is no piracy of the actual composition perhaps; but, by assuming the same title, those who may be attracted by the reputation of the work which goes under that title, may be drawn off to purchase the new one,—the very assumption of an appropriate title being evidence of the loss to the one party in proportion to the gain expected by the other.⁸ The same title cannot therefore be taken; but a similar and distinguishable title may be assumed.⁹

8. A book published abroad seems still to continue property to the author for a reasonable time to have it published in Great Britain. But if he neglect this opportunity, the

was held an invasion of the right. Murray v M'Farquhar, 1785, M. 8309. [Sayere v Moore, 1 East 361, note.]

¹ See, in illustration of this point, Rowarth v Willis, 1 Camp. 94; and Wilkins v Aikin, 17 Vesey 422, where the Lord Chancellor sent a case to be tried at law for the purpose of settling the question by a verdict.

² See this subject illustrated, and the distinction between fair and colourable abridgments, in Gyles v Wilcox, 2 Atk. 143; Bell v Walker, 1 Brown Chan. Cases 451; Butterworth v Robinson, 5 Vesey 709; and Whittingham v Wooler, 17 Vesey 424, as to quotations. [Pike v Nicolas, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 251.]

³ It must, of course, be distinguished correctly how far the proof legitimately goes; for a mistake transcribed goes only to that particular passage, and by inference only can be extended further. Of this the jury will judge.—Dict. of Lord Ellenborough. Cary v Kearsley, 4 Esp. 168.

⁴ The whole of this subject is fully discussed in Longman v Winchester, 16 Ves. 269, and Wilkins v Aikin, 17 Ves. 422, and the cases there referred to; and in the Scottish case of Taylor and Skinner v Bayne and Wilsons, 1776, M. 8308. See also an elaborate opinion of Lord Erskine, Chan., in Matherson v Stockdale, 12 Ves. 273. [Kelly v Morris, L. R. 1 Eq. 697; Morris v Ashbee, L. R. 7 Eq. 34; Morris v Wright, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 279.]

⁵ Huie v Dale, 1803, 11 East 244.

⁶ White v Geroch, 2 Barnw. and Ald. 298.

⁷ See Cary v Longman, 1 East 358, and the cases there referred to.

⁸ So, in Hog v Kirby, a magazine publishing in numbers was thus invaded, and protected by injunction, 8 Ves. 215. So of a newspaper, Keene v Harris, 17 Ves. 342. Constable & Co. v Brewster, 1824, 3 S. 215, N. E. 152.

⁹ See 8 Ves. 222.

work is open to others to publish; and the person first lawfully publishing in this country seems to have the privilege.¹

9. The right is by the statute confirmed to the author (or his assigns having his authority in writing) during a period of twenty-eight years from the day of publishing; and if he shall be alive at the expiration of that term, during his natural life.² The right after the expiration of the twenty-eight years is the author's alone; saving, however, to the assignee such copies as have been printed during the twenty-eight years (sec. 9). It is held under this Act, 1. That the author, when he sells, in general terms, without any limitation, has no resulting right against his own assignee by survivorship.³ 2. That if the book was published more than twenty-eight years before the passing of the Act, the author has not the remainder copy-right.⁴ The transfer of the copyright is by assignation, but there seems to be no precise method whereby in a competition the transfer is to be completed. It seems to class with heritable rights, as bearing a tract of future time, and as unattachable by any diligence but adjudication.⁵

A written title is required in all cases where the action is not by the author [123] himself;⁶ and acquiescence in a publication is not enough to confer the right.⁷

As a sequel to the law of literary property, it may be fit to mention some other particulars analogous in principle.

1. Engravings may be the subject of a kind of property much of the same description with literary compositions. This sort of property was first regulated by the 8 Geo. II. c. 13; a statute of which the celebrated Hogarth was the author. He prepared it in order to protect those engravings of his which, the instant they were published, were exposed to all sorts of piracies. This defective statute was reformed by the 7 Geo. III. c. 38, and 17 Geo. III. c. 57.⁸ These Acts protect, 1. Engravings, etchings, or works in mezzotinto or chiaro-oscuro, of any historical or other print or prints which any one shall invent or engrave; or, 2. Such as one shall, from his own works, design or invention, cause to be engraved, etc.

In these, as in the information generally contained in almanacs, etc., there is no property in the subject where it is not an original design of the engraver. The property is only in the engraving itself, from which no copy can be made without piracy.⁹

2. There is also a similar property conferred on the first maker of busts, models, casts, etc., by 38 Geo. III. c. 71; amended by 54 Geo. III. c. 56.

3. And a similar protection is by 54 Geo. III. c. 23 given to the inventors of original patterns for printing linens, cottons, etc. But this is granted only for the brief term of three months.¹⁰

4. Musical compositions fall under the Act of Queen Anne;¹¹ and on the same principle under the 54 Geo. III. c. 156. We have already had occasion to take notice of a case where, as such, they were found to be protected, though consisting only of a single sheet.¹²

¹ Clementi v Walker, 1824, 2 Barn. and Cress. 861.

² 54 Geo. III. c. 156, sec. 4.

³ Cannan v Bowles, 1 Cox. 288; Rennet v Thomson, ib.

⁴ Boork v Clarke, 1 Barn. and Ald. 396.

⁵ [On the analogy of patent right, it may be laid down that copyright is personal property. Supra, p. 111, note 1.]

⁶ Powers v Walker, 1814, 4 Camp. 8; Morris v Kelly, 1820, 1 Jacob and Walker 481.

⁷ Latour v Bland, 2 Starkie 382.

⁸ [Also 5 and 6 Vict. c. 100; 7 and 8 Vict. c. 73; 25 and 26 Vict. c. 68.]

⁹ See De Berrenger v Whible, 2 Starkie 548.

¹⁰ [See 6 and 7 Vict. c. 65; 13 and 14 Vict. c. 104, and 14 and 15 Vict. c. 8 (which apply also to sculpture); 24 and 25 Vict. c. 73.]

¹¹ Bach v Longman, Cowp. 628.

¹² Huie v Dale, 2 Camp. 28; Clementi v Golding, 2 Camp. 25, and 11 East 248. See also White v Geroch, 2 Barnw. and Ald. 298. [Allied to these peculiar rights of property is the property in trade-marks, which is now protected by statute. If a manufacturer uses a symbol to denote that certain goods upon which it is affixed are manufactured by him, and the goods are put into the market, a certain reputation, accompanied by substantial advantages, accrues to them. By 25 and 26 Vict. c. 88, such symbols or trade-marks are protected against forgery. Independently of statute, Courts of Equity

EFFECT OF THE EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGE OF PATENT OR COPYRIGHT.—For the protection of a patent privilege, or of literary property, two several remedies are provided: 1. Interdict; and, 2. An action of damages.

1. INTERDICT is summarily obtained by application to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, accompanied by the proofs of a prima facie case; and when obtained, it has the effect of preventing the encroachment threatened or commenced, till a full judicial investigation shall take place, in order to decide whether the interdict shall be confirmed and made perpetual. This is the remedy which in most cases (of literary property especially) is the most useful; it being easier to prevent than to remedy the invasion and injury. But it will be remembered, that by an inconsiderate interdict a court may occasion irreparable damage; since, in the case both of machinery and of literary publications, a great expense may have been incurred, which, if the favourable moment be not seized, is entirely lost. In such cases it is the duty of a court of equity interposing, first, to require the best possible proofs which the suddenness of the occasion may allow, and to give as much opportunity of discussion and discovery as circumstances admit; and, secondly, if those proofs are in any danger of not standing the test ultimately, to allow the operation to proceed, in the meanwhile ordering [124] an account to be kept, by which indemnification may be given when the matter is finally decided.

In England, when a patent is new, but objected to on the ground of imperfect specification, or as otherwise exceptionable, the practice seems to be to require a trial at law before the Court of Chancery will interfere;¹ and in copyright the same principle directs the Court.² But when possession has been enjoyed exclusively for any considerable time under a patent or copyright, injunction is granted in England.³ With us, the same reluctance to interfere is not observed in this department of jurisdiction; but on evidence, prima facie satisfactory, the Court sanctions the remedy of interdict, as merely a temporary protection of the apparent right.

2. DAMAGES.—Action for damages lies, either accompanied by a declarator of the right or otherwise.

CHAPTER V.

OF HONOURS AND DIGNITIES.

IN former times, honours and dignities were annexed to land and castles rather than to the person; and when the land was alienated, the dignity passed with it. But now they are strictly personal; descendible to the heirs in the patent, but not capable of transference by alienation, nor attachable for debt. The territory of a peer, however, when unentailed, may be sold, and is open to the diligence of creditors: even that estate from which the title is assumed, may be adjudged and sold for debt.⁴

have interfered by injunction to protect the maker of the goods represented by the trade-mark in the exclusive use of it. Hall v Barrows, 32 L. J. Ch. 548, 33 ib. 204; Leather Cloth Co. v American Leather Cloth Co., 11 H. L. 523. According to these cases, the right is viewed as a species of property.]

¹ Hill v Thomson, 3 Merivale 624.

² 6 Ves. 707, Lord Eldon, Chanc.

³ As to patents, 3 Merivale 624-8, 14 Ves. 130. As to copyright, 6 Ves. 707.

⁴ Dirleton and Stewart agree, 1st, That personal honours are not the subject of execution and diligence; 2d, That even honours annexed to land do not go with the land to disponees or comprisers; and, 3d, Although Dirleton seems to stickle a little for a distinction between territorial and personal honours, Stewart is clear 'that there would be no distinction made with us between a title of honour given by patent, and the same title annexed to and joined with lands, but the same judgment made of the title in both cases.' 314 and 315.

CHAPTER VI.

OF OFFICES.

AN office is a right to exercise a public or private employment, and to take the fees and emoluments which belong to it. In considering offices as responsible for debt, three questions may be raised: 1st, Whether the office itself may be attached, or transferred by the operation of legal diligence, or sold for the behoof of creditors? 2^d, Whether the power of recommending or appointing a deputy can be made a source of gain and fund of payment? And, 3^d, Whether the wages, profits, or salary can be taken by the creditors of him who holds the office?

1. By edicts of Justinian, venality in public offices was forbidden in the Roman law;¹ and this continued long to be the law of all the European nations established on the ruins of the empire. It seems first to have been departed from in France, where the sale [125] of offices became a source of public revenue.² In England, no public office (a few only excepted) can be sold. This law is most especially directed against venality in offices connected with the administration of justice.³ In Scotland, all heritable offices may be voluntarily sold, or adjudged, and judicially sold for debt.⁴ So all patrimonial offices, such as are descendible to heirs and assignees, may be sold or adjudged.⁵ Offices which are not patrimonial, but in which there is a personal trust reposed, are not saleable, nor capable of being attached by diligence.⁶ The practice in Scotland has been extremely loose; and examples have occurred of the sale even of offices connected with the administration of justice.⁷ But of all offices, the purity of these is to be preserved with the greatest delicacy;

¹ Nov. 8 pr. and c. 1 and 11.

² The French, long wedded to the institutions of the civil law, adhered with great strictness to the laws against venality in offices, and even enforced them by very strong ordinances. But Francis I., amidst the disorder of his finances, was betrayed into the unworthy expedient of converting the sale of offices into a source of revenue. All offices might be purchased by certain payments to the royal treasury, and, when thus purchased, might be transferred for money, the king approving of the resignee. That Montesquieu should justify such venality (Esprit des Loix liv. v. c. 19), is by Voltaire attributed to his holding the presidency which his uncle had purchased. Vol. ix. p. 208.

³ By 5 and 6 Edward VI. sec. 16, the sale for money, directly or indirectly, is prohibited, of offices or deputations of offices, touching or concerning, 1. The administration or execution of justice; or, 2. The receipt of the king's treasure, etc.; or, 3. The receipt of the king's customs, or any administration or attendance in the king's custom-house; or, 4. The keeping of castles, etc. for the king; or, 5. Clerkships in courts of record: And it is provided that the prohibition shall not extend to any offices whereof a person is seised of inheritance, or to the keeping of any park, house, etc. But offices of inheritance, or for terms of years, are saleable.

² Blackst. 36. See Garforth v Fearon, 1 H. Blackst. 327, where Lord Loughborough delivers an elaborate opinion on the effect of bargains for the sale of offices.

The sale of public offices to the highest bidder leads to extortion, and some degree of corruption in the execution of them. The person who has the power of selling is induced to demand as high a price as the largest calculation of the emolument will sanction; and the purchaser, when installed, makes the best advantage of the power which his office puts into his hands. Neither can anything be a greater temptation to officers to abuse their power by bribery and extortion, and other acts of injustice, than the consideration of the great expense they were at in gaining their places, and the necessity of sometimes straining a point to make their bargain answer their expectations.' Hawkins' Pleas of Crown 198.

VOL. I.

See Cook's B. L. 298. Schilinger v Blackerby, 1 Ves. 347, holding the offices of the Palace and House of Lords liable to creditors.

⁴ As the heritable ushership (Cockburn, 1747, M. 150, 1 Pat. 603), so heritable sheriffships, etc. in former times. 2 Bankt. 219.

⁵ As the office of king's printer (Blair, 1737, M. 148), so the right of presenting a pauper to a public charity, 1 July 1796, in a question with the town of Edinburgh. [See Gardner v Grant, 1835, 13 S. 664; Bruce v Grant, 1839, 1 D. 583.]

⁶ So the office of keeper of the Register of Sasines is not adjudgeable. Wilson, 1759, M. 165. [See Paul v Hill, 1841, 2 Rob. 524; Ord v Hill, 1847, 9 D. 1118.]

⁷ In the case of Waddel v Inglis, 1770, M. 13134, 1 Pat. 205, and in the case of Stewart v Miller, determined in the House of Lords 25 Feb. 1802, 4 Pat. 286, it was clearly proved that such offices had frequently been sold and bargained for in Scotland. But in the last of these cases, the Lord Chancellor Eldon delivered his opinion strongly against venality in all public offices, and was peculiarly anxious (in moving the judgment of affirmance in the House of Lords sustaining the bargain between the parties) to guard against the belief that there was any intention to decide the general question, far less to give the sanction of their high authority to the sale of

and the provisions of the English statute of Edward Sixth are now extended to Scotland and Ireland.¹ The prohibition to sell offices and deputations is by the same Act extended to all offices in the gift of the Crown, and in the public departments of Government, in the United Kingdom, or in the colonies, or under the East India Company. But an exception is made: First, Of certain offices in the palace; and secondly, Of sales and exchange of commissions in His Majesty's forces, for the regulation price, and under such rules and restrictions as His Majesty from time to time shall establish.

[126] Under the exception contained in this Act, it may be questioned whether an officer in the army can be compelled to sell his commission for the benefit of his creditors. Certainly creditors may not directly attach the office by adjudication; and it would also appear that an officer, either on whole or half pay, would not be compelled in a sequestration to assign to his trustee, or in a cessio to authorize the sale of his commission.

If a commission is to be sold voluntarily for the benefit of creditors, the officer must first, on the proper application, obtain leave to sell; and those who conduct the transaction must agree with the purchaser, and then get the sale negotiated in the common way.

2. DEPUTATIONS OF OFFICES.—The doctrine relating to offices applies also to the power of deputation, on the same principle which bars the diligence of creditors in the case of the principal office. The right of appointing deputies cannot become a source of gain to the creditors of the principal; or be claimed by them as affording a fund of division, where the office is of the nature of a public trust, or relates to the administration of justice.²

3. SALARY OF OFFICE.—The salary of an office stands on a different footing from the office itself. Although the delectus personæ, which an office implies, may effectually prevent the office itself from being exposed to sale, to be purchased perhaps by one who is quite unable to discharge its duties, this principle at least can never stand in the way of creditors proceeding to attach the salary, or the accruing perquisites and profits as they arise, and converting them into a fund of payment.³

But any restraint on the right of attaching the salary of an office proceeds on other principles. 1. A proper salary is in its nature alimentary. In its very constitution and appropriation, the fund set apart for it is separated from common purposes, and from its destination it may fairly be regarded as under specific appropriation. And, 2. With this appropriation, the public policy concurs in requiring that officers should at all times be ready, without interruption, to perform the duties which the public expects from them. A offices. See a note of part of this speech in the Fac. Coll. vol. xiv. p. 197. [Thomson v Dove, 16 Feb. 1811, F. C.]

¹ 49 Geo. III. c. 126.

² See the above-quoted Act, 49 Geo. III. c. 126.

Lord Chancellor Thurlow held that where His Majesty empowers an officer, for the benefit of the public, to recommend, and much more to appoint, a person to an office, whether in the administration of justice or in matters of less consequence, the law supposes the Crown to repose the trust in him, that he will appoint a person worthy to fill the place; that he will not permit his judgment to be corrupted by entering into a consideration of the question who would give most for his recommendation or appointment; and any traffic which he enters into to make a personal benefit of his power and trust, is traffic which a court of equity will cut down. Hamington v Du Chattel, 1 Br. Ch. Cases 124. The report of this case, as in Brown, was said by Lord Eldon in the House of Lords to be very bad. 'A judgment,' said he, 'very ill reported, but most ably delivered.'

It was formerly a practice in Scotland, in the case of some offices, to take money for deputations; but such practices will not probably be continued, now that the opinion of the court of the last resort has so directly discountenanced them upon the broad ground of public expediency and constitutional law. It seems at one time to have been the resolution of Lord Chancellor Eldon to move, in Stewart and Miller's case, for a judgment annulling the whole bargain upon which the parties had come before the Court; and he was restrained only by the consideration that the Court of Session had not decided the case on the general question, so that it would have been an original discussion in the House of Lords, and that it would have occasioned an enormous expense to the parties to return to Scotland for a trial of the point.

³ Lord Kames, in his remarks on the case of Wilson v Falconer, delivers an opinion, that wherever there is a power of deputation, the emoluments may be adjudged, however personal the office, as the deputy there may easily account to the adjudger instead of the principal; that where there is no power of deputation, the emoluments cannot be adjudged. Select Decisions, p. 219. If this opinion is to be followed, it must be limited to offices which are mere sinecures, or to the surplus of a due subsistence.

doubt naturally suggests itself, whether, in deciding on such cases, the former of the considerations now stated has always been sufficiently recognised, or the latter enough attended to in its remote and in its immediate consequences. It is quite true that the law will not recognise as a sufficient characteristic of the alimentary nature of a fund, that it is necessary for the subsistence of the person favoured. But the particular appropriation to sub- [127] sistence is the decisive mark of an alimentary fund; and this seems to be necessarily implied in the appointment of a salary to a public office. On the other hand, it is consistent with the policy of thus securing the service and uninterrupted readiness of public officers for their duties, that their salaries should not serve as a fund of credit. It is at least sometimes true that credit is pernicious. And if the speculative opinion is not to be assented to universally, that to deny action for small sums would prove salutary in stopping such debts in their origin, yet in some cases a policy like this is unquestionably good. So it has been found in the Liquor Acts;¹ so it probably would prove in regard to the salaries of public officers, in stopping false credit beyond the amount of the salary, in preventing an officer from thus by anticipation dissipating the public provision for his services. Nothing can be more indecent than to see clergymen trafficking with their creditors for that stipend which is a provision for the undisturbed performance of their sacred functions; nothing more inconsistent with the very nature of the appropriation of military or naval pay, or half-pay, than that the officer whose services are thus purchased for the public, shall, by the consequences of a credit obtained by reliance on this fund as directly attachable, or indirectly to be reached by imprisonment, be placed in a state of incapacity for the performance of his duties. Yet these are views which have not been uniformly adopted in questions of this sort. Some salaries of a public nature have been allowed to be assigned or attached; others, though not attachable, have been ordered in cessio to be given up, or in part at least relinquished.

1. In England, a clergyman's benefice is held to be liable to sequestration, and the proceeds to distribution among creditors.² But neither the pay nor half-pay of an officer in the army or navy is in England held assignable; and although at one time it was found that they might be assigned in equity,³ this was afterwards held bad, and all assignments considered as ineffectual.⁴ The pay is not taken under a commission. Arrears seem to be held attachable.⁵ But that has been doubted.⁶

2. In the law of Scotland, the salary of a judge, the pay or half-pay of an officer, and the salary of other inalienable public offices, as the funds assigned by the statute for enabling those who hold them to discharge the duties of their place, have been supposed to be [128]

¹ 24 Geo. II. c. 40. See Index, Liquor Acts.

² Ex parte Meymot, 1 Atk. 196; Arbuckle v Cowtan, 3 Bos. and Pull. 321.

³ Stewart v Tucker, 1777, 2 Blackst. Rep. 1137.

⁴ Odlum, a half-pay lieutenant of a reduced regiment of foot, was imprisoned for debt by Flarty; and in a question concerning his liberation, under the Lords' Act, he objected to the inclusion of his half-pay in his schedule of funds to be given up to his creditors. The prisoner was ordered to be discharged without giving up his half-pay. Lord Kenyon said: 'Emoluments of this sort are granted for the dignity of the state, and for the decent support of those persons who are engaged in the service of it. It would therefore be highly impolitic to permit them to be assigned; for persons who are liable to be called out in the service of their country ought not to be taken from a state of poverty.' Judge Buller said: 'I know of no authority by which an officer may sell his half-pay, and on principles of policy he ought not to be permitted to do it. If the question was whether or not the pay which was actually due might be assigned, I should have thought it, like any other existing debt, assignable, but that does not extend to future accruing payments.' Flarty v Odlum, 3 Term. Rep. 3.

This decision was at the time highly approved of, as we learn from Lord Alvanly, Arbuckle v Cowtan, 3 Bos. and Pull. 328. And a similar judgment had been given in Chancery, in the case of Captain Kennedy, a bankrupt, about the year 1788.

The decision in Flarty v Odlum was strongly confirmed—first in the King's Bench, the Court holding that both on grounds of public expediency and on account of the officers themselves, half-pay is not assignable at law (Lidderdale v D. of Montrose, 4 Term. Rep. 248); and afterwards in Exchequer, in Stone and Lidderdale, 2 Anstruth. 533, where it was held not assignable in equity.

⁵ Barwick v Read, 1 Henry Blackst. 627. An opinion the other way seems to have been delivered by Lord Hardwicke, but not relied on. Cook 285.

⁶ 1 Montagu, Bankrupt Law, 1819, 446. [See Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 679.]

not attachable by creditors; but this doctrine has been called in question, and in modern practice is not admitted without limitation.

1. Minister's stipend has been held arrestable, and to fall under sequestration;¹ while the salary of a private lecturer in a chapel has been deemed alimentary, and exempt from attachment.²

2. A professor's salary has been held arrestable.³

3. Salaries of judges and other public officers of state have, however, been held not to be arrestable.⁴

4. It has not been left entirely on the general principle to dispose of the pay and half-pay of the army or navy. Special statute has declared in confirmation of the common law, that all assignments of such pay are void and null.⁵

Whether, indirectly, salaries, pensions, and stipends may become available to creditors, in so far as the relief from imprisonment by cessio bonorum is qualified by the necessity of giving up to creditors all that exceeds the necessary means of subsistence, will be discussed hereafter.⁶

5. Arrears have been considered as attachable, whether of pay or of salary.⁷

6. The salary of a public officer cannot lawfully be burdened with the payment of any sum as a consideration for the exertion of influence to procure the nomination.⁸ Neither can those who hold the power of nomination stipulate that a part of the salary shall be paid to a candidate who retires from the contest.⁹ These are pacta illicita, forbidden by the clearest considerations of public good. But it is left doubtful whether the allotment of a share of the salary by agreement between two candidates is legal.¹⁰ An agreement by an officer in bad health to share the emoluments with an assistant is effectual.¹¹

CHAPTER VII.

OF ALIMENTARY FUNDS.

THE power to give or to withhold a fund implies also a power to qualify the grant with such a restriction as shall exclude creditors. No one can so vest his own funds in himself, [129] or for his own use, as to exclude his creditors. But he may, by conveying his estate or funds to another, under a condition that it shall be applied only for a particular purpose,

¹ Anonymous, 1824, 3 S. 195, N. E. 133.

² See 1 Fount. 46 for the original doubts. Hall, 1736, M. 711. Hogg, 1743, M. 722; Elchies, Stipend, No. 5. Smith v E. of Moray, 13 Dec. 1815, Fac. Coll. [A. B. v Sloan, 1824, 3 S. 195, N. E. 133.]

³ Laidlaw v Wylde, 1801, M. App. Arrestment, No. 4. But this salvo beneficio competentia.

⁴ There is an Act of Sederunt, 11 June 1613, declaring that it shall not be lawful to arrest in the hands of the treasurer, or receiver's hands, any pension, fees, etc., directed to be paid to any by precept from His Majesty. Spottiswood's Prac. voce Pension; Sir Ilay Campbell's Acts of Sederunt, p. 9.

The salaries of judges and public ministers held not to be attachable. Stair iii. 1. 37; Act of Sed. 20 Nov. 1626, and decree in terms thereof, 27 Feb. 1662.

The salary of a member to the Parliament of Scotland not arrestable. Mollison v Clark, 1707, 2 Fount. 362.

⁵ 47 Geo. III. c. 25, sec. 4.

⁶ See below, of Cessio Bonorum.

⁷ Brodie v Campbell, 1715, M. 709, as to arrears of officer's pay.

⁸ See the case of Dalrymple v Shaw, 1786, M. 9531, where an opinion at least to this extent was delivered. See 49 Geo. III. c. 126. [Gardner v Grant, 1835, 13 S. 664, relative to an agreement to pay an annuity to one who had procured the officer's appointment. See also Bruce v Grant, 1839, 1 D. 583.]

⁹ Thomson v Dove, 16 Feb. 1811, 14 Fac. Coll. 196.

¹⁰ In the above case of Thomson v Dove, Lord President Blair expressly reserved his opinion on this question as more doubtful, though I confess that I cannot see much reason to hesitate in discountenancing a transaction which substantially destroys the freedom of election.

¹¹ See Haldane v De Maria, 6 May 1812, 14 Fac. Coll. 536. See 49 Geo. III. c. 126, sec. 11.

and that no creditor shall have the power of attaching it by diligence, place it beyond the reach of creditors while it continues in its original form, unmixed with the universitas of the holder's funds.¹ And so, where an estate is created and the proceeds appropriated, or a debt is constituted, and the obligation undertaken expressly for the purpose of alimentering and subsisting the person for whose use it is given, it is (at least so far as it exceeds not a moderate aliment) protected from creditors.²

Property conveyed to a wife, excluding the jus mariti, is not attachable by creditors.³ An aliment granted to a wife does not fall under the jus mariti so as to be affectable by her husband's creditors, or liable to compensation by debts due by him.⁴ But in order to protect a fund in this way, it is necessary that it should be properly constituted as an aliment. It is not enough that it be given as an annuity or liferent; it must be declared expressly alimentary.⁵

It is not sufficient to give the character of an alimentary provision, that it is the sole fund of subsistence.⁶ Thus, where a wife has an annuity secured to her by marriage contract, and on her husband's death marries again, her annuity from the first husband's estate will go to her second husband's creditors, leaving to her only the eventual survivorship. Neither is the maintenance of the wife an inherent burden on the jus mariti, so as to entitle her to claim a portion of the rents of her lands, free from the diligence of her husband's creditors.⁷ It seems, on the same ground, very doubtful whether the annuity settled on a wife on separation is attachable by the husband's creditors. See below, of Marriage Contracts and Bonds of Provision.

Pensions from the king are held as alimentary, although they do not expressly [130] bear a declaration to that effect.⁸

¹ [Baillie v Nasmyth, 1674, M. 703.]

² As the principles of the law of France were drawn from the same sources with those from which our law flowed, I make use, without scruple, of the admirable work of Pothier for the illustration of our jurisprudence. According to him, the French law gives effect to the constitution of such alimentary rights. 'A debt,' says he, 'which is given or bequeathed to me to serve for my aliment, with a provision that it shall not be seized by my creditors, is a debt against which no compensation can be opposed. For as this clause is effectual to prevent it from being seized by a third party, and applied in payment of my debt, so must it also for the same reason be effectual to prevent it from being applied, by means of compensation, in payment of what I owe to the debtor in it.' Traité des Obligations, tom. i. p. 314. This might stand as a passage in a book of Scottish law. Dirleton says, in reporting the case of Broomhall v Darsie, 'Constituto semel alimento, quo nihil in jure magis favorable, aut magis personale, de eo nec alienatio nec transactio rite celebratur; datur enim ut persona exhibeatur et utcunque vitam tolleretur.' 7 July 1678, Dirleton, voce Alimenta, p. 3.

³ Ersk. i. 6. 14.

⁴ Broomhall v Darsie, 1678, ut supra; Tenant, 1637, M. 10372; Westnisbet v Morrison, 1627, M. 10368; Lady Pinkell, 1709, M. 5999, 10399. [See Harvey v Calder, 1840, 2 D. 1095, as to whether an express exclusion of the diligence of creditors is necessary; also Waddell v Waddell, 1836, 15 S. 151; Rennie v Ritchie, 1845, 4 Bell 221.]

⁵ Kilcadron, 1639, M. 10372. A subject, the rents of which would in the common case fall to the husband jure mariti, was found not attachable by the husband's creditors, in respect that he lived separate from his wife, and gave her no aliment, so that her own rents were to be regarded as alimentary; or rather, the true principle of the decision was this, that a wife is entitled to a preference by retention of her tocher, or of the rents of her own estate, for her aliment, where she and her husband do not live together and share their fortunes. Jameson v Houston, 1770, Hamilton's Decisions, p. 128. In the case of a provision left by our great lawyer Dirleton to his niece, of the liferent of 20,000 merks (the fee to her son), 'for her better support and maintenance,' the Lords found it attachable by her husband's creditors, as not being declared expressly alimentary. Gordon of Pencaitland v Blackburn, 1697, M. 10394.

⁶ See Smith v E. of Moray, 13 Dec. 1815, Fac. Coll.

⁷ Turnbull, 1709, M. 5895; Robb, 1794, M. 5900. An opposite decision in the case of Lisk, 1785, was settled in consequence of an observation of the Lord Chancellor.

⁸ Dick v Sir A. Dick, 1676, M. 10387; Stair's Inst. ii. 5. 18, iii. 1. 37; Ersk. iii. 6. 7. A decision has been pronounced in England which I scarcely think could have been given in this country, and which appears contrary to the very intention of the bequest out of which it arose. A person bequeathed an annuity for life to another, with a proviso that it should be paid only into the annuitant's own hand, and that, if alienated, it should immediately cease. He became a bankrupt, and it was included by the commissioners. The question occurred in Chancery, and was sent to the King's Bench. The creditors claimed the annuity. The heir of the testator contended that it had ceased and determined, which the bankrupt denied, as he had given no voluntary alienation. The Court of King's Bench reported their opinion that the annuity had determined. Dommet v Bedford, etc., 6 Term. Rep. 684. See also 3 Vesey 149. [The reference to this somewhat exceptional case is scarcely sufficient for the purposes of illustration. See Wills and Succession i. 293, and ii. 65.]

The annuities due to the widows of Scottish clergymen, or of principals or professors in Scottish universities, and the provisions to their children, are not subject to arrestment,¹ nor can they be assigned.²

When, instead of an yearly sum, there is a residuary principal sum destined for aliment, and declared alimentary, it would seem that while the fund remains as a jus incorporale, distinct and unmixed with the debtor's effects, it is exempt from diligence.³

Although no person can reserve to himself any part of his own property so as to withdraw it from the diligence of creditors, a fund already protected as alimentary may be converted into another shape with an effectual reservation of its privilege.⁴ So, perhaps, it would be held where an office is abolished on a salary, or where the officer retires on a salary.

Persons who furnish subsistence are entitled by diligence to attach the alimentary fund of the year for which they made furnishings.⁵ It has been imagined that their diligence is limited to the year's fund; but the better opinion seems to be, that the furnishers of the year have a preference on that year's fund over furnishers of former years, but that the latter are not precluded from attaching the fund.

Where the alimentary fund is exorbitant, or where several alimentary funds concur, the debtor will not be privileged to enjoy the superfluity, while his creditors are deprived of their payment. The creditors may throw the debtor into prison; from which he will not be relieved by cessio bonorum till he give up a part of his aliment to his creditors, and restrict himself to such moderate competency as becomes his condition; but even, directly, a court would probably not feel themselves authorized to stop diligence intended to attach the excess of an exorbitant aliment.⁶

Sometimes the friends of a bankrupt appear at the sale of his property, and purchase goods or furniture for the aliment or personal use of him and his family. As a bankrupt may enjoy an alimentary fund acquired before bankruptcy, he may also enjoy it when bestowed upon him after bankruptcy. The only difficulty seems to be, whether he can hold moveable property under any condition that will protect it. At least it seems to be [131] competent to settle household furniture, etc., effectually upon his wife or children for their subsistence and aliment, so as to save it from the diligence of the creditors. Questions in such cases can arise only from the doubtful mode in which the fund is vested: 1st, If the fund or subject be vested strictly as alimentary, it would seem to be effectually guarded from the diligence of former creditors; for they have received the price of this fund, and are not misled into credit by the false reputation of ownership. 2^d, Furniture or clothes may also be effectually bestowed upon him in the same manner. 3^d, It would appear to be safe to vest property of any kind in him as trustee, for the use of his children or his wife. And 4th, Although a bankrupt cannot, without a discharge, be enabled to carry on trade again on his own account, without subjecting to payment of his former debts all his new acquisitions, yet the friends of the bankrupt's family may safely carry on trade for their behoof. They may purchase the bankrupt's stock, and, vesting it in themselves or in

¹ 17 Geo. II. c. 11, sec. 68; 19 Geo. III. c. 20, sec. 78. In establishing the Schoolmasters' Widows' Fund this was neglected. 47 Geo. III. c. 85, sec. 2. [Irvine v M'Laren, 1829, 7 S. 317.]

² M'Kenzie v Morrison, 1791, M. 10413.

³ Urquhart, 1738, M. 10403. Lord Elchies raised the doubt in this case, whether, the fund being assignable, it might not be arrested; but the Court held the word assignees to mean 'assignees for aliment.' Elch. Notes, p. 20, No. 8. See also Kilk. 21. Qu. Would the Court have held an assignation bad?

⁴ Ersk. iii. 6. 7. The clerk of the Canongate sold his office, taking a bond for an annuity in lieu of it, not to be arrestable.

It was held to be free from diligence, so far as a moderate provision. Swinton, 1738, Elchies, Aliment, No. 7, and notes, p. 20.

⁵ Bankt. i. 159. 14; Lady Caithness v Seaton, M. App. Pers. and Real, No. 1. The President held the fund not attachable for furnishings of a former year. The other judges seem to have held otherwise, with perhaps a preference to the furnishers within the year. The case was decided by an arrangement. See Kilkerran's note, 5 Br. Sup. 338. [Greig v Christie, 1837, 16 S. 242.]

⁶ [The subsequent decisions of the Court have not given much encouragement to creditors to attach alimentary funds. See Monypenny v E. of Buchan, 1835, 13 S. 1112; Harvey v Calder, 1840, 2 D. 1099.]

trustees, proceed with the trade, making their manager or trustee account to the bankrupt's family, and appropriate the profits partly to the subsistence of the bankrupt himself, and partly to that of his family. Nay, there seems to be no obstacle to their employing the bankrupt himself, if not in prison, to superintend the business.¹

Where a bankrupt holds a lease excluding assignees and subtenants, the creditors cannot take that lease without the landlord's consent; but the stock and accruing profits may be taken. It would seem that the bankrupt's friends may supply a stock, which, if properly settled on him, may be free from the diligence of creditors. But still the profits will be attachable. Perhaps, however, they may, by means of a trust, be so fixed upon the family of the bankrupt as to save them from his creditors. To accomplish this, the only unexceptionable way seems to be to constitute a trust for the family.

The wages or fees of servants constitute a fund properly alimentary, and can be attached only so far as they exceed what is necessary for their subsistence.²

The salary of a comedian is held to be alimentary on a similar principle. The debtor, indeed, may be imprisoned, and thus forced to bargain with his creditors; but if the creditors should prefer the attachment of his gains, they must leave untouched a reasonable maintenance conformable to his condition.³

Although alimentary funds, salaries, and pensions are not attachable for debt, it is held that the arrears of them may be attached.

CHAPTER VIII.

FACULTIES OR RIGHTS OF RESTITUTION AVAILABLE TO CREDITORS.

[132] CREDITORS have the right of following out actions of restitution, arising from illegal or challengeable alienations, direct or indirect, of property belonging to their debtor, or to which he may have succeeded. Without discussing the whole doctrine of restitution in all its parts and relations, it may be sufficient to select those examples which are of chief importance. Deeds, whether of alienation or of obligation, granted by minors, by persons insane, by persons interdicted, by persons of weak capacity imposed on by fraud, are subject to restitution on certain conditions, and within certain terms; and of this right creditors may avail themselves.

¹ In Forrester's sequestration, some friends purchased the stock in hand for the benefit of his children, to be sold under their father's management, as a fund of subsistence to the family, the shop being opened in the children's name. In the course of the trade new goods were commissioned; and after some time, certain creditors thought proper to insist in their personal diligence against the bankrupt, which forced him into the Abbey, and obliged the friends to dispose of the stock at once. They accordingly sold the whole to Crooks and Burns, in whose hands two creditors of the bankrupt arrested the price. The question was, Whether the arrestment was effectual? or, Whether the fund was not the property of the children and their friends, and not of the bankrupt? The Court preferred the children and their friends. Montgomery and Campbell v Sibbald, 1799 and 1800, n. r. [A husband cannot, by ante-nuptial contract, convey his furniture to his wife by declaring it alimentary, and exclusive of her creditors, so as to prevent it being attached by his own creditors. Brown v Fleming, 1850, 13 D. 373, and cases there cited.]

² Stair iii. 1. 37. In the case of Boog v Davidson, 1668, M. 10380, 'the Lords found that a servant's fee, in so far as was necessary for the servant's aliment, conform to his condition of service, could not be reached by his creditors to whom he had made a cessio bonorum, except as to the surplus more than what was necessary, and they found no surplus in this case.' [See 1 Vict. c. 41, sec. 7; 8 and 9 Vict. c. 39; Shanks v Thomson, 1838, 16 S. 1353.]

³ In France, 'les parts revenantes aux comédiens François, jusqu'à concurrence d'une portion seulement, sont insaisissables; le surplus de ces parts peut être saisi.' 4 Denisart 418.

SECTION I.—RESTITUTION AGAINST THE DEEDS OF PUPILS AND MINORS.

After a minor has arrived at majority, he may, by insolvency, open to his creditors a right to challenge alienations made in minority. But a case still more likely to arise, is where a minor is succeeded by one whose insolvency gives to his creditors the property and the rights to which he may have succeeded of challenging the reducible acts of his predecessor.

There is a remarkable difference between deeds done in pupillarity and deeds done in minority. A pupil is absolutely incapable of consent; a minor, though peculiarly subject to imposition, has legal capacity to contract, engage, or convey. This is a distinction important to be observed in considering the right of restitution in those several cases.

I.—DEEDS IN PUPILLARITY.

1. Deeds of conveyance, and contracts, executed by pupils themselves, are null and void, on the ground of that absolute incapacity of legal consent which has just been stated. This, of course, holds true whether the pupil has tutors or not. And such deeds, although not challenged till after the anni utiles have expired,¹ will be ineffectual.

2. Deeds which are made by the tutors of a pupil for him, stand so far in a different situation, that they are not null; the necessary consent being interposed, and the incapacity of the pupil supplied by the interposition of the tutors. But still the deed is subject to challenge, and the property alienated to restitution, if judicially questioned within four years after the pupil has attained majority.²

3. The favour of the law towards landed proprietors goes even further than this, in regard to deeds of alienation of the pupil's land, or deeds burdening his heritage. These are held to be beyond the tutor's power; or at least the presumption of lesion is so strong, that it is not to be refuted otherwise than by the previous sanction of the Court of Session. This necessity for judicial sanction appears to have been introduced with us after the example of the Roman law, which required the previous decree of the prætor to make valid the sale of a pupil's immoveable estate.³ By the original rule in the Roman law, it was [133] only for payment of debt that the pupil's land could be sold.⁴ But this rule was greatly relaxed, so as to introduce a sort of discretionary power, or judicial tutory, under which the prætor authorized such sales as were for the manifest benefit of the pupil. In adopting the original rule, we at first adopted also the relaxation. But this has been reformed in our more recent practice, and judicial sanction is now refused in all cases where the sale is not necessary: First, For the payment of debts for which the pupil is answerable;⁵ and to this extent the judicial authority may be regarded as only an anticipation of what might subsequently be accomplished by diligence at greater disadvantage: or, secondly,

¹ Rankine v Rankine, 1821, 1 S. 43. [M'Gibbon v M'Gibbon, 1852, 14 D. 605.]

² See below, p. 130. [The difference between the laws of England and Scotland on this matter is thus stated in the report of the Law Commissioners of 1855, p. 11: 'In England and Ireland, a minor, or person under the age of twenty-one, is not liable on any contract except for necessities, as food, lodging, and clothing. In Scotland, males under the age of fourteen, and females under twelve, are not bound by any contract, although their property is liable for necessities furnished for their benefit; but after those ages, if in trade alone or in partnership, they are bound by contracts made in that trade.]

³ See Dig. lib. 27, tit. 9. De rebus eorum qui sub tut. l. i. et seq. and Cod. de Admin. Tut. l. 22. Sandilands v Laird of Niddry, 1692, quoted by Stair, i. 6. 18.

⁴ Dig. ut sup. lib. 27, tit. 9, l. 1, sec. 2.

⁵ The case of Vere, in which, after the discretionary power of the Court had been exercised, it was, after an interval of fifteen years, recalled, shows the principle while it illustrates the doctrine. On the authority of our institutional writers, the Court authorized a sale by the tutors of Mr. Vere, in circumstances of most decided advantage (as it speculatively appeared) to the pupil and to the estate, though there was not the least call of necessity so to interpose. Tutors of Vere, 1787. In 1802 this was challenged by the pupil on his attaining majority, and the Court reduced the whole proceeding, reserving the purchaser's claim for meliorations. Vere v Dale, 1804, M. 16389.

See Ross v Ross, 9 March 1820, 20 F. C. 126; Finlaysons v Finlaysons, 22 Dec. 1810, 16 F. C. 114.

The sale must be obviously necessary for the safety of the pupil,¹ mere expediency never being admitted as a sufficient ground to justify the granting of such warrants to tutors.

4. Tutors may effectually grant deeds of ordinary administration of their pupil's estate. And, 1. The Court will not interfere so as in any degree to lessen the responsibility of tutors in such cases. 2. Although the act which the tutors are called upon to perform be one which, if done by a person in full capacity, would have the effect of altering the succession, this effect will not follow as a consequence of any change on the subject made by the tutors. The administration of tutors for the pupil's benefit is thus relieved from a restraint under which at one time it was supposed to labour.²

5. Acts of extraordinary administration, however, are beyond a tutor's powers; such as engaging a pupil in a mercantile partnership, however advantageous,³ or granting leases of extraordinary duration. Nay, it has been held that no lease by tutors is effectual beyond the duration of their office. And although there seems to be no sound principle for such a rule,⁴ it has been so long adopted and relied on, that the matter is now not to be held open for decision;⁵ and the only corrective which the Court has held competent (though far from being complete), is to interpose their authority in such cases as suggest a necessity for judicial aid.⁶

II.—DEEDS IN MINORITY.

In regard to deeds granted in minority, the minor being by law capable of [134] consent, the rules are these:—

1. A minor who has no curators may effectually enter into obligations, or grant conveyances inter vivos even of his heritage, subject to restitution for 'enorm lesion.'⁷

2. If a minor have curators, either his father as administrator-in-law, or curators appointed by testament or on his own choice, his obligations and deeds of conveyance granted without their concurrence, though not null as those of a pupil, are challengeable at any time without the necessity of proving lesion.⁸ The presumption of law is, that they are to the minor's lesion; and so a mere exception is sufficient in pleading. But, first, A minor may make a will, disposing of his moveable estate, without consent of his curators, although he cannot thus settle his heritable succession.⁹ Secondly, He may effectually marry

¹ The case of debt presents a necessity, accompanied with a power on the part of the creditors to compel the sale, by judicial proceedings and diligence. But there is also a necessity leading more indirectly to the same result, to which the Court has yielded; as in the case of a lease, where the obligations incumbent on the pupil, as heir of the tenant, threaten an accumulation of debt that would be ruinous to him. Meikle v Meikle, 1823, 2 S. 274. Cockburn's Tutors v Cockburn, 1825, 3 S. 642, N. E. 449.

² See Ersk. i. 7. 18, as corrected by Graham v E. of Hoptoun, 1798, M. 5599; Ross v Ross's Trs., 1793, M. 5545; Morton v Young, 11 Feb. 1813, 17 F. C. 179.

³ See below, of Partnership.

⁴ It may be observed, 1. That the principle of law on which tutors are held to supply the defect of capacity of their pupils, in all that is necessary in the proper and reasonable administration of their affairs, seems fairly to authorize the granting of agricultural leases of ordinary duration; 2. That tutory is different from negotiorum gestio, of which the acts are valid only for preservation in a case of temporary necessity by absence; and, 3. That it seems enough to protect pupils, that the tutors cannot lower the rent but by auction, and that there is restitution on lesion. See Ersk. i. 7. 16. [By the Pupils'

Protection Act, 12 and 13 Vict. c. 51, sec. 7, provisions are made by applying to the Court of Session, 'where there is a strong expediency,' for granting abatement of rent, renewing or granting a lease for a period of years for draining or otherwise improving the estate.]

⁵ L. Reay v Anderson, 1800, M. 16385.

⁶ Hallows, 1794, M. 14981. But see Ross v Ross, 9 March 1820, 20 F. C. 126. In this last case the Court seem to have thought, that if they should authorize such leases on views of expediency, they would become the administrators of the estates of all pupils. The true remedy would have been to hold this a point of ordinary administration, leaving it on the responsibility of the tutors, and the remedy against lesion.

⁷ Thomson v Stevenson, 1666, M. 8982; Crs. of Clerk v Gordon, 1699, M. 3668.

⁸ [There are certain exceptions: e.g. if a minor be engaged in trade, v. infra; or if he make an ante-nuptial contract. Bruce v Hamilton, 23 Dec. 1854, 17 D. 265.]

⁹ Cunningham v Whiteford, 1797, M. 8966. In Wauchope v Wauchope, 1738, Elchies, Minor, No. 6, and notes, p. 291, the change of bonds moveable to bonds secluding executors was held ineffectual, unless with the minor's consent, and this proved by parole. Aff. 1 Cr. and St. 200.

without consent of his curators, though he cannot make a marriage contract different from the disposition of the law itself, without their concurrence.¹ And, thirdly, If the consideration money or effects given for the obligation or conveyance shall be proved to have been profitably applied to the minor's use, the presumption of lesion is removed, and the transaction will be held unchallengeable.²

3. Where the curators concur with the minor, the act is legitimate, even if it be a sale of land;³ and accordingly the Court will not interfere in such a case.⁴

III.—RESTITUTION ON LESION AGAINST DEEDS IN MINORITY.

1. Deeds which are ipso jure null, as those of pupils, do not require reduction, but may be challenged at any time as void and ineffectual, without even alleging lesion.⁵

2. Deeds of minors having curators, without their concurrence, if not null, are at least, by the absolute presumption of lesion already taken notice of,⁶ exceptionable at any time, even after the anni utiles, without the necessity of a formal reduction.⁷

3. Although the deed of a pupil or minor have been made with the full advice of his tutors or curators, still it is subject to reduction, in an action in the Court of Session instituted within four years from attaining majority, either at the instance of the minor, or of his [135] heir, or of his creditors. The summons must be raised and executed against the person who received the conveyance within the four years. It is therefore a fatal objection to the action if the quadriennium utile has expired; and it is presumed (presumptione juris et de jure) that the minor has not been hurt by the deed.⁸ It is also a good defence against the action, that the minor has ratified or even homologated the act.⁹ But the oath of the minor never to call the deed in question will not ground a good defence.¹⁰

If the reduction have been once properly raised, it may be prosecuted after the quadriennium utile; or creditors may bring a reduction, adopting the original reduction properly raised within the term, although in the interval, before their own action has begun, the term should have expired.¹¹ When creditors thus adopt the challenge, it is either in the room of the minor himself, their debtor; or in the room of one entitled to succeed to the

¹ Anderson v Abercromby's Trs., 1824, 2 S. 662, N. E. 557. [But see Bruce v Hamilton, supra.]

² Gordon v E. of Galloway, 1629, M. 8941.

³ Thomson v Stevenson, 1666, M. 8982.

⁴ Wallace v Wallace, 1817, F. C. A lease, on the same principle, is good not only during the curatory, but during its whole term, subject to restitution on lesion. [Alexander v Thomson, 1813, Hume 411; Munro v Munro, 1735, Elch. Minor 1; Gibson v Scoon, 6 June 1809, F. C.]

⁵ Bruce, 1577, M. 8979.

⁶ See above, p. 128.

⁷ Kincaid, 1561, M. 8979; Robertson v Oswald, 1584, M. 8980, where there was silence for twenty years; Bell v Sutherland, 1728, M. 8985. [See Pr. 2099; Thomson v Pagan, 1781, M. 8985; M'Gibbon v M'Gibbon, 5 March 1852, 14 D. 605; Manuel v Manuel, 15 Jan. 1853, 15 D. 284; Rankine v Rankine, 31 May 1831, 1 S. 43, N. E. 47. The consent of a tutor, curator, or of a father, to a deed in rem suam has no effect, and the deed is objectionable without a reduction. Anderson v Cation, 28 Nov. 1828, 7 S. 78; 15 Nov. 1832, 11 S. 10. M'Gibbon, supra. Manuel, supra.]

⁸ Ersk. i. 7. 35. It is not enough to have executed a deed of revocation. Ramsay v Maxwell, 1672, M. 9043. [Or to have pleaded minority and lesion as a defence. Stewart v Snodgrass, 20 Dec. 1860, 23 D. 187. But see alleged exceptions in Crawford v Bennet, 19 June 1827, 2 W. and S. 608; Hark-

ness v Graham, 20 June 1833, 11 S. 760, and other cases in Fraser, Parent and Child, 426.]

It was held that reduction raised and executed against the original donee within the quadriennium utile was effectual, although the possessor of the lands acquiring from him was not called till after the expiration of the term. Belches v Calderwood, 1687, M. 9045. This is not, however, to be relied on in practice. [In order that the quadriennium utile may be available, a reduction on the ground of minority and lesion must be brought within the four years. It is not enough that the plea shall have been stated within the four years in defence to an action on a document granted during minority. Stewart v Snodgrass, 1860, 23 D. 187.]

⁹ Melvil v Arnot, 1782, M. 8998. [See Kyle v Allan, 23 Nov. 1832, 11 S. 87; Dempster v Potts, 31 Dec. 1837, 15 S. 364, 12 F. C. App. 25; Forrest v Campbell, 4 Nov. 1853, 16 D. 16; Rose v Rose, 20 Nov. 1821, 1 S. 154, N. E. 148. But a ratification after majority will receive no effect if the transaction ratified bears evidence in gremio of fraud—Leiper v Cochran, 9 July 1822, 1 S. 552, N. E. 506; or if it has already been challenged even by way of exception by the minor's creditors—Harkness v Graham, 20 June 1833, 11 S. 760.];

¹⁰ Ersk. i. 7. 39.

¹¹ Stair i. 6. 44. Hamilton v Sharp, 1630, M. 8981. [Harkness v Graham, 20 June 1833, 11 S. 760.]

minor. In the former case, they of course must take the privilege as it stands in the minor, and bring the challenge within the term. In the latter case, these distinctions are observable: 1. That if the ancestor died in minority, they have four years from the time of his death during which to bring their action. 2. That if part of the quadriennium utile had expired at the predecessor's death, they can have only what remains, counting from that point of time. 3. That if the case should happen, that a minor having creditors should succeed to the minor whose deed is to be challenged, the creditors would seem to have the full extent of their debtor's minority, as well as what remains of the quadriennium unexpired, according to the common rule of minor succeeding minor.¹

The two points of the pursuer's case in the action are: 1. Minority; 2. Lesion.

1. MINORITY is fact, and may partake of all the difficulty of proving a point of chronology. It will be a good answer to this point of the pursuer's case, 1. That the minor was in trade, the transaction being mercantile; or in the exercise of an employment by which he gained his livelihood, the act being in the common course of that employment.² 2. That he represented himself as major, and thereby deceived the party, ignorant of his true age, to contract with him.³

2. LESION.—This point of the case is made out, 1. By presumption: for example, in deeds without onerous consideration on the minor's part, as cautionary engagements; or in loans of money contracted by the minor, where misapplication is presumed, and the [136] money must be proved to have been profitably applied.⁴ Or, 2. By proof: As to which, lesion less flagrant, and more slender evidence of it, will be received where a minor has no curators, or where the transaction relates to land, or where ready money is put into the power of a youth under age. But there will be much greater difficulty in the reduction where tutors or curators have authorized the transaction, or where previous judicial sanction has been given.⁵

It is necessary to the reduction that the lesion shall have proceeded directly from the transaction. Where a house has been advantageously purchased, and afterwards by accident has been burnt, the lesion is not thus direct. But it may be sufficient if greater hazard has been thrown on the minor, or greater temptation to imprudence and loss occasioned by the fault of the party; an illustration of which is found in the case of voluntary as contrasted with necessary payments.⁶

The condition on which restitution is granted is, that the restitution shall be reciprocal,—the price with interest repaid, meliorations indemnified,⁷ etc. But if the transaction has been voluntary, and the interest of the minor has suffered by the extravagance or waste

¹ M'Math v Baron of Broughton, 1628, M. 9040.

² This is partly grounded on the consideration of the interest of minors themselves in this situation, as giving them admission to the exercise of such lucrative occupations. See Galbraith v Lesly, 1676, M. 9027; Heddel v Duncan, 5 June 1810, 15 F. C. 681. See also Craig v Grant, 1732, M. 9035.

But see Dick v Cumming and Smith, 1824, 3 S. 231, N. E. 162, where a bill in a company name was suspended on the ground of minority, and the unauthorized act of the minor's father including his name in the firm. [See Macdonald, 1789, M. 9038; Crawford v Bennet, 19 June 1827, 2 W. and S. 608; M'Michael v Barbour, 17 Dec. 1840, 3 D. 279.]

³ Ersk. i. 7. 36. Kennedy v Weir, 1665, M. 11658. The bond in this case bore majority, which was held a good objection, unless the minor could prove the creditor's knowledge of his minority, or that he was fraudulently induced to assert majority in the bond. In a case where a minor became cautioner, he was held not barred from pleading minority, by having received the degree of Doctor of Medicine on falsely

(under a mistake) swearing to his majority, a year before the contract. Sutherland v Morson, 1825, 3 S. 449, N. E. 313. [A similar bar to restitution was held to exist where a minor had falsely represented his brother as his curator, in the indenture sought to be reduced. Harvie v M'Intyre, 7 March 1829, 7 S. 561. Where the appearance of a minor proximus majorenitati is not such as to put persons dealing with him on their guard, his inducing them by his silence to trust him excludes the claim to restitution. Macdougall v Marshall, 1705, M. 8995, 421; Wilkie v Dunlop, 28 Feb. 1834, 12 S. 506. See Dennistoun v Mudie, 31 Jan. 1850, 12 D. 613.]

⁴ See V. of Arbuthnot v Morrison, 1716, M. 9487, 1 Cr. and St. 7.

⁵ This previous sanction does not preclude a challenge on lesion, but the proof of lesion must be very decisive. Vere v Dale, 1804, M. 16389.

⁶ Ersk. i. 7. 36, 41 [sec. 38, and Ersk. Pr. i. 7. 20].

⁷ This rule applied where the transaction with the minor was necessary. E. of Aberdeen v Gordon, 1708, M. 9031.

proceeding as the direct consequence of the dealing,—as in voluntary loans of money, or even voluntary purchases of the property of a minor without curators,—in such cases the reciprocal restitution will not be extended beyond the fund profitably employed for the minor.¹

The extent of restitution is only so far as the minor's estate is lesed, or injury sustained. This will not, however, where restitutio in integrum can be given, entitle a purchaser to keep the subject, offering the balance of the value of the land or other property, but only to demand mutual restitution or indemnification.

SECTION II.—RESTITUTION AGAINST DEEDS BY PERSONS INSANE OR FATUOUS.

The interest of creditors may be deeply concerned in questions of insanity; not only by the circumstance of their debtor's succeeding to a person in that unhappy state, but by the supervening insanity of their debtor himself, or by the circumstance of the debtor's property consisting partly of estates purchased from an insane person. The legal effect of insanity attaching to any deed or contract is to give restitution in integrum to the person injured, whether the insane person himself, or his heir, or his creditors; and this without any other limitation of time for the challenge than the years of the long prescription.

For the purpose of establishing a similar guardianship over persons incapable by disease, with that which is provided for persons under lawful age, the incapacity is to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury under a brieve of IDIOTRY or of FURIOSITY.

This is a very old proceeding in the law of Scotland; and at first the question for the jury was confined to the present state of the person. In 1475 (by c. 67 of that year) the jury were directed further to ascertain the time to which the malady had retrospect, 'How lang tyme he was of thay conditions;—'and fra it be knawin be the inquest that the persone be fule or furious, and the time thereof, the alienation maid by him after the time that the inquest finds that he was either fule or furious, sall be of na vail, bot retrexit and [137] brought again to him, as weil as the alienation made after the pursuing of the brieve.' The effect, however, of such a verdict is not conclusive either way. The object of the inquisition, properly speaking, is to authorize the guardianship of the law; and to give to the guardian, as the rule and also as the aid of his interference, the presumption arising from this inquiry.

The effect of the verdict may be questioned in various circumstances:—1. A deed granted before the time so fixed is not by the verdict excluded from reduction, if competent evidence should be brought to establish insanity as in relation to that deed.² 2. A deed may be effectual, although made after the period fixed in the verdict as the commencement of the insanity. The trial on the brieve is ex parte, and that evidence which the holder of the deed may possess of a lucid interval during which the deed was made may still be produced.³ 3. A deed may be challenged on the ground of insanity, although the brieve of furiosity or idiocy has not been followed by a verdict of insanity. There may be insanity sufficient to reduce a particular transaction, though not enough for making out a case of status.

In the action of reduction the rules of law are: 1. That a person of mature age is

¹ Thomson v Stevenson, 1666, M. 8983.

² Hay v Kiell, July 1810, n. r. Here a verdict found that the person was incompos mentis, or of insane mind, in the end of 1804; that he was of insane mind on 7th January 1807; and that he has been in that state of insanity ever since the last-mentioned period, and continues so at present. This person, after public advertisement, sold an estate in 1805 to a stranger for a full price. The cognition and verdict was in 1807, and then a reduction was raised. The question was of the state of mind during the period excluded from the verdict. The Court, according to the mode then in practice, allowed a proof, and two questions were raised: 1. Whether the verdict was not equal to a verdict of sanity during the interval omitted? It was held otherwise. 2. Whether there was insanity at the time of bargain? which made a very curious case of evidence.

³ In several early cases, it was found that a deed within the term in the verdict is not null by exception, but only reducible by action; and this in order to give room for the requisite inquiry relative to the particular deed, as perhaps made in lucid interval. Crawford, 1583, M. 6276. See also Loch v Dick, 1638, M. 6278.

presumed to be in full capacity; and, 2. That a verdict of idiocy or of furiosity inverts this presumption; and from its date, or from the point of time specified in the verdict, raises the opposite presumption of incapacity.¹ The action of restitution, then, on the ground of insanity, commencing with a presumption in the one way or the other, resolves into a proof on the one hand of idiocy or furiosity at the time of making the deed, or on the other of lucid interval at the time the transaction was entered into. It is an inquiry which now, by the Judicature Act,² must proceed in the Jury Court. And in the issue of capacity or incapacity, the onus probandi will be laid on the reducer or on the maintainer of the deed, as there is a previous verdict of furiosity or idiocy, or as the inquiry into the state of mind first begins in the action of reduction.³

1. The proof of insanity is chiefly matter of fact for a jury, and commonly disposed of under the brieve of idiocy or furiosity. The point is, whether the person is of mind and capacity fit to understand and transact the business in question? Each case must depend upon its own circumstances: in some, the most common observer may distinguish the incapacity; in others, there is so much method in the madness, that to perceive the doubtful and uncertain point at which reason disappears, and lurking incapacity manifests itself, often requires the most skilful development and experienced observation.⁴ The degrees of capacity required by law for different acts are various, and may so far be generally discriminated, that less capacity is required to make a will or settlement than to transact [138] a bargain. Little more is required for the former, than that one should be able to understand the effect of so far yielding to his affection or aversion as to alter the disposition of the law of succession; while in bargains, though greater capacity is required to chaffer and avoid deception, there is a natural and just limitation, that where the transaction is in the course of the person's trade, courts of law must be more averse to give relief.⁵

Physicians have distinguished, both by their symptoms and effects, many classes of this unhappy malady; but in law these are all reduced to two—IDIOCY and FURIOSITY.

The idiot is described in our brieve as 'Incompos mentis, fatuus, et naturaliter idiota;' and this consisting chiefly in absolute imbecility of mind, seems to be incapacity of a more incurable kind, more permanent, more exclusive of those intervals of intelligence by which the violence of the lunatic is occasionally relieved.⁶

Furiosity comprehends all those more violent species of the disease which are designated in common speech as madness, lunacy, or mania. We have not in the language of the law of Scotland the word Lunacy, by which the law of England so unphilosophically distinguishes the state of insanity.⁷ The term with us is more correct—Furiosity; the person being described in the brieve as 'Incompos mentis, prodigus, et furiosus, qui nec tempus, nec modum impensarum habet, sed bona dilacerando profundit.' In this class of the maladies which affect human capacity there is greater violence, but there is also occasional relief by lucid interval; during which legal capacity returns, and deeds of conveyance and engagement may effectually be made.

¹ This is law in England also. See Collinson on Idiocy and Lunacy, i. 396. [2 Evans' Pothier, 332; answer of the judges to the House of Lords, 8 Sc. N. R. 895, 1 Car. and K. 131. See Lindsay's Trs. v Watson, 14 June 1843, 5 D. 1194.]

² 6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 28. [It is not necessarily, though still usually, before a jury. 13. and 14 Vict. c. 36, sec. 49; 29 and 30 Vict. c. 90, sec. 4.]

³ [As to onus where the deed to be reduced is holograph, and hence does not prove its date, see Waddell v Waddell's Trs., 16 May 1845, 7 D. 605; cf. 12 July 1845, ib. 1017.]

⁴ See observations of Lord Stowell, Turner v Meyers, 1808, 1 Hagg. Cons. 417.

⁵ [Gibson v Watson, 18 Nov. 1825, 4 S. 202, aff. 2 W. and

S. 648; Fraser v Fraser's Trs., 7 Nov. 1834, 13 S. 703; Morrison v Maclean's Trs., 27 Feb. 1862, 24 D. 625.]

⁶ In the class of idiocy are ranked those who are deaf, dumb, and blind. [See 1585, c. 18; Stair i. 6. 25, i. 10. 13; Ersk. iii. 1. 16. But now it would seem to be necessary to prove the incapacity of deaf and dumb persons in the ordinary way. Montgomerie Bell's Lect. on Conveyancing, i. 129; Craigie v Gordon, 17 June 1837, 15 S. 1157; Kirkpatrick, 8 June 1853, 15 D. 734. Blind persons can contract and execute deeds. See E. of Fife v Duff, 30 Nov. 1819, F. C., revd. 1 S. App. 498; Reid v Baxter, 19 Dec. 1837, 16 S. 273.]

⁷ See 1 Blackst. 304. Ex parte Barnsby, 3 Atk. 174.

In the trial of both sorts of insanity, it is an essential point that the jury should themselves see and examine the person, if still alive.¹

2. Against the presumption induced by a verdict of insanity, or in the proper discrimination which belongs to the original inquiry, the most difficult question relates to LUCID INTERVAL. It has been well said, that it is scarcely possible to be too strongly impressed with the great degree of caution necessary in examining the proof of lucid interval. But the law does recognise as valid acts done during such an interval,² and this rule of law must not be defeated by overstrained demands of the proof of the fact. It may be observed in general, that the lucid interval may be either in relation to time or to subject. 1. If in point of time there is proof of remission or of intermission, either periodical or at a particular date, including the interval during which the deed was made, it is enough to sustain the deed. There is no rule in law fixing any precise duration for a lucid interval—a week, a day, an hour: the point truly for inquiry is, Whether there was time sufficient for the rational doing of the act in question? 2. If the description of the malady be such that the person is insane on particular topics only, and the act done, with all its associations, form no insane topic, this will be enough. 3. In either inquiry, the act itself, and the manner of performing it, are of the first importance. If it be a rational act, rationally done,³ without the guidance and control of another; if there be no delusion, no insane irritation, or hallucination inducing it; if from the deed or the manner no indication of frenzy or of folly can be gathered, it will be sustained. 4. It is very important that facts, not opinions, shall be relied on in matters of this sort. The opinions of calm and skilful observers may be useful to guide the jury; but even from such persons no opinion is of weight independently of the fact on which it rests. And to the evidence of keepers, and of nurses, and of the vulgar, who, with [139] a carelessness or a prejudice which overlooks all the necessary discriminations, and misinterprets every action of a person pronounced to be insane, this observation requires to be very vigilantly applied.⁴ 5. Some difference of opinion has arisen as to the strength of proof necessary in a case of lucid interval, considered relatively to the proof of the insanity to which it forms an exception. Two great masters in jurisprudence have expressed opposite opinions on this question. Lord Thurlow seems in both cases to have deemed it necessary to have a proof as demonstrative of the lucid interval as of the insanity, and of a restored strength of mind not inferior to the original state of intellect of the person in question. But Lord Eldon has well limited the doctrine, since neither the same demonstration can be expected in acts of rational calmness, as in the striking symptoms of insanity, nor does the law require, in order to validate many acts, the same perfect tone of intellect as while untouched by disease, but is satisfied with a much less degree of capacity.⁵

SECTION III.—RESTITUTION AGAINST THE DEEDS OF PERSONS INTERDICTED.

Inequality alone, or lesion, affords no ground of challenge of the deeds of a person of full age whose capacity is unimpeached. There must be combined with it evidence of fraud

¹ [Important changes in regard to procedure are introduced by 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, sec. 101, and A. of S. 3 Dec. 1868. The briefe is now to be in English, and directed to the Lord President of the Court of Session. The question put is whether the party is 'insane;' and he is to be deemed insane 'if he be furious, or fatuous, or labouring under such unsoundness of mind as to render him incapable of managing his affairs.' The inquiry is to be before a judge of the Supreme Court and a special jury, parties having the remedy of bills of exceptions and motions for new trials as in ordinary actions, and the Court having power to award expenses. See Irving v Swan, 7 Nov. 1868, 7 Macph. 86.]

² 'Furiosi autem si per id tempus fecerint testamentum quo furor eorum intermissus est, jure testati esse videntur.' Inst. ii. 12. 2.

³ Not merely 'actus sapienti conveniens, sed actus sapientis.'

⁴ Among the cases reported on this question, perhaps the most interesting and instructive is that of Cartwright, 1793, 1 Phillimore 90. See also White v Driver, 1809, ib. p. 84; Towart v Sellars, 1817, 5 Dow 231, 6 Pat. 301.

⁵ Attorney-Gen. v Parnter, 3 Brown's Chan. Ca. 443. Ex parte Holyland, 11 Ves. 11.

and circumvention. But there may be in one of perfect age a degree of weakness, facility, or prodigality, which, although not such as to justify a verdict of insanity, and place him under guardianship as insane, may yet demand some protection for him against unequal or gratuitous alienations: and this is attained by a proceeding which gives warning to all who may enter into contracts with him that he is under trust, and not free to exercise the power of alienation, directly or indirectly, without consent of his interdictors. It is this warning or notice which gives effect to the interdiction.

This remedy, called INTERDICTION, seems originally to have reached all the transactions of the person interdicted: it extends now only to the alienation of his heritable property, and to his other transactions only in so far as they are made the ground of proceedings against his heritage.¹

The effects of this protection, and the right of challenge arising from it, may materially interest creditors—either those to whom the interdicted person stands indebted, or those whose debtor has succeeded to the property of him who stands interdicted. The challenge is competent to creditors adjudging the estate which has been conveyed, or against which diligence is attempted on bonds liable to challenge on interdiction.²

JUDICIAL INTERDICTION.—Interdiction properly is a judicial proceeding grounded on an inquiry into the state of mind of the person whose property is to be protected, and denouncing, at the suit of those interested in him, the necessity and the fact of his being placed under the care of certain persons, without whose consent his deeds will be subject to challenge on a proof of lesion alone.³ The summons and decree of interdiction include, 1. A declarator of the facility of the person in question; 2. An interdiction or prohibition against selling his lands, wadsetting, etc., or contracting debt whereby his lands may be [140] affected; and, 3. A declarator, by anticipation, of the nullity of all acts and deeds contrary to the interdiction.

For attaining the great object of notice, it is requisite, 1. That the person to be interdicted shall be cited; 2. That the interdiction shall be published at the market-cross of the head burgh of the person's residence; and, 3. That it shall be duly registered in the General or Particular Register of Inhibitions⁴ within forty days, and till registration it has no effect whatever (1581, c. 119). If registered in the general register, the interdiction will reach all the interdicted person's lands in Scotland. If not so registered, and omitted also in the particular register of the county in which the lands lie, the interdiction will not affect those lands. Registration in the record of inhibitions is effectual for all heritable property, whether in shire or burgh, within the district.

The effect of interdiction is in two respects different from that of minority:—1. It inverts so far the common rule of law, as to make lesion by itself a competent ground of reduction of the deeds of the person interdicted, when granted without the consent of the interdictors; but such deeds are not null: they are only reducible on proof of lesion.⁵ 2. If the deed be granted with consent of the interdictors, no challenge will be competent, unless the deed be to the benefit of the interdictors themselves. Lesion alone, which in deeds of minors, even with consent of curators, is a good ground of reduction, is not sufficient where interdictors consent.⁶

There are two points in the reduction on interdiction: 1. That the interdiction has

¹ Stair i. 6. 41; Ersk. i. 7. 57.

² L. Salton v Park, 1666, M. 10420.

³ Sometimes, in the course of an action, interdiction proceeds ex parte judicis in the Court of Session.

⁴ See Ersk. i. 7. 56; Ersk. ii. 11. 4, 5. [There is now but one General Register of Inhibitions and Interdictions. 31 and 32 Vict. c. 64, sec. 16.]

⁵ The distinction between deeds of minors and of interdicted persons in this respect was first established in a case reported by Gosford—Anonymous, 1672, 1 B. S. 655; afterwards it was confirmed in Stewart v Hay, 1676, M. 7132. See Elch. Annot. on Stair, p. 34.

⁶ [From a case noted in Baron Hume's Sess. Pa., referred to by Mr. Fraser, Par. and Ch. 565, it appears to have been held in 1807, that the consent of interdictors was not an absolute protection against gross lesion. But there was much division of opinion.]

been regularly obtained and duly published; 2. That there is lesion by the deed.¹ It has been laid down by Erskine, but on no sufficient authority, that an interdicted person can make no effectual settlement of his lands, however rational, without consent of his interdictors, nor even with it.² The case to which he refers as reported does not sustain his doctrine, being a settlement in favour of the interdictor himself.³ No other lawyer has delivered the same law, and the doctrine goes much beyond the legal effect of such imbecility as will authorize interdiction, especially if it can be held as meant to be applied to voluntary as well as judicial interdiction. If the proper effect of interdiction be to indicate such imbecility only as exposes the person to imposition and lesion, the consequence, in relation to a deed of succession, should be no other than to facilitate a reduction where the settlement is irrational, or where it has been induced by circumvention and undue influence.⁴

VOLUNTARY INTERDICTION.—But although interdiction is a judicial proceeding, and to its efficacy formerly it was necessary that inquiry should be made into the state of mind, and that, by declarator, an imbecility should be judicially declared analogous to that of minority;⁵ yet, considering this as a remedy which proceeds no further than to protect against lesion and gross inequality, it has not been rigidly required that there shall be a previous decree of declarator. The increasing delicacy of modern manners has gradually led to the introduction of voluntary interdiction as almost superseding the judicial, since the distinction [141] was fairly established between minority and interdiction. But the combination of voluntary interdiction with deeds of entail, and the use of it as a separate protection, were not unknown in practice towards the beginning of the seventeenth century.⁶ The great point is the notice of interdiction—the warning against relying on the acts of a man who has placed himself under trust. In voluntary no less than in judicial interdiction, registration is necessary.

SECTION IV.—RESTITUTION ON THE GROUND OF FACILITY, CIRCUMVENTION, AND LESION.

The deeds of persons of full age, not cognosced, nor interdicted, may yet be reduced on showing evidence of weakness of mind, combined with fraud (or circumvention, as it is called in this instance) and lesion. Fraud alone may indeed ground reduction where it is such as to give occasion to the contract. But facility alone, where the person has understanding enough to save himself from a sentence of idiocy,⁷ is not a sufficient ground of challenge; and still less is lesion by itself, or gross inequality. But where lesion and facility concur, or where facility and circumvention appear, or even where there is lesion so gross as to indicate the other two qualities, a deed of conveyance or contract will be reducible.

Such cases must, of course, depend on their own circumstances, and scarcely can be brought under any general rule of law.

¹ [Where a deed is rational and onerous, it is not reducible on the head of interdiction, even although it be in favour of an interdictor, at least if it be consented to by the other interdictors. Kyle v Kyle, 14 Dec. 1826, 5 S. 128, N. E. 117; Fraser v Fraser, 6 Feb. 1827, 5 S. 801, N. E. 279.]

² Ersk. i. 7. 58. In the Principles, he states the inability as applicable to the case of a settlement without consent of interdictors. Ersk. Pr. i. 7. 34.

³ Tenant v Spruel, 1725, M. 7127, 7165. [It seems to be the law that interdiction does not apply to mortis causa deeds. Mansfield v Stuart, 26 June 1841, 3 D. 1103.]

⁴ See above, of Insanity, p. 133.

⁵ Auchenbowie v his Interdictors, 1607, M. 7157; Anonymous, 1618, M. 7158. Is this the case relied on by Erskine, i. 7. 53?

⁶ See Seton v Acheson's Crs., 1622, M. 7162; Row v Monro, 1703, M. 7154.

⁷ Ersk. iv. 1. 27.

CHAPTER IX.

OF RIGHTS OF SUCCESSION IN MOVEABLES.

As, in relation to the heritable estate, creditors are entitled to adopt and make effectual their debtor's rights of succession, so in moveable succession, testate or intestate, the right of the debtor may be made available for the payment of the debt. But there is not much to be delivered on this subject that may not find a better place in a subsequent part of this work. Thus the necessary points in the law of succession and confirmation of moveables will be fully explained in commenting on the diligence for attaching moveable succession after death.¹ So the interest of creditors in the effect of marriage contracts and bonds of provision, as augmenting or diminishing the funds for their payment, will be taken into view in a full commentary afterwards to be given on marriage contracts and bonds of provision, in treating of the claims of wives and children.

But one or two observations may be worthy of attention here, in relation to the vesting of rights in moveable succession.

1. VESTING OF EXECUTRY WITHOUT CONFIRMATION.—Formerly it was of no avail to creditors that there should have opened to their debtor a lucrative succession in moveables, unless the right was vested by confirmation during their debtor's life. His death without confirmation carried the whole executry, of which he had not actually attained possession, away from his representatives and creditors, to the next of kin of the deceased. By [142] the recent Act² this is altered, and the succession is made to vest ipso jure without confirmation. The language of the statute is not, perhaps, very happily conceived for bringing out the principle which it was intended to sanction. But it will no doubt receive the most liberal construction, in order to give efficacy to this most just and expedient rule.

2. SPECIAL ASSIGNATIONS AND LEGACIES.—Debts or effects specially assigned or bequeathed effectually vest without confirmation,³ and may be attached by creditors as a fund for their payment; and so legacies vest ipso jure by mere survivance of the legatee.⁴

3. LEGITIM is the part which belongs to the children of the communio bonorum of their parents. On their father's death they have immediate right to it without confirmation, and this right their creditors may attach.

4. JUS RELICTÆ.—On the same principle, the widow's share of the goods in communion requires no form to vest it. She is ipso jure entitled to demand it, and her representatives or creditors, or those of a succeeding husband, are entitled to the benefit of the fund.

CONCLUSION OF PARTS I. AND II.

RATIFICATION OF EXCEPTIONABLE DEEDS—HOMOLOGATION—APPROBATE AND REPROBATE.

MANY of those rights which have already been the subject of consideration in this part of the work, may be renounced or departed from, either by express agreement and renuncia-

¹ See below, Book III.

² By 4 Geo. IV. c. 98, it is enacted, that from and after 19th July 1823, 'in all cases of intestate succession, where any person or persons, who at the period of the death of the intestate, being next of kin, shall die before confirmation be expedite, the right of such next of kin shall transmit to his or her representative, so that confirmation may and shall be granted to such representatives, in the same manner as confirmations might have been granted to such next of kin immediately upon the death of such intestate.'

VOL. I.

³ 1690, c. 26.

⁴ Ersk. iii. 9. 30.

tion, or by implied assent and sanction. Under the former may be comprehended those deeds of ratification by which, in the case of a married woman, a minor, or an heir, an exceptionable conveyance or settlement may acquire the full effect of the most legitimate. Under implied consent may be included the two important doctrines of homologation, and approbate and reprobate. The principle which regulates the effect of such approbation is the same, whether it be express or implied, if the approbation be once clearly ascertained.

SECTION I.—EXPRESS RATIFICATION OF EXCEPTIONABLE CONTRACTS OR SETTLEMENTS.

Contracts, or deeds of conveyance or of settlement, may be saved from fatal objections by the express approval of those who would otherwise be entitled to challenge them; and this may operate as a bar not merely against the approver, but against his heirs and others coming into his place.

1. RATIFICATION BY MARRIED WOMAN.—Deeds by a wife, conveying to a stranger any heritable property to which she has right, either her own, or the subject of her liferent or other provisions, may be challenged by her, on the ground of having been granted through the just fear of her husband, or compelled by his violence.¹ But against a challenge on that [143] ground, a ratification made by the wife judicially, 'outwith the presence of the husband,' affords a complete defence, even if proof of force and fear be offered in impeachment of the deed.²

It has been said that the ratification, if truly, though secretly, made under the same compulsion with the deed itself, ought to be reducible, as the deed unratified would have been.³ This doctrine, however, is against a determination which, so early as 1481, was made on this question, and which is entered in the Rolls of Parliament, c. 84, as fixing the law at that time. And although there is a decision in the beginning of the seventeenth century to the contrary,⁴ the question has subsequently been determined conformably to the rule in the statute-book.⁵ There seems to be no doubt that this would now be held the rule of law, unless the party taking benefit by the deed should be proved to have been participant in the violence, or at least to have had notice of the compulsion under which the deed was granted and the ratification made.

2. RATIFICATIONS BY MINORS, made after majority, have the effect of discharging all claim of restitution on lesion.⁶ But where the ratification is made in minority, either at the time of the original contract or subsequently, it has no effect as a defence against the minor's reduction.⁷ Even where made in majority, immediately after attaining the legal age, and without due opportunity of learning the state of his affairs, the Court will give great effect, in a reduction of the ratification, to any circumstances of deception under which it may have been executed; and in particular, to proof of a continuation of the influence or deception which may have operated during minority.⁸

3. RATIFICATION BY AN HEIR will be effectual to bar him from challenging the settle-

¹ See Johnston v Napier, 1708, M. 16511, for illustration of this ground of challenge.

² Ersk. i. 6. 32, 36. Without such ratification the deed is good, if not liable to a challenge ex vi aut metu. Hay v Cuming, 1706, M. 16506.

³ Ersk. i. 6. 34.

⁴ Anonymous, 1612, M. 16481.

⁵ Grant, 1642, M. 16483.

⁶ See above, p. 129. Ersk. i. 7. 39.

⁷ It was formerly held, that if such ratification was made by an oath, though in minority, 'never to call the deed in question,' it was effectual. But a statute was made in 1681, 19, for the purpose of preventing such oaths; declaring them to be null and void, punishing the obtainers of them, and making a challenge competent to the relations of the minors. See also Ersk. i. 7. 39.

⁸ Murray v Murray, 1826, 4 S. 374, N. E. 377, 1 Fac. Coll. New Series 222.

Lochiel's Trs. v Cameron, 1795, where a minor, having been secretly supplied with money on an engagement to sell two farms, and immediately on reaching majority, while ignorant of the state of his affairs, made a conveyance accordingly, without any advice or the aid of a man of business, the transaction was reduced on circumvention and lesion. Cited 1 Fac. Coll. p. 230.

ment of his ancestor, as made on deathbed; or as not duly authenticated; or as contra fidem tabularum nuptialium, etc.; provided the heir be of age, and in such circumstances that the ratification cannot be ascribed to his peculiar situation.¹ Such ratification is ineffectual, for example, where an heir is required by his dying ancestor to ratify a deed made on deathbed, and he complies, out of regard to the peace of the dying man.² But some care must be taken in discriminating the cases fit for the application of this principle. The expression of Mr. Erskine is not happy; and if extended to other cases than this of deathbed (to which alone the precedent quoted applies), it might sanction a very erroneous principle.³

It may be observed with regard to all these several cases, 1. That the ratifica- [144] tion is ineffectual wherever it is liable to the same exception with the deed ratified; as a wife's ratification in the presence of her husband; or a minor's, while yet in minority. And, 2. That it can operate as a renunciation only of those rights which are vested in the person ratifying, and which that person is in circumstances to alienate. So the ratification of an heir-presumptive, though binding on him and his heirs, will not affect the heir-apparent, should the ratifier not survive to succeed to the right; neither will a ratification, which is merely personal, be effectual in competition to divest creditors of a real right which requires a conveyance. See below, p. 141.

SECTION II.—IMPLIED ASSENT, OR CONFIRMATION, OF PREVIOUS DEEDS OR CONTRACTS.

By implied assent, as well as by express ratification, a right or ground of challenge may be effectually renounced; and the doctrines which are comprehended under this head present little difficulty, except that of applying the rules of evidence by which it is to be determined, whether the person entitled to the right or challenge in question can fairly be held to have abandoned or renounced it, to the effect of establishing the deed against which it might have been pleaded? On this principle of implied assent, the two doctrines of Homologation and Approbate and Reprobate depend.

I.—OF HOMOLOGATION.

Homologation is a word used with us in a sense somewhat different from that in which it is understood in other systems of jurisprudence. In the Continental law, homologation is an express act of judicial sanction or approbation, confirming and enforcing a private contract or transaction which would otherwise be exposed to objection.⁴ In this sense there are few examples of judicial homologation in Scottish law. Perhaps as such may be reckoned, 1. The act by which the Court of Session confirms a contract of composition among creditors in a sequestration, which without this sanction would not bind any but those who consented to it;⁵ 2. The judicial sanction of a trustee elected in sequestration, who in the same way might be objected to by the minority who voted against him; 3. The decree confirming the sale of a pupil's land, on the ground of necessity; 4. The decree which, on occasion of a judicial reference, is pronounced in terms of the award of the disinherited, would dare to refuse to sign such renunciations.' Ersk. iii. 8. 99. But it would rather seem, that if the ancestor could effectually disinherit, and is prevented from doing so only by the heir's consent, it would be an act which the heir would not afterwards be entitled to retract. This fear of disinheriting is not the species of fear which the law regards as sufficient to annul consent.

¹ See Murray v Murray, supra. [A ratification or compromise after the ancestor's death must be complete and express. Richardson v Richardson, 8 March 1848, 10 D. 872. Acceptance of the office of trustee and of a small legacy was held to bar a claim of legitim. Carmichael v Carmichael's Trs., 2 S. 198, N. E. 175. Comp. Dunlop v Greenlees' Trs., 2 Nov. 1863, 2 Macph. 1; aff. 2 Jan. 1865, 3 Macph. H. L. 46, L. R. H. L. Sc. 109.]

² Dallas v Paul, 1704, M. 5677. See also Ersk. iii. 8. 99.

³ Mr. Erskine places it on the ground, that the ratification has proceeded merely 'from the fear of incurring the ancestor's displeasure;' and 'few heirs,' he adds, 'for fear of being

⁴ It proceeds upon an application to the proper judge, who, on due inquiry made, and the assent of all concerned, or the rejection of frivolous objections, ratifies and confirms the act.

⁵ See below, Book vi.

referee; 5. The judicial ratification by a married woman is also an example of this sort of homologation.

But homologation, as commonly used in the language of the law of Scotland, corresponds more with the doctrine of Implied Confirmation in other systems of law. It is that assent or approbation of a deed, conveyance, settlement, or contract, which is inferred from circumstances; supplying, in the case of the obligor or granter, the want of legal evidence of consent, and establishing as a recognised engagement a contract defectively entered into; [145] or giving sanction and effect to a conveyance or settlement against which exception might be taken.¹

Homologation is a generic term, comprehending all confirmations by implied assent; and so includes Approbate and Reprobate, which, however, as a separate doctrine, admits of some modification, to be afterwards explained.

Homologation may be either by the subsequent approbation of the granter or maker of the obligation, deed, or settlement; or by the acquiescence of one who, having an interest adverse to it, confirms what has been done. Homologation of the former kind bars locus pœnitentiæ; homologation of the latter bars all exception otherwise competent.²

When the original party homologates, he either ratifies a deed or obligation already executed, but imperfectly, or he adopts and gives effect to what would otherwise be null. When there is already an obligation existing, though imperfect or subject to exception, homologation may have the effect of confirming it as good from the first. Where the deed or obligation is null, homologation acts only as the adoption of what is reduced to an intelligible and precise shape, but is in no degree binding; and the binding effect has in this case no retrospect.³

When the homologation is by one not an original party to the deed, it is only where the deed is objectionable, but not absolutely null, that this implied assent is available. Homologation is here merely a bar to the exception.

In order to give the same effect to the approbatory act as to the full original consent, it is necessary, 1. That the assent be clear and indisputable, applying directly and unequivocally to the contract, conveyance, or settlement said to be homologated. 2. Such contract, conveyance, or settlement must be fully known to the person homologating, together with the state of matters as affected by that deed.⁴ And, 3. It must be an act that can be fairly ascribed to no other purpose than that of giving sanction to the deed or contract in question. The class of cases in which questions have most frequently arisen on these points, are those in which a person having an adverse interest has subscribed the deed as witness. The proper and only legitimate purpose of this act is to attest the authenticity of the subscription of the granter of the deed; and therefore it infers not, in the common case, homologation of the deed.⁵ But where, in addition to this, either the connection of parties and nature of the transaction is such as to afford real evidence of knowledge of the deed, or where there is evidence of its having been read to the person so subscribing, ¹ It has thus had the same effect with perfect consent or concurrence at the first formation of the contract, or granting of the conveyance, or making of the settlement.

² Erskine seems in his large Institute almost to narrow the doctrine to the former of these cases. Ersk. iii. 3. 47. But this inaccuracy of language is only in his posthumous work. In the Principles it is stated correctly. Prin. iii. 3. 15.

³ [The distinction between homologation of a reducible deed and adoption of a null deed was made in Gall v Bird, 3 July 1855, 17 D. 1027; a counter issue of homologation being allowed as to the former and refused as to the latter, on the ground that such a defence against reduction on the ground of insanity could only be established by declarator. See Cumming v Munro, 19 Nov. 1833, 12 S. 61. But forged writings may be adopted by the person whose name is forged, so as to have effect ab initio. Maiklem v Walker, 16 Nov. 1833, 12 S. 53; Findlay v Currie, 7 Dec. 1850, 13 D. 278; Frost v North of Scotland Banking Co., 20 June 1858, 20 D. 1135.]

⁴ See Johnston v Paterson, 1825, 4 S. 234, N. E. 237. [Keith's Trs. v Keith, etc., 17 July 1857, 19 D. 1040; Douglas v Douglas' Trs., 28 June 1859, 21 D. 1066; Stewart v Baillie, 27 Jan. 1841, 3 D. 463; Hope v Dickson, 17 Dec. 1833, 12 S. 222; Urquhart v Urquhart, 20 Feb. 1851, 13 D. 742, aff. 14 July 1853, 1 Macq. 658; Selkirk v Law, 2 March 1854, 16 D. 715; Paterson v Moncrieff, 15 May 1866, 4 Macph. 706.]

⁵ Pourie v Johnston, 1613, M. 5629; Walwood v Taylor, 1625, M. 5630; Veitch v Pallat, 1676, M. 5646; Ersk. iii. 3. 48.

the subscription as witness has been held as homologation.¹ The peculiarity, however, of an heir's condition, called on to witness the execution of a deathbed deed, has been held a sufficient ground for raising, in that particular case, an exception to this last rule.²

Homologation being an implied confirmation of a previous obligation, contract, or [146] deed, a protest against the inference which might otherwise collaterally arise from the act to be done will exclude homologation.³ But where the person so protesting is not entitled to do the act, or take the benefit which he contemplates, without undertaking as a condition of it the obligations imposed by the deed, the protest will have no effect in discharging such obligations. This, however, belongs to the doctrine of approve and reprobate, which will be considered immediately.

The effect of homologation, when clearly established as an implied assent to the deed or contract, is similar to that of express ratification. Therefore, 1. It sanctions the whole deed, if it be one which is indivisible; ⁴ but if divisible into parts, the homologation of one of the separate parts will not confirm the whole.⁵ 2. Where the matter homologated is a deed or written instrument, and there is a verbal error in it, the homologation will be held to sanction the deed or instrument in its true meaning, but not the error.⁶ 3. Homologation will bar him who so confirms the deed, and his representatives, but not third parties entitled to rely on a real right; and so homologation of an heritable bond, in which one of the witnesses was not designed, and on which infestment followed, was held ineffectual to support it as a real right in competition, although good to support the bond as a personal debt.⁷

II.—OF THE DOCTRINE OF APPROBATE AND REPROBATE.

This is a part of the general doctrine of homologation.⁸ While acts of approbation from which no benefit arises to the approver are disposed of under the doctrine of homologation, those acts from which benefit arises, although strictly speaking also acts of homologation, are considered by lawyers under the head of Approbate and Reprobate. This doctrine is expressed in the maxim, 'Quod approbo non reprobo;' and it has been stated from the highest judicial authority in the following manner: 'It is equally settled in the law of Scotland as of England, that no person can accept and reject the same instrument. If a testator give his estate to A, and give A's estate to B, courts of equity hold it to be against conscience that A should take the estate bequeathed to him, and at the same time refuse to give effect to the implied condition contained in the will of the testator. The Court will not permit him to take that which cannot be his but by virtue of the disposition of the will, and at the same time to keep what, by the same will, is given, or intended to be given, to another person. It is contrary to the established principles of equity, that he should enjoy the benefit while he rejects the condition of the gift.'⁹

¹ Davidson v Davidson, 1714, M. 5652; Johnston v Berry, 1725, M. 5657. See a distinction in Bothwells v E. of Home, 1748, M. 5662. [Innes v D. of Gordon, 5 July 1822, 1 Sh. App. 169; Thorburn v Martin, 8 July 1853, 15 D. 845. The party homologating must be of full age. Irvine v Tait, 1808, M. App. Deathbed 6; Brodie v Brodie, 6 July 1825, 5 S. 900; Macgibbon v Macgibbon, 5 March 1852, 24 Jur. 306.]

² See above, p. 139. See Stewart v Stewart, 1663, M. 5614; and Halyburton v Halyburton, 1666, M. 5675; as corrected by Dallas v Paul, 1704, M. 5677. [Murray v Murray's Trs., 21 Jan. 1826, 4 S. 374, N. E. 377.]

³ [Malcolm v Bardner, 19 June 1823, 2 S. 410, N. E. 366. Orichton v Orichton's Trs., 4 S. 553, N. E. 561; aff. 25 July 1828, 3 W. and S. 329.]

⁴ Steel v Steels, 1774, M. 5669, 5 B. S. 471. See also Erskine v Erskine, 1682, M. 5703.

⁵ Primrose v Duie, 1662, M. 5702. This case, however, is not a good illustration; for the acceptance which was pleaded as homologation did not necessarily confirm the decree arbitral.

⁶ Wauchope v Hamilton, 1711, M. 5712.

⁷ Liddel v Dick's Crs., 1744, M. 5721; Elchies, Homologation, and notes, p. 185. Perhaps Lord Kilkerran's expression is a little too broad, 'that it was never found in any case that homologation was good in a competition.' [Harkness v Graham, 20 June 1833, 11 S. 760; Mansfield v Walker's Trs., 28 June 1833, 11 S. 813.]

⁸ [Although it is so in principle, yet practically the doctrine arises in questions of succession more frequently than in questions as to obligations or contracts.]

⁹ Kerr v Wauchope, in H. L., 1 Bligh 21. [Martin v Martin, 1795, 3 Pat. 421.]

There is in such cases, strictly speaking, an alternative offered to the party; and a necessity raised for making an election either to accept and comply with the condition, or to forego the intended benefit. In this respect, the Scottish doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate approaches nearly to that of Election in English jurisprudence.¹ The great question to be determined is, in what cases the necessity of an election arises? or when a person can take benefit by a deed, without the necessity of complying with the indication of intention, as a condition under which that benefit is conferred, or intended to be conferred? In clearing this doctrine, not only do the same difficulties occur which have already been considered in treating of Homologation,—namely, whether the act in question truly is such as to infer a sanction to the imperfect deed, contract, or settlement, in its full extent and effect; but, superadded to these, there is another set of difficulties, relating to the power of the party who makes the deed to impose, as a condition of it, that alternative which requires a choice to be made,—the benefit to be accepted along with its burden, or the proffered advantage forfeited.

The alternative is raised, and the necessity of making choice between the benefit and the burden imposed, either by force of an express or of an implied condition, such as one person has the power to impose and the other is bound to submit to. The point may occur in one of two situations: either where no step has yet been taken to declare the choice, or after the benefit conditionally given has been already accepted, and a desire is manifested to avoid the fulfilment of the condition. The same principle will, of course, regulate both cases.

I. EXPRESS CONDITION.—Where the condition is express, and clearly stated as such, the doctrine is settled, that a person cannot accept and reject, approbate and reprobate, the same deed.² Where, for example, one having a land estate of small value, and a large personal estate, bequeaths by his will the personal estate to his heir, not otherwise entitled to it, under the condition that he shall give the land to another, the heir must either comply with the condition, or forego the benefit intended for him.³ A difficulty may in such cases, indeed, arise with regard to the power of imposing the conditions, or with regard to the validity of the mode in which that power has been exercised.⁴ And,

1. As to the power. Although the person imposing the condition may not have legitimate power substantively to make such a disposition (as a minor to make a settlement of his land), yet, if imposed expressly as a condition in the bequest of personal estate which

¹ [As to election, when there is an alternative under a contract, see Chitty on Contracts, by Russell, p. 628.]

² See above, p. 141.

³ On this principle the case of Cunyngham v Gainer was decided, 1758, M. 617. And the question had been viewed in the same light in England, where Lord Hardwicke, in Chancery, had some time before decided in the same way upon the same will. See 1 Bligh's Rep. in H. L. 27.

The doctrine was again applied in England, in Brodie v Barry, 1813, where one, by his will, devised and bequeathed to trustees all his estates, both in England and Scotland, on trusts for certain purposes, and among others to form a distributable fund to be divided among his nephews and nieces. On his death, his heir-at-law in Scotland was a niece included in the distribution; and against her a bill was filed by those interested in the distributable fund, in order to have her put to her election, either to forego the Scottish estate, which the will was ineffectual to carry, although intended to go with the other trust-estate, or to stand excluded from the benefit of the distribution. Sir William Grant, Master of the Rolls, decided 'that the heir must make election.' 2 Ves. and Beames 127.

Gibson v M'Bain, 1786, M. 620. Here, by will, two estates were settled; an estate in India on J. C. M'Bain, and an estate in Scotland on Janet Gibson, with an express exclusion of the person succeeding to the Indian estate from partaking of the Scottish. The question arose in relation to an heritable bond to which the testator had not made up titles, and which J. C. M'Bain claimed as not falling under the devise. The Court held, that as he had taken the estate in India, with the condition annexed, 'that he should stand excluded from any dividend of the effects or estate which was or might become the property of the testator in Scotland,' he was debarred from claiming any part of the sum in question.

See also Lady E. and M. Kerr v Wauchope, in H. L., 1 Bligh 1.

⁴ [The chief difficulties which have arisen in connection with this subject are those which involve international questions of English and Scotch law; e.g., where Scotch property is disposed of by English will, and vice versa. See Loudon v Loudon, 1811, Hume 23; Wightman v De Lisle, 1802, M. 4479, Hume 24; Robertson v Robertson, 16 Feb. 1815, F. C.; Campbell v Munro, 1836, 15 S. 310; Trotter v Trotter, 3 W. and S. 407; Dundas v Dundas, 1829, 4 W. and S. 460; Alexander v Bennet, 1829, 7 S. 817.]

the person can make, it has been held in England (though with much doubt) that it is operative. On the same principle, a question has been raised respecting deeds made on deathbed, in which conditions affecting heritage and the heir's right of succession have been introduced; but although the deed on deathbed, if it stood by itself, might be ineffec- [148] tual to carry land, yet, where such conveyance is made an express condition of a will of personal estate, the benefit of that will cannot be assumed without undertaking the condition.¹

Where the condition is such that the person on whom it is imposed is naturally, or by law or contract, disabled from fulfilling it, he will not be placed under the necessity of making his election. So, if an illegal condition be imposed, or one which is impossible, it will be held pro non scripto.² So also, although one may effectually impose it as a condition of his gift, that his donee shall purchase and entail certain lands, or shall entail his own lands, yet if he shall include under such express condition lands belonging to another, but which, being already entailed, cannot be purchased; or lands belonging to the donee, but already under an entailed destination which cannot be altered,—this is not a settlement which can legitimately raise the alternative requiring election to be made, but the disposition will be effectual although the condition should not be complied with.³ In such cases, however, a question arises whether compensation may not be demanded.⁴

2. As to the mode of imposing the conditions, there are certain forms settled by law as necessary, in point of solemnity and proof, to evince intention on particular occasions: as, in Scotland, a deed must be authenticated according to the Act 1681, c. 5, in order to convey land; in England, by the statute of frauds, a devise of freehold must be executed with certain ceremonies; and till lately (55 Geo. III. c. 192), wills of copyhold property, without surrender, were ineffectual.⁵ But although, as substantive acts, such imperfect wills and settlements are ineffectual, yet, where they are made expressly conditions of a will sufficient to convey the personal estate, the alternative to the benefit intended by that will to be conferred will be effectually raised, and the relinquishment or conveyance of the heritage will be required as the condition of the acceptance of the benefit.⁶

II. IMPLIED CONDITION.—Where the condition is only implied, the question presents greater difficulty.

1. Where there is no doubt of the power to declare or of the validity of the mode taken for declaring the purpose, the case will depend on the construction or evidence of an intention to make the bequest conditional. The principle which rules cases of this kind is, that the design must be manifest and unquestionable, and especially that no mere conjecture is admissible against the favour which the law entertains for the heir. His right is not to yield to a mere inference; nor is he to be held bound to convey on a supposition merely conjectural of what the testator would have intended, had he known or marked accurately the state of the property or parties. In applying this general principle, 1. A single deed of settlement, framed manifestly for the arrangement of the whole succession, and of which

¹ [M. of Breadalbane's Trs. v D. of Buckingham, 1840, 2 D. 731; Minto v Kirkpatrick, 1842, 4 D. 1224; Urquhart v Urquhart, 13 D. 742, 1 Macq. 658. See, as to the effect of a condition in a settlement of entailed property, obliging the donee to bring other lands under the entail, Carmichael v Carmichael, 15 Nov. 1810, F. C.; Smith v Murray, 9 Dec. 1814, F. C.]

² Ersk. iii. 3. 85.

³ In the case of Arbuthnot v Arbuthnot, 1792, M. 620, the Court distinguished between the case of approbate and reprobate, and 'the cutting down of part of a deed where that part was null from want of power in the granter.' As if a person were to entail his estate, and in the same deed to include an estate belonging to another, it was said that the entail would be void, in so far as it related to the estate which did not belong to the granter; but there was no reason why that deed should not have effect in so far as it related to the estate over which the granter had the entire disposal. Bell's Ca. 195. Stuart v Leslie, 10 March 1810, F. C., is a strong case to the same purpose.

⁴ See below, p. 145.

⁵ English rule, Boughton v Boughton, 2 Ves. sen. 12; Sheddon v Goodrich, 8 Ves. jun. 481. Scottish rule, Ersk. iii. 9. 5.

⁶ This is fixed both in England and in Scotland.

1. See for English law, Brodie v Barry, 2 Ves. and Beames 127; and Welby v Welby, ib. 137,—both cases having been decided by Sir W. Grant.

2. For Scottish law, see Kerr v Wauchope, in H. L., 1 Bligh 1.

the parts are dependent on each other, and meant to stand or fall together, gives the proper case for the application of the maxim, Approbo non reprobo. And even where the settlement [149] is in separate deeds, but executed with the declared and manifest purpose of forming one consistent plan of settlement, the same rule is applied.¹ 2. But this general doctrine is so far qualified, that, in the first place, A mere narrative or assumption will not impose it as a condition on the heir or person favoured to realize that assumption as a condition of any bequest in his favour; and secondly, Where a settlement consists of a revocation of an old and the declaration of a new disposition, the favour which the law entertains for the heir leads to a separation of the parts of such a settlement, to the effect of admitting the heir to enjoy his legal right, as revived by the revocation, without being held bound by the new disposition as a condition, provided he takes nothing by the conveyance. This is a point which derives more than usual importance from the operation of the law of deathbed; the question being, whether the heir, strictly speaking, takes benefit by the deed, so as to give to the disposition contained in it the force of a condition. This point has been decided in the negative by great authorities.²

2. Although there may be no doubt in point of construction that a condition is intended, which, if expressly declared, would be imperative to raise the alternative, and compel an election, it may notwithstanding be ineffectual for want of power, or for defect of solemnity, where the condition is merely by implication. The exercise of the power is in that case taken as subject to the same exceptions to which as a substantive act it would be exposed. This distinction has been much questioned; but having once been established, it seems now to be settled as a rule not to be shaken.³

¹ C. of Strathmore v M. of Clydesdale, 1729, M. 6377. Here a tailzie and bonds of provision, made at the distance of two days from each other, were held as one settlement, so as to raise the alternative for election. Turnbull v Turnbull, 1776, 5 Br. Sup. 380. Here there were two deeds executed unico contextu, which were 'held to make one settlement of the defunct's whole estate.'

Gordon's case, not reported, but referred to in the Duke of Roxburghe's case, 1 Bligh 9, seems adverse. But Wilson v Henderson, 4 Pat. 316, also referred to in that case, 1 Bligh 4, seems to have been decided conformably to the above cases. [See also Stewart v Stephen, 1832, 11 S. 139; Black v Watson, 1841, 3 D. 522; Harvey v Harvey's Trs., 22 D. 1310, 1 Macph. 345. The case of Hill v Hunter, 1818, Hume 27, is exceptional. In Dow v Beith, 1856, 18 D. 820, the heritable and moveable estates were settled by different deeds and upon separate trusts, and the principle of approve and reprobate was held not to apply.]

² Lord Rosslyn, in the House of Lords, in Coutts' case, said: 'The respondent founded part of his argument upon what is termed in Scottish law the maxim of approve and reprobate. Says Mr. Coutts: "If you approve the revocation of the deed to Sir Hugh, contained in the posterior deed in my favour, then you cannot reprobate the other clause of that deed." But this is false reasoning. The Court cannot say to the heir-at-law, "Under what deed do you claim?" It is enough for him to say: "God and nature have made me heir-at-law; show me by what deed my right is cut off." 3 Bligh 664. Lord Chancellor Eldon, in a later stage of the proceedings, said, with regard to the argument of approve and reprobate: 'I have made a good deal of inquiry into the grounds of the decision, to see whether it went upon that ground; and if so, how it could be maintained. I think that this is not a case where the doctrine of approve and reprobate will apply. The heir says: "Your deed does not give you a title, unless you can show me a deed executed in liege poustie, existing at the death of the granter; and if there be no such deed executed, the deed executed on deathbed is gone." 3 Bligh 684.

See also Cunningham v Whiteford, 1748, Elchies, Deathbed, No. 19, 5 Br. Sup. 234. [Battley v Small, 2 Feb. 1815, F. C.]

³ 'I do not understand,' says Sir William Grant, in a case relative to a will comprehending both an English and a Scottish land estate, 'why a will, though not executed so as to pass real estate, should not be read for the purpose of discovering in it an implied condition concerning real estate, annexed to a gift of personal property, as it is admitted it must be read when such condition is expressly annexed to such gift. For if by a sound construction such condition is rightly inferred from the whole instrument, the effect seems to be the same as if it were expressed in words.' But he adds: 'Whatever may be the foundation of the distinction, it is established.' Brodie v Barry, 2 Ves. and Beames 130.

Lord Chancellor Eldon, in the Scottish case of Kerr v Wauchope, says: 'The distinctions upon this head of law appear to be rather unsubstantial. It has been held, that although a will containing dispositions of land be not duly executed according to the statute, yet if in the same will personalty is given, upon condition that the legatee convey the land, in such a case, inasmuch as the disposition of the personalty cannot be read without reading at the same time the condition upon which it is given, the gift and the condition are inseparable; and a case of election is raised because the testator in the disposition, not of land, but of personalty, expresses and directs what is to be done. These are undoubtedly thin distinctions, and a judge having to deal with them finds a difficulty in stating to his own mind satisfactory principles on which they may be grounded.' Then, after

In applying this rule, it would appear, 1. That where the testator has no power [150] to execute a settlement of the land (as a minor to make a settlement of heritage), the condition or alternative is not raised by implication: the will being void, it is not to be held as evidence of an intention to impose this as a condition.¹ 2. That where the deed is a testament, which, though made by a person having power to settle land, is unavailing in point of form and solemnity to carry land, or give evidence of an intention to dispose of it,² the alternative will not be raised.³ 3. That where the deed is done on deathbed, it is not void, and therefore the same reasoning does not apply. It is only reducible, not null. It is evidence of intention, though subject to challenge as influenced by importunity, and therefore a deathbed deed will raise the alternative, and require election.⁴

In closing this doctrine of Approbate and Reprobate, there remains one important question, which has been settled by a long series of determinations in England, but in relation to which there has been no decision in a Scottish case. Where an alternative is effectually raised, and the person sees it good to repudiate the proffered benefit rather than embrace the proposed condition, what shall be the effect of this to the person favoured by the condition? Shall he thus be entirely deprived of the benefit intended for him?

'In England (as Lord Chancellor Eldon said in the House of Lords), there has been engrafted upon the primary doctrine of election, the equity, as it may be termed, of compensation. Suppose a testator gives his estate to A, and directs that the estate of A, or any part of it, should be given to B; if the deviser will not comply with the provision of the will, the courts of equity hold that another condition is to be implied, as arising out of the will and the conduct of the devisee; that, inasmuch as the testator meant that his heir-at-law should not take the estate which he gives to A, in consideration of his giving his estate to B, if A refuses to comply with the will, B shall be compensated by taking the property, or the value of the property, which the testator meant for him, out of the estate devised, though he cannot have it out of the estate intended for him.'⁵

In the case which gave rise to these observations, this point had not been decided [151] in the Court of Session. It was therefore remitted for judgment by that Court, with certain referring to Sir William Grant's having stated the same doubts, but concluded with adhering to the rule, he says: 'In such conclusion, and upon similar grounds, I acquiesce; for long professional experience has convinced me, that it is more beneficial to the community to adhere to imperfect or ineligible rules of law, which have been long established, than that each succeeding judge should be at liberty, upon his own notions of expediency, to improve and unsettle the law. The traditional experience of the Court does not furnish a wiser maxim than that which is contained in the short precept, Stare decisis.' 1 Bligh 23.

¹ This held in England on a principle equally applicable in Scottish jurisprudence. Hearle v Greenbank, 3 Atk. 695. See 13 Ves. 223. [See Douglas' Trs. v Douglas, 1862, 24 D. 1191.]

² Montgomery v Foulis, 1795, Bell's Fol. Ca. p. 203.

³ Wilson v Henderson, 1802; revd. in H. L., 4 Pat. 316, M. 15444.

⁴ Paterson v Spreul, 1745, M. 3334. It was contended that, by the law of deathbed, the defunct is presumed non sanæ mentis, so far as concerns the disposal of heritable subjects; and so the question was not, whether by the disposition, as comprehending both heritage and moveables, the heir was prejudiced, but whether the disposition, so far as it conveyed a faculty to dispose of heritage, was not void as granted by a person who, presumptione juris, was incapable quoad that subject;—which the Lords had no regard to, as an improper conception of the law of deathbed; which, though it may proceed on the presumption of incapacity, only restrains deeds in prejudice of the heir, who therefore cannot take by a deed, and at the same time reprobate a part of the same deed.

See also Kerrs v Wauchope, in H. L., 1 Bligh 25.

⁵ Kerrs v Wauchope, H. L., 1 Bligh 25, 26. The Ladies Mary and Essex Kerr had, by the settlement of their brother the Duke of Roxburghe, the life interest of a trust-estate; the residue, after the death of the survivor, being devised to Sir John Scott and others. Those ladies were also their brother's next of kin. They reduced ex capite lecti the settlement so far as it conveyed land, and were in consequence held to have made their election to reprobate the deed, so that they could not under it claim the life interest. And thence a question arose, whether the residuary legatees, by way of compensation for what they lost by the reduction of the deed, could claim compensation out of the profits during the lives of the Ladies Kerr; or whether the Ladies Kerr were not, as next of kin, entitled to those profits as not disposed of by the will.

observations from the Lord Chancellor, which plainly indicated his opinion that the doctrine of compensation would apply to the case.¹ But it was not decided on the remit.

It will, however, require great consideration before this doctrine in its full extent be judicially admitted in Scotland. It will be found opposed by the necessity of holding the heir-at-law disinherited by mere implication, which the law of Scotland does not recognise. And practical difficulties of no mean importance must be encountered in the making up of titles, and in giving effect to the implied will.

PART III.

OF PROPERTY IN MOVEABLES CORPOREAL.

THE class of subjects which next demand attention as a fund of credit, or of payment of debt, comprehends the property of Moveables. And, first, Of property in ships, as a peculiar subject ruled by special statute; next, Of property in goods and merchandise.

CHAPTER I.

OF PROPERTY IN SHIPS.

PROPERTY in ships may be either of BRITISH or of FOREIGN vessels. The difference between them may be generally stated thus: 1. FOREIGN or ALIEN SHIPS are liable to alien duties when engaged in neutral trade, and to forfeitures and penalties when engaged in the trade of which, by statute, a monopoly is secured to British vessels; and, 2. BRITISH SHIPS enjoy commercial privileges and immunities which greatly augment the value of that sort of property.²

[152] It has been questioned whether a foreign-built ship, owned by British subjects, can legally be employed by them in the same trade in which it may be employed by an alien owner. Upon this point, Lord Eldon, while presiding in the Court of Common Pleas, had occasion to deliver this opinion, 'That a British owner of a foreign-built ship may have no right, and the respondents have all the right, in the subject of litigation, why is it not to be applied immediately by way of compensation, upon the ground that the condition of the gift being rejected, the life estate did not form a part of the disposition?' 1 Bligh 26. [The principle of equitable compensation has subsequently been established by a series of decisions embracing almost all the cases in which a person has the right of election between legal and conventional provisions. See Fisher v Dixon, 2 Bell 63, and cases cited; Wills and Succession, vol. i. pp. 480-483.]

¹ 'The Court has not yet determined whether the respondents are or are not entitled to take their compensation until the death of the survivor of the appellants. The Court below having given no opinion, it is impossible that we should give any opinion upon that point. It is for their determination in the first instance. The cause must, in point of form, be remitted with a view to have that question decided. It appears to me very easy of solution. There are certain persons who, according to the expression and principles of our law, have a vested remainder in the capital. They have also, by way of compensation, a title to the life interest, preceding that remainder in the fund. Having, therefore, the whole interest, I do not understand upon what ground it can be argued that there ought to be an accumulation of the profits until the decease of the survivor of the appellants. If the appellants

² [For the privileges of British ownership and British character, other than the right to British protection, see Customs Consolidation Act, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 107, secs. 152, 163, 191, 324 to 331; and 18 and 19 Vict. c. 96, secs. 1, 14, 15.]

engage in neutral trade, and will be liable to the alien duties; but it is not the policy of the Legislature to prevent British subjects from employing foreign ships in neutral trade in as ample a manner as they can be employed by aliens.¹

The methods of acquiring property in foreign vessels must, of course, depend on the rules of the law of the state to which the ship belongs. But I shall confine myself to the consideration of property in British ships.

The great peculiarity of property in British ships, as distinguished from property in foreign ships or in other moveables, is, that it depends on written titles, which are recorded in a public register; and that on the state of the property as appearing from those titles in the register, creditors and purchasers may rely. In this respect, property in ships may be likened to property in land, which, in so far as creditors are concerned, is held by the law of Scotland to be correctly set forth, with all its burdens and encumbrances, in the records of sasine, of inhibitions, and of adjudications.

It appears that, at all times, the property of ships has been transferred with greater solemnity than that of ordinary moveables. In England, this species of property from very early times was evidenced by written documents;² and although, in Scotland, a written conveyance does not appear always to have been required for the transference of a ship,³ this has, by custom, been long since deemed essential. Besides the written instrument by which the property of ships is conveyed, there are other very important solemnities required by the Navigation Acts. Those Acts were not meant to regulate the transference of ships, but merely to give encouragement to shipping and navigation in this island. But, in the course of securing these objects of national policy, a system of regulations and a public record of this sort of property sprang up, which have proved of the most essential use in regulating the interests of shipowners and of their creditors. Courts of justice have not been blind to the uses which might be derived from the record that came thus to be established, and have thought it of importance to preserve and improve this record for the benefit of the public. Every rule of construction has been favoured which could lead to this beneficial end.

A short review of the history and policy of the Navigation Acts, with a commentary on the requisites enjoined by those Acts for establishing the character of a British ship entitled to the privileges, and for transferring and burdening this sort of property, will present a view of all the law on this subject.

SECTION I.—HISTORY AND POLICY OF THE NAVIGATION ACTS.⁴

Without recurring to the earlier codes of maritime law, in which a policy similar to that of the Navigation Acts may perhaps be traced, the first English statute on the subject was in Richard II.'s time, when it was ordained that no merchandise should be shipped out of the realm but in British ships, on pain of forfeiture.⁵ Amidst the civil distractions of England after that time, the maritime interest suffered neglect. An abortive attempt was made to introduce a navigation law in the time of Henry III., and it was not till the [153] sitting of the Long Parliament that the proposal was revived and adopted. To whatever motives we may trace this measure, whether to private animosity or to national hostility against Holland, the regulations are acknowledged to have been framed with as much wisdom as if dictated by the most enlightened views of maritime policy; and, indeed, at that moment, national animosity and the true interests of England coincided in a very remarkable manner.

It was in 1646 that the first Navigation Act was passed, for more effectually securing

¹ Long v Duff, 1800, 2 Bos. and Pull. 216.

² Abbot, Treat. of the Law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen, 1.

³ Cathcart v Holland, 1681, M. 8471.

⁴ [See Reeves' History of the Law of Shipping and Navigation.]

⁵ 5 Rich. II. St. i. c. 3; 14 Rich. II. c. 6.

the trade of the British colonies in the West Indies to British shipping. In 1651, Cromwell's Act was passed; and, with improvements, it was, after the Restoration, re-enacted in England in 1660, and in Scotland in 1661.¹ By these laws, certain duties and forfeitures were imposed on foreign ships, while the trade of England and Scotland was confined to ships truly belonging to natives. A species of register was appointed by both those Acts: it being enacted that an oath should be taken to the ownership, and a certificate granted; and that of all those certificates a register should be kept. Further improvements were introduced in the reign of Charles II., of William III., and of George II. During the administration of Mr. Pitt, the whole of those laws were revised and consolidated into a system, under the care and by the exertions of the late Lord Liverpool, than whom no man was better skilled in the naval policy of Great Britain.² The system thus established, after having been amended by particular statutes,³ was again consolidated in an Act of His present Majesty, the 4 Geo. IV. c. 41. This statute, however, was repealed by the Act of last session, 6 Geo. IV. c. 105, entitled 'An Act to repeal several Acts relating to the Customs,' on occasion of the general reformation made on the laws of Custom and Excise. And by the Acts of the same session, c. 109 and 110, the system of registry was re-enacted, with only the changes necessary from the new arrangement of the establishment of the Customs. These two statutes, which came into operation on 5th January 1826, contain a digest of the whole of this department of the law.⁴

This is not the place in which to discuss the policy and expediency of these Acts, or their effects on foreign trade or domestic industry.⁵ Their aim was national defence,—an object of vital importance in a country like this, and with regard to which it seems the part of wisdom not entirely to trust to the indirect effects of an augmenting commerce, but to add the force of legislative enactment in the creation of naval power.

The great objects proposed to be attained by the Navigation Acts are—

1. The creation of a body of skilful and hardy seamen.
2. The augmentation of the shipping actually in the possession of the natives of this country. And,
3. The encouragement of the skill and industry of our own ship-carpenters, by confining the privileges to ships British-built.

It would be a false inference from the comparative tardiness in restricting the privilege to British-built ships, that the encouragement of this branch of our national manufacture has been regarded as of little importance by the Legislature. It must be recollected that the number of vessels British-built was not, till of late years, by any means adequate to the occasions of our trade; and that it was not till 1786 that the Legislature could, with any [154] regard to true policy, restrict the monopoly to British-built ships. They were forced to rest satisfied with ships that were British-owned.⁶

The monopoly of trade secured to British ships is: 1. Of the trade from Britain to the British settlements and plantations. 2. Of the coasting trade. 3. Of the importation of many bulky or valuable articles into Great Britain; with a share of this importation trade to ships of the country of the produce or manufacture, or from which the goods are imported

¹ The English statute is 12 Car. II. c. 18, and the Scottish 1661, c. 45.

² 26 Geo. III. c. 60.

³ 27 Geo. III. c. 19; 34 Geo. III. c. 42 and 68; 35 Geo. III. c. 58; 37 Geo. III. c. 63; 48 Geo. III. c. 70. The Registry Acts are in force in Ireland. See Irish statutes, 27 Geo. III. c. 23; British Acts, 42 Geo. III. c. 61.

⁴ 6 Geo. IV. c. 109, Act for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation; and c. 110, Act for the registering of British vessels.

⁵ [The doubt here indicated by the author as to the policy of the Navigation Laws has been verified by their total repeal, in so far as they gave protection to the British shipowner. See 12 and 13 Vict. c. 29, and 17 and 18 Vict. c. 5. An abstract of the provisions of the subsisting statute, as to Registration, Sale, and Mortgage, is given, infra, p. 159 sqq.]

⁶ By the accounts taken in 1801 of British ships registered in the different ports of the empire, the number of vessels manned and navigated by British subjects amounted at that time to 17,295; their tonnage to 1,666,481 tons; and the number of seamen employed, on an average of one man to 17 tons, to 129,546.

(with certain exceptions). 4. Of the fisheries for importation into Great Britain. These privileges are guarded and made valuable by forfeitures and alien duties against foreign ships;¹ and they are confined to ships duly registered as British ships, and navigated by a British master, and three-fourths of the crew British seamen.

But it is proper to give more precisely the description of such vessels as are required to be registered, and which, being registered, are, while the register is in force, entitled to the privilege of British ships.

SECTION II.—OF A SHIP'S NATIONAL CHARACTER.

The privileges of trade being shared between British and foreign ships, the Legislature has been careful to distinguish the description of either character.

I.—DESCRIPTION OF BRITISH PRIVILEGED SHIPS.

By the recent statutes, no ship shall be entitled to the privileges of a British ship, unless, 1. It shall be duly registered and navigated as such; or, 2. It shall be under fifteen tons burden, and confined to inland or coast trade, and wholly owned and navigated by British subjects.

1. REGISTERED SHIP.—The leading description, according to the late Act, of a ship entitled to be registered, or which, having been registered, is to be deemed duly registered, comprehends, (1.) 'Such ships as are wholly of the built of the United Kingdom, or of the Isle of Man, or of the islands of Guernsey or Jersey, or of some of the colonies, etc. in Asia, Africa, or America, or of Malta, Gibraltar, or Heligoland, which belong to the king at the time of the building of such ship.' And, (2.) 'Such ships as shall have been condemned in any court of admiralty as prize of war, or in any competent court as forfeited for breach of the law for prevention of the slave-trade, and which shall wholly belong, and continue wholly to belong, to His Majesty's subjects, duly entitled to be owners of ships or vessels registered by virtue of this Act.' 6 Geo. iv. c. 110, sec. 5.

Two exceptions to this description are made: 1. That where a ship has been repaired in a foreign country, if such repairs shall exceed the sum of twenty shillings for every ton of the burden of the ship (unless made necessary by extraordinary damage sustained during absence, to enable her to perform the voyage in which she was engaged, and to return to the king's dominions), she shall not continue to enjoy the privilege of a British ship (sec. 6).² 2. The other exception is, where such ship has been captured and become prize to an [155] enemy, or been sold to foreigners; and the character as a British registrable ship shall in that case be redeemable only under the provisions of the 5th section, by condemnation as prize of war, or for breach of the laws for prevention of the slave-trade.

It is a part of the national character as a British ship, that the owners shall be British. And, 1. No person who has taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign state (except under the terms of some capitulation), unless afterwards he become a denizen or naturalized subject of the United Kingdom, shall, in whole or in part, or directly or indirectly, be owner of any ship required or authorized to be registered. 2. Neither shall any one be such owner if he usually resides in a country not under the king's dominion, unless a member of a British

¹ 6 Geo. iv. c. 109, secs. 2–11. By sec. 4, to exercise the privilege unregistered exposes the ship to forfeiture; and by sec. 23, 'If any goods be imported, exported, or carried coastwise, contrary to the law of navigation hereinbefore contained, all such goods shall be forfeited, and the master of such ship shall forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.'

² It is provided that a ship undergoing such repairs in a foreign country shall, by the master, etc., on arrival, be reported to the collector and comptroller of the customs at the port, under the penalty of twenty shillings per ton; and if satisfied on the points in the Act, they are directed to certify, on the back of the register, that the privileges of the ship have not been forfeited (sec. 6). It is further provided against combinations of workmen in British ports, that the Privy Council may permit a ship to repair to a foreign port for necessary refitting (sec. 7).

factory, or agent or partner in a house or copartnership actually carrying on trade in Great Britain or Ireland (sec. 13).

With these requisites, a ship, in order to enjoy the privilege of a British registered ship, must have the sanction of a certificate of registry, guarded by the surveys, oaths, and other precautions enjoined in the Act. See below, p. 151 et seq.

2. SHIPS NOT REGISTERED.—Ships British-built under 15 tons, though not registered, if owned and navigated by British subjects, are British ships, in all navigation in the rivers and on the coasts of the United Kingdom, or of the British possessions abroad, not proceeding over sea; or such vessels not exceeding 30 tons, and not having a whole deck, employed in fishing on Newfoundland banks and shores, etc., are also admitted as British (6 Geo. iv. c. 109, sec. 13).

Honduras ships also, owned and navigated as British ships, are entitled to the privilege of British ships in all direct trade between the United Kingdom and that settlement, on producing certificates of the built and ownership from the superintendent of the colony (sec. 14).

3. NAVIGATED AS BRITISH.—It is requisite in all cases, that ships professing to be British shall be navigated by a certain proportion of British subjects. Every registered ship, while she claims the privilege, shall be navigated during the whole of every voyage, with cargo or in ballast, by a master who is a British subject, and a crew whereof three-fourths at least are British seamen; and in the coasting trade, or among the British islands, or in fishing there, the whole crew shall be British (secs. 12, 13).

Two provisions are added for clearing difficulties: 1. The character of British master or seamen includes natural-born subjects; or subjects by naturalization or denization; or by conquest or cession taking the oaths; or serving in time of war for three years in a ship of the king (sec. 16). And, 2. As to the proportion, if there be one British seaman for every 20 tons burden, the ship shall be deemed duly navigated, although the number of other seamen should exceed one-fourth of the crew.¹

II.—DESCRIPTION OF FOREIGN PRIVILEGED SHIPS.

In order that a ship should be admitted to be a ship of any particular country, to share the privilege of trade with British ships, it is requisite—

1. That she be of the built of such country; or, 2. Prize of war to such country, and condemned as prize; or, 3. Forfeited to such country under laws for the prevention of the slave-trade, and condemned as forfeiture; or, 4. British-built, not being a prize of war from British subjects.

[156] Under this law a question sometimes arises, whether a ship repairing in a foreign port be of the built of that particular country; as when a Russian cargo was imported in a ship originally built in Holstein, but which having been wrecked on the coast of Russia, was there repaired at the expense of two-thirds of her value, which by the Russian law entitled her to navigate as a Russian ship. It was held by Lord Ellenborough that she was not Russian-built; that repair is not built; that the ship must be of the built of the place of her original construction; and that the Russian law cannot control the Navigation Act of Great Britain.²

2. It is necessary that such vessel should be navigated by a crew of which three-fourths are subjects of that country, and owned by subjects of such country (6 Geo. iv. c. 109, sec. 15). And the rule of proportion of one seaman for every 20 tons is applied as in the case of British navigators (sec. 16).

¹ On these points occasional exceptions are admitted, or power given by royal proclamation to make relaxations; for which see the Act, secs. 17–20.

² Redhead v Cater, 4 Camp. 188. This question arose under the old laws.

SECTION III.—OF THE REGISTERING OF BRITISH SHIPS.¹

While a ship continues in the hands of the builder, the property of it is, like that of any other moveable, unaffected by any of the regulations of the Navigation Acts. If it is to be attached by creditors, they must use the ordinary diligence for affecting moveables. If it is to be transferred, a bill of sale, with delivery, is a sufficient conveyance.²

But as soon as the vessel is ready for sea, and before she departs from port, she must be registered in terms of the Acts; or after a ship captured from the enemy comes into a British port, and is condemned as lawful prize, if she is to be fitted out for sea under British ownership.

By the recent Act (6 Geo. iv. c. 110, sec. 2), no ship or vessel is to be entitled to any of the privileges or advantages of a British-registered ship, until the person or persons claiming property therein shall have caused the same to be registered, and shall have obtained a certificate of such registry. And by sec. 4, ships not duly registered, and not having obtained the proper certificate, and exercising any of the privileges of a British ship, shall be subject to forfeiture, and with the guns, ammunition, etc., may be seized by any officer of the customs. But this is declared not to affect any vessel registered under former Acts, until such time as, by the subsisting Act, they shall be required to be registered de novo. The occasions on which registers de novo are required are these: 1. Where the owner or owners shall have transferred all his or their share or shares, the ship shall be registered de novo, before sailing or departing from the port to which she belongs, or from any port in the same part of the kingdom, or with a provision for a certificate on the back of the existing certificate, if time presses, enabling him to sail upon that voyage (sec. 13). 2. When a certificate of the registry of a ship is lost, on proof thereof made, the commissioners of the customs may permit a register de novo, and a certificate to be granted on bond to deliver up the lost certificate when found, to be cancelled (sec. 26). 3. When the certificate of a ship is unduly detained by the master, etc., after certain precautions the ship may be registered de novo (sec. 27). 4. When a ship, after being registered, shall be so altered as not to correspond with all the particulars mentioned in her certificate, she shall be registered de novo, as soon as she returns to her port, or any port in the same part of the kingdom (sec. 28). And, 5. No certificate, except under the subsisting Act, or under the Act of 4 Geo. iv. c. 41, for the registering of vessels and specifying the shares of the vessel [157] held by each owner, shall be in force after the 5th January 1826, or the ship's arrival at her port after that date, unless where time has been granted for ascertaining the number of shares (sec. 35).

The following points are fixed as to the registry and certificate:—

I. PERSONS AUTHORIZED TO MAKE REGISTRY AND GRANT CERTIFICATE.—The collector and comptroller of His Majesty's customs in any port in the United Kingdom, and in the Isle of Man; the principal officer of the customs in Guernsey or Jersey, together with the governor or commander-in-chief of these islands, etc., are authorized and required to make registry and grant certificates (sec. 3).

II. WHERE TO BE REGISTERED.—Registry shall not be made, nor certificate granted, in any other port or place than that to which the vessel shall properly belong, otherwise to be void and null, unless specially authorized by an order in writing under the hands of the commissioners of customs (sec. 11). And the port of the vessel shall be that at or near to which some or one of the owners who shall take the requisite oath shall reside (sec. 12).

III. PROOFS OF THE BUILT OR CONDEMNATION.—Before the owner can obtain a certificate, certain proofs must be given of the place in which the ship has been built, or of her condemnation as a lawful prize, and of the ownership.

¹ Under existing laws, infra, p. 160 sqq.

² Oxenheim v Gibbs, 1807; Abbot on Shipping, chap. i.

BUILT.—The evidence of the 'built' is a full and true account, under the hand of the builder, of the denomination of the ship, time and place of building, tonnage, and name of the first purchaser. Such account the builder is, by the statute, required to give on the same being demanded; and this is confirmed by the oath of the owner, that the ship to be registered is the same with that described by the builder.¹

CERTIFICATE OF CONDEMNATION.—If the ship to be registered is a prize captured from the enemy, or forfeited for breach of the slavery laws, a certificate must be produced of the condemnation, under the hand and seal of the judge of the court in which the ship was condemned; and also an exact account or survey under the order of the condemning court; and an oath to the identity of the ship.²

IV. SURVEY OF THE SHIP.—In order to enable the collector and comptroller of customs to grant a certificate, truly and accurately describing the ship, and to enable other officers of the customs, on due examination, to discover the identity of the ship, one or more persons, approved by the commissioners of the customs, go on board and examine, and take the measurement of the ship.³

V. OWNERSHIP.—The proofs of ownership are intended to prevent foreigners from being proprietors of British ships. They partly arise out of the documents produced to prove the BUILT, and partly out of the oath of the owners. Before obtaining a registry, an oath is prescribed to be taken before the persons who grant the certificate, by the owner, if only one; or if two, and both resident within twenty miles of the port, by both; if both or either resident at a greater distance, by one. If the number of owners exceed two, then by the greater part (not exceeding three), if resident within twenty miles of the port; and if all are resident beyond twenty miles, one shall suffice. This oath expresses the name and description of the vessel, the name of the master, the name of every proprietor or owner, with every particular relating to their character as British subjects; and it contains also a positive averment that no foreigner, directly or indirectly, has any share or interest in the ship.⁴

[158] VI. REGISTER AND CERTIFICATE.—The particulars relating to the description of the ships thus collected are inserted in a register. Of this a certificate is granted, which bears, That in pursuance of the Act, the owners having taken and subscribed the oath required, and sworn that (in the proportions specified on the back) they are the sole owners of the ship, by her name and port, that she is of such a burden, and that such a one is master, and that the ship was built at such a port, etc.: And that the surveying officer, by name, having certified that the ship is of such and such dimensions, and rigged in the manner particularly specified, and that the owners having consented and agreed to the description, and having caused sufficient security to be given, as required, the said ship by name has been registered at such a port. On the back of the certificate of registry there shall be an account of the parts or shares held by the several owners; the several shares being distributed among owners not exceeding in number thirty-two.

At every port of registry a book is to be kept by the collector and comptroller of the customs, in which the entry shall be duly made, each being numbered in progression; and within one month at furthest, a true and exact copy shall be transmitted to the commissioners of the customs. They again are bound, in Scotland and Ireland, to transmit at the end of every month, true and exact copies to the commissioners of customs in England.⁵ This record has collaterally, as already observed, come to serve as a useful representation of the actual state of the shipping interest of this country.

¹ 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, sec. 25.

² Ib. sec. 29. Prize vessels are not to be registered at Jersey or Guernsey, or Isle of Man (sec. 36).

³ 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, sec. 16; and the rules of admeasurement are laid down in secs. 17, 18, 19, and 20.

⁴ 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, sec. 14. If a corporate body, the oath must bear the name of the company or corporation.

⁵ Secs. 11 and 47.

The certificate is written on parchment, and delivered to the captain, signed by the collector or comptroller of the customs, to be a voucher and safeguard to the vessel of her character and privileges as a British ship.

VII. PRECAUTIONS AGAINST THE ABUSE OF THE CERTIFICATE.—It is only by the certificate that an officer can determine whether a ship is entitled to the privileges of a British ship, and it is of great importance on this point to prevent abuse. For this purpose, in the first place, security by bond is granted by the master and owners in a large penalty, that the certificate shall not be lent, sold, or disposed of, but shall be faithfully kept for the use of the ship, and returned on the several events which render it no longer useful.¹ And, secondly, the certificate is entrusted to the custody of the master, who is bound to deliver up the certificate to the proper officer of the customs, for the use of the ship, as occasion shall require, under high penalties; and it is not essential that this detention should be malicious: it is sufficient if it be wilful.²

VIII. LOST CERTIFICATE.—When a certificate shall be lost or mislaid, and proof thereof to the satisfaction of the commissioners shall be made, they are authorized to register the vessel de novo, and grant a new certificate; or when the ship is far from her port, to grant a licence, under which she may sail in safety to the extent permitted. The additional precaution, however, is taken of an oath or bond as to the lost certificate, that it shall, if found, be delivered up to the proper officer.³

IX. EFFECT OF CERTIFICATE AS PROOF OF PROPERTY.—The use of the certificate is to prove the identity of the ship as privileged. But the privilege is so combined with the property as sworn to in the owners specified, that it serves also as a badge of the property or ownership in British ships; and while no one whose name does not appear in the certificate, or by indorsation on it, is deemed a proprietor, those who appear still as owners on the register are held as such, and their creditors may seize the ship as their untransferred [159] property. But the proof by the register is not absolute to the effect of vesting the property in one who has not given authority for the transfer.⁴

Where the precautions enjoined by the Act have been neglected in cases intended as trusts for benefit of others, the registry is held the sole criterion of property, and the right of those for whose benefit the sale was intended will be defeated.⁵

X. OF SHIPS HELD IN SHARES.—Under former statutes there was much confusion and vagueness relative to shares in ships. By the Act of 4 Geo. IV. c. 41, and the renewed Act of 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, secs. 32–35, it is provided,—

¹ 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, secs. 21, 22, 23.

² The Court of Admiralty will, in a suit for possession of ships, order delivery of the certificate where necessary. Barbara, Chegwyn, 4 Rob. A. R. 1.

³ 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, sec. 26.

⁴ Tinkler v Walpole, 14 East 226; Trehella v Rowe, 11 East 435. [Abbot on Shipping, 11th ed. 68.]

⁵ Thus, under the former Acts, a ship intended to be for a partnership, but one of the parties alone being sole registered owner, his separate creditors were preferred to the creditors of the partnership. Curtis v Perry, 6 Ves. jun. 739.

Again, in a similar case, a ship was bought by a company and paid from its funds, and everything relative to the purchase marked it as a purchase by the company, but the registry was in the name of one of the parties alone; and in a question between the joint and separate creditors the latter were preferred, the Lord Chancellor Eldon holding the registry to be the evidence of the property, and that it must be taken so to be even among creditors. Yallop ex parte, 15 Ves. jun. 60.

The same decision was given where 10-16ths of a ship were bought by a company, and 5-16ths registered in the name of one partner, and the other 5-16ths in the name of another, in a question between the joint creditors and the creditors of one of the partners as to one of those 5-16ths. Houghton ex parte, and Gibble ex parte, 17 Vesey 254.
VOL. I.

A ship purchased by a company of four persons was registered in the name of two of them alone. An action on a policy of insurance on freight was not maintainable by the company, freight arising only from ownership; and there being no right, either legal or equitable, in the company as owners of this vessel. Camden v Anderson, 5 Term. Rep. 709.

See Stringer v Murray, 2 Barn. and Ald. 248, where one contracting to have a ship built for him in the East Indies agreed to sell a share, and received the price. Held that the ship, having been registered in the name of the former alone, the latter had no legal interest.

Brewster v Clarke, 2 Merivale 75.

See ex parte Burns, 1 Jac. and Walker 378. Ships registered in the name of one partner, but in the order and disposition of both, belong to the partnership. [Abbot on Shipping, 11th ed. 52–54.]

1. That the property in every ship or vessel, of which there are more than one owner, shall be considered as divided into sixty-four shares; and the proportion held by each owner shall be described in the registry as being a certain number of sixty-fourth parts, no person being entered as owner in respect of any share which shall not be an integral sixty-fourth part of the same (sec. 32).

2. That, upon the first registry of any ship, the owner or owners who shall take the oath before registry, shall swear to the number of such parts thus held by each, and the registry shall be accordingly; it being provided, that the owners of fractional parts, wherever in a division the property of a ship comes to be separated into any number of parts, may transfer to each other, or join in transferring to a stranger, the fractional parts, by memorandum on their respective bills of sale, or by fresh bills of sale without stamp (sec. 32). And by secs. 34, 35, provision is made for clearing in the registry the titles to all shares of ships registered before 31st December 1823.

3. That it shall be lawful for any number of owners named and described in the registry, being partners in any house or copartnership actually carrying on trade within the king's dominions, to hold any ship, or share of a ship, in the name of such house or partnership, as joint-owners, without distinguishing the proportionate interest of each owner; and that the ship, or shares so held in copartnership, shall be held to be partnership property to all intents and purposes, and shall be governed by the same rules as relate to and govern all other partnership property in other goods (sec. 32).

4. That not more than thirty-two persons shall be legal owners at one and the same time, under the exception, first, of the equitable title of minors, heirs, legatees, creditors, or others duly represented by, or holding from, any persons within the number registered as legal owners; secondly, of joint-stock companies for the purpose of owning ships or vessels [160] as their joint property, who shall have elected any number, not less than three, of those members to be trustees for them: in which case it is declared lawful for such trustees, or any three of them, with permission of the commissioners, to take the oath required before registry; except that, instead of stating therein the names and descriptions of the other owners, they shall state the names and description of the company to which such ship shall in such manner belong (sec. 33). This provision was introduced into the Act of 6 Geo. iv. for the first time, to provide for a case which had raised many doubts under former Acts. There are partnerships whose partners are so numerous, that it is very desirable to avoid the necessity of having a title from each in case of a sale. Shipping companies, and companies for herring fishery, etc., sometimes consist of perhaps a hundred persons. And in practice, under former Acts, the registry of ships belonging to such companies was in general made in the name of certain persons, as trustees for themselves and all the other partners by name, as persons carrying on trade under such a firm; and when a ship of the company was sold, the transfer was made on the back of the certificate by the trustees, as authorized either by general powers or by a special minute of the company. This method, however, had never been judicially sanctioned, and might have been exposed to much doubt, which is now removed.

CONCLUSION.—In order to bring the whole shipping property of Great Britain under the operation of the system established by this last Act, it is provided, that from the 5th January 1826, or from the first arrival or entry of any ship after that day at the port to which she belongs, or any port in the same part of the kingdom, or in the same colony, etc., no certificate of registry shall be in force, except such as are granted under one or other of the Acts 4 Geo. iv. c. 41, or 6 Geo. iv. c. 110, and in which the share or shares held by each owner shall be set forth;¹ and to facilitate this, no stamp duty is required on the bond for the first registry under this Act (sec. 36).

¹ Sec. 35. Indulgence is given where the collector and comptroller certify that time has been granted for ascertaining the shares.

SECTION IV.—OF THE SALE AND TRANSFERENCE OF SHIPS.¹

Under the older statutes, the whole doctrine of the sale and transference of ships was difficult and embarrassing, unsuitable to a species of property so much the subject of daily transfer. The matter is now reduced to great simplicity by the statutes of 4 Geo. iv. c. 41 and 6 Geo. iv. c. 110, the latter being very nearly a transcript of the former.

I.—SALE OF A SHIP.

To the sale of a ship three things are necessary: A bill of sale or instrument in writing; an entry on the register at the ship's port; and either an indorsement on the certificate, or a new registry.

(1.) BILL OF SALE.—The written deed of vendition, which had in Scotland become by usage in some degree necessary in transferring the property of ships, has, under the Ship Registry Acts, been required as indispensable. Under the old statutes it was required, that every transfer or mortgage of a ship, in whole or in part, and every contract for such transfer,² should be by a bill of sale, or agreement, or instrument in writing, in which [161] 'the certificate of the registry of such ship or vessel should be truly and accurately recited in words at length;' otherwise such bill of sale, transfer, or contract, or agreement for transfer, should be utterly void and null, and should not be valid or effectual to any purpose whatsoever.³ This rule was adhered to with the greatest strictness; insomuch, that although a mere clerical mistake was held not sufficient to void a bill of sale,⁴ yet very trivial errors were held fatal.⁵

But this inconvenient and truly unnecessary strictness was removed by the Act

¹ [See the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, infra, p. 164 sqq.]

² As a transfer such agreements were void; but it was doubted whether a personal obligation to transfer and complete the sale according to law, though undoubtedly not of force to change the property, might not be sufficient to ground an action for implement. The words, 'every contract for such transfer,' it was said, may mean contracts intended as a transfer. But Lord Thurlow seems to have had a correct view of the point, when, in a private opinion delivered to the counsel in the case of Hibbert v Rolleston, he held it to have been the policy of these Acts (distinguishing the question from all the analogies at common law), that no such thing as an equitable title to a ship could effectually subsist. See 11 Ves. jun. 625.

In England, a bill of sale, by way of mortgage, was found void under this Act, so far as regarded the conveyance of the property in the ship, but held sufficient to support action for the money lent. Kerrison v Cole, 8 East 231.

In Scotland the following case was decided:—Letters were exchanged, offering and accepting the purchase of a ship, but without any recital of the certificate. The master was directed to obey the buyer's orders, and did so. The seller then tendered a regular vendition, which having been refused, an action was raised for payment of the price; and the Court held the vendee effectually bound to pay, as the statute was supposed to apply only to venditions themselves, and contracts having the effect of transfers, not to the preliminary agreements intended to be followed by the regular conveyance. M'Nair v Millar, First Division, 2 Dec. 1808, F. C.

Of this decision it was doubted whether it were according to the sound policy and plain intendment of the statutes.

³ 26 Geo. III. c. 60, sec. 17; 34 Geo. III. c. 68, sec. 14.

1. A bill of sale intended as a mortgage for a promissory note held void for want of the recital; and though the grand bill of sale and actual possession of the ship were delivered, yet, as against the creditors of the granter, the vendee had not even a lien. Rolleston v Hibbert, 3 Term. Rep. 406, and 3 Brown's Ch. Ca. 571, same case.

2. In a proceeding in Admiralty for the purpose of dispossessing a shipmaster and part owner, the defence was, that by an agreement to sell certain shares, for which he had accordingly paid, the master held the majority of shares. 'Independent of any other objection,' said Sir William Scott, 'I do not think that, under the Act of Parliament, it would be possible for the Court to recognise such a transaction as this; for the words of the Act are as strong as they can be.' The New Draper, Walker master, 4 Rob. 287.

⁴ Rolleston v Smith, 4 Term. Rep. 161. This was a prize-ship transferred while the ship and certificate were at sea. The date of the sentence of condemnation was in the recital said to be 28th May 1783, and of the certificate of freedom 23d Jan. 1783. The true date of the condemnation was 28th May 1782, and the mistake was palpable on comparing the dates. The error in the recital was not held to be fatal to the transfer.

⁵ Westerdell v Dale, 7 Term. Rep. 306. Here in the recital the word oath was used instead of affirmation; the non-residence of any other part owner within twenty miles was omitted; and a different name was given to the master. Everything else was truly stated. The Court held a person who had sold by this incorrect transfer liable for repairs, though the ship had passed in the meanwhile through several hands.

It has been held that, to one effect, a conveyance is good, of 4 Geo. IV. c. 41, sec. 29, re-enacted by the 6 Geo. IV. c. 110, sec. 31, whereby, after requiring that the transfer, in all cases where the property in any ship shall, after registry thereof, be sold to any other of His Majesty's subjects, shall be 'by bill of sale or other instrument in writing, containing a recital of the certificate of registry of such ship or vessel, or the principal contents thereof, otherwise such transfer shall not be valid or effectual for any purpose whatever, either in law or equity,' it is enacted, 'That no bill of sale shall be deemed void by reason of any error in such recital, or by the recital of any former certificate of registry instead of the existing certificate, provided the identity of the ship or vessel therein intended be effectually proved thereby.' This places the recital on the true footing on which it ought to stand; and although, perhaps, the expression 'the principal contents thereof' may be held ambiguous, it cannot be doubted that a fair recital of all that truly [162] relates to the several points which are in the Act considered as essential to the identification of the ship would be a sufficient recital.

(2.) ENTRY IN BOOK OF REGISTRY.—No bill of sale or other instrument in writing is under the new statute valid or effectual to pass the property in any ship, until produced to the collector and comptroller of the customs of the port at which the ship is registered, or of the port at which she is about to be registered de novo; and until such collector or comptroller shall have entered in the books of registry or of intended registry of such ship, the name, residence, or description of the vendor, or of each if more than one; the number of shares transferred, with the name, residence, and description of the purchaser, or of each if more than one; and the date of the bill of sale and of the production of it (sec. 37). Besides indorsing these particulars on the certificate as hereafter to be mentioned, the collector and comptroller are required, if called upon so to do, to certify by indorsation on the bill of sale, that the particulars as above have been entered in the book of registry, and indorsed on the certificate.

When the entry is so made, the bill of sale is valid and effectual to pass the property as against all, and to every intent and purpose, except against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees, who shall first procure indorsement to be made on the certificate of registry (sec. 38). See below.

As the indorsement on the certificate or registry de novo is thus the criterion of preference among competitors for the property, or rival mortgagees, provision is made for allowing sufficient time to the vendee to have his vendition so indorsed on the certificate. By sec. 39, after an entry of particulars in the book of registry, there shall be no entry of any other bill of sale, etc., from the same vendor to any other vendee till thirty days shall have elapsed from the day when the other entry was made; or in case of the ship's absence from her port where the former entry was made, till thirty days from the day of her arrival in her port.

(3.) INDORSEMENT ON THE CERTIFICATE, OR NEW REGISTRY.—The sale is not completed, to the effect of passing the property effectually, until either the certificate of registry is produced, and an indorsement made on it of the particulars mentioned in the entry in the book of registry,¹ or a new registry is made and certificate granted to the vendee.

1. Under the first statutes no indorsement was required. It was first made necessary by 34 Geo. III. c. 68, sec. 15, and then it was a more complex operation than it is now, insomuch that difficulties almost insuperable were experienced in practice. This appears in though the requisites of the Registry Acts have not been observed, viz. to the effect of supporting an action for the money lent. See above, Kerrison v Cole, 8 East 231; and in Mestaer v Gillespie, 11 Ves. jun. 621, the Lord Chancellor and Sir William Grant gave their opinions in favour of the efficacy of such a conveyance in carrying freight.

¹ That indorsement is made by the collector and comptroller thus:—

'CUSTOM HOUSE, LEITH, 27th May 1826.

'A B, of Leith, merchant, has transferred, by bill of sale dated 25th May 1826, the ship Atlas to C D, of Edinburgh, merchant.

'E F, Collector.

G H, Comptroller.'

the decided cases, which may now be regarded only as matter of history. One most essential improvement in the recent Acts is, that the penal effects of not having the entry made in the book of registry indorsed on the certificates are taken away, the only effect of such neglect now being, that priority of right is with the first indorsement.

As already noticed, thirty days are allowed after entry of the transfer in the book of registry, before another transfer from the same person to another vendee can be entered; and the collector and comptroller are required, 1. To indorse on the certificate of registry the particulars of the bill of sale of such person as shall produce the certificate of registry for that purpose, within the thirty days after the entry of his bill in the book of registry; or within thirty days after the return of the ship to port, in case of her absence at the time of entry. 2. Where no one so produces the certificate within thirty days of the entry of his bill, etc., the officers are to indorse on the certificate the particulars of the bill of sale, [163] etc., to such person as shall first, after the expiration of the thirty days, produce the certificate of registry for that purpose (sec. 39). 3. If the certificate be lost or mislaid, or improperly detained, so that indorsement cannot be made in due time, and proof thereof shall be made to the satisfaction of the commissioners of the customs, it shall be lawful for them to grant such further time as may be necessary for recovery of the certificate, of which a memorandum shall be entered by the collector and comptroller in the book of registry, and during such further time no sale shall be entered (ib.). 4. To prevent the necessity of the vessel resorting to the port of her registry for the mere purpose of completing a transfer by indorsement, it is provided that such indorsement may, under certain precautions, be made in another port. And, First, The bill of sale, etc., must be entered at the port of registry. Secondly, The bill of sale must contain a notification of such record, signed by the collector and comptroller of the port of registry. Thirdly, The collector and comptroller of the port where the ship lies, shall give notice to those of the port of registry of the requisition to make indorsement; and they, again, shall thereupon send information whether any and what other bills of sale have been recorded in the registry book. Fourthly, The collector and comptroller of the port where the ship is, shall then indorse on the certificate the transfer. Finally, They shall give notice thereof to the collector and comptroller of the port of registry, who shall record the same, inserting the name of the port at which the indorsement was made.

2. Instead of an indorsement on the old registry, a new registry may be obtained on every transfer of property. By sec. 42 it is provided, that if, upon any change of property, the owners shall desire a new registry, although not required by the Act, it shall be lawful to make registry de novo, all the requisites being observed. And such new registry, whether required by the Act or made in compliance with the desire of the party, as fully completes the transfer as if the indorsement had been made on the certificate.

3. By sec. 39 it is declared to be the true intent and meaning of this Act, that the several purchasers and mortgagees, where more than one appear to claim the same property, shall have priority one over another, not according to the respective times when the particulars of the bill of sale, etc., were entered in the book of registry, but according to the time when the indorsement is made upon the certificate of registry.

II.—SALE OF SHARES IN A SHIP.

It has already been seen, that ships owned by more than one are held to be divided into sixty-four shares, and that each owner must hold a certain number of sixty-fourth parts; no person being entitled to be entered as owner in respect of any share not being an integral sixty-fourth part. All the requisites of bill of sale—entry in the book of registry—and indorsement on the certificate—already enumerated as applicable to the sale of ships, are to be observed also in the transference of shares or ships.

III.—SALES IN ABSENCE OF OWNERS.

Provision is made by the Act for two cases which sometimes occur: 1. Where a ship or any shares of it belonging to one who is absent from the kingdom are sold by his known agent or correspondent, under directions express or implied, the commissioners of the customs are authorized, on application made, and a proof to their satisfaction of the fair dealings of the parties, to permit such transfer to be registered, if registry de novo be necessary, or recorded and indorsed as if legal power were produced; good and sufficient security being given to produce a legal power or bill of sale within a reasonable time, or to abide the future claims of the absent owner and his heirs. And, 2. A similar provision is [164] made for the case where, from death, or absence, or distance of time, a bill of sale cannot be produced or proved to have been executed, and registry de novo shall have become necessary (sec. 44).

IV.—TRANSFERENCE TO HEIRS, CREDITORS, ETC.

The passing of property in ships to heirs or to creditors is not within the words of the statute, which requires either an instrument in writing, or an entry in the book of registry, or an indorsement on the certificate. The 31st section of the Act, relative to transfers by bill of sale, speaks only of the property 'in any ship, etc., belonging to any of His Majesty's subjects, being sold to any other of His Majesty's subjects.' The 37th section, relative to the entry in the book of registry, mentions only vendors or mortgagors. The 45th and 46th sections refer only to mortgages or assignments to trustees, for the purpose of selling for the payment of debt. But the transmission by confirmation to the executor, or the right acquired and assigned by commissioners of bankruptcy in England, or by the adjudication which in sequestration passes the property of a bankrupt in Scotland to the trustee, is not comprehended within the words, nor is within the spirit, of the provisions relative to sales and mortgages. There is, in such cases, no sale from one subject of the king to another: there is a mere transmission of right as to personal representatives of the owner. Under former Registry Acts it was held in England, that the requisites of those Acts did not apply to transfers, deriving their effects by peculiar provision or operation of law; as assignments by commissioners of bankruptcy to the assignees.¹ And although this decision in some degree proceeded on the peculiarity of the conveyance from the commissioners, as not being from a former owner in the strict terms of the Acts in question, the general principle seems to have been admitted, that the conveyance to the assignees is a conveyance of powers to be exercised in making a transference, rather than itself a transference. I have no doubt that this precedent would be followed both in England and in Scotland. If a question were to arise in bankruptcy with a purchaser or mortgagee, not having got an indorsement till after the right of the English assignees, or of the Scottish trustee, were completed, by assignment in the one case and adjudication in the other, it would seem that the sale or mortgage would be defeated. Bankruptcy alone would not indeed prevent the completion of the mortgage or purchase, by indorsement on the certificate.² But the assignment or adjudication being complete without indorsement, the subsequent indorsement of the bill of sale or mortgage would not seem to avail against the creditors; at least it would not if the term of thirty days from the bill of sale, or from the ship's arrival, had been allowed to elapse without an indorsement.³

¹ Abbot 74; Bloxham and Assignees of Ward v Hubbard, 5 East 407; Yallop ex parte, 15 Ves. 60; Hay v Fairbairn, 2 Barn. and Ald. 196.

² Dixon v Ewart, 3 Merivale 322, where, under the former Acts, the indorsement being an act to be performed by the vendor or his attorney, was not held barred by bankruptcy.

³ In a case on this part of the Act, however (May 1826), I found, in consultation, my opinion opposed by that of two

V.—MORTGAGE OF SHIPS AND DEEDS IN SECURITY.¹

There are two methods of using property in ships as a fund of credit—by mortgage, and by assignment to a trustee, for the purpose of being sold for payment of debt. Both these forms of security are regulated by the 45th and 46th sections of the Act, by [165] which many of the doubts and practical difficulties are removed which attended the doctrine of mortgages under the former Acts.²

It is enacted, that where any transfer of a ship, or share thereof, shall be made as a security for debt by way of mortgage, or any assignment to a trustee for selling the same for payment of debt, the collector and comptroller of customs of the port of registry shall make an entry in the book of registry, and also an indorsement on the certificate of registry, as in the case of a sale; and in such entry and indorsement shall state and express that such transfer was made only as security for the payment of a debt by way of mortgage. The mortgagee is not, by reason of his mortgage, to be deemed the owner of such ship or share; nor shall the person or persons making such transfer be deemed, by reason thereof, to have ceased to be owner or owners, except so far as may be necessary for the purpose of rendering the ship or share available, by sale or otherwise, for payment of the debt for securing which the transfer was made.

Where any transfer of a ship or share shall have been made for security of debt, either by way of mortgage or of assignment, and such transfer shall have been duly registered according to the provisions of this Act, i.e. entered in the book of registry, and indorsed on the registry, the right or interest of the mortgagee or assignee shall not be affected by any act of bankruptcy of the mortgagor or assignor after the time when such mortgage or assignment shall have been so registered, although such mortgagor or assignor, at the time he shall become bankrupt, shall have in his possession, order, and disposition, and be the reputed owner of the ship or shares; and the mortgage or assignment shall be preferred to any right, claim, or interest which may belong to the assignee of such bankrupt (sec. 47).

VI.—EVIDENCE IN MATTERS OF OWNERSHIP IN VESSELS OR SHARES.

It was under the former Acts found very inconvenient, on occasion of trials relating to the ownership of vessels, to require the registering officer to attend and bring up the records; to remedy which it has been enacted, 1. That there shall be exhibited, upon request for inspection and examination, the oaths and affidavits, registers and entries; 2. That copies may be taken, or an extract, which, on being proved a true copy, shall be allowed and received as evidence upon any trial at law, without the production of the originals, and without the testimony or attendance of the collector or comptroller, or any one acting for them (sec. 43).

[PRESENT STATE OF THE LAW OF PROPERTY IN SHIPS.]

Ships are personal property, and as such are at common law subject to the same general principles of attachment, of transference, and of succession, as other moveables. They are subject to the legal diligence of arrestment and poinding. They pass on the death of the owner to his personal representatives, and not to his heir-at-law. On the marriage of a female owner, the property in them falls under the jus mariti of the husband. These eminent English counsel, who were both of opinion that a trustee in sequestration, or an assignee under an English commission of bankruptcy, must be held, on the strict words of the statute, bound to enter the transference to him in the registry, and indorse it on the certificate, otherwise the right will be bad. [See the statute 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, secs. 59, 74, 75; Abbot, 11th ed. p. 59.]

¹ [See the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, infra, p. 169 sqq.]

² See Trollop's Treatise on Mortgage of Ships.

[and all the other common law principles applicable to moveable property in general apply to ships, except where they are the subject of special statutory provisions. But in this, as in every maritime country, there is a very comprehensive collection of statutory enactments and customary law relating to shipping. Most of these are now consolidated into a few statutes: the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104); the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 120); the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. c. 91); the Passengers Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict. c. 119); the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 63). The extent of prior statutory regulation regarding the mercantile marine of England may be seen from the schedule appended to the Repeal Act of 1854, which contains a list of the statutes repealed to make room for the Consolidation Act of 1854. The repeal of the Navigation Laws, and the introduction of the policy of free trade into shipping, has essentially altered the objects and purposes which a great part of the older statutes was meant to accomplish. The general object of much of the former legislation was to draw a distinction between British and foreign vessels; to secure for British vessels a monopoly in this country of commercial privileges and immunities which greatly augmented the value of British ship property; to render foreign ships liable to alien duties when engaged in neutral trade, and to forfeitures and penalties when engaged in trades of which it was desired to secure a monopoly to British vessels. The fundamental purpose was national defence—the creation of a body of skilful and hardy seamen in the mercantile marine, the seminary from which the supply of our sailors for the navy was drawn; the augmentation of the shipping actually in the possession of the natives of this country; and the encouragement of the skill and industry of our own ship-carpenters, by confining the privileges to ships British-built. When the policy which dictated this legislation was abandoned, the purpose of much of the legislation had ceased to exist; but advantage was taken of the existing machinery to apply it to purposes different from the original, but quite in accordance with the necessities and requirements of a great maritime country. By the Acts above specified, particularly the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, the tenure, transmission, and burdening of property in British ships has been subjected to regulations which bear a close analogy in principle to the system of registers of land rights. The recent legislation has continued the distinction between British and foreign ships; and it is to the former alone that this system of registration applies. Property in British shipping is allowed to be held by subjects of the British empire only; and all ship property so held is, with a few inconsiderable exceptions, within the compulsory scope of the registry enactments.]

ACQUISITION OF SHIP PROPERTY.—Property in a ship, or share therein, may be acquired by building, by purchase of the ship when built, or by capture. As a general rule, it may be said that, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, a written title of property in British ships is imperative. Every vessel which is to be navigated as a British ship must be registered before she can get a clearance as a British ship from any British port; yet, as regards the mere property, there is no law obliging the builder of a vessel, as a condition of holding the property of what he has so built, to register it. If he chooses to keep it unemployed, registration or written title is not essential to his right of property. When a man orders a ship to be built for him, it is often a nice question, when the property vests in him so as to be effectual against the creditors of the shipbuilder on the shipbuilder's bankruptcy. In the case of Simson v The Creditors of Duncanson, the Court of Session held, that where a ship was to be built and paid for by instalments, and where the builder became bankrupt after receiving payment of the first instalment, the work being unfinished on his hands, the property was not in the creditors, but in the person for whom the ship was being built, and that he might have her on paying the balance of the price.¹ This case, however, is contrary

¹ Simson v Duncanson's Crs., 1786, M. 14204; Sim v Grant, 1862, 24 D. 1033.

[to the principle of the Scotch law of sale, by which delivery alone passes the property of goods. Under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, sec. 1, the creditors of the shipbuilder would be bound to deliver upon tender of the price; but until delivery, the vessel is the property of the bankrupt or his trustee. And it may be doubted how far an unfinished ship is within the clause, which only prohibits creditors from attaching goods sold but not delivered where they so remain with the seller custodice causâ.

Supposing, however, that the vessel is built and already on the register, she may be acquired from the registered owner by purchase and sale. But a transference of a registered ship can only be made in the form and under the conditions prescribed by the Merchant Shipping Act. It is therefore necessary to explain the system of registration of ships as now established by Act of Parliament.

REGISTRATION OF SHIP PROPERTY.—Property in British ships can only be possessed by subjects of the British Crown, and no ship shall be deemed to be a British ship unless she belong wholly to owners of the descriptions specified in the Act, i.e. (1.) Natural-born British subjects; (2.) Foreigners made denizens, or naturalized, and either resident within Her Majesty's dominions, or partners in a business carried on there, and who have taken the oath of allegiance; (3.) Bodies corporate established under, subject to the laws of, and having their places of business in, the British dominions. A British subject by birth, who has afterwards taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign state, is treated, in regard to the right of holding property in British ships, as a foreigner. He must, to re-entitle him to hold such property, take the oath of allegiance to Her Majesty of new, and, like a naturalized foreigner, either reside in her dominions or be a partner in some house carrying on business within her dominions, during the whole period of his ownership. The condition requiring residence or interest in a business carried on in Her Majesty's dominions is meant to prevent persons from enjoying the rights and privileges of Englishmen while in reality subjects of another country. It was decided by the English courts prior to this Act, that a corporation carrying on business in the United Kingdom, some of whose members were foreigners residing abroad, might register its ships; and the principle of this decision is now incorporated in the Act.¹ In no legal sense are the individuals owners. The ownership is in the corporation. Although bodies corporate can hold British ship property, yet private firms cannot, though the individual partners should be all natural-born British subjects, or naturalized foreigners capable of holding such property individually. This latter exception is caused, as we shall see, by the necessities of the scheme of registration, which is cognate to our system of registration of land rights. It may be pointed out, that in the particulars just mentioned there is already a similarity between ship and land property in two respects: (1.) A foreigner not naturalized cannot hold landed property in Great Britain; (2.) A private firm cannot hold landed property; but (3.) A body corporate can. These peculiarities of landed property flow from the theory of superior and vassal, which is the foundation of our law of real property; the same peculiarities in the case of British ship property are the result of positive enactment.

With certain inconsiderable exceptions, every British ship must be registered in certain registers kept by the persons mentioned in the 30th section of the Act, and at the places there mentioned. The registration of ships by their owners is not compulsory, but no ship unless registered in the manner specified is a British ship. Yet, by sec. 100, a non-registered ship, though not entitled to any of the benefits belonging to British character, is nevertheless declared subject to payment of dues, and to all penalties and punishment of offences committed on board of her as if she were a British ship. In the United Kingdom the registers are kept at any ports or places approved of by the commissioners of customs, by the principal officer of customs there. In order to identify the vessel, when

¹ Reg. v Arnaud, 9 Q. B. 806; and Reg. v Powell, 11 Jur. 279.

[she is first put on the register, the owner or owners, or his or their agent duly authorized in writing to make the application for registry, is required to produce to the registrar a certificate by a surveyor duly appointed under the Act, and in the form given in the schedule to the Act. This certificate specifies the tonnage, build, and other particulars descriptive of the identity of the ship. In order, again, to prevent any person or body corporate, other than those qualified to own such ship, from registering her as British, the owners, or their agent applying for registry, must produce a declaration in the form provided in the schedule of the Act, referring to the ship as described in the surveyor's certificate, stating in what way he or they are entitled to hold British property, when and where the vessel was built, etc., the name of her master, the number of shares he holds in her, and a denial that any unqualified person or body of persons is entitled as owner to any legal or beneficial interest in such ship. In addition to these two documents, the applicant for registry must produce a certificate by the builder, if the ship is British-built, as to her tonnage, time and place of building, etc.; and in the case of a foreign-built ship, he must either produce a similar certificate from the builder, or declare his ignorance of these matters, and the impossibility of getting a builder's certificate. Where, again, the ship is one taken from the enemy by our vessels, and condemned and sold, the purchaser, on applying for registry, instead of producing the builder's certificate, will produce an official copy of the decree of the prize court condemning her to be sold as lawful prize of war. These documents being produced, the registrar is bound to register the vessel. He records in the registry book the particulars required by the Act, i.e. her name, the port to which she belongs, the details as to tonnage, build, description, etc., and the several particulars as to her origin, given in the documents produced to him, and which serve to identify her; and lastly, the names and descriptions of her owner or owners, and the proportions in which they are interested in her. On the completion of the registry, the registrar grants to the owners a certificate of her registry in the prescribed form, which comprises a statement of the same particulars that are entered in the register book, with the addition of the master's name. By these means the title to ship property is so clear and plain, as to be matter of eyesight on record. But the record being local, and accessible only in the place where it is kept, the advantage of the certificate issued to the owner is, that it in effect submits a duplicate of the authentic register, under the authority of the registrar, to the eyes of people at a distance. It is, however, no part of the title to the ship. It is used by the master, and its functions are confined to the practical purpose of the navigation of the ship, for which purpose it is the authentic evidence, to such of Her Majesty's officers as are entitled to interfere, of the ship's national character. The certificate also provides the means of information in any quarter of the globe, as to some at least of the persons who are responsible for penalties or damage incurred in connection with the ship. These being its purposes, the certificate cannot be detained by the owner or any other person from the master or person entitled to it, for the time, for the purposes of the lawful navigation of the ship. Every change of owners or master must be endorsed on it; and the use, for such purposes, of a certificate not granted in respect to the ship for whose navigation it is used, involves forfeiture of the ship to Her Majesty.

The property of every ship is divided, for the purposes of the register, into sixty-four shares, and these shares cannot be held in severalty by more than thirty-two persons. Nobody can hold less than one sixty-fourth of a ship; nobody can be registered as the owner of a fraction of a share. One or more shares, however, may be held by five,—or fewer, but not more than five persons,—jointly, i.e. as undivided property. Joint-owners are considered as constituting one person only as regards the rule making thirty-two persons the maximum number that can be registered as owners. And one of such joint-owners cannot dispose in severalty of the fractional pro indiviso part to which his interest in the undivided share or shares extends. The five joint-owners of a share thus form but one person for the purposes of holding or of conveying the share or shares they hold jointly or pro indiviso. Individual joint-owners are [expressly forbidden from exercising any act of disposal over the joint property without the concurrence of the rest. By these restrictions the complexity of fractional details is avoided, and simplicity of title is preserved. With the same view to simplicity, the title of every owner appearing on the register is assumed to be absolute and unqualified. By sec. 43, no notice of any trust—express, implied, or constructive—shall be entered on the register book, or be receivable by the registrar. The registered owner of any ship or share therein shall, it is provided, have power absolutely to dispose of such ship or share, and to give effectual receipts for any money paid or advanced by way of consideration for such disposition of the ship or share. By force of this section, therefore, if any one holds ship property as trustee for another, the trust is not recognised by the register. Although the frame of the statute, by prohibiting private firms to be registered as owners of ships, actually obliges such firms to hold ship property through the intervention of trustees, yet for all purposes of the register—for all questions as to who are the persons in whom the title is vested, and by whom it can effectually be transferred—trusts have no existence. Whoever appears as owner on the record, is absolute owner to all third parties; and any person is entitled to deal with him as such on the faith of the record, and to pay the price for and take a transference of the ship or share from him. Such being the relation in which a registered owner, whether holding for himself or for another, stands to third parties, what remedies have the parties for whom he is engaged as trustee against him? This matter is regulated by a subsequent statute—the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 3. That section provides that no prejudice is to be created thereby to the provisions of the principal Act for preventing notice of trusts from being entered in the register book, or received by the registrar: it provides also that no prejudice is to be done to the powers of sale and disposition, and of granting effectual receipts conferred by the principal Act on registered owners: it also provides that no prejudice is to be done to the provisions which exclude unqualified persons from the ownership, avowed or latent, of British ships. Subject to these declarations, it provides that equities may be enforced against owners of ships (i.e. against the persons appearing as such on the register), in respect of their interest therein, in the same manner as equities may be enforced against them in respect of any other personal property. The equities here referred to are obviously the equitable and beneficial interest as opposed to the legal title of property. Thus, if a shipowner dies and leaves his estate to trustees who register as owners, and directs that his ship, in certain events which afterwards happen, be made over to a legatee, so soon as the specified event happens, and the legatee is entitled to have the ship made over to him, the equitable or beneficial interest vests in the legatee. If the trustee has the legal estate, i.e. if he is in the position of registered owner, the legatee may bring an action to compel him to execute a transfer in his favour. If the property has been sold, an action will lie against the trustee for breach of trust, in availing himself of his legal powers to sell, in violation of the trust purposes. Thus, in all questions purely between the trustee as legal owner and the legatee as vested with the equitable right, and which do not affect third parties, such equities may be enforced. It appears, further, that if a purchaser from a trustee, at the time of the purchase and transference, had notice of the trust or other qualification of the vendor's title, he will be deemed a partaker of the fraud of the trustee in selling, and the equity vested in the legatee may be enforced against him on the ground of his being conscious of the fraud, just as it might be enforced against the trustee himself.¹ Yet, as the power to pass an absolute title lay with the trustee as registered owner, his transference appearing on the register even to a fraudulent acquirer will hold the latter out to the world as absolute registered owner; and a third person who has no notice of the obligations of the trustee, and no knowledge of the transfer of these liabilities to the fraudulent purchaser, will be entitled to deal with either on the faith of the register.

¹ La Neve v La Neve, 2 White and Tudor's L. C. 3d ed. 39, notes.

[But no such equity in respect of the ownership of a British ship, can be acquired by any one who is not legally qualified to hold property in British ships. The third section of the Amendment Act, providing for the enforcement of equities against the registered owner, expressly guards against any prejudice to the provisions in the principal Act relating to the exclusion of unqualified persons from the ownership of British ships. And the principal Act itself makes it imperative on every owner applying for registration to emit a declaration that no unqualified person or body of persons is entitled to any legal or beneficial interest in the ship, or any share therein. Beneficial interest is declared by the third section of the Amendment Act of 1862 to include all equitable interests: therefore no equitable interest in a British ship, or a share of such ship, can be held by any unqualified person; and British law will not enforce any such interest against the registered owner at the instance of a person not qualified to hold property in British ships.]

Such being the nature of the legal title in the person who stands on the register as owner of a ship, he may transfer that title, or he may mortgage it, but he can only do so in the forms provided by the Act. The only two deeds affecting the legal title of the registered owner which can appear on the register, are a deed of transference or transmission of the ownership from him to another, or a deed of mortgage, which creates a burden on his right of ownership, in the nature of a security for a loan or other valuable consideration.

SALE OF SHIP PROPERTY.—The 55th section provides that a registered ship or any share therein, when disposed of to persons qualified to be owners of British ships, shall be transferred by bill of sale in the form of the schedule, or as near thereto as circumstances permit. A bill of sale in any other form, or containing any particulars other than those in the schedule, cannot be recorded, unless by the special direction of the commissioners of customs. As the bill of sale must enter the register in order to make the purchaser's title good against all the world, the statute has made the form of it comprehend all those particulars necessary to make the identity of the ship unmistakeable, and to secure the continuity of the series of the titles and securities relating to it. The form for these purposes contains the description of the vessel given in the surveyor's certificate produced to the registrar when she was first put on the register book, or such other description as may be sufficient to identify her to the satisfaction of the registrar. It then goes on to set forth, that 'I, A B, being owner of shares in the ship above particularly described, in consideration of £ paid to me by C D, hereby transfer to the said C D the said shares.' And then there is a clause in which A B covenants with C D that he has 'power to transfer the shares, and that they are free from incumbrances, save as appears by the registry of the said ship. In witness whereof,' etc. This is the form in the schedule; but the commissioners of customs, under sanction of the Board of Trade, have issued an amended form, which appears preferable in this respect, that it includes a transfer not only of the ship, which is all that the statutory form allows to be included, but also 'of her boats, guns, ammunition, small arms, and appurtenances.' This seems necessary, because questions have frequently arisen as to sales under the general word 'ship,' whether this or that passed to the purchaser by the contract. Thus the writers on maritime law hold that the boats are not conveyed by the word ship. In one case¹ common ballast on board at the time of sale did not pass under the word furniture of ship, for the place and purpose of it might be supplied by merchandise; and in another case² ballast known as kentledge (pig-iron ballast laid on each side of the keelson) did not pass by a sale of the ship with all her stores, tackle, apparel, etc. The purchaser ought, therefore, if he has any doubt about any special things being capable of conveyance under the words in the form, to make a separate contract as to these. If these are really parts of the ship, the form will carry them; if not, they do not require to enter the register, as not being parts of the ship, and they may pass by any form competent

¹ Kinter, Leon. 46.

² Lano v Neale, 2 Starkie 105.

[to convey other moveable property. The statutory bill of sale is to be executed in the presence of, and be attested by, one or more witnesses. It requires no stamp (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 9). The transfer is made simply 'by A B to C D.' No statement is permitted of any character in which C D is to hold the property. So, if the transfer is to C D, E F, and G H, the owner can only transfer to them 'jointly:' he cannot say, 'to C D, E F, and G H, as copartners.' The statutory form also permits of no warranty or representation being inserted in the bill of sale, although it may have been part of the bargain. The only permissible conditions are the warranty of title to transfer, and against incumbrances other than those on record. Now, it is an established principle of the common law, that verbal representations or warranties made with respect to a contract afterwards reduced to writing, are held to be discharged or passed from if they are not introduced into the written contract. By the statutory form all such prior communings are excluded from the bill of sale, and therefore it would appear that if the purchaser buys on the faith of them, his only remedy or protection is to see that they are true before he takes the bill of sale and pays the price. If he relies on them, and finds after taking the bill of sale that the representations are false or the warranties not complied with, he has no ground of action; for they do not appear in the final written shape to which the parties reduce their bargain.

The bill of sale, when duly executed, must be produced to the registrar at the ship's port for registry. Until the bill of sale is recorded, the absolute disposing power remains in the seller, whose name stands on the record as vested with the property (sec. 43). When the registered owner, then, executes two bills of sale in favour of different purchasers, he who first records his bill of sale is the owner.

Before a purchaser or transferee holding a bill of sale can have it recorded, something more is necessary than mere production to the registrar. The transferee must make a declaration in the form provided in the schedule. The object of this declaration is to prevent any unqualified person in whose favour a bill of sale may be granted from appearing on the register as owner of property in British ships. The declaration, therefore, states the applicant's qualification to hold such property, and contains a denial that any unqualified person or body of persons is entitled as owner to any legal or beneficial interest in the ship, or any share therein. Any person making a false declaration of qualification (whether his own or another's) to hold British ships, is declared guilty of a misdemeanour, and the ship or shares in respect of which such false declaration is made shall, to the extent of the declarant's interest, be forfeited to Her Majesty; and if he make the declaration on behalf of others, and it be not proved that he had no authority from them to make it, their interests are also forfeited (sec. 103). On this declaration and bill of sale being produced to the registrar, he records it, and endorses on the bill of sale the fact of registration, with the day and hour thereof. The statute provides (sec. 57) that all bills of sale shall be entered in the register book in the order of their production to the registrar. Suppose that an owner has sold and granted bills of sale to two parties, and one has got his bill of sale recorded, then the question may arise whether the registrar is entitled to record the other when produced to him, whether he is entitled to refuse it, or whether he is bound to record it valeat quantum? In *Orr v Dickinson*¹ (a case under this Act), it was held that if any bill of sale is a nullity, or the registration itself is invalid or fraudulent, the register may be vacated by order of a court of equity because of the nullity of the transaction. Suppose, then, that one of the two bills is a nullity, say the one first recorded, unless the nullity appears on the face of it, how is the registrar in a position qualifying him to judge whether the second bill, if recorded, would or would not carry the property? Mr. Maclachlan says it is his duty, if one bill is recorded, to refuse the other, because the last registered person is owner; and the bill second produced not being granted by that person, but by the person registered previously to him,

¹ Orr v Dickinson, 1 Johnson 1.

[it is plain that the second bill is bad. But this opinion cannot be reconciled with Orr v Dickinson. The first bill may be a nullity, and incapable, though recorded, of carrying the ownership to the person in whose favour it is granted. If that be so, as for aught the registrar knows it may be, why should not the second transferee have his bill recorded valeat quantum? Mr. Maclachlan says that the registrar is not entitled to record any bill unless it be in proper form duly executed, and correspondent with the state of the register book at the time. The 57th section, to which he refers, undoubtedly supports the opinion that it is only bill of sale 'duly executed' which the registrar is bound to record; but the words 'duly executed' mean no more than executed in the form of the statutory schedule, and duly witnessed as required by the Act. There is no warrant for Mr. Maclachlan's other condition, that the bill of sale must be correspondent with the state of the register at the time; nor is there any right on the part of the registrar to say that the second bill is bad, as being granted by a person having no title to grant it. He obviously cannot say so, because although there is another bill already on record, granted by the same owner as the one produced for registration, he cannot be certain that the first bill is not a nullity. The refusal on the part of the registrar to record an instrument presented for registration may be the subject of an appeal to the commissioners of customs. Any omission on the part of the registrar would not, it seems, invalidate the transfer.¹

Such, then, is the method by which a purchaser's title is completed to a British ship, if he is qualified to hold property in British ships. But a British ship may be sold to a foreigner, a person not qualified to hold British ship property. In that case a bill of sale cannot be recorded in his favour. The statute (sec. 53), however, provides that whensoever a registered ship, by reason of a transfer to persons not qualified to be owners of British ships, ceases to be a British ship, every person who at the time of the transfer owns such ship or share therein, shall immediately give notice to the registrar, who shall make an entry thereof in his register; and the master must at once, if in port, or if not, within ten days after his arrival in port, deliver up the certificate of registry which he uses in navigating the ship as evidence of her British nationality. A British ship must be wholly owned by British qualified owners: a valid transfer may be made of the whole vessel, or of any share in her, to a disqualified person; but in either case the vessel ceases to be British, and must be taken off the register, and must cease to use the British flag, or to assume the British national character, under the penalty of forfeiture of the whole ship to Her Majesty (sec. 103). The only assumption of British character which is not visited by forfeiture is, when it is assumed to avoid capture by an enemy. It is therefore of the first importance to a purchaser of a share in a British ship, to see that no unqualified person owns any share in her; and it is of the same importance to co-owners of the seller of a share, to see that he transfers no interest to any disqualified person, for this involves her loss of national character, and, it may be, the forfeiture of the vessel.

Here it may be asked, What are the privileges of British ownership and British national character? British ships are entitled to the protection of the British Government, and to the protection of British consuls and forces in all quarters of the world, and against all aggression on British rights. Without registration the vessel is not entitled to use the British flag, nor can any vessel clear out of any British port with the character of a British vessel unless the master holds a certificate of her registration as a British vessel. Again, there are some trades in which no foreign vessel is permitted to engage. No goods or passengers can be carried from one part of any British possession in Asia, Africa, or America, to another part of the same possession, unless in British ships (sec. 163 of Customs Consolidation Act, 1853; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 107). Under the Navigation Laws, duties were imposed on all foreign shipping entering our ports, and foreign vessels were excluded from our coasting [trade, that is, from carrying between one part of the United Kingdom and another. By the Act of 1855, 18 and 19 Vict. c. 96, sec. 1, foreign vessels were admitted to our coasting trade under the same laws, rules, and regulations as our own; and by sec. 14, no foreign ship or goods carried therein are to be liable to any higher or other dues or restrictions than British ships so employed, or than goods carried therein. But by sec. 15 Her Majesty has the power, by an order in council, of imposing similar prohibitions and restrictions on foreign ships employed in our coasting trade, and duties of tonnage on all foreign ships or on all goods or any specified classes of goods imported or exported in those ships, as provided in sec. 324 of the Customs Consolidation Act with regard to foreign trade. By sec. 324 of the Customs Consolidation Act, Her Majesty, by order in council, may impose these prohibitions and restrictions and duties on foreign ships of any country, and goods therein imported or exported into or from any part of the United Kingdom or any British possession in any part of the world, so as to place these foreign ships on as nearly as possible the same footing in British ports as that on which British ships are placed in the ports of the foreign countries to which the vessels in question belong, and so as to countervail any disadvantages to which British trade or navigation is subjected by the regulations of such foreign countries. These are the chief matters regarding freedom of trade in which British vessels have or may have an advantage over foreign vessels. Under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 516, the statutory provisions limiting the responsibilities of shipowners in certain cases were applicable only to the owners of British vessels; but this privilege was done away with by the 64th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act of 1862, which extended the existing limitations of liability to the owners of all vessels, whether British or foreign.

¹ Ratchford v Meadows, 2 Esp. 69; Heath v Hubbard, 4 East 110; Underwood v Miller, 1 Taunt. 387; Thompson v Smith, 1 Madd. 395.

TRANSFER OTHERWISE THAN BY SALE.—We have seen how a purchaser, qualified or disqualified, may complete his title to a ship. But ship property, like all other property, requires to be transmitted in consequence of the death of owners, of the bankruptcy of owners, or in consequence of the marriage of a registered female owner. On the death of the owner without any settlement, the succession passes to his executors or heirs in mobilibus; if he leave a settlement, to his appointees; on his bankruptcy, to his trustee for behoof of his creditors; on the marriage of a female owner, the property in the ship falls under the jus mariti of her husband, and becomes his. In order, however, to maintain the completeness of the register, it is necessary that all these transmissions of the property enter the record, and the statute has not overlooked them.

In case of such transmissions of the right to a registered ship, the registration of the title acquired by the person to whom such right is transmitted is a condition precedent to his disposing power in regard to the ship. Before registration, the applicant for registry must authenticate the transmission of the right by a declaration made in the form in the schedule, containing the description of the ship, the statement of the applicant's right or qualification to hold British ship property; and, in addition to these, a statement describing the manner in which, and the party to whom, the property has been transmitted. Thus, in the case of a declaration by a legatee to whom the ship has been left by will, the declaration sets forth the death of the testator, and the fact of his having left a will whereby he bequeathed the ship to the applicant; so, in the case of a trustee in bankruptcy, it will set forth the sequestration and the act and warrant in his favour, transferring and confirming the right to the ship to and in the trustee. In the case of a marriage, the husband will set forth the marriage, and the fact that thereby the property became by law vested in him, and that he is entitled to be registered as owner. An executor to an intestate will set forth his confirmation as executor, and so forth. The 58th section makes the same provision, not only for cases of transmission by death, bankruptcy, and marriage, but also 'by any lawful means other than by transfer,' or bill of sale from the owner. This will comprehend all cases of legal diligence; as, where a ship is pointed by a creditor, the creditor will make a similar declaration narrating the particular steps of legal diligence which transferred the property

[to himself. And in all cases the declaration will contain the denial that any unqualified person or bodies of persons have any ownership, legal or beneficial, in the ship. Along with this declaration, the statute requires that there be produced to the registrar, in the case of bankruptcy, such evidence as may be receivable in courts of justice of the title of the parties claiming as trustees or otherwise; in the case of marriage of females, a copy of the register of marriage, or other legal evidence of the marriage, and of the identity of the female owner; in the case of a transmission by testamentary instrument, or by intestacy, the will, or a copy thereof which would be evidence by the law of Scotland, or the extract testament dative, or other legal evidence capable of proving the title of the claimant upon an intestacy. In the case of insolvency, which would include probably all transmissions by legal diligence, the registrar will require legal evidence of the transmission of the property to the creditor, which will be the extract decrees, charges, etc., necessary to operate the transference. On production of the declaration with the requisite evidence, the registrar is bound to register the persons entitled under this transmission as the owner or owners of the ship; and such persons, if more than one, shall, however numerous, be considered only as one person as regards the maximum number of owners entitled to be put on the register (sec. 60).

But death, or marriage, or legal diligence may transfer the right to one not qualified to hold British ship property. In this case, sec. 62 provides that, if the ship is registered in Scotland, the Court of Session may, on the application of such unqualified person, order a sale of the property so transmitted, and direct the proceeds to be paid to the applicant or otherwise as the Court may direct. Every order for sale made by the Court in such cases is appointed to contain a declaration vesting the right to transfer the ship or shares to be sold in a nominee of the Court, who shall thereupon be entitled to transfer as if he were registered owner, and every registrar is to obey the requisition of such nominee as he would do that of the registered owner (sec. 63). Such application must be made within four weeks after the death or marriage, transmitting the property to the unqualified owner, or within such further time as the Court may allow; and if no application be made, the ship or share so transmitted shall be forfeited. The Court may, however, in its discretion, refuse to grant any order of sale, as it probably would do in the case of an alien enemy making the application, and in case of refusal the property is forfeited to the Crown (sec. 64).

If, after the execution by a registered owner of a bill of sale, but before its registration, it should happen that the registered owner died, or became bankrupt, or was married, and a transmission of the property took place, and the transferee by operation of law got his acquired title recorded first, that title being in no way inconsistent with or adverse to the claim of the transferee by bill of sale, it seems to be the result of the English cases that a court of equity in England, and no doubt also, on the same principles, the Court of Session in Scotland, would have no difficulty in ordaining the executor, trustee, or husband whose name is on record, to grant a new bill of sale, or to do all things necessary to perfect the title intended to be conveyed by the bill of sale granted by the prior registered owner. And by sec. 65 the courts have the power, on summary application, to issue an order prohibiting for a time to be named therein any dealing with any ship or share; and, on intimation of such order, no registrar will record any deed affecting such ship or share granted by the party prohibited. In the event of any transferees by law placing their title on record before the transferee by bill of sale from the testator, the latter may, while he brings his action to have them decerned to complete his title, prevent them from exercising their power of transferring the property to a third party, from whom, if he had no notice of the claimant's rights, the claimant would not be able to recover the ship. If it should be found that the registrar is not entitled to register two bills of sale by one party, the second applicant may, on showing prima facie grounds that the first recorded bill of sale is a nullity, or that the registration is a nullity, be entitled to a remedy by interdict against his disposing of the property in virtue of his standing on the register as owner until the reasons on which [his title is challenged shall be determined. The Court has power to annex conditions of caution or otherwise to the granting of any such order.

Again, suppose a bankrupt, within sixty days of his bankruptcy, or in violation of the Acts 1696 or 1621 for preventing fraudulent alienations by insolvents, and fraudulent preferences, should transfer his ship property, the trustee or creditors may no doubt effectually reduce and set aside the deed of transference, and by decree of Court vacate the registry of the transferee's title, should the title still appear on the register in the person of the immediate transferee of the bankrupt.¹ The transferee may also be interdicted from putting away the property, until the action of reduction, or other legal proceedings to set aside his title, can be brought and decided.

MORTGAGE OF SHIP PROPERTY.—We have thus examined the ordinary mode by which property in British ships is transferred—whether by sale or voluntary conveyance by the registered owner, or by operation of law, as in the cases of death, bankruptcy, marriage, and legal diligence. Before explaining another method, intended to facilitate transactions regarding ship property, to be carried out in foreign lands, we proceed to consider the ordinary mode of burdening British ship property by mortgage or deed of security for a loan or other valuable consideration.

The registered owner of a British vessel may grant such a security in the form of a mortgage over the vessel. The instrument must be in the form given in the schedule to the Act, or as near thereto as circumstances permit, and mortgages of ships can be made in no other manner.² The Act itself (18 and 19 Vict. c. 91, sec. 11) provides that, if the mortgage be made in any form, or contain any particulars other than the prescribed form, no registrar can be required to record the same, without the express direction of the commissioners of customs. The form given in the Act embodies, for the purpose of identification, the surveyor's certificate of the vessel; acknowledges receipt of the loan; binds the owner to repay it with interest; and in security of repayment, 'mortgages' to the lender the shares of which the borrower is owner in the ship therein described. It contains a covenant against incumbrances, save what appear on the register. It requires, though the Act is silent on the subject, the usual witnesses; and by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, sec. 9, it requires no stamp. As between the grantor and grantee, registration does not appear to be compulsory, although it undoubtedly is so in all questions with third parties. On production of a mortgage to the registrar of the ship, he is bound to record it in the register book. All mortgages are to be recorded in the order in which they are produced to the registrar; and he notifies the fact of registration thereon in a certificate, stating the day and hour of registration. If more than one mortgage of the same ship or share are registered, the mortgagees are entitled to priority one over the other, according to the date of recording, whatever be the dates of the respective instruments, and whatever notice—express, implied, or constructive—the first registered mortgagee may have had of the prior existence of any mortgage recorded after his own (sec. 69). A mortgagee does not require to make any declaration such as is required from a person claiming registration as an owner. There is no restriction in the Act against a person who is disqualified from being the owner of British ship property, holding a mortgage over it. A mortgagee is not, by reason of his mortgage, to be deemed the owner of the ship or share mortgaged; nor is the mortgagor deemed to have ceased to be owner, except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt (sec. 70). This enactment puts an end to the questions which arose under the earlier statutes as to the liabilities attaching to the legal interest in the ship, which under those statutes were vested in the mortgagee without any qualification or reserve. But in order to make his security available, the mortgagee has power, in virtue of the Act, absolutely to dispose of the ship or share in respect of which

¹ Anderson v Western Bank, 14 Jan. 1859, 21 D. 250.
VOL. I.

² Liverpool Borough Bank v Turner, 6 Jur. N. S. 935.
Y

[he is registered; and to give to any person purchasing from him, receipts for the price, which shall be effectual to defend the purchaser against any action at the instance of the owner or others, and to exempt him from the necessity of seeing to the application of the price. If a surplus should arise on such a sale over what is required to pay the debt and consequents, the mortgagee will hold such surplus as trustee for the owner and subsequent mortgagees according to their rights.¹ But if there be more mortgagees than one, it is only the first who is entitled to sell. No subsequent mortgagee can exercise this power, unless with the concurrence of all the prior mortgagees, or under an order of Court. A mortgagee, however, is so far the owner, that he is entitled to the accruing freights and other benefits,² but his responsibility for work and service done to the ship depends on a different principle; and although he is declared by the present Act only to be an owner in a qualified sense, yet he may make himself liable as owner, if he has acted in such a way with reference to ship's furnishings as shows that the credit was given to him. A mortgagee may also, it seems, enter into the possession and use of the ship:³ at least such was Lord Hatherley's opinion, although there is nothing directly authorizing this in the statute. But a mortgagee who takes possession for the purpose of sale is bound to use the care and diligence of a prudent man, in order to sell to the best advantage; and if he employ the ship meanwhile in a speculative adventure with loss, the loss will fall on himself.⁴

A registered mortgage may be transferred by the creditor to another, just as a bond over land may be transferred. As the original mortgage itself may be held by a person disqualified to hold the ownership of British ship property, so it may be transferred to a disqualified person. The instrument by which the transfer is made must be in the statutory form, which requires to be registered in the same way as the original mortgage, in order to vest in the assignee a right valid and indefeasible, as against either the assignor or third parties. So, also, when the interest of the original mortgage, or of any registered owner of a mortgage, becomes transmitted in consequence of death, bankruptcy, marriage, or any lawful title other than transfer, the legal title to the mortgage is to be transmitted in the same way as the title to ownership is transmitted in similar cases, the person in whom the interest vests making a declaration as to the means by which, and the person to whom, the interest has passed, in the same form as is required in the case of a change of ownership, except that no declaration of qualification to hold British ship property is required. Evidence must be produced to authenticate the transmission of the interest; and on production of the declaration and evidence, the registrar will enter the name of the person or persons entitled under such transmission as the mortgagee or mortgagees. Although nothing is directly said on the point in the Act, there is no doubt that where two transfers of a mortgage are granted, it is the first recorded which carries the legal title; but whether express, implied, or constructive notice of a prior dated assignment would apply to the holder of the first recorded transference of a mortgage in the same way as prior notice does between two competing transferees of ownership, or whether, on the contrary, the exclusion of such notice would apply to the transference as it does to the constitution of mortgages, the Act does not explicitly determine. When a mortgage is satisfied, the registrar, on production of the mortgage deed, with a receipt for the mortgage money endorsed thereon duly signed and attested, is required to make an entry in the register book of the fact that the mortgage has been discharged; and 'upon such entry,' says the statute, 'the estate which passed to the mortgagee shall vest in the same person or persons in whom, having regard to intervening acts and circumstances, the same would have vested if no such mortgage had ever been made' (sec. 68). If a man stand as mortgagee of a ship on the face of the record, but has been paid his debt, he cannot, it would seem, transfer that mortgage to an assignee, so as to convey to him an effectual interest in the ship. A creditor infert in a bond and disposi-

¹ Tanner v Heard, 3 Jur. N. S. 427, Rolls.

² Cato v Irving, 21 L. J. Ch. 675.

³ De Mattos v Gibson, 7 Jur. N. S. 282.

⁴ Marriott v The Anchor Reversionary Co., 30 L. J. (Ch.) 122.

[tion in security, of which the debt has been paid, cannot, although the record contains no registered discharge, give a valid title to an assignee, who, nevertheless, may have been relying on the absence of any registered discharge extinguishing the security, and presuming therefore that it subsisted. That is a matter against which it is held the register affords assignees of land securities no protection. It is the same with an assignee to a mortgage over a ship. The payment extinguishes the security along with the debt itself, and reinvests the proprietor with the full right and unburdened property of the vessel. On principle, this effect certainly follows; yet it has been observed that the 68th section seems to say (it does not unequivocally say, but it may in one view be taken to say) that it is only on entry of the discharge of the mortgage in the register that the estate held by the mortgagee re-vests in the owner of the ship. The better opinion is, however, that nothing but unequivocal words in the statute to that effect could continue the mortgagee's right in the ship after the debt itself was paid off; and therefore, that although it will be every owner's interest to see a discharge duly noted in the register, that is not necessary to disburden the ship of the security.

SALE AND MORTGAGE PROCEEDING ON CERTIFICATE.—The ordinary method of conveying or burdening the property of registered ships, which has now been examined, is obviously intended for those who are resident in this country, and have access to the register book kept at the ship's port of registry. The declarations required are, for instance, all to be made by the person who receives the property in presence of the registrar, if the declarant reside within five miles of the port of registry, and if beyond that distance, by any registrar or justice of the peace. Many persons, however, not resident in the country of the port of registry, will require to deal in British ship property either as purchasers or lenders on mortgage. These persons have no convenient access to the registry to examine the state of the title; and even if they depute agents in this country to examine the record, and these agents send them out written reports, such a report may, before it reaches the intending purchaser or lender in a foreign country, be rendered valueless by the owner in the meantime granting, and the purchaser recording, a transference or mortgage prior in date to that of the foreign purchaser or lender.

In order to facilitate the commerce in ships, and the obtaining advances on the security of ships in distant countries, a certain machinery has been devised consisting of what are called certificates of mortgage and certificates of sale. These are not to be confounded with the ship's certificate of registry as a British ship, which the captain is to use while navigating the ship as a proof of her British nationality, and her title to British protection.

The certificate of mortgage is a device or expedient for placing the register with all its contents authentically before the eyes of an intending mortgagee in a distant country—too distant conveniently to communicate with the port of registry; and for enabling that mortgagee to deal with the owner on the footing that, whatever deeds may be granted by the owner at home after the date of that certificate, they cannot affect his mortgage, which, on the contrary, will rank in the order of priority precisely as if it were recorded at the date of the certificate. The registration of the certificate at the same time is a notice to people inspecting the register, of the chance that their rights may be cut down by deeds executed abroad, but not yet brought home for registration. The owner records in the ship's register notice that he has executed a deed giving power to certain specified persons to mortgage the ship for a specified amount, and of the time within which, and the places at which, the same may be exercised. The registrar gives a certificate of the state of the ship's register down to the date of recording this notice, and to this certificate is appended the deed of powers. Any mortgage granted by the person named within the time and not exceeding the sum specified is, in terms of the statute, to have priority over mortgages granted by the owner subsequent to the date of the notice that such powers had been granted to be exercised abroad. By this machinery the person abroad sees how the register stands down [to the moment at which the power of mortgaging in his favour is granted : he knows that his own mortgage will rank next, and all other deeds subsequent to his own; and the public at home, on searching the record, and finding the notice of the grant of powers to be executed abroad standing in the register, though they do not know that the power has actually been exercised, nevertheless see and learn enough to make them act with caution, since they know that a mortgage made abroad in virtue of that power will rank preferably to any deed the owner may grant them in the meantime. In like manner, an owner may grant a power of sale instead of a power to mortgage; and deeds of sale and transfer executed in pursuance of such a power, will rank as of the date when the notice of the granting of the power is put upon the record. No certificate of mortgage or sale can be granted so as to authorize any mortgage or sale to be made in pursuance thereof at any place within the United Kingdom, if the vessel's port is there; or to be exercised within the same British possession in which her port of registry is situated. In either case, the power given, whether to sell or to mortgage, must be exercised in strict conformity with the deed conferring it; it must be exercised by the person named in the deed as intended to exercise it; it must, in the case of a power to mortgage, be for a sum not larger than the maximum sum authorized by the deed of power to be borrowed on the security of the vessel; and in the case of a sale, it must not be for less than the minimum price authorized to be taken for her. It is further provided that no mortgage or sale bona fide made shall be impeached by reason of the person by whom the power was given dying before the making of such mortgage or sale. Bona fides, it is presumed, means ignorance of the mandant's death. So also, in the case of the owner's bankruptcy, if the sale or mortgage is tainted with mala fides on the part of the receiver, or if he had notice of the bankruptcy, the transaction will be liable to be set aside at the instance of the creditors, on the ground that the power was brought to an end by the bankruptcy, and the receiver cannot plead bona fides and ignorance to exempt the case from the operation of the general principle that the deed must be null as granted after a recall of the power to grant it. Even bona fides and want of notice of the bankruptcy is not always enough under this Act to support a deed granted after the bankruptcy. The statute only provides that such a deed shall not be impeached if made and received in bona fide without notice, and when the power of granting is limited to a certain specified place or places, and to a certain specified time not exceeding twelve months from the registration of the certificate of powers, and when (of course) the power is exercised in conformity therewith, at the place and within the twelve months specified. The statute does not make any provision for or against a case of bona fides and want of notice when the power is granted to be exercised (as it may competently be) anywhere out of the United Kingdom, or possession where the ship's port is, and without any limit as to time. This case is left to the operation of the ordinary rules of law, unless we are to infer from the express provision made for supporting bona fide onerous deeds taken without notice of the bankruptcy at a place specified in the certificate of power, and within twelve months of the date thereof, that no other deeds are to be supported against challenge on the ground of recall of power by the bankruptcy. There is another case to which the statute makes no reference: it is the supervening insanity of the granter of the powers before the execution of them. Notice of insanity will apparently nullify any deed taken after its receipt, but such notice would require to be proved by the challenger; for the fact has no element of notoriety about it such as may be predicated of death or bankruptcy.

Supposing the mortgage or sale to be validly constituted as jus ad rem by the agent or mandatory abroad, what requires to be done in order to make the one or the other effectual as a right of property? The requisites are different according as it is a mortgage or a sale that is in question. When a mortgage is granted in virtue of a certificate of mortgage, a record of the mortgage requires to be endorsed thereon by a registrar or British consular officer abroad; and on receipt of the endorsed certificate, the registrar at the home port is [bound to record in the register book any undischarged mortgage appearing thereon, in such manner as to preserve its priority over mortgages or other deeds granted after the powers were issued. Having thus entered the mortgage, he is to cancel the deed or certificate of powers itself, and enter the fact of its cancellation in the register book, which voids the powers for ever quoad all future exercise of them. Every mortgage which is so registered on the certificate shall have priority over all mortgages of the same ship or share which are created subsequently to the date of the entry of the granting of the powers made in the ship's registry at home; but it would seem that, if not so endorsed on the certificate, the subsequent mortgagees or vendees are not affected by it, just as an unrecorded bond would not affect the property. If powers have been issued to mortgage, say to the extent of £1000, it is competent for the mandatory to grant one or more mortgages amounting in whole to the sum specified. If two or more mortgages are granted, they all, when recorded on the back of the certificate of powers in virtue of which they are created, take precedence of others granted subsequent to the notice on the ship register of the issue of these powers; but in any question of priority inter se, they rank one before the other in the order in which they are endorsed on the certificate, just as, if granted at home, they would rank in the order in which they are entered in the register; and no notice, express, constructive, or implied, to the holder of the last dated but first endorsed mortgage, that the competing mortgage has been granted, although not endorsed on the certificate, is to be of any effect in determining questions of priority. Unless the first dated mortgage is on the certificate of powers, to show to all who are asked to lend on the faith of it how far these powers have already been exhausted, the lender is not bound to take any heed of the prior mortgage, though he knows of its existence. And if, after lending on the faith of the unexhausted certificate, the second lender parts with it before getting his mortgage endorsed thereon, and so allows the first lender to have his mortgage first registered after all, the second lender will lose his chance of priority in consequence of his negligence. Subject to these rules, the mortgagees under a certificate of powers who have got their mortgages registered on the back of the certificate, have the same rights and powers, and are subject to the same liabilities, as if their mortgages had been registered in the home register, instead of upon the back of the certificate. If a mortgage is discharged before the certificate of powers is returned to the home registrar, and the mortgages endorsed thereon are recorded in the home register, the discharge may be endorsed thereon by any registrar to whom the certificate is produced; but afterwards it must, of course, be recorded in the ship's home register. The statute contains no provision requiring the certificate of powers on which mortgages are registered to be produced to the home registrar, and cancelled within any given time, or at all; nor is it essential to the validity against the world, of a mortgage granted under such certificate of powers, that it should ever be transferred from the certificate into the ship's home register,—the reason being, that people dealing on the faith of the home register, see that the powers were issued of a certain specified date, and must act on inquiry, or on the assumption that the powers have been exercised. Suppose a ship is worth £10,000, and powers of mortgaging abroad for £2000 have been issued, and noted on the ship's register, of course the owner's hands are not tied up from granting mortgages at home; and there being a margin of £8000 free, even if the powers should be exercised abroad, people may be found willing to lend on mortgages which will be postponed to those granted abroad, or the owner, after granting the powers, may sell the ship at home. Each subsequent mortgage or bill of sale will, of course, be in the form of the Act, but there is a little difficulty as to the form of the clause of warrandice against prior incumbrances. The use of the statutory form is essential, and the clause must contain nothing beyond what the Act allows; but that form is only, 'I covenant that I have power to mortgage as aforesaid, or to sell, and that the ship or shares are free from incumbrances, save as appears by the registry of the said ship.' But what if the foreign mortgage is not on the registry of the ship, but only on the back of the certifi[cate? In that case the warranty would not literally except these foreign mortgages; but would the home mortgagee or purchaser be entitled to insist on the warranty against the grantor, and maintain that he is bound under it to clear off the foreign mortgage, because the warranty only excepts the incumbrances that appear on the home register? In all probability, the courts would construe the issue of powers to mortgage appearing on the register as an incumbrance on the title, and would hold the prospective or actual exercise of it as excepted in the warranty.

Where, again, the certificate issued is a certificate of power to sell, it has this peculiarity, that it must be for a sale of the entire ship: it cannot be issued for the purpose of selling only a part or certain shares of a ship. The ship, when sold under such powers, is required, if the sale abroad be made to a person qualified to hold property in British ships, to be registered anew; and for the purpose of getting her registered anew, the bill of sale, the certificate of powers to sell, and the ship's certificate of registry, are to be produced to the registrar of the port where she is to be registered anew (which may be any port the purchaser thinks proper, abroad or at home, but it will always be done at the nearest port abroad); and on production of these documents to him, the new registrar is to endorse on the certificates of sale and the ship's certificate an entry of the fact of a sale having taken place, and he is to forward them to the home registrar, who thereupon makes a memorandum of the facts in his register, and so closes the old registry of the ship. If, prior to the sale, a mortgage were entered on the old, or if there be any existing certificates of power to mortgage standing thereon, the old register, though closed for all other transactions, remains open as to them. On such registry anew, the new registrar is to transfer from the certificate of power to sell the notice of all mortgages endorsed thereon by the registrar by whom it was issued. By these provisions, entry of the issue of a certificate of power to sell abroad made on the home register will practically close the register from that date, as no one will deal with the owner in regard to the ship until the certificate issued is returned unexercised, and is cancelled by the home registrar, and a note thereof made on the registry. The certificate, when issued, contains all the mortgages granted up to the date thereof, and thus enables the foreign registrar, when registering the ship anew, to transfer to his book in which the ship is registered de novo the whole existing incumbrances on the vessel. These mortgages will therefore appear in both registers, and until they are discharged the new purchaser will hold his property under burden of them. But although the home register is, on the issue of powers of sale, practically closed against all further dealings with the owner, because nobody will deal with him, any prior mortgagee may exercise his powers of sale, either before or after the vessel is sold abroad, under the certificate of sale. Such a sale by the mortgagee would be recorded in the home registry, if the vessel was not registered anew, and might be recorded in either if she were. The purchaser abroad might thus find his title defeated by a sale made by the mortgagee either before he bought abroad or after he had bought; and this will suggest the necessity of no one purchasing on such a title abroad, if there are mortgages endorsed on the certificate of powers of sale, until the mortgages are produced and the discharges recorded. If the foreign purchaser, however, buy without that precaution, and the mortgagee do not sell till after the title is vested in him, the mortgagee will hold the balance of the price, after paying off his own debt, for behoof of the foreign purchaser. If, however, the sale has been made by the mortgagee before the foreign purchase was completed, it will be a question whether in that case any trust would be created in the person of the mortgagee, for behoof of the purchaser who had no interest or property in the ship at the time when the mortgagee sold and received the price; whether the mortgagee has any concern with him, or can be called to account by him; whether, in short, the question of accounting for the surplus is not a question solely between the mortgagee selling and the then owner, leaving any claim the foreign purchaser has for repetition of the price paid for a ship already sold to be settled between him and the owner. The new registry contains [the description of the vessel as in the original survey, and before registration the purchaser makes the same declaration as to qualification, etc., as any other transferee. The vesting of the title of a purchaser under a certificate of sale, is not the recording of the sale on the back of the certificate, but the new registry of the vessel. So far as concerns mortgages granted under a certificate of powers of mortgage, the certificate with the endorsed notice of mortgages granted thereunder may, for the time being, be regarded as a sort of floating registry of the ship; and if endorsed on the certificate they are valid, as we have seen, whether recorded afterwards in the ship's register or not. But it is not so with a sale abroad, made in virtue of a certificate of sale. The endorsement on the certificate of powers of sale of the fact of a sale having been made, is only for the purpose of transmitting to the home register authentic information to enable him to close the old register, and it is the registry of the sale abroad that vests the title in the purchaser.

Provision is made in sec. 83, enabling an owner who grants a power of mortgage or sale, or any person who succeeds to the ownership, to recal the powers before they are exercised or exhausted. This can only be done, however, when the powers are to be exercised at a place or places specified in the certificate; because the revocation is to be made by notice to the registrar at those places abroad, so as to prevent the public from acting on the faith of the deed of powers. The revocation is made by a form given in the schedule: it is certified by the home registrar, and sent to the registrar abroad, where the deed of powers was to be exercised; there notice of recal is recorded in the register, and the registrar is required to exhibit the same to all persons who may apply to him for the purpose of effecting or obtaining a mortgage under the deed of powers. But what if the money is given on loan, or the sale completed, and price paid on the faith of the deed of powers, without application to the registrar who has received notice of revocation and recorded it? The party must blame himself for not inquiring before he contracted; but the effect is clear, for the statute says expressly, that after such notice has been recorded, the certificate, quoad any further exercise of the powers, is deemed to be revoked and of no effect.

The statutory powers of sale or mortgage do not interfere with the power that an owner has in the ordinary course of business to depute any person to act for him in granting deeds of mortgage or sale under the usual power of attorney. There is this great distinction, however, which explains the necessity for providing the statutory machinery, that any sale or mortgage effected under an ordinary power of attorney will have no validity until recorded at the port of registry: it will not take precedence of subsequent deeds first recorded there, and it will not rank as of the date of issuing the power of attorney.

We have seen that no certificate of sale can issue except for the sale of a whole ship. But occasionally it may happen that several owners of a vessel reside in different countries, and wish to unite in effecting a sale out of the country or possession of the ship's port of registry. This may be done, 1. By ordinary power of attorney; but the purchaser's title will not be complete till the bill of sale and declaration of ownership are sent home to the port of registry, and the sale recorded there. If the purchaser desires to change the registry afterwards, he can do so under the 89th section, which provides that the registry may be transferred from one port to another whenever the owners desire. Or, 2. All the owners desirous of selling the whole ship abroad may grant a transfer of their interests to one resident at the port or in the possession of the port of registry, who would then execute the deed of transfer to the purchaser, or the certificate of sale to the agent abroad to sell her there. Or, 3. The absent owners, along with the others, may apply to have the registry changed to the foreign port where the vessel is to be sold; and on the new registry being completed, then the bill of sale to the purchaser may be completed there.]

CHAPTER II.

OF PROPERTY IN GOODS AND MERCHANDISE.

THE great mass of property which forms the subject of mercantile dealings, and which we see undergoing incessant changes in commercial cities, consists of moveables corporeal—goods, wares, merchandise, in a rude or in a manufactured state. And the infinite variety of situations in which this species of property is found, from the first moment that the crude material is begun to be prepared for the market to the final exhibition of the completed manufacture in the warehouse of the merchant, in the manufactory of the artisan, in the [166] shop of the retailer, or in the hand of the purchaser, or of the carrier who undertakes to transport it to the purchaser's residence, occasion questions of difficult solution.

Where a merchant fails with his goods lying consigned in the hands of factors, or in the course of being worked up by the manufacturer; or the agent of a foreign house, with his warehouse full of goods, partly his own, partly belonging to his correspondent abroad; or the seller of goods, after receiving payment or good bills for the price, becomes insolvent, while yet the commodity lies in his repositories waiting a message from the purchaser for delivery; or the buyer of wares fails without paying the price, and the goods are still with the vendor, or, having just left his warehouse, are on the road, or at least in their passage, to the buyer to be delivered,—in all such situations matter of doubtful right arises, in regard to which the rules of the ancient jurisprudence are hard to be reconciled with the facilities required in modern trade, or the usages which manufacturers and merchants have found to be necessary or convenient in conducting their intercourse.

The contest in such discussions resolves into matter of disputed right between an individual claimant and the general body of creditors: the former asserting his claim of property, to the effect of diminishing the general fund for division; the latter maintaining their right, as in the room of their debtor, to sell and distribute the goods in satisfaction of their debts. This inquiry corresponds with that which the Continental lawyers have so amply discussed in questions concerning 'creditores domini.' And it seems necessary to consider,

1. The rules, in their simplest form, respecting the completing of transferences, where, the price being paid or secured, there is no disturbance of the right on account of insolvency.
 2. The equitable right, on the insolvency of the buyer, to retain or stop in transitu goods which have not been paid for.
 3. The remedy afforded against fraud, even after the commodity has been delivered.
- And,
4. Certain circumstances in which the true ownership yields to the right of those who, by collusion, have been enabled to acquire false credit on the apparent ownership of goods.

SECTION I.

OF THE TRANSFERENCE OF GOODS AND COMMODITIES BY SALE AND DELIVERY.

There exists in name, though not in reality, a remarkable difference between the law of Scotland and that of England relative to the effect produced on the right of property by the contract of sale. In England, the completion of the mere contract is said to pass the property. But it is not the absolute property which so passes: it is only a qualified and imperfect right which subjects the buyer to the risk of the commodity, but confers on him no title to demand possession of it, or to exercise any dominion over it; and it therefore cannot be said that the property passes, otherwise than nominally, until the contract is followed by delivery and possession.¹ In Scotland, property is not transferred, either nominally or effectually, without delivery of the commodity; and yet the risk of the [167] thing is with the buyer, as completely as by the law of England, from the moment the contract is completed.

Essentially, therefore, the law of the two countries in this matter is the same; and yet it is very necessary to keep the nominal distinction in recollection in comparing the writings of lawyers, or perusing the language of judicial decisions, in either country. It is not perhaps of any importance to contend for the greater purity of principle or of language by which the law of Scotland in this matter is distinguished; and yet I cannot help observing, 1. That it is inconvenient, and apt to introduce confusion of ideas, to use the word PROPERTY in different senses. Correctly speaking, property imports 'dominium'—the entire and exclusive dominion over the thing spoken of—the proprietor being the dominus, and having the sole disposal of it. The departure from this simplicity of language has required, in English juridical expression, the qualifying terms (not understood in common speech) of Absolute and Special property; whereas in Scotland the term is used in one uniform and unvaried sense, importing the right of exclusive possession and uncontrolled disposal. 2. It does not, to a Scottish lawyer, appear correct in reasoning to ascribe to property alone that risk attending commodities sold, which is inconsistent with the other features of a right admitted to be imperfect, and at the same time is sufficiently accounted for (consistently with the imperfect transference) by referring it to the principle of the law of contract, the obligation undertaken by the seller being discharged by the perishing of the commodity without his fault.²

According to the Roman jurisprudence, which in this matter is followed in Scotland, there are, in the transference of property by sale, two distinct parts: 1. The contract or agreement to transfer, regulated by the law of obligations; and, 2. Tradition, by which the transference is completed, which constitutes the right of property, and in its effects is ruled by the law of property. In the language of the Roman law, the contract is distinguished as the titulus, the tradition as the modus transferendi dominii.

The completion of the contract, or titulus transferendi dominii, confers no real right. Without tradition it passes no property or dominium. It only establishes against the person who means to transfer, the obligation to deliver the thing sold; and bestows on the person who means to acquire, a jus ad rem.

¹ See Bloxam v Sanders, 1825, for a statement of this imperfect right in English jurisprudence. The propositions laid down by Mr. Justice Bayley in delivering the judgment of the Court are: 1. Where goods are sold, and nothing said as to time of delivery or of payment, and everything the seller has to do is complete, the property vests in the buyer, so as to subject him to the risk of accidents, and entitle him to demand possession or payment of the price; but he has no right of possession till the price be paid. 2. The seller's right in respect of the price is not a mere lien which he will forfeit if he parts with the possession, but grows out of his original ownership and dominion; and payment or tender of the price is a condition precedent on the buyer's part, till when he has no right to possession. 3. If the goods are sold on credit, and nothing said of time, the buyer has right to possession as well as property; but his right of possession is not absolute, but liable to be defeated if he become insolvent before he obtain possession. 4. If he fail to pay when the credit expires, and is insolvent, it is as if no bargain for credit had been made; the seller has a right to stop in transitu in virtue of his original ownership, the right of the buyer being defeated. Much more has the seller a right to retain the goods. 5. The buyer can maintain no action which requires both a right of property and a right of possession, but on payment of the price. Add to this the effect of the Act of 1 James I. c. 19, below, next note.

[Correct these observations on the English law of sale by Blackburn on Sale, pp. 147–200, particularly pp. 187–9; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 213–301; or Brodie's Stair, App. p. 906, note.]

² The chief distinction in practical effect between the English law in passing the property, and the Scottish in leaving the goods untransferred, is visible on occasion of a sale where the price has been paid. In England, this entitles the buyer to possession, and in all cases at common law makes a perfect transference, so that the creditors of the seller cannot take it. In Scotland the property is not passed, and the creditors of the seller will be entitled to it as part of the fund of division. By the English statute 21 James I. c. 19, the same practical effect is produced in England with that which results from the operation of the common law in Scotland; goods remaining in the seller's possession, although paid for, going to his creditors as if untransferred. [Repealed by 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, and subsequent Acts.]

It is by the completion of the modus transferendi accompanying a legitimate contract that the property passes, and the jus in re is established, by which the right of the vendee is distinguished from that of the general creditors of the vendor.¹

[168] Sale as a contract will be considered hereafter. At present it is to be assumed that a contract of sale has been concluded, unexceptionable, and established by the legitimate evidence; the present inquiry being directed to the doctrine of tradition or delivery—the modus transferendi by which the real property is passed in conformity with such contract.

The property of moveables is, according to the received maxims of the law, presumed from possession; and this possession, the badge of such property, is conferred by tradition, implying the consent and act of the vendor to confer on the vendee at once possession and the jus dominii.

DELIVERY OR TRADITION, originally, was a clear and unequivocal act of real possession, accomplished by placing the subject to be transferred in the hands of the buyer, or of his avowed agent, or in their respective warehouses, vessels, carts, etc. This sort of delivery was well entitled to be held as the true and proper badge of transferred property, as importing full evidence of consent to transfer; preventing the appearance of possession in the transferrer from continuing the credit of property unduly; and avoiding uncertainty and risk in the title of the acquirer.

But an adherence to this plain and simple rule is utterly impossible amidst the complicated transactions of modern trade. It often happens that the purchaser of a commodity cannot take instantaneous delivery. Its bulk; the distance from his house; the frequency of bargains concluded by correspondence between distant countries; the peculiar situation of the goods, deposited perhaps in public custody for the duties, or in the hands of a manufacturer for the purpose of having some operation of his art performed upon them, to fit them for the market; and many other obstructions,—make it often impracticable to give or to receive actual delivery. The fair occasions of trade have been thought to require that in such cases the original rule should not be adhered to rigidly; that something short of actual delivery should be admitted to transfer the property. Thus, when the seller in a distant country puts the goods on board a ship to be transported to the buyer, and delivered to him; or when, the distance between them being by land, a carrier receives the goods from the seller to carry to the buyer; or when, the goods being in the hands of a manufacturer or packer, or in a public warehouse, an order is given to the buyer to receive delivery,—these acts come constructively to be regarded as fair badges of transference, entitling the buyer, who has paid the price, to take the wares as his own. By the admission of these, and such acts as these, to have the effect of delivery, commerce is facilitated, and the rapid circulation of commodities, and busy employment of stock in speculation and mercantile enterprise, fostered and encouraged.

But when the buyer suddenly fails before the price is paid, and the goods are still in a state of transit to the buyer, the situation of the seller is thought hard, and an extension of the right of the seller to retain his undelivered goods is naturally attempted. His goods are still distinguishable, and have not yet reached the buyer; they have not gone into his

¹ Traditionibus dominia rerum non nudis pactis transferuntur. Cod. de Pact. l. 2, tit. 3, l. 20.

In the following passage, Pothier has delivered with great clearness the distinction between real and personal rights, according to the doctrine of the civil law: 'Les conventions seules et par elles-mêmes ne produisent que des obligations: c'est leur nature; c'est pour cela qu'elles sont établies. Ces obligations ne donnent à celui envers qui elles ont été contractées, qu'un droit contre la personne qui les a contractées. Ce droit est bien un droit par rapport à la chose qu'on s'est obligé de nous donner; mais ce ne peut être un droit dans la chose; c'est encore moins le domaine de la chose.' He afterwards adds: 'De ce principe que le domaine d'une chose ne peut ordinairement passer que par la tradition de la chose, il suit, que quelque convention que j'aie avec une personne qui s'est obligée de me donner une certaine chose, tant qu'elle ne m'en a pas fait la tradition réelle ou feinte, elle en demeure toujours la propriétaire. C'est pourquoi ses créanciers peuvent la saisir valablement sur elle, sans que je puisse être reçu à demander la récréance de cette chose n'en étant pas encore devenu le propriétaire.' Traité du Droit de Propriété, tom. iv. p. 436, No. 245, 247.

stock ; they have not contributed to mislead others by raising a credit on the property ; and in this way, and from the indulgence of equitable considerations, and notions of hardship, [169] a privilege arises to sellers of following and stopping their goods before they come into the buyer's hands.

This may be regarded as a general view of the principles and considerations on which the law with respect to the transference of goods, merchandise, etc., has in this country been arranged, and which in the prosecution of this inquiry is now to be more particularly detailed : the doctrine of delivery in this section ; the provisions against injustice in the next.¹

SUBSECTION I.—OF RISK AS A CRITERION OF THE TRANSFERENCE OF GOODS.

In attempting to reconcile the jarring principles, and resolve the difficulties, of the doctrine of delivery, it has been thought that the simplest and least objectionable criterion

¹ [An important qualification of the doctrine of delivery (and bearing likewise on the law of reputed ownership) has been introduced by the statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, which must, in perusing the text, be carefully kept in view. It is enacted by sec. 1, that 'from and after the passing of this Act, where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller after the date of such sale to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same; and the right of the purchaser to demand delivery of such goods shall from and after the date of such sale be attachable by or transferable to the creditors of the purchaser.' From this rule the landlord's hypothec is excepted. This is so far an adaptation of the law of England to Scotland ; but it seems to have escaped observation, that in England sales of goods exceeding the value of £10 must be in writing, which is not the case in Scotland : and even with this precaution great evils have existed. These evils are thus stated in the preamble to 17 and 18 Vict. c. 36, 'for preventing frauds upon creditors by secret bills of sales of personal chattels :—' Whereas frauds are frequently committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and the granters or holders of such bills of sale have the power of taking possession of the property of such person to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors,' therefore certain enactments are made for the recording and publication of such bills of sale under the sanction of nullity. (See also, as to Ireland, c. 55.) The enactment in the English Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97, sec. 1, intended to correspond with that in the Scotch Act, is in these terms : 'No writ of feri facias or other writ of execution, and no writ of attachment against the goods of a debtor, shall prejudice the title to such goods acquired by any person bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, before the actual seizure or attachment thereof by virtue of such writ ; provided that such person had not, at the time when he acquired such title, notice that such writ, or any other writ by virtue of which the goods of such owner might be seized or attached, had been delivered to and remained unexecuted in the hands of the sheriff, under-sheriff, or coroner.' It does not appear that the statutes requiring the sale to be in writing, and to be registered, are repealed. There is thus still disconformity between the laws of the two countries. On the construction of the first section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, it is decided that the purchaser cannot claim the benefit of the enactment, where he agrees that the seller shall retain not only the custody, but the use of the subject, the principle of reputed ownership being applied. Sim v Grant, 1862, 24 D. 1033. The Act does not interfere with the seller's right of retention for the price, Linn v Shields, 1863, 2 Macph. 88 ; nor even (in the opinions of a majority of the consulted judges) with his right of retention for a general balance. Wyper v Harvey, 1861, 23 D. 606. By 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, s. 2, it is enacted, that 'where a purchaser of goods who has not obtained delivery thereof shall, after the passing of this Act, sell the same, the purchaser from him or any other subsequent purchaser shall be entitled to demand that delivery of the said goods shall be made to him, and not to the original purchaser ; and the seller, on intimation being made to him of such subsequent sale, shall be bound to make such delivery on payment of the price of such goods, or performance of the obligations or conditions of the contract of sale, and shall not be entitled, in any question with a subsequent purchaser, or others in his right, to retain the said goods for any separate debt or obligation alleged to be due to such seller by the original purchaser. Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice or affect the right of retention of the seller for payment of the purchase price of the goods sold, or such portion thereof as may remain unpaid, or for performance of the obligations or conditions of the contract of sale, or any right of retention competent to the seller, except as between him and such subsequent purchaser, or any such right of retention arising from express contract with the original purchaser.' And by sec. 3, 'Any seller of goods may attach the same while in his own hands or possession, by arrestment or poinding, at any time prior to the date when the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller ; and such arrestment or poinding shall have the same operation and effect in a competition or otherwise as an arrestment or poinding by a third party. See Melrose & Co. v Hastie, 1 Macq. 698, as to the seller's right of retention for a general balance due by the purchaser, in a question with a sub-vendee, which seems to be settled by the above-mentioned enactment.]

of transference is to be found in the Risk; and that if in any case it be doubtful whether the property be altered, the most correct decision is to assign the right to him who must bear the burden of the loss should the subject perish. If the legal effects of risk were not to be accounted for on any other theory than as the accompaniments of ownership, the conclusion would be unavoidable. But without admitting ownership as in any degree influenced by the completion of the contract, all the effects of the maxim, 'Periculum rei venditæ nondum traditæ est emptoris,' may be justified as legitimate consequences of the personal obligations under that contract. And in the law of Scotland it is settled that risk is no test of property; and that the question of risk forms a point in the law of Obligation, not in the law of Transference,—the decision of it depending upon principles quite distinct from those concerned in the question of property.

If a person have sold a particular cask of wine, and received the price, he has by the contract of sale conferred on the vendee the jus ad rem; and he is, by the obligation contained in that contract, bound to deliver the wine when demanded. But as tradition alone passes the property, or jus in re, he continues still the undivested proprietor. The buyer may by action compel delivery; and if this have become impossible by the fault of the seller, he will be entitled to damages. But if by unavoidable accident the wine perish, the obligation to deliver cannot be enforced; and as no damages can be due where there has been no fault, the wares are said to have perished to the buyer. It is only a concise way of expressing this doctrine to say, that the risk lies with the buyer.¹

The best proof of this doctrine is, that if the subject of the obligation be not specific, but indefinite (a certain number of quarters of corn, for example, or of pipes of wine), then, as the obligation may be fulfilled although all the wine in the vendor's cellars have perished, so the loss is not to the buyer; the seller has no good defence against the claim for delivery. Thus, in the contract of sale, the buyer is creditor, and the seller debtor for delivery; the seller is creditor, and the buyer debtor for the price. The buyer is entitled to enforce the obligation to deliver, under which the seller lies; the seller, on his part, to enforce payment [170] from the buyer.² The seller's obligation, being for a specific subject, is extinguished wholly, or to a certain extent, by the annihilation or partial destruction of the subject without his fault; the buyer's, being for a sum of money, can admit of no such defence.

It is thus that the subject comes to perish to the buyer, and to be at his risk; not because the transference to him is complete, but merely because the property is the subject of an engagement by the seller, which is extinguished by its destruction. In no sense, either actually or constructively, is the real right of property altered. Possession, the true badge of property and foundation of credit, remains with the seller; and even the very maxims of the law which lay the risk upon the buyer, distinguish the property as still untransferred. While, by one maxim, 'Traditionibus dominia rerum non nudis pactis transferuntur'; by another, 'Periculum rei venditæ nondum traditæ est emptoris.'³ After a bargain of sale, therefore, the goods which still remain in the seller's warehouse perish to the buyer;⁴

¹ Stair i. 14. 7; Ersk. iii. 3. 7. See also Pothier, Tr. des Obligations, part 3, c. 6. Tr. du Cont. de Vente, vol. i. p. 481, sec. 56. [On the principle of the rule, that risk passes by the contract and not by the delivery, and its history, see Brodie's Stair, Appendix, pp. 854–8.]

The legislators employed in constructing the new civil and commercial code of France departed from these views, and assumed the principle that the property of goods sold is acquired to the buyer from the moment of completing the contract. 'La vente est parfaite entre les parties, et la propriété est acquise de droit à l'acheteur à l'égard du vendeur, dès qu'on est convenu de la chose et du prix; quoique la chose n'ait pas été encore livrée ni le prix payé.' Code Civile, § 1583.

In the passage of Lord Stair, cited above, there is an idea extremely similar to this: 'The intention and tendency of the property being to the buyer, if the seller be not in mora, the case is as if the delivery were made, and the property changed, as to the intention and meaning of the parties, which regulates contracts.'

² The buyer is entitled, besides, to have his commodity, according to agreement, with all its intermediate advantages; and he must take it with all its accidental damage.

³ Contrast the 8th law of the Pandects (lib. 18, tit. 6, De peric. et com. rei vend.), where the doctrine is laid down concerning the effect of completing the contract, with the 20th law of the Code, lib. 2, tit. 3, De Pactis.

⁴ See Pothier, Con. de Vente, vol. i. p. 579; Stair i. 14. 7; Ersk. iii. 3. 7. In M'Donald v Hutchison, 1744, M. 10070, the but if the buyer become a bankrupt without paying the price, the goods are still the seller's; nay, though the price has been paid, the creditors of the seller, finding the goods in his warehouse, are entitled to take them as a part of his estate, leaving the buyer to claim a dividend for the price.

In England, the doctrine of risk, considered in its practical effects, is almost precisely the same with that which has now been explained; but the principle seems different. In that law, it appears that the risk may correctly be stated as the criterion of property. For the determinations touching the question seem to proceed on the ground that the property passes with the completed contract, and is suspended while the contract is incomplete, and that the risk attaches to the thing, and so to the owner of it.¹ But practically the decision is not different in this class of cases in the two countries. In England, the property passes when the contract is complete, not sooner; in Scotland, the obligation to deliver does not attach till the same point of completion. But taking the principle of the law of Scotland, the doctrine of risk (whatever it may be in England) is quite unconnected with the question of transference: it affords no true criterion by which the question of property can be decided; and some other method must be taken of reconciling the apparent inconsistencies of the doctrine of delivery, considered as a badge of transference.²

SUBSECTION II.—OF COMPLETION OF THE TRANSFERENCE BY DELIVERY.

The general doctrine of delivery is laid down in very clear terms by one of the [171] best of our lawyers: 'Transmissions of every subject, of whatever kind (says Kilkerran), must be completed by some public act that may come to the knowledge of third parties, and without which the transmission will be incomplete, be it ever so fairly and honestly intended. The transmission of the property of moveables is completed by delivery; of lands, by infeftment; of tacks (leases), and other rights which require no infeftment, by possession.'

Keeping in recollection that, in this first part of the inquiry, the rules are to be considered in their most simple form as unaffected by any failure in the payment, or satisfaction given for the price, it is to be observed, that although delivery of the commodity is necessary to the passing of property, it still is not indispensably required that it should be of that actual and unequivocal kind which places the thing sold within the grasp and in the personal apprehension of the buyer, or of his servants, clerks, and others, whom the law identifies with him and considers as his hands;³ but that acts of possession less immediate

Lords determined the general point, 'that periculum rei venditæ nondum traditæ lies on the buyer.' The case was: 'A parcel of spirits in the king's warehouse was sold, and a bill given for the price, but the spirits not delivered; and next day the warehouse was broken, and the spirits taken away, yet the buyer found liable for the price.' Elchies, voce Sale, No. 5. [So in the case of Hansen v Craig & Rose, 1859, 21 D. 432, where a cargo of oil weighed and ready for delivery was destroyed by fire after the exchange of bought and sold notes, but before delivery,—it was found that the subject perished to the purchaser, although the buyer had not checked the weight and quality of the oil, which by usage he was entitled to do.]

¹ The principles of English law on this subject seem to me to be justly stated by Mr. Brown, in his treatise on the Law of Sale, p. 355 et seq., and I fear that I am accountable for the fault of having overlooked this distinction, and misread the case of Rugg v Minnet, 1809. In this case, turpentine was sold by auction, and certain casks bought by Rugg. They were to be filled up by the sellers during a certain time, while they remained in their warehouse till the last payment was made. Some of the casks were filled up, and nothing remained for the sellers to do; others were not so filled up, and in this state of matters a fire happened which consumed them. The Court held the former to be at the risk of the buyer, the latter at the risk of the seller. 11 East 210.

In the case of Zagury v Furnell, 2 Camp. 240, relative to goat-skins, which by usage are counted over before the contract is complete, the same principle was followed; the whole having been burnt before counting off. So in Hinde v Whitehouse, 7 East 558. [Addison on Contracts, 6th ed. 177-9.]

² For the obligations to deliver, and their effects, see below, Of Sale.

³ Ersk. ii. 1. 19. 'Non est corpore et actu necesse comprehendere possessionem, sed etiam oculis et affectu, et argumento esse eas res quæ propter magnitudinem ponderis moveri non possunt, ut columnas: nam pro traditis eas haberi si in re præsentî consenserint.' Dig. lib. 41, tit. 2. De possess. l. 1, sec. 21. See also Pothier, Tr. du Droit de Propriété, vol. iv. 419, where, speaking of the sale of a log of wood by a timber merchant, who points it out as the vendee's, and other similar and direct are by construction of law held sufficient, when actual tradition into the buyer's hands cannot be given.

It appears that at first the rule of law which required actual delivery in order to complete a transfer of property was rigidly observed, unless where actual delivery was in the circumstances of the case impracticable. And the confusion which has been introduced into the doctrines of the law by the relaxation of the rule, even to this extent, gives warning of the danger with which any further indulgence may be attended. It is by no means uncommon, however, to find every fancied conveniency or facility to the dealings of traders represented as a case of that sort of necessity which the law has in contemplation in admitting constructive delivery; not reflecting that this doctrine, in its true nature, is not meant as an indulgence to imprudent carelessness, nor the ancient rule of tradition intended to be broken in upon for the attainment of mere conveniences. There is no end to the multiplication of small distinctions, and traders will be found infinitely ingenious in discovering cases in which mere conveniency and facility in the management of their dealings may be made to assume the appearance of necessity, till all the fixed principles of the law shall be unsettled, and a miserable pretence of mercantile usage, varying in every port, and with each new set of dealers, be permitted to usurp the place of those great rules to which it is so easy to conform. If a merchant buy and pay for a pipe of wine, which is marked and set apart for him in the vendor's cellar, it may be a great conveniency to him that it should remain there; and in one sense he may be said to suffer a hardship, should that wine be taken by the seller's creditors on bankruptcy as a part of the divisible fund. But that is a hardship to which the buyer voluntarily exposes himself for the sake of this very conveniency, and against which he may provide by taking immediate delivery, or by having the wine locked up, and the key delivered to him. But if he order this wine from a distance, and pay for it, and it is put into the hands of a carrier or shipmaster, to be transported to the buyer, all is done that [172] can be done: all the delivery is taken that the circumstances of the case allow. It is only a necessity of that absolute kind that can in strict principle authorize constructive delivery. Where the goods are at sea; or require to be sent from a distance by a carrier; or are in a public warehouse; or in the hands of a manufacturer, to have some operation of art performed,—these are truly cases of necessity; and without some relaxation of the rule of actual delivery in such cases, it has been supposed impossible to carry on trade.

In England, it appears from some recent decisions that this doctrine is in danger of being unsettled, not merely by the admission of conveniency, to supply the place of the impossibility of making actual delivery, which formerly was held essential to constructive delivery; but even by admitting this imperfect delivery to have the effect of divesting the seller of his right to stop in transitu.

To make the explanation of this doctrine as plain as possible for practical uses, the cases may be considered in the following order:—

1. Where goods are in the seller's own custody at the time of delivery; and the delivery is made directly to the buyer, or into his warehouse, ship, or cart.
2. Where the goods are in the custody of a third person.
3. Where the seller and buyer are at a distance, and the goods are to be sent by sea or land-carriers.
4. Where the buyer is represented by another person.

cases, he says: 'Dans tous ces cas, les yeux, de celui à qui on fait la montrée de la chose dont on entend lui faire la tradition, lui font acquérir la possession d'une chose mobilière de même que s'il l'eut reçue entre ses mains.' See Ulpian's doctrine, Dig. l. 18, tit. 6, l. 1, sec. 2. De Peric. et Comm.; and that of Paulus, ib. l. 14, sec. 1.

ART. I.—TRANSFERENCE OF GOODS IN THE SELLER'S OWN POSSESSION, DIRECTLY TO THE BUYER.¹

1. The simplest case of all is, where a person goes into a shop, and buys and brings off with him an article there exposed for sale: as, if I go into a bookseller's, and purchase and bring away with me a book; I have received actual delivery, and the transfer is to all intents and purposes complete.

'The clearest possession,' says Lord Stair, 'is of moveables, and it is the first possession that was amongst men: for so did the fruits of things common become proper; and thereafter, ornaments, clothes, instruments, and cattle, became proper; the possession whereof is simple and plain; holding and detaining them for our proper use, and debarring others from them, either by detaining them in our hands, or upon our bodies, or keeping them under our view or power, and making use of them, as having them in fast places to which others have no access. This possession of moveables was so begun and continued, and by contrary acts interrupted and lost, when others exercised the same acts either without the possessor's consent, or by their tolerance, or tradition and delivery, or by forsaking and relinquishing them; so that in the matter of possession of moveables there can be little controversy.'²

2. Where the commodity is not a single article, but, like a cargo of grain, requires repeated acts, and a long protracted course of delivery, circumstances may fall out so critically as to make it of importance to draw the line between what is actually delivered and what is not yet delivered. If, for example, a merchant in Leith have in his warehouse 100 bushels of corn, which he sells to another merchant, and 50 bushels of the grain have been delivered over to the buyer; is it to be held that delivery has taken place only of that part of the cargo which has in truth been given out of the warehouse, and received by the buyer, while the other is still in point of fact undelivered? Or is the whole to be held as delivered? In such a case, even where the price has been paid, the delivery cannot on strict principle be held complete, so as to prevent the creditors of the seller from [173] taking the undelivered part, leaving the buyer to claim a dividend on the price.³

¹ [The author, in delivering the doctrine of the transference of property in corporeal moveables by tradition, has unfortunately introduced into his exposition much obscurity and confusion by his division of delivery into actual and constructive, with a view to marking the boundary between cases in which stoppage in transitu is, and those in which it is not, competent. He makes the cases in which stoppage is not competent, cases of actual; those in which it is competent, cases of constructive delivery. The competency or incompetency of stoppage ought not to have been treated as part of the question of delivery, or the right dealt with as if it had been a consequence of imperfect delivery. The division into actual and constructive delivery is barren of any practical results, even if theoretically defensible. There is no such thing as constructive delivery, though there may be actual and constructive possession. There is either delivery or no delivery, considered as the criterion of the transference of the dominium of moveables. The division is useless also in regard to the doctrine of stoppage in transitu. In all real cases of stoppage in transitu, there can be no question that the goods have been delivered, that the property has passed to the vendee, and that all the other consequences of complete tradition have taken place. The right of stoppage ought to have been kept apart from the question of delivery as the criterion of the transference of property, and to have been dealt with as an equitable privilege of an exceptional nature accorded to the unpaid seller, in certain circumstances, against goods which have by completed delivery already become the property of the insolvent vendee. The true question in a case of stoppage is not whether the goods have been delivered, or whether the property has passed, but whether the goods are still in transitu?—whether, notwithstanding, or rather assuming, that the delivery is complete and the property passed, the goods are not still within the limits or in the circumstances in which the equitable and exceptional remedy of stoppage is exercisable? The reason why goods are liable to be stopped is not that delivery to a carrier is an imperfect tradition, but because it is a delivery for the purpose of transport, or in the course of the conveyance of the goods from an unpaid vendor to an insolvent vendee. The confusion throughout this whole section of the work arises from making cases which deal merely with the question as to the termination or prolongation of the transitus, authorities on the question of delivery or no delivery. The confusion which has arisen, both in regard to tradition and to stoppage in transitu, from the author's method of treatment, has been pointed out successfully by Mr. Brown in his Treatise on Sale, Nos. 655–665, and Nos. 719 to 728.]

² Stair ii. 1. 11. [Observe, however, that where goods are rejected on the ground of disconformity to order, the property does not pass; that is, where the seller acquiesces in the rejection of the goods, or where the buyer is justified in rejecting them. Jowitt v Stead, 1860, 22 D. 1400.]

³ Collins v Marquis' Crs., Nov. 1804, M. 14223. Here a cargo of timber was commissioned by Marquis from Collins, and sent by a ship, which on arrival was partly unloaded. Part of the timber was taken into Marquis' timber yard, part

3. Where the seller sends his carts, waggons, etc., to the premises of the buyer, the goods continue undelivered while they are still on the carts unpacked.¹

4. Where the buyer sends his cart to receive delivery, and the ware is delivered over and placed on his cart, this is actual delivery, transferring the property.

5. Where the commodity is delivered to any one entitled to represent the buyer, and give it a new destination, in which the seller is not participant; or to one who, as his clerk, servant, custodier, etc., is to hold the goods till, by a separate and uncontrolled act of the buyer, a new destination is impressed on them, the delivery is effectual to all purposes. Where it is made even to a third person, and for the sole purpose of the goods being carried farther, the delivery is good to pass the property in all cases, except where the seller stops for the price.²

6. The delivery of commodities into the warehouse of the buyer, whether he be present or not, is as complete delivery as in the example already given of a book put into the hand of the buyer. So, where one has a granary or a warehouse under the care of a servant or clerk, delivery into that granary or warehouse passes the property. Nay, it has been decided in England, that 'if a trader be in the habit of holding the warehouse of a wharfinger or of a packer as his own, and making it the repository of his goods, delivery into such warehouse is actual and real delivery.'³

7. Under the bonding acts, the bond warehouse is to be held as the merchant's own was still on the shore, part remained on board, when the process of delivery was stopped by the shipmaster, doubtful of the security for his freight. Collins then applied to the sheriff to have the cargo inventoried and sold for his behoof. But in the meanwhile, Marquis' creditors, to gain an advantage, paid the freight, and got possession of the whole timber from the shipmaster. The question was brought to trial by an action on the part of Collins for restitution of the whole cargo. The Court held Collins entitled, 1. To that part of the cargo which remained on board; and, 2. To that which was on the shore undelivered; but, 3. They found the creditors of Marquis entitled to 'that part of the cargo which was, at the date of Collins' apprehension, within the woodyard or other premises belonging to Marquis.'

This decision may admit of some question, if it can be considered as falling under another class of cases, hereafter to be discussed. See below, Art. II. in fin.; and in that view, the English case of Slubey v Hayward, quoted ineffectually in Collins' case, was perhaps the true decision. In the simple case of delivery from the seller to the buyer, the decision seems to be law, and I should have been inclined to think it ought to have ruled, accordingly, the case of Broughton v Aitchison, 15 Nov. 1809, F. C.

[The text and note afford a striking example of the confusion already referred to, arising from mixing up tradition and stoppage in transitu. It is clear that the payment or non-payment of the price has nothing to do with tradition as the criterion of the transference of the property, though, of course, it is essential in a question as to stoppage. If the question in Collins v Marquis had been whether the property had passed to Marquis, there could have been no doubt that the whole cargo had become his property by being put on shipboard for him, and not merely that part of it which had been taken into his timber yard. It is inconceivable how, if the price had been paid, and stoppage incompetent, or if the price had not been paid, but no stoppage attempted, the creditors of the seller could have claimed any part of the cargo as undelivered, i.e. as property untransferred from the seller. The question whether the whole cargo, or only part of it, was still in transitu, and liable to stoppage, is a totally different question; as to which, see, besides Slubey v Hayward, the following cases:—Dixon v Yates, 5 B. and Ad. 313; Betts v Gibbins, 2 A. and E. 57, 73; Tanner v Scovell, 14 M. and W. 28; Hammond v Anderson, 1 B. and P. N. R. 69; Bunney v Poyntz, 4 B. and Ad. 568; Simmons v Swift, 5 B. and C. 857; Miles v Gorton, 2 Cr. and M. 504; Jones v Jones, 8 M. and W. 431; Wentworth v Outhwaite, 10 M. and W. 436; Crawshay v Eades, 1 B. and C. 181. And see commentary on these cases in Benjamin on Sale, pp. 603-606. The author's doubts as to the soundness of the decision in Collins v Marquis as a point of the law of stoppage are confirmed by those of Mr. Brodie, Stair, App. pp. 882-3; and Ross, L. C. Comm. Law, vol. ii. 808.]

¹ Blakey v Dimsdale, 1774. Here a quantity of corn had been sold by sample to Blakey, deliverable in a month. It was sent by the seller in a cart, under the charge of his own servant, to Blakey's premises; and while the servant was in the act of uncarting the corn, part being already lodged in Blakey's repositories, and the rest still on the cart, a seizure was made of a certain proportion for the whole out of what remained on the cart as payment of a market-toll. The question was, whether Blakey was proprietor of the grain, so as to maintain his action of trespass. Lord Mansfield was of opinion that the delivery to the servant, for Blakey's behoof, was sufficient to vest the property in him as to third parties; and to this effect constructive delivery was sufficient. But the opinion on which I rely at present is this:—His Lordship proceeded to say, 'But what is still stronger in this case is, that the corn was absolutely brought to the plaintiff's house, and part of it unloaded before the trespass was committed. That is an actual, not a constructive possession.' Cowper's Rep. 664.

² [The more accurate statement would be, that even in this case the property passes by delivery to the carrier, although, if the vendee be insolvent, the seller may stop for the price.]

³ Richardson v Goss, 3 Pull. and Boss. 127; Scott, etc. v Pettit, ib. 469; and Leeds v Wright, ib. 320. [Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 554.]

warehouse, where his goods lie at his disposal, and into which they may be delivered for his use. A delivery by the seller into the bond warehouse, for behoof of the buyer, of goods bonded in the buyer's name, is as effectual delivery as if made into the buyer's own cellar.¹ So it is with delivery into the warehouse of a public warehouseman in the buyer's name.

8. Where a buyer sends his own ship for the goods, or a ship chartered by him [174] for a definite period, and entirely at his own command, delivery into such ship is effectual to all intents and purposes. In the former case, it is his own repository in which the goods are placed; in the latter, the possession of the ship being with his hired servants, not for a mere voyage, but for such destination as he may choose to give, delivery into such vessel is delivery into the hands of the buyer.

9. But where a ship is on general freight only for a particular voyage, and in order to bring home to the freighter those particular goods from abroad, the freighter having no control over the ship, the delivery, though not held as made into the buyer's repository, is effectual to pass the property, the price being paid. And in such a case it makes no difference whether this affreightment is made by the buyer, the ship being sent from Britain, or by the seller, freight being got abroad; the engaging of the entire vessel not differing essentially from engaging a part of a general ship.²

The doctrine of these two paragraphs is illustrated in the cases quoted below.³

¹ Strachan v Knox & Co.'s Tr., 21 Jan. 1817, 19 Fac. Coll. 253. Knox & Co. of Aberdeen ordered from Strachan of London wine in casks, to be sent from Oporto. Strachan's agent at Oporto accordingly shipped the wine for Aberdeen, where, on arrival, it was lodged in the king's cellars, bonded for the duties, in the name of a merchant acting for Knox & Co. While the wine lay thus in bond, and not paid for, Knox & Co. failed. Strachan applied to the sheriff for a warrant to have the wine delivered to him, as stopped in transitu, not yet having reached the hands of the vendee. The sheriff refused his application; and, on appealing to the Court of Session, they, recognising the distinction stated in the text, held the king's cellar to be the cellar of the person in whose name and for whose behoof the wines were bonded, and that in this case the delivery to Knox & Co. was complete.

² [The confusion in this paragraph is obvious. Delivery on board a general ship is effectual to pass the property, whether the price is paid or not. The non-payment of the price is only of consequence to the right of stoppage, which in that case is undoubtedly competent while the goods are on board a general ship, if the master be a middleman interposed merely for the purpose of conveyance to the buyer, but not if he has made himself the special agent of the buyer, as by granting bills of lading for the goods as shipped by the buyer, or if he holds the goods for conveyance away from the buyer to a foreign market. With reference to the right of stoppage in the cases distinguished in paragraphs 8 and 9 of the text, and the sub-distinctions just mentioned, see Blackburn on Sale, pp. 241-248; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 634-644, and cases there; Story on Sale of Personal Property, pp. 396-7, 400, and 402, and cases; Morton v Abercromby, 1858, 20 D. 362; Noble v Adams, 7 Taunt. 59; Meletopulo v Ranking, 6 Jur. 1095.]

³ In England, the following cases have been determined:—

Fowler, etc., Assignees of Hunter & Co., v M'Taggart and Kymer, tried by Mr. J. Grose at Bristol, Mich. Term, 1797. In that case, M'Taggart & Co. had shipped a quantity of tobacco by order of Hunter & Co., the bankrupts, on board of a vessel chartered to the bankrupts for three years, and in which the goods in question were to be carried out to Naples and Alexandria. The goods were shipped 4th February, and the mate's receipt given for them, and an invoice made out by the sellers in name of the buyers. The vessel was by contrary winds detained at Portsmouth; and in March, the buyers becoming bankrupts, the sellers procured bills of lading from the captain to themselves, and in September 1794 got possession of the tobacco—got it relanded, and disposed of it. It was held that the shipping on board the vessel thus chartered by the buyers was an actual delivery, transferring the property of the goods, and divesting the sellers of the right to stop. 7 Term. Rep. 442; and Cowasjee v Thomson, 1 East 522, 3 East 396.

Inglist, etc., Assignees of Crane, v Usherwood, tried in King's Bench, 9 June 1801 (1 East Rep. 515). Lord Kenyon incidentally expressed an opinion apparently extending the doctrine of Fowler's case to a common affreightment. But this was corrected in the following case.

Bothlingk v Inglist. Crane chartered a vessel from London and sent her to Petersburg for a cargo. In consequence of Crane's order, Bothlingk & Co. shipped the cargo between the 19th and 29th October; but hearing of Crane's insolvency, they sent one of the bills of lading to London, and the goods were stopped. The question was, Whether this delivery into the vessel thus chartered was equivalent to actual delivery? and the Court held that it was not. An extract from the opinion of Lawrence, J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, will show the doctrine:—'For the benefit of trade, a rule has been introduced into the common law, enabling the consignor, in case of the insolvency of the consignee, to stop the goods consigned before they come into possession of the consignee; which possession Mr. Justice Buller, in Ellis v Hunt, says, means an actual possession. That the possession of a carrier is not such a possession has been repeatedly determined; and the question now is, Whether the possession of the master be anything more than the possession of a carrier, and not the actual possession of the bankrupt? As to this, it appears that Usherwood, the master, contracted with the bankrupt to proceed from hence to Petersburg, and to bring [175] 10. Where goods are in a repository of the seller, from which the buyer does not wish them removed, but which he is willing to make the ultimate place of their destination for a time, the giving up of the key of that repository by the seller to the buyer is an act of real delivery.¹ It differs from symbolical delivery in this, that a symbol is properly nothing more than the sign of the thing transferred—the image by which it is represented to the senses; whereas the delivery of the key gives to the buyer access to the actual possession of the subject, and power over it, while the seller is excluded; in which particular it corresponds with what Lord Stair delivers in his definition of actual possession—‘having the goods in fast places, to which others have no easy access.’ It will not prevent this kind of delivery from having effect, that the seller has a double or master key by which he may open the door, or that he may get access by some indirect and unusual means, or that there is a door of communication with some other part of the premises which the seller may clandestinely open.² It does not, however, seem to be altogether settled (though the decision would probably be in the negative), whether the circumstance of the repository being in his ship a cargo of goods, which Crane engaged should amount to the tonnage of the ship: which does not differ from a similar contract entered into by the consignor, by the direction of the consignee, at the loading port, for the conveyance of the goods from him to the vendee; in which case it would hardly be contended that a delivery by the consignor to the master of the ship, for the purpose of carriage, would be such a delivery to the vendee as to prevent the right of stoppage in transitu. In each case the freight would be to be paid by the consignee; in each case the ship would be hired by him, and there would be no difference, except that, in this case, the ship, in consequence of the agreement, goes from England to fetch the cargo; in the other case, the vessel would bring it immediately from the loading port. Both in the one case and in the other the contract is with the master for the carriage of goods from one place to another; and until the arrival of the goods at their port of destination, and delivery to the consignee, they are in their passage, or transit, from the consignor to the consignee. If a man contract with the owner of a general ship to take goods which are equal to half the tonnage of the ship, and the master complete the loading of his ship with the goods of others, there would be no question but there might be such stoppage. And surely it will not be said that the right of stoppage depends on the quantity of the goods consigned. In support of the defendant's claim, the case of Fowler v M'Taggart has been relied on. The more proper name of that case is Fowler v Kymer et al., which was tried before Mr. Justice Grose at Bristol. But that case is very distinguishable from this. There the bankrupts, Hunter & Co., were in possession of a ship, let to them for a term of three years, at £52, 10s. a month, they finding stock and provisions for the ship, and paying the master; during which time they were to have the entire disposition of the ship, and the complete control over her. The ship had been one voyage to Alexandria, and had the goods put on board her to carry them on another voyage to the place; not for the purpose of conveying them from the plaintiff's to the bankrupts, but that they might be sent by the bankrupts upon a mercantile adventure, for which they had bought them. There the delivery was complete. And the facts of that case differ widely from this, where Crane had no control over the ship, and had merely contracted with the master to employ his ship in fetching goods for him.' Bothlingk v Inglis, 3 East 395.

In Scotland, these cases were decided:—

Robertson & Aitken v More, 1801, M. App. Sale, No. 3. On the 25th February 1796, Sinclair & Williamson purchased 127 quarters of wheat from Robertson & Aitken, with whom it was to remain till an opportunity occurred of sending it to Leith. The buyers having afterwards purchased, by their agent in that part of the country, another quantity of grain, hired a vessel at Leith, and sent it to the port of Eyemouth to take delivery of both quantities; and, accordingly, both were put on board, and the vessel sailed again for Leith. The bills of lading and invoices were regularly sent to Sinclair & Williamson. They became bankrupts; and the grain in the harbour of Leith was claimed by the sellers. There was some difference of opinion on the bench as to whether the delivery in this case was actual delivery; but it was at last decided that the grain might be stopped.

Pierson v Baxter, 8 July 1807, F. C., Hume 688. A similar judgment was given where the ship was chartered by the buyer for the purpose of carrying the grain. The judge-admiral, in respect it was not denied that the wheat ‘in question was put on board a ship or vessel, chartered by Henry Thomson the purchaser, found that the putting said wheat on board a vessel so chartered was equivalent to actual delivery into the hands and custody of the purchaser, and that the right to stop in transitu was thereby barred.’ This judgment was altered by the Court of Session. [See Smith Merc. Law, 7th ed. 555.]

¹ ‘Si quis merces in horreo repositas vendiderit,’ says Gaius, ‘simul atque claves horrei tradiderit emptori, transfert proprietatem mercium ad emptorem.’ Dig. lib. 41, tit. 1, l. 9, sec. 6; Instit. lib. 2, tit. 1, sec. 44.

² In the case of More v Dudgeon & Brodie, 3 July 1801, n. r., the latter had sold to Sinclair & Williamson a quantity of grain deposited in a loft. The question related to the delivery of the key, and the effect of it. But the Court was clear (on the supposition that the key was truly delivered) that the circumstance of the sellers having it in their power, by an open compartment over a communication door, to get access to the loft, and bar the door on the inside, to the exclusion of the buyers, could have no effect in destroying the reality of the delivery and possession. [See Maxwell & Co. v Stevenson & Co., 1831, 5 W. and S. 269, where delivery of the key was held actual delivery of goods in a warehouse.]

within an enclosure, the doors of which may be shut against the buyer, has any force [176] in destroying the effect of the delivery of the key.¹

11. Where the seller's warehouse is one in which goods of others also are received for rent, the taking of rent by the seller is held delivery in England.² But that is not yet decided as the law of Scotland.³

12. Where standing trees are bought, they cannot be instantly cut down and removed, and the practice is to mark them for the buyer. Such marking is good constructive delivery.⁴

13. In the sale of growing corn, no actual removal can take place till the corn be reaped. A delivery by symbols was held good to exclude creditors; but it has not been determined whether the transit could be held as completed.⁵

14. But in the sale of cattle, the practice is extremely common to mark them with the buyer's mark, and leave them for grazing in the enclosure of the seller, the buyer paying rent. This seems to be effectual delivery.⁶

15. In selling a farm-stock of sheep, it is often difficult to deliver them to the buyer; for they are scattered over many miles of pasture hills, and cannot be collected. The delivery is in parcels: the shepherds alone know when they have gone through the whole; and the sheep cannot advantageously be removed from their native farm. Usage seems to give the only rule where the question turns on the completion of the transit.

16. There is another case of necessity, which seems to give sanction to constructive delivery: viz., where goods are purchased from a manufacturer before some necessary operation of his art is completed. Contracts of this kind are frequent. A person buys a ship on the stocks; or a piece of cloth at the printfield; or a vase in the hands of a goldsmith unfinished; or a merchant, having an order from abroad for cotton goods, goes round among the manufacturers, and buys all the cloth upon their looms in a state of preparation. Actual change of the possession is generally speaking impracticable; but if the accidental

¹ Stein bought from Somerville & Co. a quantity of whisky, which was counted over and lodged in a cellar, and the key delivered to the purchaser. The purchaser became bankrupt; and when the goods were demanded, the seller refused delivery, because the bills were bad. The answer was, that there was no longer any power of retention, the delivery being completed by delivery of the key. The seller replied, that he held the full power of the outer gate, by which alone access could be obtained to the loft. In the papers there was some discussion on the point under review, but no decision on this question. I should rather be inclined to think, that as this circumstance could have no effect in disturbing the right of possession of the tenant of a loft or granary so situate, and as he might demand and enforce access at any time, so should it prove of as little avail in a question of the kind now under consideration. And the remarks that incidentally fell from the judges in the case of Dudgeon & Brodie, seemed to me to favour this conclusion. In that case there was no room for a direct judgment on the point. The loft was situate within a court, the door of which was locked at night; but this court was not exclusively the property of the vendors: several others had cellars and lofts there, and the gate was common. 18 April 1796, 3 Pat. 462.

² Hurry v Mangles, 1 Camp. 452. See below, Of Stopping in transitu; also p. 190. [Smith, Merc. Law, 554.]

³ [See the contrary decided in Anderson v M'Call & Co., 1866, 4 Macph. 765; Matheson v Allison, 1854, 17 D. 274.]

⁴ [See Paul v Guthbertson, 1840, 2 D. 1286; and particularly the opinions of the majority of the judges, which are adverse to the above doctrine. See also Duff v Brown, 11 July 1817,

6 Pat. 337; Anderson v Ford, 1844, 6 D. 1315; and the opinions in Boak v Megget, 1844, 6 D. 662.]

⁵ Grant v Smith, 1758, M. 9561. It was held, that a quantity of growing corn being sold while yet green, the property passed by symbolical delivery, so as to exclude the seller's creditors, by whom it was afterwards pointed when ripe. [See Elder v Allen, 1833, 11 S. 902, where it was held that pointing of a crop of wheat in December, and which was only then braided, was incompetent,—distinguishing from the case of a crop fully, or nearly fully grown. In England, the sale of growing grass, growing timber, etc., 'not made with a view to its immediate severance and removal from the soil, and delivery as a chattel to the purchaser, is a contract for the sale of an interest in land;' 'but fructus industriales, such as growing crops of turnips, etc., are considered goods and chattels.'—Add. Cont. p. 39.]

See, on the subject of paragraphs 12 and 13, Brodie's Stair, App. pp. 897–8. The distinction between the case of unfelled timber and growing corn appears to be that, till separation, the former is pars soli, the latter a moveable.]

⁶ In an old case, where cattle were sold, and marked by the buyer, and a bill given for the price, the cattle were left in the seller's enclosures till the buyer could conveniently take them away. Some were taken away. The servant who had the charge of the enclosures joined the rebels in 1745, and under his direction the rest of the cattle were carried off. The Court held the buyer liable for the price. Campbell v Barry, 1748; Elchies, voce Sale, No. 7. [Lang v Bruce, 1832, 10 S. 777. But see Boak v Megget, 1844, 6 D. 662.]

bankruptcy of those manufacturers were to entitle their creditors to seize the goods, and there were no means of securing the property to the buyer, ruin might, in extensive speculations, ensue to the foreign merchant and his factor. Where, in such cases, the evidence of the contract is clear; where the subject purchased is specific; and where there is no ground for pleading on the effect of reputed ownership, as giving additional credit¹ to the holder of [177] the goods; there is a constructive tradition sufficient to transfer the property, the price being paid.²

17. In England, where a specific existing subject has been sold, and all the delivery has been given which the nature of the case admits, although the thing continues in the hands of the vendor, it has been held as constructively delivered.³ But where the subject is not in existence at the time of the contract, it is held that no property passes till it is finished and delivered; the contract for the time being considered as entire, not to be separated into parts.⁴

In Scotland the purchase of a specific subject or materials, the price being paid, is,

¹ As to which, see below, On Reputed Ownership and Collusive Possession.

² If we seek for authority for this doctrine in the civil law, we shall find it, 1st, In the constitution of Honorius and Theodosius the younger, which lays down that a donation or sale, with retention of the usufruct, requires no other tradition: 'Sed omni modo idem sit in his causis usumfructum retinere quod tradere.' Cod. lib. 8, tit. 54; De donat. l. 28. 2d, We shall find the principle laid down by Ulpian (in the 77th law of the Pandects, De rei vind. lib. 6, tit. 1), that in donation a feigned tradition, resulting from the retention of the subjects in the character of tenant, puts the donatory in possession, and transfers to him the property. The doctrine of the civil law on this subject is thus delivered by the editor of the Pandects: 'Traditionis fictæ species est, quum is, qui rem alicui traditurus est, hanc illius nomine se possidere constituit, v. gr. usumfructum retinendo simpliciter; etiamsi non stipulatus fuerit emptor venditorem viri boni arbitrato fructurum, quæ cautio in constituendo usufructu interponi solet. Hoc enim ipso quod sibi usumfructum retinet jam rem tanquam alienam tenet, eamque jam non sibi emptori et per hoc hujus possessionem ad emptorem transfert. Idem est si conduxerit.' Pothier, Pandect. vol. iii. p. 109.

The question has given birth to much controversy on the Continent. On the one hand, it was contended that tradition alone, and not convention merely, transfers property (Lib. 3, tit. 3, Cod. de Pact. l. 20); and whatever may be the effect of such agreement between the parties, a feigned tradition, without any external act, can have none against third parties (Belordeau, liv. 1, chap. 18). On the other hand, it was maintained, that by such agreements the vendee truly takes possession, and acquires the property; for we may acquire possession and property by the agency of a third person, and in these cases the seller takes possession in the buyer's name. And against the law of the Codex is opposed the 3d and 9th law of the Pandects, De acquir. poss. lib. 41, tit. 2, and the 77th law, De rei vind. lib. 6, tit. 1; Guy Pape, decs. 112. With this latter opinion the lawyers of chief authority on the Continent concur. [By the present laws both of France and Holland, the property is held to be transferred when the contract is completed.]

The doctrine of this and the two following paragraphs has been severely animadverted upon by Mr. Brodie, App. to Stair, 905, note, and 898 et seq. See also Boak v Megget, 1844, 6 D. 662; Wylie & Lochhead v Mitchell, 17 Feb. 1870; Parsons on Contracts, ii. 131 et seq.; Story on Sale, 233, and cases Benjamin on Sale, 228-236 and 268-270, and cases.]

³ Manton v Moore, 24 Nov. 1796, 7 Term. Rep. 67, 73. A canal company employed Langwith as their engineer to build locks and bridges. He purchased materials, which he laid down on the company's premises, the banks of the canal. In this situation the company advanced him money, and he made a bill of sales to them of the materials, and, to make all sure, gave a symbolical delivery by a halfpenny. A question occurred between the company and the assignees under Langwith's bankruptcy. This case may be resolved into two questions: 1st, Whether this was a good delivery to transfer property? 2d, Whether the assignees were not entitled to challenge it under 21 James I. c. 19, sec. 11, as a case of collusive possession? The Court of King's Bench sustained the delivery as effectual, being the only delivery possible in the circumstances of the case.

See below, p. 189, where, in the more recent determinations in England, such delivery has been held effectual to divest the seller of his right to stop. [Smith, Merc. Law, 510; Addison, Cont. 6th ed. 176.]

⁴ Mucklow v Mangles, 1 Taunt. 318. In this case, Royland, a barge-builder, undertook to build a barge for Pocock. Before the work began, Pocock advanced money to account; and as the work proceeded, he paid him more, to the amount of £190, the whole value of the barge. When it was nearly finished, Pocock's name was painted on the stern. Two days after the work was completed, an execution was issued against Royland, and the barge was taken in execution. It was given up to Pocock on an indemnity; and in an action of trover by the assignees of Royland, a verdict was given for them. On a motion that the sum of £190, the price of the barge, should be deducted from the amount of the verdict, on the ground of the property having vested in Pocock, the Court of Common Pleas refused the rule. They held the property not to be passed till the barge was finished and delivered, and drew the distinction between the sale of an existing subject and the contract, Do ut facias. 'If the thing be in existence at the time of the order,' said Heath, J., 'the property of it passes by the contract, but not so where the subject is to be made. See the next note.' without actual delivery, effectually completed by such constructive possession as the case admits; and this may take place successively, without any necessity of the whole being completed.¹

18. In this class of contracts a distinction is to be made between what may be [178] called a generic and a specific purchase. If I go into a goldsmith's shop, and order and pay for a vase of a certain shape, and weight, and fineness, which the workman agrees to make for me, I am a mere personal creditor of his for the vase: there is in such a case no delivery, real or feigned, and consequently no transference nor constitution of a real right. But if I find standing in the shop a vase begun, and purchase and pay for that specific vase, which I order him to proceed in finishing for me, the property of the vase will be transferred to me by the feigned tradition. And the same consequence would seem to follow, if I purchase and pay for a mass of silver, or a quantity of dollars, which I set apart and order to be made into a vase. In either case it would be absurd to carry away the materials or the vase, by way of taking possession, when it was to be instantly returned for manufacturing. Every objection to the holding of feigned delivery as a completion of the transference applies as strongly to the device of actual delivery and the immediate return of the materials to be manufactured.

19. In no other case does the law of Scotland seem to hold delivery sufficient for passing the property, in which there is not a manifest change of custody. In England, from the operation of the special statute already alluded to, the same effect should be expected; and, till lately, there was no case in which, against the policy of the Act of James I., goods were held to be sold and effectually delivered, without passing out of the warehouse of the seller, or some alteration of place indicative of change of property. But this came to be relaxed on one occasion, where altering the situation of commodities, in execution of a sale and

¹ The following case is nearly the same with the English case last quoted:—

Simson v Duncanson's Crs., 1786, M. 14204. Simson employed Duncanson to build a ship; the materials of the hull to be furnished by the builder, the masts and other articles by the employer. The price was to be paid in three sums: one at laying the keel, one when the ship was planked to the gunwale, and the last when she was launched. After receiving the first sum, the builder failed; and the factor for the creditors claimed the vessel as the untransferred property of the bankrupt. The Court held Simson to be the proprietor in consequence of the particular nature of the bargain, and the appropriation of the vessel from the time of laying the keel.

Lord Justice-Clerk M'Queen said, that, taken upon general principles, it was a nice question; but he thought the special nature and terms of the contract should decide it. In the case of a simple bargain for the building of a ship, the materials to be furnished by the builder, he would incline to the opinion that the unfinished vessel belonged to the builder or his creditors; but in the particular case when, by the contract, one-third of the price was to be paid when the keel was laid, another when the building was advanced, he held that there was an appropriation of the vessel to the employer from the time of laying the keel. In this opinion Lord Eskgrove concurred. The rest of the Court went chiefly on the ground that the creditors of Duncanson, taking the benefit of the contract, could not refuse credit for the payments which had been made to Duncanson himself.

In comparing those two cases, so nearly similar, there is perhaps a distinction which may entirely reconcile them. In the English case there was no contract, as in the Scottish, to make progressive transfers, and no progressive conveyances were executed. Accordingly the Court of Session proceeded on the principle that the agreement was merely of the nature of the contract, Do ut facias, of the civil law, to pay money for a barge to be finished; but seem to have held that, till completed, the obligation of the builder was only an executory contract, which could not transfer property.

At all events, I incline to think the Scottish determination the more correct, in holding the property of what was finished capable of appropriation on payment of the price, though still retained in the vendor's hand for the purposes of the contract. Perhaps the principle of accession might have operated in some degree in adding the property of each new part of the work to that which was already considered as vested in the buyer.

To this question, perhaps, the principle laid down by Julian in the 61st law of the Pandects, De rei vind. lib. 6, tit. 1, sec. 1, may apply. Julian, in commenting on a response of Minicius (who, being asked whether a ship, repaired with the wood of another, continues the property of the repairer, answered that it did), draws a distinction where a ship is built with another's materials: 'Nam proprietates totius navis,' says Julian, 'carinæ causam sequitur.' [See Wood v Russell, 5 Barn. and Ald. 942; Clarke v Spence, 4 Ad. and El. 448; Laidler v Burlinson, 2 M. and W. 602. It would seem that, without such successive appropriation consequent upon payment of instalments of the price, the property of the article in the course of being manufactured remains with the workman if he supplies the materials. Mucklow v Mangles, 1 Taunt. 318; Atkinson v Bell, 8 Barn. and Cress. 277.

See, on the case of Simson v Duncanson's Crs., the elaborate observations of Mr. Brodie, App. to Stair, 900 et seq., and note.]

transference, though the commodity had not passed out of the seller's custody, was held sufficient to entitle the buyer to have the goods, the circumstances not admitting of an immediate removal;¹ but the case partook, in some degree, of the nature of partnership. [179] In another case, it seems to have been taken for granted, that goods deposited in a hovel belonging to the seller, for the purpose of the buyer taking them away, were delivered to all effect but that of divesting the power to stop.² And more recently it has been held, that wherever the universal custom is such as to make the public aware of the possibility of a transference while the goods continue with the seller,³ it is an effectual constructive delivery, and even good as actual tradition, if the vendee has marked the goods as his own, or if he has paid warehouse rent for them.⁴ There seems to be a qualification of this doctrine, however, where something remains to be done by the vendor in measuring over or separating the goods.⁵

¹ Flynn and Field. These persons, being at Liverpool with the intention of purchasing plantation tar, found lying on the quay, to be disposed of, 500 barrels belonging to Matthews. It was agreed that they should purchase two-thirds of the whole, and take the other third on consignment for sale for Matthews—he to pay the cartage and portage, and expense of shipping the whole, and they to sell his share free of charge; and that, in execution of this bargain, the goods should be removed from the quay, and lodged in a warehouse till an opportunity should occur of shipping them. All this was clearly expressed in a bill of parcels, containing an acknowledgment for the bills. Matthews accordingly put the tar into a warehouse or cellar of his own; and having become a bankrupt, his assignees took possession of the tar remaining in the bankrupt's warehouse. Lord Hardwicke ordered the property to be given up on two grounds: 1. That this was a joint concern, and common property, and the possession of one was the possession of all; and, 2. That Matthew's possession was merely a temporary custody, because the buyer of the tar had not an opportunity of selling it, by shipping it off immediately to Ireland. 1 Atk. Rep. 185.

² Goodall v Skelton, 2 H. Blackst. p. 316.

³ See Thackthwaite v Cook, 1811, 3 Taunt. 487. Moore sold seventy-eight pockets of hops to plaintiff, who paid for them. They were to remain with the seller at a rent till the plaintiff should re-sell them. A custom in the hop trade was relied on as sanctioning the transfer; the hops remained unmarked. Verdict for the plaintiff was, on a rule for non-suit, held bad. The Court required a custom such that persons dealing with the trade may see and know that the goods may possibly not be the property of the possessor, and thought a new trial unnecessary, as no evidence could be given, consistent with the evidence in the cause, that could prove such custom as is required.

In Knowles v Horsfall, 1821, 5 Barn. and Ald. 134, several casks of brandy were sold, some of them in seller's own vaults, some of them in bonded vaults of one Ledson. The price was paid. No notice was given to Ledson, and the casks in the seller's custody remained there without rent, only marked with K in chalk. It was relied on as a sufficient custom to make strangers aware of the possibility of another right, that goods thus situated are frequently sold without delivery, and it was said that the transaction in question was publicly known. The Court held, 1. That notice to Ledson would have passed the property; but, 2. That neither the casks in his custody, and far less those in the seller's own vaults, were effectually passed; but, as under the statute, still as in the order and disposition of the bankrupt. [Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 700.]

⁴ In Hammond v Anderson (see below, Art. 2, in fin.), the weighing of the goods by the buyer was a fact much relied on as completing the transit.

In Hurry v Mangles, 1 Camp. 452, Lord Ellenborough held 'the acceptance of warehouse rent as a complete transfer of the goods to the purchaser. If,' says he, 'I pay for a part of a warehouse, so much of it is mine. This is an executed delivery by the seller to the buyer.' Again, he says: 'It would be overturning all principles to allow a man to say, after accepting warehouse rent, "The goods are still in my possession, and I will detain them till I am paid." The transitus was at an end. The goods were transferred to the person who paid the rent, as much as if they had been received into his own warehouse, and there deposited under lock and key.'

In Stoveld v Hughes, 1811, Hughes sold a quantity of timber lying at his own wharf, and it was marked with Dixon the buyer's initials. Dixon re-sold it, and the second buyer brought a notice from Dixon to deliver it to him. Hughes went to the wharf, and showed the timber to the second buyer, who in his presence marked it with his initials. Part of the timber had been delivered to the first buyer before this new sale. The second buyer paid the price to Dixon, who failed, without paying Hughes. The question was, whether Hughes could stop as against the second buyer? The Court of King's Bench held unanimously that the transit was at an end by the marking in presence of the seller. 14 East 308.

⁵ White v Wilks, 1813. Shuttleworth bought from Wilks twelve tons of linseed oil at £1200; but not being immediately in want of it, and it never having been measured off, it was agreed that it should remain in the cisterns under Wilks' care, the purchasers paying rent for the warehouse room. The invoice had this note: 'Mr. Wilks holds the above in cisterns for Messrs Shuttleworth's accommodation, charging them 1s. per ton per week rent.' Before the bills were accepted, the buyers failed. The assignees brought an action of trover against the seller. Mansfield, Ch. Justice, on a motion for a new trial (verdict having gone for the seller), said: 'In trover for a quantity of sugar, where the sale had been agreed upon, but there had been no actual delivery, the Court was of opinion the action was not maintainable (Austin v Craven), and certainly sugar is of a more divisible nature than oil. The question here is the separation, which I think is essential for the support of this action; and there certainly has been no separation of the oil in question.' The rule refused. 1 Marshall, Rep. C. P. 2.

In Scotland there is only one case in which property has been held as passed to [180] the buyer while lying without necessity in the warehouse of the seller; and it seems to require a very full reconsideration of the matter before this decision is admitted as law.¹

See also above, Bloxam v Saunders, p. 176. [On the subject of the transference of property in unascertained goods, under the law of England, the expositions of Mr. Justice Blackburn, in his Treatise on Sale, have obtained a high degree of authority. According to this author, in order to a change of property, there must be not only an appropriation of certain goods to the purposes of the contract, but also (expressly or impliedly) an assent on the part of the purchaser to the terms on which this appropriation is made. Godts v Rose, 17 C. B. 230; Campbell v The Mersey Dock, 14 C. B. N. S. 412. Where the assent of the purchaser to the appropriation is not given, such appropriation is revocable by the party who made it, and not binding on the other party, unless it were made in pursuance of an authority to make the election conferred by the agreement (Black. on Sale, 127). Where, from the terms of the contract, the vendor is to despatch the goods, or to do anything to them which cannot be done till the goods are appropriated, he has a right to choose what the goods shall be, and the property is transferred by the despatch or other act (ibid. p. 128). Appropriation may, on this principle, be made by placing the goods in bags or bottles furnished by the purchaser. Aldridge v Johnson, 7 Ell. and Bl. 885; Langton v Higgins, 4 Hurl. and Norm. 402; and see Logan v Le Mesurier, 6 Moo. P. C. Ca. 116. A delivery of a part of the goods sold will not be considered constructive delivery of the whole, if anything remains to be done either to ascertain the specific goods or their price. Simmons v Swift, 5 B. and C. 857; Acraman v Morrice, 9 C. B. 449, 19 L. J. C. P. 57. See Tudor's Mercantile Cases, voce Hansen v Meyer, pp. 610 sqq.; Addison on Contracts, 6th ed. 193; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 241-271.]

¹ The case to which I allude in the text I have fully reported, not that it may stand for a precedent, but that the peculiarities of the case may be pointed out, and the danger of holding it as a precedent fully explained.

Broughton v Aitchison, 15 Nov. 1809, F. C. On 9th September 1807, Aitchisons, bakers in Edinburgh, bought 8 bolls of wheat from Crow & Wood in Leith, and had it delivered. Being pleased with the quality, they on 17th September entered into a bargain by letter for 90 bolls more at the same price, the original quantity being included in the contract: 'We hereby offer you 98 bolls Virginia wheat, at 40s. per boll, to be settled one-half in cash, and the other by bill at three months.' This was accepted by a counter letter. The bill was granted, and part of the cash paid; the rest offered when the question arose. The wheat was part of a cargo which lay in a loft hired by Crow & Wood, and under the care of Aitken, their own servant. At the time of the bargain, the greater part of this cargo had been sold to different persons, but a considerable quantity (161 bolls) still lay in the loft; and it appears that Crow & Wood intended to sell to Aitchisons all of this quantity that remained unsold. The buyer was to take the wheat when convenient for him, and he received an order to enable him to do so, addressed to the servant who had the care of the loft: 'Deliver to J. & A. Aitchisons, Edinburgh, 90 bolls Virginia wheat, from Cathie's high loft.' The other buyers gradually received deliveries to the amount of 62 bolls, after the bargain with Aitchisons; and at last Crow & Wood called their creditors together. At this time there lay 99½ bolls in the loft, 90 of which were sold to Aitchisons, the rest belonged to the vendors. The day after the creditors were called together, Aitchisons applied for their wheat, which was refused, on the ground that the bankrupts could do nothing to alter the condition of their creditors. An application was then made to the sheriff, and he granted warrant for delivery of the wheat. The question came into the Court of Session by bill of suspension for the factor under the sequestration. The Lord Ordinary held, 'That neither the order of delivery by Crow & Wood to Aitchisons, nor that obtained from the sheriff, could be held equivalent to actual delivery and possession of a quantity of wheat remaining in the warehouse at the time of the bankruptcy, so as to operate as a transfer of the property, or prevent its passing to the interim factor as part of the sequestered estate.' In the First Division of the Inner House there was much difference of opinion; but by two judgments, the determination of the Lord Ordinary was reversed, and it was found, 'That the property of the wheat in question was legally vested in the vendees.'

This judgment is not to be held as a precedent; for not only was there much division of opinion on the bench, but some of the judges proceeded on a misapprehension of the facts. Thus, 1. It was held that the 8 bolls first purchased were part of the original bargain, and that actual delivery of a part was delivery of the whole. 2. That the subject sold was, in truth, a specific subject, not part of a mass; for at the bankruptcy all the grain had been taken away but this, the small remnant not being entitled to consideration, being only the 90th part of the whole. 3. The most important mistake, in fact, was, that Aitken was a mandatory, not the servant of Crow & Wood, but one who could, and did, act as the servant of the buyer after the purchase.

The opinion of the majority of the judges, so far as it touched the abstract point, seemed to be, that the necessity of their trade required bakers to have a power of continuing their grain in the loft where it was purchased, and taking delivery gradually, and that an order like the one in this case was all the delivery that the case allowed: that where the price is paid, part delivered, and an order given for the rest, the transfer is completed: that this being, in truth, the sale of a specific subject, the payment of the price, with an order to deliver, transfers the property: that insolvency of the seller could not stop delivery legally required; and here delivery was required before bankruptcy; nay, a warrant of the sheriff was granted, which must be held equivalent to delivery.

The opinion of Lord President Blair was extremely strong against the judgment. He began with stating this as a case of infinite consequence to the law. He held that this was a concluded bargain on the 17th September, when the sellers were in good credit; and that, in consequence of it, the respondents had a good title to sue for implement by delivery.

[181] It cannot be said that there is any judgment fixing the law, that either marking goods¹ or the payment of warehouse rent has in Scotland the effect of delivery, where the goods are with the seller. In one case the measuring out of grain, and setting it apart, when that was done by the seller, was not held final delivery.² It may well admit of a different construction where the same thing takes place respecting goods in the hands of a third party.³ See below, p. 195.

Such a right, however, is merely personal—a jus ad rem: it ranks among personal creditors, some of whom claim money, others wheat, there being no difference among obligations from the subject of them. Aitchisons here claim as being proprietors, and holding antecedent to the bankruptcy a jus in re. The question is, whether, at the date of the proclaimed insolvency, when the creditors were called together, the property was transferred? After that, the bankrupts could do no effectual act. If they had paid a debt, the trustee might have had restitution; if they had delivered wheat, it might have been reclaimed for the creditors.

The payment of the price is to be laid out of the question; for nothing is better fixed than that payment of the price has no effect whatever on the transfer of the property. Yet this has in some degree been allowed to enter into consideration. Suppose that the buyers had failed without paying the price, would the wheat in Crow & Wood's possession have belonged to the buyer's creditors as part of their sequestrated estate? On principle, there can be no doubt that if the property is transferred in the one case, so must it be in the other. The completion of the contract of sale and payment of the price have no effect at all in transferring without delivery: sasine in land, actual possession in moveables, are absolutely indispensable.

Then what possession was held by the sellers before their bankruptcy? This grain was not under deposit; it was in their own hands—in the hands of their own servant. The possession was the same which a merchant has of goods in his shop, or a gentleman of his furniture; not civil, but actual possession. To transfer the property, the titulus transferendi must have been accompanied with the same possession which the seller had. But here there was no delivery, even in appearance, made of the grain. An order was given, it is said, and it was intimated to Aitken: suppose this intimation proved, is this delivery of moveables? No. There must be something ostensible; something to pass to the vendee the same possession which the vendor had. As to constructive delivery, this is not a case for it. Where goods are in the hands of a third party, an order and intimation places the buyer in the seller's situation: so of goods at sea; goods in a bond-cellar. But here, no necessity, no civil possession by a third party. The buyer might have got delivery; the order entitled him at any time to do this, but he did not. He trusted to the bankrupts; so did the other creditors: and how should he be in a better situation than they? How justify a sale and transference retenta possessione, which is reprobated by law?

Practice, and the necessity of trade, have been founded on. It may be common for the buyer, if he trusts the seller, to leave the goods in his hand; and this is convenient. But does it therefore follow that the real right goes with the buyer? Such a doctrine would outrage that most valuable rule, which makes property and possession in moveables go together; it would subvert all the common principles of mercantile dealing. If I buy, and don't choose to trust to the seller, I pay and carry off my purchase, and trust only to the goods. But shall I, having done so, be exposed to the claim of a former buyer, who has bought, and got the anomalous kind of transfer founded on in this case? It would be found that the new rules adopted in order to simplify, would only confound and lay embargo on traffic in moveables. Transfer the argument to pledge: If this kind of delivery is sufficient to transfer property, so must it be to constitute pledge; and a debtor wishing to give a pledge, does it by an order on his own servant! Is this law? These doctrines are most dangerous, and contrary to the fundamental principles of the law of Scotland; and will, if admitted, destroy at length all security and uniformity in the law of transference.

If the application to the sheriff had been made before the declared insolvency, an order would have procured delivery; and, if disobeyed, would have been equivalent to delivery. But on the 30th September the insolvency was proclaimed, and the property fixed in the creditors as at that time. See a report of this case, 15 Fac. Coll. 411.

¹ [As to marking, see Pothier, Vente, No. 315.]

² Salter bought sixty bolls of malt from Knox & Co., to be delivered afterwards. He paid the price, being about £67. About two months afterwards, Knox & Co. gave notice to Salter that they had measured out and set apart for him the stipulated quantity. A few days afterwards, Knox & Co. having failed, the factor on their sequestrated estate took into his possession the whole malt found in their warehouses. Salter applied to the Court of Session for a warrant to have the sixty bolls delivered up to him. But the judges were unanimous in rejecting his claim. It was observed by one of the judges, 'That a purchaser had indeed an equitable claim to the goods of which he had paid the price; but however equity may afford relief, by undoing what had been illegally done, it cannot, in a question with third parties, supply the want of those things which, though required by the law, have been left undone.' Salter v Knox's Factor, 1786, M. 14202.

³ [In a case that occurred before the passing of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, an act of delivery was held sufficient, although the goods still remained in the premises of the seller. A pipe of port wine had been bought and paid for, was bottled off for the buyer, and placed in a binn appropriated to his use, and so marked in the binn-book. The question arose on the bankruptcy of the wine merchant, and the delivery was held complete, so as to pass the property to the buyer. Gibson v Forbes, 1833, 11 S. 916. (See to the same effect, Lang v Bruce, 1832, 10 S. 777; Henry v Dunlop, 1842, 5 D. 3.)

Both Gibson v Forbes and Lang v Bruce must be read subject to the law laid down in the later cases of Matheson v Allison, 1854, 17 D. 274, and Boak v Megget, 1844, 6 D. 662. They are both doubted by Ross, L. C. Comm. Law, vol. ii. p. 567.]

20. It is not a possession equivalent to delivery, where, goods being in a warehouse, or grain in a granary, the buyer or his servant receives the key to sift the grain or air the goods, the key being returned to the sellers.¹

21. It does not seem to be sufficient to answer the purpose of delivery, that samples have been taken while the commodity remains with the seller. Samples are useful [182] in affording evidence of a completed contract, and a test of comparison should any question arise concerning the quality or identity of the article sold.² But as a badge of delivery, or as supplying the place either of actual or constructive tradition, the taking of samples has no effect.³

22. Delivery to a person in order to have some operations of art performed on goods sold, is not delivery to the vendee, where the workman is employed by the vendor; as, where a goldsmith sold plate, on which the purchaser wished to have his arms engraved, and the goldsmith sent for an engraver, to whom he gave directions to engrave the arms, and bring the plate to the workman for payment, the goldsmith was found entitled to stop as in transitu.⁴ But, on the other hand, there seems to be little doubt, that if one buy goods, and order them to be delivered for manufacture to his own engraver or bleacher, who, on finishing the operations of his art on them, is to bring them to the vendee as his paymaster, the delivery will be held as complete.⁵

23. Where the contract of sale is complicated with locatio operarum, it does not seem to be settled whether mere delivery of the materials be sufficient to transfer. If, intending to build a house, I purchase the materials, and employ a mason and a carpenter to construct and fashion them to my wish, the materials, the stone, the lime, and the wood, when brought upon my premises, are actually delivered to me, independently of the operations of the builder and the carpenter. There are here two contracts distinct—a contract of sale, and a contract of locatio operarum—which may be completed independently of each other. But if I contract with a builder, and he procure the materials, are those materials, when laid down on my ground or deposited in my sheds, actually delivered, although that final act, which was to close the workman's undertaking, and to complete the transfer of the particular materials, is unperformed? In the more complex machines, it is necessary not only to have the wheels, etc., properly prepared and nicely fitted, but to have a person of skill to erect them in the place where the engine is to be used. Watt and Boulton, for example, when they receive an order for a steam-engine, not only send the various parts of the engine, but send persons along with it properly qualified to place the work. In the same way, where a machine is to be improved, or, having received injury, any of the wheels are to be taken off and others substituted, the engineer does not hold his order as completed merely by sending the necessary wheels, but he sends a workman to put them up. On the other hand, it often happens that, in large manufactories, engineers are kept by the manufacturer for the purpose of attending to the machinery; in which case, the person who furnishes the

¹ Dudgeon & Brodie v More, 3 July 1801, n. r., where the above circumstances were held insufficient to pass the property.

² With a view to which, the samples should be sealed at making the bargain. Cheap, 1713, M. 14238.

³ In this case, Hill v Buchanan, 1785, M. 14200, samples were delivered; but although this kind of delivery was aided by other circumstances, the Court refused to hold the property as transferred; and this judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords. The case was, that Buchanan, having imported a cargo of tobacco, offered for sale to Messrs. Wilson & Brown thirty hogsheads, 'to be delivered to you, or order, at Greenock, as it lies in the king's cellars, and at the weight it passed at the king's scales,' etc. Wilson & Brown accepted of the offer, and samples were delivered. Eight of the twenty hogsheads were actually delivered to the order of the purchasers, and put on board a vessel; but they becoming bankrupt next day, gave up the bill of lading to the vendees, who got it cancelled by the shipmaster, and a new one granted to themselves. On account of some irregularity in the shipping of the hogsheads, they were relanded and lodged again with the rest, by order of the custom-house officers. The trustee under the sequestration claimed the property of the whole, as transferred to Wilson & Brown. But the Court decided in favour of Buchanan, the vendor. Affirmed in the House of Lords, 11 April 1786, 3 Pat. 47. [Jowitt v Stead, 1860, 22 D. 1400.]

⁴ Owenson v Morse, 7 Term. Rep. 64.

⁵ [See Eadie v Mackinlay, 7 Feb. 1815, F. C.; a special case.]

wheels, etc., is not required to send a person to place them. In cases of this kind, the determination may often be difficult; but probably a distinction would be made between vendition when simple, and when complicated with the contract of locatio operarum. Wherever the contract is fairly resolvable into simple vendition, the possession of the thing ordered, the delivery of it upon the premises of the vendee, seems to be sufficient as an absolute and perfect transference. Where, again, it is resolvable into a contract for performing a particular act or piece of labour, of which the articles sent are merely the materials, the act of delivery seems not to be complete till the work be performed.¹

ART. II.—TRANFERENCE OF GOODS IN THE CUSTODY OF ANOTHER FOR THE SELLER.

This division of the subject includes several important cases, the decision of which depends on this principle, that whatever changes the custody, and makes him who originally held for the seller continue his possession for the buyer, alters the property as effectually as it could be altered by actual delivery.

I.—GOODS IN THE HANDS OF WHARFINGERS, WAREHOUSE-KEEPERS, AND AGENTS.

1. Where goods are lying in the hands of a warehouseman or wharfinger at the time of the sale, the transfer of them in the wharfinger's book to the name of the buyer, by order of the seller, completes the delivery, making the wharfinger thenceforward the custodier for the buyer.²

[184] 2. But it is not indispensable that there should be a transfer in the books. It is the notice to the custodier that operates as a transfer of the property.³ In the law of Scotland

¹ [See note, p. 198.]

² Main v Maxwell, 1710, M. 9124.

Harman v Anderson, 1809, 2 Campb. 243.

Withers v Lyss, 1815. Here Lyss & Co. sold rosin lying in their warehouse, and received payment. Withers & Co., the buyers, desired it might for some time continue there in this manner. They then sold to Bromer, by a broker, and sale-notes exchanged, and a delivery order was given addressed to Lyss & Co.: 'Please weigh and deliver to Mr. D. Bromer, our rosin in matts, about 30 tons, more or less.' This order was lodged with Lyss & Co., but no one came to have the rosin weighed. Bromer stopped; and the question was between Withers & Co. stopping the goods, and the assignees for the creditors of Bromer. Verdict went for the former, on the sole ground that the weighing, which was necessary to ascertain the price, was not done; and Lord Chief Justice Gibbs said, that 'if nothing had remained to be done to ascertain the price, a delivery order lodged with the warehouseman is a sufficient transfer of the possession.' 4 Campb. 237. See below, p. 196. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 171. Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 511.]

³ [It appears certain that a transfer in the books of the custodier is not necessary (Lord Ellenborough in Harman v Anderson, 2 Campb. 243; Blackburn on Sale, 234); but it is decided in England that mere notice to the custodier is not effectual to change the custody without the custodier's assent, express or implied, to his becoming holder or bailee for the purchaser. Nor is it so without an intent in the mind of the purchaser that the custodier shall become an agent to hold possession for him, even though the custodier should consider himself as agent to hold possession for the purchaser. In order to operate a change of possession there must concur the authority of the seller, the assent of the custodier, and the acceptance of the buyer: the transfer of possession takes place only when the vendor, the purchaser, and the custodier agree together that the latter shall cease to hold the goods for the vendor, and shall become the agent of the buyer in retaining custody of the goods for him. A non repugnantia on the part of the custodier when the notice is given will imply his assent (Blackburn on Sale, pp. 234 and 236); but his refusal or dissent, even though wrongful, will prevent the constructive possession held through him by the vendor from becoming the constructive possession of the vendee. Bentall v Burn, 3 B. and Cr. 423 S. C., 5 Dowl. and Ryl. 284; Jackson v Nichol, 5 Bing. N. C. 508; Lackington v Atherton, 8 Scott. N. S. 38, 7 Mann. and Gr. 360; Bill v Bament, 9 M. and W. 36; Lucas v Dorrien, 7 Taunt. 278; Woodley v Coventry, 32 L. J. Ex. 185; Harman v Anderson, 2 Campb. 243. In Bentall v Burn an attempt was made to distinguish the case of a public dock company holding a Treasury certificate, and so under obligation to receive goods into their warehouses and transfer them from seller to buyer, from the case of a common warehouseman; but the Court said, that though the dock company might be bound by law when required to hold the goods on account of the vendee, and though they might render themselves liable to an action for refusing to do so, still, if they did wrongfully refuse, the original possession of the vendor would remain unchanged. In Jackson v Nichol, and in Lackington v Atherton, the vendee repeatedly demanded the goods from the holder before any stoppage in transitu; but it was held that, on account of the want of assent on his part to hold them for the purchaser, the vendor's possession was not determined. See also Farina v Home, 16 M. and W. 119. In James v Griffin, again (2 M. and W. 623), the bankrupt purchaser had often used Beale's

a transfer of the custody has always been held as effectual delivery to the buyer.¹ On the same principle, Lord Ellenborough delivered the law in the sequel of the case of Harman, already referred to.² The change of custody may be proved in many ways; as by a transfer in the book, acceptance of the order by the custodier,³ the testimony of clerks or of the wharf as his warehouse for lead; but being insolvent, he did not wish to accept a cargo of lead, purchased but not paid for by him, which had come to the wharf, and which, in order merely to set the ship free, he told the captain to land on the wharf. He intended this not to be a delivery to himself; but he did not communicate his intention to the wharfingers, who considered themselves as agents to hold possession for him. The majority of the judges (Parke, Bolland, and Alderson, B.B.) held that, except as a test of its reality, it did not matter whether he communicated the intention or not, and that though the holders of the goods meant to hold them for the buyer, that did not render their possession the constructive possession of the buyer, because the buyer's assent was wanting. See also Salte v Field, 5 T. R. 211, as explained by Lord Kenyon in Barnes v Freeland, 6 T. R. 86, and Brown on Sale, pp. 556, 564,—a case in which the reception of goods by a person who intended to receive them for the buyer was rendered ineffectual as a constructive possession by the buyer, on account of the buyer's uncommunicated intent to reject the goods formed before they reached the agent's hands. It is, however, necessary to distinguish the case where a third party holds the goods as bailee of the vendor, from that in which they are merely lying at a free wharf, or on the ground of a third person not the bailee of the vendor. In the latter case no assent by this third person is required to change the possession, which will be effected by the goods being put at the disposal of the vendee. Tansley v Turner, 2 Bingh. N. C. 151; Cooper v Bill, 34 L. J. Ex. 161. In Scotland it appears to have been assumed, though never expressly decided, nor perhaps questioned, that mere intimation of the vendor's order is sufficient to operate a change of the constructive possession of goods in the hands of a custodier. Probably this arose from confounding a delivery order with an assignation, or from the analogy of the effect of a presented but dishonoured draft, in transferring to the holder the right to the drawer's funds in the hands of the drawee. Some countenance to the idea that a delivery order is an assignation of the vendor's personal rights, or a document of title to the subjects, is given by the opinions of the judges of the First Division in Pochin v Robinow & Marjoribanks, 1869, 7 Macph. 622; and by Hamilton v Western Bank, 1856, 19 D. 152. But see contra, Arbuthnot v Paterson or Bisset's Crs., 1798, M. 14220; and M'Ewan v Smith, per Lord Cottenham, C., and Lord Campbell (6 S. Bell, 340, 352), and the observations of Mr. Brodie, App. to Stair, p. 874, note. The question as to the nature of a delivery order by the law of Scotland involves that of the seller's right to countermand it, as well as the question whether, besides intimation, it requires the custodier's assent to make it operate a change of possession. In England such a note is certainly not a document of title, but a mere means of possession. (See Ackermann v Humphrey, 1 C. and P. 53; Jenkyns v Osborne, 7 M. and Gr. 699; Griffiths v Perry, 28 L. J. Q. B. 204; Farina v Home, 16 M. and W. 119; Blackburn on Sale, pp. 273-4, and p. 297; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 612-615, 623.) Apart from any doubt there may be as to whether such an order is by the law of Scotland an assignation or document of title (not a mere executive document, deriving whatever effect it has from some previous transaction between the grantor and grantee lying behind it), there appears to be no legal ground for holding that mere notice or intimation to a non-assenting custodier should operate a change of constructive possession from vendor to vendee, any more than it does in England. See Blackburn on Sale, pp. 248-250; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 127-9, 503, 575, and 602; Brodie, App. Stair, 873-4, note. See also Von Savigny on Possession, book ii. sec. 28.]

¹ In the case of Hall & Co. v Auld, 12 June 1811, F. C. (to be afterwards detailed), the doctrine of a change of custody by notice to the custodier, being equivalent to actual delivery, was stated by Lord President Blair as the undoubted law of Scotland, and fully acquiesced in by the Court.

² In Harman's case (supra, p. 194, note 2), the Attorney-General, arguing on the direction given to the jury, moved to reduce the damages, on the ground that, as to one parcel of the butter, no transfer had been made in the defendant's books. The fact was, that, as to this parcel, the delivery note was sent to the wharfinger; but he neither made any transfer in his books, nor did anything to testify that he accepted the delivery note, or held the goods on the buyer's account. Lord Ellenborough said: 'After the note was delivered to the wharfinger, he was bound to hold the goods on account of the purchaser. The delivery note was sufficient, without any actual transfer being made in the books: from thenceforth they became the agents of Dudley, the bankrupt. They themselves might have a lien on the goods, and be justified in detaining them till that was satisfied; but, as between vendor and the vendee, the delivery was complete, and the right to stop in transitu was gone.' The other judges concurred. 2 Campb. 245.

Stonard v Dunkin, 1809, 2 Campb. 344.

³ Hawes v Watson, 1824, 2 Barn. and Cress. 540. A quantity of tallow lying on wharf, sold with an order to the wharfinger. The vendor sold to another, and the wharfinger gave to that other a written acknowledgment that he had transferred the tallow to his account. On the original buyer's bankruptcy, the Court of King's Bench held the tallow to be with the wharfingers, as agents of the last purchaser.

On this view of the law, doubts may be entertained of one part of the decision of the Court of Session in the case of V. Arbuthnot v Paterson, 1798, M. 14220.

By the leases of the estate of Arbuthnot, Fordoun, and others, the tenants were bound to deliver annually certain quantities of oats and barley to the Viscount. In 1796 his Lordship wished to raise money by a sale of the grain then due to him, and Messrs. Bisset & Sons purchased the whole, and granted bills for the price, being £1141. Upon which Lord Arbuthnot's factor issued precepts or orders to the tenants to deliver the grain to Messrs. Bisset & Sons; and the tenants in some cases bound themselves in writing, at the foot of the orders, to deliver; in others, they refused to do so. Upon the bankruptcy of Bisset & Sons, without paying their bills, a competition arose between Lord Arbuthnot and the custodier, the post-mark of a letter transmitting the order, or proof of the presentment of the order, or notice to the custodier.¹

3. Acts of ownership done by the buyer, with the seller's authority, upon goods in the custody of a warehouseman or other custodier, will be available to pass the property, on this principle, that such acts of ownership effectually give notice of the transference, and change the custody.² We have already seen³ that, in England, the payment of warehouse rent, or the marking of goods by or for the buyer, have been held to pass the property, even where the goods were in the seller's own custody. That, on strict principle, seems to be doubtful as law in Scotland; but the same acts have been admitted to this effect, the goods [185] being in the hands of a custodier;⁴ and the cases, though English, are good precedents in Scotland.

trustee for the creditors. The Court found, that 'the factor for the creditors has right to the price of the parcel of grain which was under accepted precepts by the tenants, but that Lord Arbuthnot has a right to the price of the parcel of grain which was in the hands of the tenants who did not accept the precepts upon them.

[As to Arbuthnot's case, note, 1st, that this was not the final judgment, but was recalled by an 'almost unanimous interlocutor,' adhered to on representation; and, 2d, that the grain in the hands of the tenants was unspecified—nay, probably, from the dates, even unthrashed. The tenants were not custodiers for Lord Arbuthnot, but debtors under obligation to deliver a quantity of grain in genere, which would only become specific by their selecting for delivery a certain part out of the entire quantity in their possession; and even then this part would be, and till delivery of it, remain, the undivested property of the tenants, and not of Lord Arbuthnot. Till delivery, their possession was their own, not his Lordship's through them. Neither the intimation nor acceptance of the precepts, therefore, could transfer any constructive possession of, or any property in, this grain from Lord Arbuthnot to the buyer. It was properly argued as a question whether the precepts or delivery orders operated as assignments carrying the tenant's personal obligation to deliver grain to Lord Arbuthnot from him to the buyer, and it was held they did not. (See Brodie's observations on the case, Stair, App. 874, note.) The case of Hawes v Watson is also misunderstood, and so misled the minority in M'Ewan v Smith in the Court of Session. The case turned not on change of constructive possession as between vendor and vendee, but on the principle of estoppel barring the custodier, who had attorned to the buyer, from denying, in the face of his own acknowledgment, that he held the specific goods as the vendee's property. (See it explained in Blackb. p. 164; Brodie, St. App. 878. Woodley v Coventry, 32 L. J. Ex. 185.)]

¹ In Bloxam v Morley, 1825, it was taken for granted by Bayley, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, that notice to one in whose warehouse the seller had his goods deposited, would have made a perfect transfer to the buyer. 4 Barn. and Cress. 952, foot of page.

See also Knowles v Horsfall, Barn. and Cress. 134 et seq. [Observe that, in order to transfer the property, the notice must be given to the warehouse-keeper or actual custodier: it is not enough that it is given to the seller's importing agent if he is not the custodier. M'Ewan v Smith, 9 D. 434, aff. 6 Bell 340; Melrose v Hastie, 1850, 12 D. 665; and see Whitehead v Anderson, 9 M. and W. 518.]

² [Such acts must, however, denote unequivocally the change of constructive possession. In Dixon v Yates (5 B. and Ad. 313) the buyer's cooper marked the casks with the buyer's initials in the warehouseman's premises; but the seller's possession was held undivested thereby, for marking is an equivocal act, and may be merely for the purpose of identifying the goods. Smith v Allan & Poynter, 1859, 22 D. 208. Compare Pothier, Vente, No. 315.

Where the custodier is sequestered, the notice should be given to his trustee. Eadie v Mackinlay, 7 Feb. 1815, F. C.; 2 Ross L. C. Comm. Law, 568. It was stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Meadowbank that verbal notice to the custodier would have been sufficient. The letter of the buyers claimed delivery of the hides as being tanned for them, and offered to pay the charges, but did not mention that they had been sold to them by the person for whom the custodier held them. Lord Meadowbank intimated, that if the custodier knew the fact of the sale, that would have been sufficient to transfer the property to the buyers, so as to exclude the seller's creditors. It does not seem material whether the authority, from the vendor to the vendee, to take possession, actual or constructive, be merely implied from the contract of sale vesting the right of possession in the purchaser, or be given expressly; and it probably does not affect this right whether the authority be in writing or not, though by recent statutes the effect of at least one species of written delivery order in the hands of a factor or agent is considerably enlarged. See Dixon v Yates, 5 B. and Ad. 313, and Mr. Justice Blackburn's comments on it (Sale, pp. 231-3). So the custodier's assent need not be formally expressed by recorded transfer, but is as effectually expressed by word of mouth, or by silence under circumstances which make silence indicative of assent (p. 234).]

³ Above, pp. 189, 190.

⁴ Wright v Lawes, 4 Espinasse 82, where wine was delivered to an agent of the buyer at Yarmouth, and the buyer being at Norwich, came to Yarmouth, tasted, and took samples of the wine. It was ruled by Lord Kenyon that the transit was completed.

In a late case, Lord Ellenborough said: 'The change of mark from A to B, on bales of goods in a warehouse, by the direction of the parties, was clearly held by the House of Lords, in a late case, to operate as an actual delivery of the goods, and this after three days' argument at their bar; though I own it appeared to me that the case only required to be stated in order to be disposed of at once.' Dict. in Stovell v Hughes, 14 East 312. ['The payment of rent in these cases

4. Where goods already in the hands of a manufacturer are sold, and notice of sale given, with an order of delivery addressed to the manufacturer, he will be held, like any other custodier, as the servant of the vendee, to hold the goods for the buyer.¹

5. But where anything remains to be done by the sellers in the way of ascertaining the price or quantity of the commodity sold, or in order to put it in a deliverable state, the transfer is not completed by a delivery note given to the buyer, addressed to the keeper of the goods, with notice to the custodier, or even by a transfer in the custodier's books. Till the commodity is weighed, or till the other act, whatever it may be, shall be performed, which remains to be done in order to put the commodity in a deliverable state, the property is untransferred.² This was settled in England, first, in the case of a sale of starch, where the amount of the price was to depend upon the weight.³ Next, it was settled that the delivery by a note intimated to the wharfinger was not completed in a sale of oil, where the price and quantity were both ascertained, but an operation customary in such sales remained unperformed: viz., that the seller's cooper should search the casks, and a broker ascertain the foot-dirt and water in each, for which allowance is made, and then that the casks should be filled up.⁴ A distinction was made by Lord Ellenborough between that case and another, where a person having sold 10 tuns of oil out of 40 contained in a cistern, afterwards accepted a delivery note from the buyer in favour of a third party.⁵ In this last case he held that the goods were in a deliverable state, and nothing remained to be done is a circumstance to show on whose account the goods are held.' Lord Ellenborough in Harman v Anderson, 2 Campb. 243. So, in Hammond v Anderson (1 N. R. 69), the weighing of goods merely for the buyer's own satisfaction, and which formed no ingredient in the contract, was held a very important circumstance as an unequivocal act of possession and ownership on the part of the buyer (per Lord Ellenborough in Hanson v Meyer, 6 East 614.).

¹ [If the goods exist in the specific form under which they are sold. Where they have not at the sale received that form, the intimation of a delivery order will pass no property till they do receive that specificatio which is necessary to make them that which is sold. See Black v Incorporation of Bakers and Rowan, 1867, 6 Macph. 136. Wheat being sent to mill to be ground into flour, bran, and thirds, the owner sold the bran and thirds to be produced (retaining the flour for himself), and gave buyer delivery order on miller for them. At the date when this order was intimated, the bran and thirds had no separate existence, the wheat being still unground; but before the buyer's bankruptcy, which occurred subsequently, the whole products of the wheat had been separated, and the bran and thirds existed in formâ specificâ. The seller then countermanded delivery. But the Court held that the bran and thirds, as they came into existence in specific shape in the process of grinding the wheat, became the property of the buyer, under the operation of the intimated delivery order; that it made no difference that the buyer had anticipated the actual production of the subject which he had bought, by intimating the order before specificatio commenced; that no right of property in the unground wheat vested thereby, and that if the buyer had failed without paying the price before the actual production of the subject of sale from the wheat, the seller, as undivested owner of the wheat, could have retained the wheat and countermanded the grinding, or specificatio, which was contemplated by the contract to take place. But that the delivery order took effect in operating constructive delivery as soon as the subjects of sale were produced, and as they had been produced in specific shape before the countermand, the seller was held too late to stop the transference of the property in them. In England it is also decided that the custodier may give assent to hold the goods for the buyer, or attorn to him in advance, and this will be effectual when the order is presented (Benjamin, Sale, pp. 503, 615, and cases.).]

² [See note, next page.]

³ Hanson v Meyer, 1805. Wallace & Hawes employed Wright, a broker, to buy starch from Meyer. It lay at the Bull Porters, Seething Lane. Wright bought it at £6 per cwt., and exchanged the bought and sold note. He bought all Meyer's starch lying there, more or less, at the above rate; and the mode of delivery usual was followed: viz., the seller gave a note to the warehouse keeper 'to weigh and deliver to Wallace & Hawes all my starch.' This order was lodged, and delivery of part was required. Part was accordingly weighed and taken away; the rest remained unweighed, and at the buyers' charge, at the Bull Porters, till the buyers failed. The seller got the remainder of the goods. Action trover by assignees of the buyers. Verdict for Meyer the seller, under the direction of Lord Ellenborough. The Court of King's Bench held the weighing to be precisely necessary to alter the property, as being necessary to ascertain the price to be paid; and therefore judgment went for the defendant, Meyer the seller. 6 East 614. See above, p. 194, Withers v Lyss. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 177-9; Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 488.]

⁴ Wallace v Breeds, 1811, 13 East 522. [In the case of Hansen v Craig & Rose, 1859, 21 D. 432, this operation was held not to be so necessary to the ascertainment of the subject, as to prevent the risk being transferred to the purchaser, where the goods were in the seller's hands. It may therefore be doubted whether, in the case of goods in neutral custody, the operation would now be held necessary to the completion of delivery. See Lord Ardmillan's opinion in Black v Rowan, 6 Macph. 136.]

⁵ See below, p. 198, note 3, Whitehouse v Frost.

by the seller in order to complete the sale as between him and the buyer; whereas in the [186] former much remained to be done before the custody as for the buyer was complete. In a sale of 10 out of 18 tons of flax in the possession of a wharfinger, the rule was confirmed, that something remaining to be done on the part of the seller to put the flax into a deliverable state, the transfer is not completed by an order to deliver intimated to the wharfinger while those acts are not performed.¹

In a case in Common Pleas, Lord Chief Justice Gibbs said: 'The principle upon which both Courts of King's Bench and of Common Pleas have decided is this, That the order sent by the vendor to the wharfinger to deliver the goods is sufficient to pass the property to the vendee, provided nothing remains to be done to ascertain the price, but to make the delivery. If it be necessary by the terms of the contract, or by the order to the wharfinger, that anything should be done previous to the delivery, the transfer is not complete till that thing be done.'²

6. If everything on the part of the seller be done which is necessary before delivery, then, although the order for delivery applies only to a part of a larger quantity under the care of the wharfinger or agent, the transfer of the custody will be completed as to that part. Thus, in England, an order of delivery of 10 tuns of oil, part of 40 tuns contained in a cistern, under the care of a third person, was held to make a complete transfer, on being accepted by the custodian.³

Where goods are lodged in the warehouse of a general commission agent, to be disposed of for the benefit of the owner, the dealings are generally made in the name of the agent, and the bill taken payable to the owner of the goods. But there seems to be no reason to doubt that the principle which regulates the transfer in the cases already mentioned would be held applicable to this case; and that from the moment the sale is completed by delivery of the bill on the one hand, and weighing or marking or approving of the goods on the other, the custody is changed and the transfer completed; so that there shall not thenceforward be any right in the seller to stop the goods as in transitu, more than if a delivery note had been given by the seller, and intimated to the custodian.⁴

¹ Busk v Davies, 1814, 2 Maule and Selwyn 397. See also Austen v Craven, 4 Taunt. 644; Shepley v Davies, 5 Taunt. 617.

² Withers v Lyss, 1815, 1 Holt's Rep. N. P. 18, and 4 Campb. 239. See above, p. 194, note 2. [In order that a transfer of goods in the hands of a custodian may have the effect of delivery to the buyer, it is essential that the custodian be an independent party, and not an employee or agent of the seller of the goods. Anderson v M'Call, 1866, 4 Macph. 765.]

³ Whitehouse v Frost. Dutton & Bancroft were proprietors of 46 tuns of oil lying in one of the cisterns of the oil-house at Liverpool, and they held the key of this cistern. They sold 10 tuns of it to J. & L. Frost, and received the price. The Frosts afterwards sold these 10 tuns to Townsend, who gave his acceptance for the price, and got from the Frosts, along with the bill of parcels, an order of delivery, addressed to Dutton & Bancroft. This order was taken to them by Townsend, and they on the face of it wrote, '1809. Accepted, 14th February, Dutton & Bancroft.' Townsend was made a bankrupt, and his assignees made a demand against Dutton & Bancroft for the 10 tuns of oil, which still remained commingled with the rest. The action was trover by the assignees against Frosts and Dutton & Bancroft, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court. Lord Ellenborough held, that 'from the moment of acceptance of the order, Dutton & Bancroft became bailees of Townsend, the vendee: the goods had arrived at their journey's end, and were not in transitu. All the right, then, of the sellers was gone by the transfer, and they could no longer contradict that delivery to which they had virtually acceded, by means of their order on Dutton & Bancroft, accepted by the latter.' The other judges concurred. 12 East 614.

[If it is meant that there can be any change of constructive possession operated by intimation of a delivery order in an unseparated part of a mass lying in a custodian's hands, this is not law in Scotland. There cannot be so much as a jus ad rem specificam in such circumstances. Even in England the case of Whitehouse v Frost 'is scarcely ever mentioned without suggestion of doubt or disapproval.' Benjamin on Sale, p. 242. See White v Wilks, 5 Taunt. 176; Austen v Craven, 4 Taunt. 644; Campbell v Mersey Dock Co., 14 C. B. N. S. 412; Smith, Merc. Law, 489; Blackburn on Sale, p. 125.]

⁴ [To avoid the misapplication which it rather appears the author has made of the English authorities on this subject, it is especially necessary to observe what the precise question is in any given case. I. It may be: Whether the personal contract of sale in the particular case is such as to indicate an intention in the parties immediately to transfer the general property in specific chattels sold, and with it the risk, to the vendee; or whether it is meant (for it is a pure question of intention) that these shall not pass until the performance of certain things agreed to be first done; which, if that is the

II.—GOODS WAREHOUSED FOR THE DUTIES.—COMMENTARY ON THE WAREHOUSING ACTS.

The Warehousing Acts, which have engaged much of the attention of the Legislature for nearly a century, have for their object some very important points of commercial policy. The duties payable to Government on foreign goods imported, are properly due only upon intention, are dealt with as conditions of the contract suspending its ordinary operation, which is immediately to transfer the property, and the risk as an incident of property, to the vendee. The rules which the English courts have since the time of Lord Ellenborough adopted, in the absence of express statement, to ascertain the intention of the parties, are these: (a) Where the vendor is to do anything to put the goods into deliverable state (i.e. that in which the buyer is bound to accept them), the performance of that thing is, in the absence of contrary indications, taken to be a condition precedent to the property and the risk passing to the vendee. This is a construction adopted out of favour to the vendee, on the ground that the vendor's delay in doing what he is bound to do before he can call on the vendee to accept, ought not to prejudice the vendee, who would be prejudiced by the transfer to him of the property, and therewith the risk of the goods, while the vendor's delay still kept them in his own hands, and so subject to his lien in security of the price. It is presumed, therefore, that the vendor was meant to do these things before he is entitled to the benefit he gets by the property and risk passing. But this presumption does not arise if the things to be done by the vendor are things which might be done after he has put the goods into the state in which he can call on the vendee to accept them; nor does it hold where the acts are to be done by the vendee. (b) Where anything remains to be done to ascertain the price, as by testing, weighing, or measuring goods, where price depends on quantity or quality, the doing of it is presumed to be intended as a condition precedent to the passing of the general property and risk, though the individual goods be ascertained, and they be in deliverable state. This rule is probably just the rule of the civil law regarding that completion of the contract which is necessary to pass the periculum. The law of England does not require a certain sum in moneys numbered to be fixed as the price before the contract be perfect; the civil law does. The existence of this rule in the English law, as a test of the intention to pass the risk (which only passes with the property), is ascribed to its direct and hasty adoption by Lord Ellenborough and his contemporaries from the civil law. (c) Where the buyer is bound by the contract to do anything which is indicated to be meant as a condition, precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property is to depend, it will not pass till the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods are ascertained and deliverable, nay, actually delivered into the buyer's possession.—II. Again, the agreement may be to sell a thing not specific. Here the contract is an executory agreement, and the property and risk cannot pass, because the subject is not ascertained. By appropriation of specific goods to the contract, that which was a mere agreement to sell becomes an actual bargain and sale, and the property and risk thereby pass. It is plain that the preceding questions do not present any analogy to our questions of tradition, as a criterion of the transference of dominium. Some of them may be analogous to the question with us, whether the personal contract is so complete as to transfer the periculum rei venditæ. Those at least under I. (b), supra, may always, and those under II. sometimes, afford apposite illustrations of this question. But from the case of Hansen v Craig & Rose, 1859, 21 D. 532 (see the Lord Justice-Clerk's observations), it appears in the highest degree doubtful whether cases under I. (a), supra, are available to test the passing of risk with us. The return of the risk to the seller, who is in mora to deliver (see Ersk. iii. 3. 7; Stair i. 14. 7, and i. 17. 15; Pothier, Vente, No. 58; Brown, Sale, Nos. 511–515), is by no means the same principle. It appears that the risk and jus ad rem specificam may pass with us in many cases in which, under I. (a), supra, the general property and risk would not pass in England. It is also not quite clear that with us a jus ad rem specificam may not be acquired capable of being converted by intimation of a delivery order on the custodian into a right of property, although there remain things to be done which shall prevent the periculum from passing to the vendee. (Compare the opinions in Hansen v Craig & Rose with the Lord President's opinion in Black, 1867, 6 Macph. 136, quoted infra.) Of course, if with us the personal contract is not so complete as to pass the jus ad rem specificam to the vendee, it is impossible that he can, while matters remain so, acquire any property through the medium of the custodian's possession. But our rules, as to when the personal contract is complete for that purpose, or for the purpose of passing the risk, are not the same as those which in England regulate the transfer of the general property and risk under I. (a), supra; nor as those which prescribe what is necessary to pass the property and risk under II., supra. Great caution is necessary in using such cases, either in reference to questions of risk, or of the acquisition of the jus ad rem specificam, or in questions as to constructive delivery. The cases falling under I. (c) are merely analogous to such cases in our law as Macartney v Macreadie's Crs., 1799, M. App. Sale, No. 1.—III. There is, however, a third question possible in such cases, which does present analogies available to us in questions of the transference of property by a change in the constructive possession held by a custodian. Where goods are in the hands of a custodian, the seller's authority to him to give possession to the vendee may be conditional; and where it is so, the custodian, as the agent of the seller, is not authorized to give possession, nor the purchaser to take it, until the conditions are fulfilled. The personal contract may be complete, and the general property and risk passed, but the contract may contain conditions suspending the buyer's right to claim possession; or the delivery order may contain directions in the nature of such conditions, not in the contract itself. If the conditions in the delivery order are authorized by the contract, they will bind the custodian and the buyer also; and on intimation of the order, though nothing be said by the custodian, he will not be understood to consent to hold the goods for the buyer until the conditions are fulfilled. An express unconditional assent on his part would stop him from denying that the possession was in the purchaser. (Stonard v Dunkin, 2 Camp. 344; Hawes v Watson, 2 B. and C. 540; Gosling v Birnie, 7 Bingh.

the sale of those goods—when the merchant derives his profit from the market. To demand [187] payment of the duties in the very moment of importation, and this, too, payment in cash, not as in the dealings of merchants with each other by bills, in which the time of actual advance is made to answer to that of probable reimbursement, greatly increases the weight of the duties to the merchant, while it diminishes the public revenue, and operates 339; Woodley v Coventry, 32 L. J. Ex. 187; Beddle v Bond, 34 L. J. Q. B. 137; Blackburn on Sale, 161-5.) But it seems that even an actual delivery of possession by him, without fulfilling the conditions, would not affect the vendor (see Bishop v Shillito, 2 B. and Ald. 329, note *), or amount to such a legitimate possession as would, in the language of our law, transfer the dominium. If the English cases presented only the naked question just explained, how far the bailee was authorized to give possession without fulfilment of the conditions of the authority addressed to him, there would be no difficulty in using them as authorities on the question of tradition among ourselves. But where the condition in the order is one expressed or implied in the terms of the contract itself, there generally lies behind the question as to the custodian's authority to give possession, the anterior question whether that condition, as a part of the contract, had not the effect of suspending the usual operation of a bargain and sale, and of preventing the general property from passing, which is the foundation of the buyer's right to the possession. Or the condition in the order may be a necessary consequence of the goods sold being unascertained, as part of a larger mass, or the like; in which case the question may also go back, from the mere point as to the conditional or unconditional authority given to the custodian to give possession, to the anterior question whether an executory agreement transmits any property before the ascertainment of the subject sold, without which the buyer can have no right to possession. If the case turns on these anterior questions, it is hardly of any use to us as an authority on delivery. It is sometimes extremely difficult to perceive on which ground the case is decided. It is only the point as to the custodian's authority that is of importance to us in questions as to tradition. The case of Hanson v Meyer, e.g., stated in the author's note, involves both points. All the starch was sold; but from the circumstances of the case, weighing was required by the contract to ascertain the price, and therefore (supra, I. (b)) the property had not passed, and the vendee had therefore acquired no right to possession. But the order was to 'weigh and deliver'; and according to Mr. Justice Blackburn, the case was decided on the ground that the authority to give possession was conditional only. (Sale, pp. 155, 238.) The doctrine involved in the anterior question was not at that time matured, and Hanson v Meyer did not decide it then, though the case is now quoted as an authority for that doctrine. The judgment was carefully worded, so as to decide no more than that the weighing was made a condition precedent to the purchaser's right to take possession. Wallace v Breeds, Busk v Davies, Austen v Craven, Shepley v Davies, are all cases in which the agreement was for the sale of a chattel not specific; and they therefore involved the point that no general property had passed in any subject, nor any right of possession (supra, II.), as well as the question as to the custodian's authority to deliver being made only conditional on preceding specification of the subject, and this condition unfulfilled. They are, however, all authorities for the proposition, that where the authority given to the custodian is limited by a condition which is to be fulfilled by him before delivery, the fulfilment of the condition will be necessary before there can be an effectual change even of the constructive possession, the custodian's acceptance of the order not operating that change till such fulfilment. In Hanson v Meyer, and the other cases mentioned, the weighing was by the contract to precede the delivery. But in Swanwick v Sothorn, 9 A. and E. 895, where the order contained directions to weigh, the Court held that this was not a condition authorized by the contract—that the warehouseman's entry of the order in his books determined the vendor's rights without the weighing, which, as not being part of the bargain, was not binding on the buyer, who chose to waive it. It seems, therefore, that the condition in the order will not necessarily affect the transfer of possession merely because it is in the order, but that it should be authorized by the contract; and that the vendee's taking the order with such condition will not imply his assent to it, at least that such assent will be revocable. See, as to the subject of this note generally, Blackburn on Sale, pp. 147-157, 160, 167, 171, 237-240; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 221, 241, 607; Story on Sale, Nos. 294-317; Brodie, Stair, App. 872-9.

When the author lays it down in the text as matter of Scotch law, that the transfer is not completed by notice to the custodian, 'where anything remains to be done by the sellers in the way of ascertaining the price or quantity of the commodity sold, or in order to put it in a deliverable state,' he was probably misled by the English rules as to what shall suspend the passing of the risk and the general property of which risk is an incident, into ascribing to the same circumstances an equal influence in preventing the change of constructive possession by an intimated delivery order. It is certainly not precisely necessary that the price or quantity be ascertained before the constructive possession can be changed; nor does it always arrest such change, that some preliminary operation is necessary to put the goods in a state for delivery. Whatever influence these things may have in questions of periculum—whether different or not—the Lord President, in Black v Rowan, etc., 6 Macph. 136, stated that, 'when the subject of sale is in the hands of an independent third party, and a delivery order by the seller in favour of the buyer has been duly intimated to the custodian by the buyer, constructive delivery will take place, whatever may be the precise condition of the goods, even though the quantity be unascertained, provided the mass be sold; even though the price be unascertained, provided it be at a rate which afterwards can be certainly fixed by ascertainment of the quantity;—even though the goods be lying in such a state that some preliminary operation is necessary to put them in a state for delivery. Such circumstances can have no legitimate effect where the actual possession of the third party custodian is—by means of an intimated delivery order—converted from a possession for the seller into a possession for the buyer; for then the custodian is no more at liberty to redeliver to the seller or his order, than before the intimation of the delivery order he would have been at

as a restraint on importation. The object of the warehousing system is at once to relieve the trader from the pressure of this advance; to free him from the risk of the perishing of the goods before they are sold; to encourage importation even of goods prohibited to be sold or used here, to the effect of making this country a great emporium of trade, filling our warehouses with goods, to be kept safely there till a market at home or abroad shall open; and to facilitate the operations of commerce in relation to goods thus warehoused for use and sale in this country, by having them exposed to sale in the warehouse, without requiring payment till they are taken out for consumption.

This system was first¹ recommended to adoption by Dean Tucker, in his discourse on trade; afterwards proposed to Parliament by Sir Robert Walpole, but without effect; then revived and recommended by Mr. Pitt, and at last digested in a practicable shape under the administration of Mr. Addington. Successive Acts have been passed for improving this system; and in the year 1823 an Act was passed, in the nature of a consolidating Act, 'for making more effectual provision for permitting goods imported to be secured in warehouses or other places, without payment of duty on the first entry thereof;' and the subsisting Act, which has come in place of it, is entitled³ 'An Act for the warehousing of goods,' and comprehends, with the relative Acts concerning the customs, the whole system as now in operation. Of this Act it may be proper to give a short analysis, before resuming the inquiry into the transference of delivery of goods thus warehoused.

I.—PROVISIONS OF THE WAREHOUSING ACT.

The whole laws relating to the customs were lately repealed and placed on a new footing, which forms the subject-matter of fourteen statutes, including those for the registering of ships and for the warehousing of goods.⁴ In particular, the repeal of the former laws included 'all the laws relating to the warehousing of goods; and the new Act is to take effect from and after 5th January 1826,⁵ for the warehousing of goods imported into the United Kingdom, without payment of duty upon the first entry thereof; or notwithstanding that such goods may be prohibited to be imported into the United Kingdom, to be used therein' (sec. 1).

1. The objects of the Act are: 1. To secure the duties payable to Government on goods lawfully imported for use and sale in this country; 2. To guard against the evasion of the laws, against the use or sale of prohibited goods, consistently with the privilege of stowing such goods in British warehouses; and, 3. To permit the transfer of goods without liberty to deliver to the buyer or his order.' Perhaps it may be said that, provided nothing remains to be done to make the contract complete enough to give the buyer a jus ad rem specificam, and nothing remains to be done prior to delivery in favour or for behoof of the vendor, and nothing which by the contract he is entitled to insist on having done as a condition suspensive of delivery. The intimation of the delivery order will operate a change of the constructive possession from vendor to vendee, whether what remains to be done—whatever it be—is to be done by the one or the other of them, or by the custodian. 'If the things to be done are entirely in favour of the purchaser, and such as he may dispense with, they cannot affect constructive delivery.' Per Lord Deas in Black v Rowan.]

¹ Sir Robert Walpole's famous excise scheme proposed the system in reference to wine and tobacco in 1733. Dean Tucker's Essay was published in 1750.

² 4 Geo. IV. c. 24, passed 12th May 1823, repealed by 6

Geo. IV. c. 105 (along with the other laws of the customs) as from 5th July 1826.

³ 6 Geo. IV. c. 112.

⁴ 6 Geo. IV. c. 104 to 118 inclusive.

⁵ As to the commencement of the Act, it may be observed that, in the repealing Act (6 Geo. IV. c. 105), the repeal is to take effect from 5th July 1826. But to clear all doubts it is enacted (by 6 Geo. IV. c. 111, sec. 17), that any regulation which is appointed to come into operation on 5th January shall be deemed the only subsisting regulation in force relative to that matter. [The same clause was repeated in the subsequent Warehouse Acts, 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 57, sec. 9, and 8 and 9 Vict. c. 91, sec. 9; but it appears to be omitted from the Customs Consolidation Act 1853, 16 and 17 Vict. c. 107, which repeals the 8 and 9 Vict. c. 91 (except sec. 51), but does not expressly repeal the 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 57, which was consolidated with several others into the 8 and 9 Vict. c. 91, but not repealed by it. See 25 and 26 Vict. c. 63 (repealing clause), sec. 2.]

the necessity of paying the duties, preserving the lien of shipowners for their freights in particular cases.

1. WAREHOUSING PORTS.—In order to afford the means of safely warehousing goods, it was by former Acts¹ provided, that the commissioners of the treasury should be empowered [188] to appoint by warrant, to be published in the Gazette, ports in which any goods, or any particular goods, or any particular articles, should be warehoused; while it was declared lawful for the commissioners of the customs to direct and allow the warehousing in any port of such goods as were not prohibited, or such as were not required by the commissioners of the treasury, or by statute, to be placed under special security. By the new Act, the commissioners of the treasury are to appoint by warrant, from time to time, what ports are to be warehousing ports, for the purposes of the Act; and the commissioners of the customs, under the control of the commissioners of the treasury, have the power of appointing in what warehouses, of special or of ordinary security, in such ports, and in what parts of such warehouses, any goods, and what sorts of goods, may or may only be kept and secured without payment of the duties.²

2. WAREHOUSES under this Act are of two descriptions: those of special security, and those of ordinary security.³ 1. Warehouses of special security are either such as are appointed by an order of the commissioners of the customs, published in the Gazette,⁴ or such as are connected with wharfs for the landing of goods, and enclosed with such wharfs within walls, 'as required by any Act for the constructing of such warehouses and wharfs, being legal quays.'⁵ The purpose of appointing such warehouses of special security is, that a more complete protection may be afforded to the manufacturers of this country against the sale of the prohibited articles,⁶ and the abuse checked of importations against the Navigation Laws.⁷ 2. Warehouses of ordinary security are such as are authorized by order of the commissioners of the customs for the warehousing of goods for sale or consumption, requiring no extraordinary precautions, but merely such as shall ensure the payment of the duties.⁸

3. SECURITY FOR DUTIES is given partly by bond, partly by lien.⁹ The bond is either, 1. A general bond given by the proprietor or occupier of the warehouse, with two sufficient securities for payment, within three years, of the full duties of importation on all goods which shall be warehoused therein, or for the due exportation thereof (sec. 8); or, 2. A similar bond by the importer, in respect of the particular goods imported by him, to be in force for three years, and no longer (sec. 8); and which may be superseded by the bond of the purchaser, in case of sale of the goods, without removal (sec. 28). It is not necessary here to detail the regulations for settling the account of duties; for checking the decrease or increase; or for giving relief of duties in case of accidental loss in landing, warehousing, delivery, or shipping. The goods can be taken from the warehouse only on due entry, and under the care of officers for exportation; or on due entry or payment of the full duties

¹ 4 Geo. iv. c. 24, secs. 5 and 14, and former statutes.

² 6 Geo. iv. c. 112, sec. 2.

³ A distinction may also be observed between warehouses and king's warehouses. 'Warehouses' (without the addition) 'are any house, shed, yard, timber yard, or other place in which goods may be lodged without payment of duty, or although prohibited to be used in the United Kingdom.' King's warehouse is a place provided by the Crown for lodging goods therein for security of the customs. 6 Geo. iv. c. 107, sec. 115. See also sec. 133.

⁴ Ib. secs. 3 and 7.

⁵ Ib. sec. 3. By 6 Geo. iv. c. 107, sec. 135, legal quays existing at the date of the Act are to continue so; and power is given to the king to appoint ports and quays in future for the landing of goods.

⁶ 4 Geo. iv. c. 24, sec. 6: 'Whereas it is expedient, for the protection of the manufacturers of this country, that the several goods and merchandise, the importation of which hath been prohibited by any Act, etc., but which by virtue of this Act may be imported and warehoused, for the purpose of exportation only, should be lodged and deposited in warehouses of special security.'

⁷ See 6 Geo. iv. c. 107, secs. 52, 53, 54, relative to prohibitions and entry for exportation only.

⁸ All warehouses appointed under previous Acts are to continue as if under this Act.

⁹ The bonds made under former Acts to be in force as if under this Act.

in ready money for consumption, if they be such as may be used in the kingdom (sec. 16). If it be necessary to take proceedings for recovery of the duties, the remedy is double, [189] viz. on the bond, or by sale of the goods. If the former be adopted, the sureties in the case of a bond by the importer, or the warehouse-keeper and his sureties in case of a general bond, will be entitled to an assignment of the Crown's remedy. If the goods are not taken out of store within three years, either for consumption or exportation (unless further time be allowed by the commissioners of the treasury), they may, by the commissioners of the customs, be ordered to be sold, subject to the conditions to which they were subject previous to the sale; a further time of three months being allowed for the clearing of the goods from the warehouse. The produce of such sale is to be applied, not to the payment of the duties—for still the goods may be exported by the buyer, when no duty will be exigible—but to the payment of warehouse rent and other charges, and the overplus, if any, paid to the proprietor. But the goods so sold, if not relieved within the three months, are to be forfeited (sec. 14). When goods are carried to the king's warehouse for security of the duties, or to prevent them from coming into home use, warehouse rent is to be paid for the time during which they remain therein, 'at the same rate as may be payable for the like goods when warehoused in any warehouse in which such goods may be warehoused without payment of duty,'¹ or as shall be fixed by the commissioners of the treasury or of the customs.² And in case such goods be not duly cleared from the king's warehouse within three months, they may be destroyed, if not worth the duties, or sold by auction for home use or for exportation; and the produce, if sold for home use, applied to the duties, and in either case to the warehouse rent and charges,—the overplus to the person appointed to receive the same.³

4. GOODS are either prohibited or not prohibited. 1. If prohibited either absolutely to be sold, or to be sold when imported contrary to the Navigation Laws, the object of the security provided is to prevent the rivalry with British commodities, or rivalry with British navigators, and to secure exportation as the sole condition of clearing the goods from the warehouse. 2. If not prohibited, they may either be sold for consumption or for exportation: in the former of which cases, the payment of the duties forms the sole condition of the clearance; in the latter, the exportation of the goods forms the condition. The arrangements authorized by the Act for the accomplishment of these objects, and facilitating a market for goods, consistently with safe custody and with indulgence for payment of duties, relate to the entry and warehousing of the goods; the examining and due preservation of them; the sale of them in the warehouse; and the preservation of the rights of the parties interested in the goods.

(1.) Upon the entry and landing of any goods to be warehoused, the proper officer of the customs shall take a particular account of them, mark the contents on each package, and the word 'prohibited' on such as are not allowed to be imported for home use; and the goods shall be carried to the warehouse under the care or with the authority of the officer; and in such manner, by such road, by such persons, and at such time, as he shall appoint (secs. 12, 13). With the goods so warehoused the proper officer is charged, till duly discharged on their being taken out for use, or for exportation, or sold for charges and duties.

(2.) The facilities for examining; for removing to another port or another warehouse in the same port; for sorting, separating, and repacking; or for taking out for cleaning, or managing, improving, and bottling of wine and spirits, are particularly detailed in the Act.⁴

(3.) The facilities for sale of the goods not prohibited are of great importance in the present inquiry. Under former Acts there was a degree of uncertainty relative to [190]

¹ 6 Geo. IV. c. 107, sec. 133.

² 7 Geo. IV. c. 48, sec. 9.

³ 6 Geo. IV. c. 107, sec. 134. Provision is also made for payment in the first place out of the price of the freight of such goods as may have been landed by officers without payment of the freight.

⁴ 6 Geo. IV. c. 107, secs. 10, 20–27, 29–36.

the custody and transfer of goods, which led to many questions. In the subsisting Act, by sec. 9, goods secured in warehouses in the actual occupation of the importer or proprietor of the goods, and which shall be bona fide sold by such importer or proprietor, shall be validly sold, although allowed to remain in the warehouse, provided the agreement shall be in writing, signed by the parties, or there shall be a written contract by a broker or person legally authorized; and the price shall be paid or secured, and the transfer entered in the officer's book ordered to be kept for the purpose.¹

(4.) There are regulations for preserving uninjured the rights of parties; and, First, The owners of the goods are to be indemnified against embezzlement, damage, or loss occasioned by the negligence of officers. On prosecuting the officer to conviction, the importer or proprietor of the goods is to have exemption from duty on the goods lost, damaged, or embezzled; and the damage sustained is to be paid and made good by the commissioners of the customs or excise, under orders to be established (sec. 39). Secondly, The masters and owners of ships in which goods shall be imported, and landed, and lodged in the custody of the proprietors of docks, have their claim of freight preserved to them over the goods in the dock warehouse; and the proprietors of the docks, their servants or agents, are authorized, empowered, and required, on notice given to them, to detain and keep such goods till the freight, rates, and charges be paid, or a deposit made sufficient to answer therefor (sec. 45).²

II.—TRANSFERENCE OF GOODS WAREHOUSED AND UNDER BOND.

Returning from this short analysis of the Warehousing Acts, it is now to be explained how goods under the operation of those laws are to be transferred.

Goods secured under the Warehousing Act either belong to the person who is proprietor or occupier of the warehouse; or to persons who have no other concern with the warehouse than in having their goods deposited there. And these cases are regulated by different rules.

GOODS THE PROPERTY OF WAREHOUSEMAN.

Goods which belong to the occupier of the warehouse, stood formerly in a predicament in which it was difficult to effect a transference of them while they continued in the warehouse. The occupier of the warehouse was, under former laws, properly speaking, the custodian of goods lodged there; the officer having only a superintendence and key for security of the duties. And the question might arise, whether, after a sale by the proprietor of goods lodged in his own warehouse, there was, by the law of Scotland, such tradition as

¹ 'That if any goods lodged in any warehouse shall be the property of the occupier of such warehouse, and shall be bona fide sold by him, and upon such sale there shall have been a written agreement signed by the parties, or a written contract of sale made, executed, and delivered by a broker, or other person legally authorized, for or on behalf of the parties respectively, and the amount of the price stipulated in the said agreement or contract shall have been actually paid, or secured to be paid, by the purchaser; every such sale shall be valid, although such goods shall remain in such warehouses, provided that a transfer of such goods, according to such sale, shall have been entered in a book to be kept for that purpose by the officer of the customs having the charge of such warehouse, who is hereby required to keep such book, and to enter such transfer, with the dates thereof, upon application of the owners of the goods, and to produce such books upon demand made.' The regulation was first introduced in 4 Geo. IV. c. 24, sec. 82; and the following expression, that goods thus sold 'shall, by such sale, be transferred and vested in the buyer to all intents and purposes,' is weakened in the new Act, with what view does not appear.

[Under this clause was decided the case of Maxwell & Co. v Stevenson & Co., 1830, 8 S. 618, and H. of L., 4 April 1831, 5 W. and S. 269, where the importer of oats, having bonded them in his own warehouse, and then sold them, gave the buyer's agent the key of the warehouse, but made no entry of transfer in the custom-house officer's book, as directed by the Act. The buyer failed; the seller attempted to retain. The question was, whether the statute was imperative and superseded the common law, or merely directory. The House of Lords, reversing the judgment below, held the statute not imperative, but directory, and the transference of the property complete.]

² See also above, for freight secured on sales in king's warehouse, by c. 107, sec. 134.

to pass the property? or by that of England, such termination of the order and dis- [191] position of the goods in the warehouse proprietor, as under the statute of James I. to put an end to reputed ownership? The difficulties attending this situation are removed by the recent Acts, whereby, 1. The officer is charged in such cases with the duty of keeping a book of transfer; and, 2. A written contract of sale, with notice and entry in the officer's book, is declared to make a complete sale.¹

GOODS IN THE BOND WAREHOUSES OF THIRD PARTIES.

Goods lodged in a warehouse not in the ownership or occupation of the proprietor of the goods, are by the statute left to the common law; and it would seem that the same rule should apply to the case of goods originally belonging to the occupiers of the warehouse, but sold as above, and an entry made in the officer's book; in consequence of which such goods are completely separated from the warehouseman's own property.

Goods in this predicament are either in the warehouses of docks, or in ordinary warehouses.

I. DOCK WAREHOUSES.—The confusion arising in the loading, landing, and warehousing of goods, and the dangers of collision, damage, and speculation, both to the revenue and the merchant, on ordinary wharfs, have led to the establishment of docks in the great emporiums of trade, with the proper accompaniments of wharfs and warehouses. The effect of this in practice is important. These are private institutions under legislative sanction.² The dock companies are remunerated by means of rates authorized by the several Acts to be levied. And it is a counterpart of this right, that the public shall enjoy the security as well as facilities of the docks and of the warehouses (for rent), while their goods are in the course of being landed or deposited there. On the occasion of any question relative to the safety or transference of goods in any dock warehouse, or on any dock wharf, the particular provisions of the Act relative to that dock ought to be referred to, lest any peculiarity in the Act should alter the disposition of the common law on the subject.³

Generally speaking, however, the dock company, or the proprietors and directors of the dock, will be held as custodiers of goods landed and lodged in their warehouses. In the London, West India, and other docks in the Thames, and in those of Bristol, Liverpool, etc., very regular arrangements are made, and books kept, and receipts or certificates granted. Under those arrangements it has been held,—

¹ 6 Geo. iv. c. 112, sec. 9; [8 and 9 Vict. c. 91; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 107, Customs Consolidation Act.] In a case which occurred in the Court of Session some years before this Act, the idea of a record in which such an entry might be made, to the effect of completing a sale in such circumstances, occurred as a consequence deducible from the regulations of the then subsisting Acts. Auld v Hall & Co., 12 July 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 290. Lord President Blair said: 'That the law of Scotland and custom of merchants concur in requiring intimation of the sale; and this intimation must be entered in a book which, by statute, must be kept for that purpose, and which affords a security nearly equal to that of the record of sasines in land rights.' But there was nothing in those former Acts to support such a result, and the usages of different ports were so various, that in some there was a distinct set of books, in which every alteration of the property appeared; in others no record whatever was kept. [See Maxwell & Co. v Stevenson & Co., 8 S. 618, 5 W. and S. 269. Delivery of key of warehouse held equivalent to entry in the warehouse books.]

² In England, the London Docks in 1800 (39 and 40 Geo.

iii. c. 47; 55 Geo. iii. c. 3), the West India Docks (39 Geo. iii. c. 69; 42 Geo. iii. c. 113), the East India Docks in 1803 (43 Geo. iii. c. 126; 54 Geo. iii. c. 228), with two others called the Rotherhithe Docks, are for the accommodation of the port of London. There are also docks at Bristol and at Liverpool, the two other principal ports of England. [See an abstract of the London Dock Acts in Mercantile and Maritime Guide, by G. Wilmore, Q.C., and Edwin Beedell (1856), p. 922 et seq.; and as to these and the other principal docks in England and Scotland, the article 'Docks' in MacCulloch's Commercial Dictionary.

In Scotland docks are established at Leith, as the port of Edinburgh, by certain Acts, 28, 38, 39, 45, 47, 53 Geo. iii., and 7 Geo. iv.; Loc. and Pers. Acts, c. 105.]

³ There is one general law, however, applicable to all dock establishments, by which the freight of goods landed under the provision of the Warehousing Acts is secured by a continuance of the lien to which such goods were liable while on board. 6 Geo. iv. c. 112, sec. 45. This will demand attention afterwards, in treating of lien for freight. Below, Book iv.

[192] 1. That due notice to the warehouse-keeper is sufficient to complete the transference, as in a question with creditors. This has been laid down by the greatest authorities in England, on the same principle which rules the transference of goods in the hands of wharfingers.¹ There is no case on this point in Scotland; but the principle on which the English law proceeds is distinctly recognised with us.

2. The proper course, however, is to make the transfer by endorsement of the dock warrant. The inconvenience was felt of going to the docks on the occasion of every transfer, to see notice duly given; and the existence of a document capable of endorsement, with the ready analogy of a transferable bill of lading (see below, p. 212), introduced the practice of ¹ Lucas v Dorrien, 1817, 7 Taunt. 278. Here Doorman applied to Dorrien, his banker, for £10,000 on his note, with a collateral security over sugars in the West India Docks. The dock checks were delivered, duly endorsed, and the money was advanced. A change afterwards was made for certain dock checks of molasses, which also were duly endorsed. The certificates were preserved and examined at the warehouse, and the clerk said they were sufficient. Some of the goods were taken out of bond, others remained. On the bankruptcy of Doorman, the clerk of the dock company refused further delivery without assent of the assignees. In an action by the assignees, one question was, Whether the assignees were entitled to recover for the molasses? Judgment went for the banker. Mr. Justice Dallas said: 'The clerk of the dock company, on the dock warrant being exhibited to him, said, "This will suffice." Therefore I must take it that the dock company, through their agent, had notice of the transfer; and though nothing was done in consequence of that notice, it falls within the case in Campbell, where Lord Ellenborough held that the mere giving notice to the wharfinger, without anything done thereon, was effective to complete the transfer of property.' Mr. Justice Burrough said: 'The moment that notice was given to the dock company, they were converted into trustees for the defendants, if it be necessary so to contend.' But the case, though it would have been decided in favour of the banker on this ground, did not, in fact, require the aid of actual notice; for the whole Court held the endorsation alone sufficient.

[In addition to the cases referred to by the author on dock warrants and similar documents, see also Keyser v Suse, Gow 58; Hoare v Dawes, 1 Dougl. 371; Farina v Home, 16 M. and W. 119; Bartlett v Holmes, 22 L. J. C. P. 182; Johnson v Stear, 33 L. J. C. P. 130; Meyerstein v Barber, L. R. 4 H. L. 317. The author has stated that goods in the possession of dock warehouse-keepers, etc., may in England be effectually transferred by the mere endorsation of the warrant, without intimation to the custodier, on the analogy of bills of lading, and he intimates an inclination to hold that to be law in Scotland. Mr. Brown (Sale, Nos. 676-679) has been led into the same mistake. But the cases down to Keyser v Suse are all differently explained by Mr. Justice Blackburn in his Treatise on Sale, pp. 297-307, and those down to 1869 by Mr. Benjamin (Sale, pp. 607-623); and the result appears to be, that by the law, as now settled by the judges in England, the endorsement and transfer of a dock warrant, warehouse certificate, dock delivery order, or other like document of title, by a vendor to a vendee, is not such a delivery of possession as divests the vendor's lien, and therefore, we may conclude, not such a delivery of possession as will transfer the dominium in Scotland from seller to buyer. There have been attempts at various times to assimilate the endorsement of dock warrants, wharfingers' receipts, delivery orders, and similar documents, to the endorsement of bills of lading. The general nature of these documents, which issue from the holder of goods in warehouses under the statutes, is, that they acknowledge the holder of the document, or his endorsee, to be the person to whom the holder of the goods is bound to deliver them, and so far they resemble bills of lading. But their negotiability is not justified, as that of bills of lading is, by the impossibility of seeking out the holder of the goods, and taking actual or constructive possession, and there is no custom of merchants sufficient to support it. According to Parke, B. (in Farina v Home), such a warrant is only an engagement by the custodier to the original holder of it, or any one he may appoint; and the custodier holds as that person's agent, and his possession is that person's possession, until he, the custodier, attorns to the appointee, and agrees with him to hold for him. Then, and not till then, is he the agent or bailee of the appointee, his possession the appointee's possession; and then only is there a constructive delivery to him. 'In the meantime, the warrant, and the endorsement of the warrant, is nothing more than an offer to hold the goods as the agent of the assignee.' Care will be taken to distinguish delivery orders of this kind from the ordinary delivery order granted, not by a warehouseman to the owner of goods, but by the vendor of goods upon a bailee who holds possession of them as agent of the vendor. It was decided in M'Ewan v Smith (6 Bell 340, 352), and in Griffiths v Perry (28 L. J. Q. B. 208), that such a delivery order also differed in effect from a bill of lading, and did not by mere endorsement, without intimation, change the constructive possession held through the bailee by the granter or endorser of it. It is thought that delivery orders of this kind are not meant to be included in the definition of 'documents of title' given in the Factors Acts, but only those granted by warehouse-keepers and wharfingers. A conflict of view, however, as to the nature and legal operation of these warehouse and wharfingers' documents seems to exist between the decisions of the English Courts on the one hand, and the legislation embodied in the Factors Acts and other recent statutes on the other; as to which see Benjamin, ut supra. The anomaly had been pointed out by Mr. Brodie (Stair, Suppt. pp. 873, note, and 896) as resulting from the Factors Act of 6 Geo. IV. c. 94. Observe the exceptional operation which such documents have in the hands of a factor (but not in those of the owner of the goods) under the Factors Acts. Benjamin and Blackburn, ut supra, and cases, ibid.; Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 510; Add. Cont. 6th ed. 815.]

transferring by means of the document or dock warrant alone. The parties, by the original conception of those certificates or dock warrants, arrange the mode of transfer; for there is printed a blank delivery order, to be filled up when the goods are sold.¹ The practice of England is quite settled, that goods in this situation may effectually be transferred by endorsement of the warrant; and it is now sanctioned by judicial determinations giving effect to such transfers, as consistent at once with mercantile usage and legal principle.²

¹ A dock certificate on a transfer is in this form:—

Warrant of Transfer, {No. of order, 500.
{Ship's rotation, No. 30.

West India Dock Warehouse, No. 6.—I certify that the following three casks, lot 6, of coffee imported by the ship Aurora, Captain T. Smith, from Jamaica, entered by J. B. & Co. on the 10th May 1826, have been transferred in the books of the warehouse into the name of John Smith. Rent commences 26th June 1826, inclusive. (Date and subscription.)

No. 20, folio 520.

Entered, J. W. SANSUM, clerk.

(Then a schedule of the marks and weight of each cask.)

A blank delivery order is subjoined, printed thus:—

LONDON, 1st July 1826.

Deliver the above-mentioned goods to or order.

No.

Examined and entered the 10th August 1826.

² In Spear v Travers, 1815, one of those dock certificates, after passing through several hands, was transferred to Spear as a security for £2000 by Greaves. Greaves had not paid the price to Mr. Mealy, from whom he bought the goods, and to aid Mealy the original holder of the certificate (in whose name the goods still stood on the books) gave notice to stop; and having applied for a duplicate certificate, on a false statement that the former had been lost, he got it. Under the direction of Gibbs, Chief Justice, a verdict was given for Spear. The gentlemen of the special jury observed that, in practice, the endorsed dock warrants and certificates are handed from seller to buyer, as a complete transfer of the goods. 4 Campbell 251.

In the above case of Lucas v Dorrien (see p. 206, note 1), this doctrine was well canvassed and established. Mr. J. Dallas says: 'There are two parts in the case of Harman and Anderson; and though Lord Ellenborough, C. J., did say at the trial that the transfer in the books passed the property, yet he afterwards says, "The delivery note was sufficient, without any actual transfer being made in their books." Spear v Travers is valuable for two purposes: 1. It shows what Gibbs, C. J., held respecting the operation of these dock warrants. 2. It shows that a special jury have expressed an opinion upon the subject. The sugars must be deposited with the dock company for securing the duties. The warrant itself contains a form of endorsement. What can be stronger to show the intention of the parties that the property should pass by endorsement than the form of endorsement put on it in the original making of the instrument?' Again he says: 'I have been several times stopped by a special jury, they being satisfied that the goods pass from hand to hand by endorsement of these instruments. All special juries cry out with one voice that the practice is that the produce lodged in the docks is transferred by endorsing over the certificates and dock warrants; and therefore there is no reputed owner if he does not produce his certificate.'

Mr. Justice Burrough says: 'This instrument is perfectly well known to all traders, and it is also known to them that the goods pass by endorsement of it, and there is no reason why they should not: it is a transfer of a mere chattel, and there is no reason why an order for delivery of the goods should not pass the property. I should have thought, independently of the notice to the dock company, that the property was transferred by the mere endorsement for a valuable consideration.' Again: 'I know not whether these instruments were in use at the time when the case of Gordon v The East India Company was decided; but Lord Kenyon, C. J., relies there on the absence of a document which Taylor could have carried to market for the purpose of disposing of that property. Here is that document. What Mansfield, C. J., says in Thackthwaite v Cock, 3 Taunt. 491, is material to the present case. He says: "There is not such a clear, distinct, and precise custom proved, as would enable others to see that these may not be the hops of the possessor." Here subsists, I will not call it a custom, but so clear an understanding of the trade, that this instrument by endorsement would pass the property, that every one may see that they are no longer the property of the bankrupt, who has ceased to possess this document.'

In Zwinger v Samuda, 1817, 7 Taunt. 265, there was a fraud. Roebuck, in order to buy coffee, got from Samuda money, in security of which he transferred the coffee by the usual note into Samuda's name in the dock books. He then sold it to Zwinger, and, on a false pretence, got from Samuda the certificate, with Samuda's name signed to the blank delivery order. On the faith of this, Roebuck got the price from Zwinger. Samuda stopped delivery at the docks; and the question was, Whether he could against Zwinger? It was adjudged he could not. Dallas, C. J., said: 'The person who enabled Roebuck to commit this fraud was the defendant, by lodging these delivery notes in Roebuck's hand, and enabling him to go to market with them. The act of Roebuck, therefore, was the act of the defendant. It is said that it would be inconvenient if property may be transferred by these delivery notes. The best test of their convenience is the use of them, which has obtained ever since these docks have been erected. Two witnesses very conversant with this trade stated, that there was a general practice prevalent to receive these warrants in the market, and to pay for the goods therein specified, without going to the dock-house to examine whether any stop was put on them. Without saying that this is such an usage as to constitute a rule of law, there is, in the particular case, enough to show that there is no foundation for the observation that the practice will be productive of inconvenience. It is enough, therefore, to say, that the persons who hold these bought notes have given a valuable consideration for them, and that therefore they are entitled

In Scotland, the practice has been extremely loose. The docks established here have not been ordered, in respect to the arrangements for recording the entry and transfer of goods, with sufficient precision or regularity to serve as the groundwork of that convenient practical system which prevails in England; but the principles and the analogy on which that usage has proceeded are the same in Scotland as in England.

In cases such as have now been stated, a competition between a person purchasing on the transfer of a dock warrant, and one purchasing with notice to the dock company or [193] its officers, might be of doubtful issue. If the above were by statute prescribed as the regular method of transfer (as in the case of goods belonging to the proprietor of the warehouse; supra, p. 204), it might be doubtful whether any other mode of transfer would be effectual. But this is a mode introduced by usage alone, proceeding on the practical arrangements made, and the facilities thereby afforded for the transaction of business. It [194] would, however, seem that the holder of the dock warrant was preferable: 1. Because this may fairly be held as the mode of transfer stipulated and agreed to by the importer or depositor of the goods, in the very form of the receipt received from the warehouse; 2. Because the mercantile usage is, to rely on such transfer by endorsement; and, 3. Because a purchase made without care taken to see the dock certificate cleared indicates something of collusion.¹

II. ORDINARY BOND WAREHOUSES.—1. In the ordinary bond warehouses, not connected with docks, there seems to be no such uniformity of practice as to be the safe foundation of a usage similar to that of the dock warrant transfers. In some warehouses for bond goods in Scotland the arrangements are very correct; and in practice there have occurred cases in which regular entries in the warehouse books have been made, and formal receipts or transfer notes have been delivered by the warehouse-keeper for goods deposited. And to a certain extent the practice has prevailed, that where the buyer again sells the whole quantity contained in such note, he gives over the note with an endorsed transfer to the second buyer. This is a course of practice similar to the English usage in the case of dock warrants; but less regular and settled, and not to be relied on as having the force of mercantile usage, or as the groundwork of any settled rule of transference. In some cases which occurred nearly twenty years ago, it was questioned whether such transfer was equivalent to a complete delivery of the goods, as if they had been taken out of bond, or as if the delivery order had been fully intimated to the keeper of the cellar? The Court of Session held the delivery to be complete.² The determination of the question was not merely as between the

to the property.' Park, J.: 'I am of the same opinion: it is the defendant who is to blame for sending out Roebuck into the world with these symbols in his hands; and the plaintiffs, by purchasing them, obtain a right to the delivery of the coffee. As to the custom, it is asked by the defendant's counsel, How can a custom grow up in so short a time as hath elapsed since the making of these docks? But in the Newfoundland case (Noble v Kennoway, 2 Doug. 510) it was held that one year was enough for a practice of trade to grow up.' Burrough, J.: 'I hope it will be understood that the Court does not proceed upon anything like a custom in this case: the only use to be made of the evidence of the practice of the trade, is that put by my brother Dallas: it shows that no inconvenience results from the use of these warrants.'

¹ In the arguments delivered in the above cases (p. 207, note 2), the law of such a case will be found almost delivered. [See p. 206, note 1.]

² Tod & Co. v Rattray, 1 Feb. 1809. In November 1802, Ritchie & Son imported rum, and it was lodged in the king's cellar, under the care of M'Lauchlan & Co. Ritchie & Son sold 91 puncheons to M'Kellar, who granted bills, and they gave an order on M'Lauchlan & Co. by letter, which, after specifying the particular casks, bore: 'You will please deliver the above-noted 91 puncheons of rum to the order of Mr. D. M'Kellar, charging us with cellar rent to 30th December next, should any lie so long.' Ten days afterwards, M'Kellar sold 22 puncheons to Mathie, and gave him an order of delivery, addressed to M'Lauchlan & Co. Mathie again sold to Frew nine puncheons for £268, and the money was paid. Frew received a note of the puncheons thus purchased by him, with an order on M'Lauchlan & Co. to 'deliver to the order of Mr. R. Frew the undernoted nine puncheons of Jamaica rum, he paying cellar rent, one month after date.' This order was intimated to M'Lauchlan & Co., and Frew's name marked as purchaser after Mathie's, 6d. per puncheon being paid for this entry. Many months afterwards Mathie became a bankrupt, without having paid for the rum to M'Kellar, who had sold to him; and M'Kellar claimed a right to stop it, as in transitu.

The judges found themselves embarrassed by the former cases, especially by that of Auchie, Ure, & Co., which was a solemn decision not then reversed, but which several of the purchaser, on the faith of an endorsed order, and the creditors of the seller; but it went the whole length of finding, that to all intents and purposes, in a case of stoppage in transitu, the delivery note as completely carried the property as, in the case of Lickbarrow, a negotiable bill of lading was found to do, where endorsed to a buyer while the goods were at sea. It was, on the one hand, maintained that the usage was so uniform as to admit that [195] analogy: on the other, it was maintained that no such usage was either proved or could (in the short time that had elapsed since the Bonding Acts were made) possibly be established to the effect of constituting a rule of mercantile law. The Court of Session held that the right of the original seller to stop in transitu could not be claimed or made effectual against subsequent purchasers paying the price on the faith of a transfer of the delivery note.¹ Looking to the entire want of uniformity in the practice of the country, it is difficult to estimate the precise effect of these determinations. In England, the judges have rested much on the uniformity of the practice, as giving notice to every one who shall deal with the importer or owner of goods, that he is not, in the case of dock certificates, to hold himself safe to buy on mere notice, without calling for the certificate. But this principle cannot rule cases in Scotland, from ports where the usage is not settled. Notice under the common law will furnish the only sure rule to be followed, even in cases where usage is alleged.

2. Where there is no settled usage, or where the delivery note still remains in the hands of the original buyer, the principle of change of custody has been admitted as good; and is indeed the only groundwork of a mode of transfer short of a complete change in the disposition of the goods.

3. The Act of 6 Geo. iv. c. 112, sec. 28, makes provision for the case where a new owner changes the bond, releasing the original owner. Little doubt can be entertained that this would be an effectual alteration of the property.

4. But it has been doubted what shall be sufficient notice to change the custody, and who is properly custodian, to whom the transfer of goods warehoused is to be intimated? A great deal of discussion took place at one time on questions of this sort, before the system of the Bonding Acts was fully completed. It was in the Court of Session questioned whether it was not necessary that the duties should be paid and the goods actually taken out of the cellar, and delivered to the vendee, in order to make a complete transfer? And in three several cases it was determined that an order of delivery on the keeper of the warehouse, though accompanied by a notice of that order, and a transfer in the cellar books, was not sufficient to transfer the goods.² But the House of judges thought very questionable. But they entertained much less doubt respecting this peculiar shape of the case. The majority of the Court was satisfied, 1. That it is the practice of trade to carry on dealings to a very great extent in rum, etc., while it continues in bond; and that merchants are accustomed to trust to the delivery and intimation of an order for the quantity sold. 2. That it is of most essential benefit to commerce that this course of delivery should not be discouraged, and that it is truly the policy of the Bonding Acts to give uncontrolled power of trade, subject only to the pledge for the duties. And, 3. That the analogy of Lickbarrow's case should be admitted, and that a vendee receiving delivery by an order and intimation, and paying full value for the goods, is not to be questioned, or to have the goods withheld for payment of the price due on some prior sale. The case was first decided thus in the Court of Session, before its division (31 May 1808). It then came under review of the First Division, and Lord President Blair added the weight of his opinion to the determination. [15 F. C. 132.]

¹ M'Eachern v Ewing & Co., 1824, 2 S. 724, N. E. 603.

In this case, rum bonded in Greenock was sold to Menzies, and by him to Gordon. No notice was given to the warehouse-keeper till he demanded payment of the duties from the importer, when he was told the rum had been sold to Menzies. Menzies paid the duties and got the rum. The Court held the delivery to be correct, and refused to admit a proof of usage that goods passed only with the delivery order. [See M'Ewan v Smith, 9 D. 434, 6 Bell 340; Melrose & Co. v Hastie, 1850, 12 D. 665, 13 D. 880, 14 D. 268, and see particularly observations in the House of Lords, 1 Macq. 698.]

² Campbell, Ruthven, & Co. were importers of rum, of which while in the king's cellars they sold 50 puncheons to Telfer & Co. Samples were delivered, but no order of delivery. The buyers authorized Robertson, a commission agent, to sell their rum, and he had free access to it, Telfer & Co. sold the rum, and gave this order on Robertson: 'I have agreed with Mr. Taylor for the rum in your hand; please, therefore, deliver it to his order.' This was by the purchaser sent to Robertson, with orders respecting the future sales, in a new course of employment, as his agent. On [196] Lords reversed these judgments,¹ and notice to the warehouse-keeper was held effectual to transfer.

In England the same principle is recognised, to the effect of not only passing the property, but of satisfying the requisition of the Act of James I. as to reputed ownership.²

But although notice made to the keeper of the warehouse, and recognised by him, is in law sufficient to transfer the property, it is far from being well settled how such notice is to be given;³ and it seems to be matter for a jury on the facts of each case.

The keeper of the warehouse is properly the custodier of the goods. The officer of the revenue has no duties of that sort to perform, except in so far as he is ordered by the payment of duties, 18 puncheons were delivered; 32 had been sold to different dealers, but were still unremoved when Telfer & Co. failed, without having paid the price, and the importers stopped the goods. This was found a good stoppage. Winter session 1803, n. r.

Robertson, Harvey, & Co. v Crs. of Adam. Robertson, Harvey, & Co. were importers of rum, which was bonded. William Adam purchased from them, and received an invoice with the warehouse-keeper's receipt, and an order of delivery to Adam endorsed; who intimated his holding the receipt, and the order, to the keeper of the warehouse. He sold 2 puncheons, which on payment of duties were delivered. He failed without paying the price, while 6 puncheons were still in bond. The sellers applied for those, and having paid the duties, received them. Adam's creditors demanded restitution. The Commissary of Glasgow held the delivery to be complete. Lord Meadowbank, in the Bill Chamber, affirmed that judgment. But the Court held that the delivery was not complete, so as to divest the importers of their right to stop. 24 Nov. 1803, n. r.

Auchie, Ure, & Co. v Spence. Auchie, Ure, & Co. were importers of rum, which was placed in bond in the cellars of Sandieman & Co. of Greenock. Auchie, Ure, & Co. sold 32 puncheons by auction to Mathie, and he drew for the price on Hugh Mathie & Co. at four months. An invoice was delivered, with an order to the keeper of the warehouse subjoined: 'Please deliver to the order of William Mathie, the under-mentioned 32 puncheons of rum.' Eighteen of the 32 puncheons were accordingly delivered on payment of the duties. The order was intimated to Sandieman & Co. In their scantling-book, Mathie the purchaser's name was duly entered by them opposite to the several puncheons; and the order itself was filed among the other orders in Sandieman & Co.'s custody. Mathie the vendee, and also Hugh Mathie & Co., failed without paying the bill; and Auchie, Ure, & Co. applied judicially to stop the 14 puncheons still in bond. The water-bailie of Clyde 'found Auchie, Ure, & Co. entitled in law to reclaim the 14 puncheons of rum sold by them to the defender Mathie, still remaining in the king's cellars, in respect the price thereof has not been paid.' The cause was then removed to the Court of Session, and Lords Balmuto and Hermand successively in the Bill Chamber adhered to this judgment; and the Court affirmed their sentence. The judges whose opinion went to support this judgment, proceeded chiefly on the ground of the decided cases, strengthened by what they understood to form the uniform line of distinction between actual and constructive delivery: the former requiring delivery into the corporeal possession of the vendee; the latter giving effect to acts short of this, for the special purpose of completing transference where the price is paid. On the other hand, Lord Meadowbank vindicated his judgment in the Bill Chamber in the former case, on the ground that such order and intimation were equivalent to the delivery of the key of the warehouse; that the warehouse became thenceforward that of the vendee, where the goods lay at his risk, and at his disposal, subject only to the king's pledge; and that the commerce of all bonded goods, and the very existence of the privilege intended by the Bonding Acts, required that it should be possible to make an effectual transference, without the necessity of paying the duties in order to get actual delivery. 18 Dec. 1804, n. r.

¹ Auchie & Co. v Spence, 16 March 1810, 5 Pat. 291. The House of Lords, by their judgment, 16th March 1810, 'Find that the pursuers in the application to the water-bailie (Auchie, Ure, & Co.) are not entitled in law, in respect that the price was not paid, to retain the puncheons of rum in question sold by them to William Mathie, which were remaining in the king's cellars: find that, in the circumstances of this case, these goods ought (in a question as between the vendor and vendee thereof, in whose possession the same were) to be considered as being in the possession of William Mathie, the vendee, before he became bankrupt; inasmuch as Messrs. Sandiemans ought, in such a question between such parties, in the circumstances of this case, to be considered as holding them prior to the bankruptcy, as the agents and servants of the vendee only; and it is therefore ordered and adjudged, that all parts of the several interlocutors complained of, so far as they are inconsistent with this finding, be, and the same are hereby, reversed: And it is further ordered, that with this finding the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session in Scotland, to do therein and as to the several interlocutors complained of, as this finding requires and as is consistent therewith.'

It may be observed, that on occasion of a case which occurred prior to this judgment, Lord President Hope, before the division of the Court, urged the importance of adjudging this point differently from the determination in Auchie & Co.'s case; and the Court came to be satisfied accordingly, on a more careful review of the system of the Bonding Acts, that the former determination was erroneous. Tod & Co. v Rattray, 1 Feb. 1809, supra, p. 208, note 2.

² Knowles v Horsfall, 1821, 5 Barn. and Ald. 134. In this case one of the parcels of brandy was in the bond warehouse of Ledson. And in King's Bench, Lord Chief Justice Abbot, and Bayley and Best, Justices, were of opinion that, if notice had been given to him, the goods would have been effectually transferred, and out of the order and disposition of the vendor. [See Maxwell & Co. v Stevenson & Co., 5 W. and S. 269.]

³ [See M'Eachern v Ewing & Co., 1824, 2 S. 724, N. E. 603.]

9th section of the recent Act to keep a book for the transfer of goods, the property of the warehouse-keeper. It is to be wished, perhaps, that this appointment had been a little broader, so as to include all transfers in ordinary bond warehouses. But in absence of [197] such regulation, the officer is properly the guardian of the right of the Crown alone, as concerned for the duties; a mere superintendent, on account of the revenue, of the proceedings of the warehouse-keeper. With the exception of the cases provided for in the 9th and 28th sections of the Act (above, pp. 204 and 209), it neither is required by the Act, nor is it the practice, to make intimation to the officer of any change in the ownership of the goods, which is not accompanied with a removal or alteration of the goods themselves. And the officer would take no notice of such intimation, though made to him, as not having any effect on the Crown's right. It is to the warehouse-keeper, therefore, that notice of a transfer is to be made. He is the custodier for the merchant, and becomes by such notice (according to the rule already laid down) the servant and custodier of the buyer.¹

A question already alluded to may be again mentioned as incident to all the situations which fall under this section: viz., What shall be the effect of delivery begun, but not completed, as requiring a series of repeated acts? In the simple case of delivery between seller and buyer direct, there seems reason to conclude that the delivery might be stopped at any point of time, the price not being paid, and the buyer becoming bankrupt.² But where the goods are in the hands of a third party as custodier, the principle which seems to rule the case is the change of custody. If notice of the buyer's right and acceptance of the charge on his account be sufficient to complete the transfer, the commenced delivery seems to be good evidence of such notice and acceptance; entitling the buyer thenceforward to consider the custodier as his agent, provided the contract be entire. And this I take to be the true principle of the cases cited below, where the delivery was held complete.³

¹ [M'Ewan v Smith, 6 Bell 340; Melrose v Hastie, 1 Macq. 698.]

² See above, pp. 182, 183.

³ Slubey v Heyward. George & Henry Browns ordered Slubey & Smith to send 7061 bushels of wheat, to be paid for at a future day. The wheat was shipped at Baltimore on board the Pomona, the bills of lading deliverable to the buyers, and by them sold to Scott. When the ship arrived, the goods were entered in the name of Scott's agents at the custom-house. Two days after, 800 bushels were taken out by Scott's agents on his own account; and the Browns becoming bankrupts, the original sellers gave notice to the ship-master to stop delivery. The Court were of opinion, 'that, under the circumstances of this particular case, the transitus was ended by the delivery of the 800 bushels of wheat, which must be taken to be a delivery of the whole, there appearing no intention, either previous to or at the time of the delivery, to separate part of the cargo from the rest.' 1795, 2 Hy. Blackst. 504.

The determination of this case is stated as a general decision, and relied on in the subsequent case of Hammond v Anderson, 1 Bosanquet and Puller, N. S. 71. In that case, a number of bales of bacon lying at a wharf, being sold for an entire sum, an order was given to the wharfinger to deliver. The buyer came, weighed the whole, and took away some bales. He then failed, and the seller attempted to stop, by ordering the wharfinger not to deliver. And although, by the custom of trade, the seller was to pay charges of warehouse for fourteen days, the buyer was held to have taken possession of the whole, and the seller to have no right to stop what remained with the wharfinger. All the Court concurred in thinking that the seller having undertaken for the warehouse rent was a mere incident, which did not enter into the case; but they relied on these points: 1. That the contract was entire; 2. That the case was stronger than Slubey v Heyward, in so far as the whole was weighed over by the buyer, which was a taking of possession of the whole; and, 3. That the leaning had gone far enough in favour of stoppage.

In a late treatise on charter-parties, Mr. Lawes seems to think that an important distinction may be taken where the seller gives delivery of a part, and where the buyer or his servants separate part from the rest, and take that part away (p. 510). But it seems inexpedient to multiply small distinctions in such cases, and it really does not appear that there is any satisfactory ground in law for the distinction; for it cannot be doubted that the mere weighing over, without taking away a part, would not complete the delivery.

On these cases, the doctrine is thus stated absolutely by Lord Chief Justice Abbot (Law of Merchant Ships, 11th ed. 428): 'If the master has begun to unload, and has delivered part of the cargo to the consignee, the consigner's right to countermand is wholly at an end, and cannot be exercised over the residue of the cargo.'

[Note that the text and notes present the confusion already noticed between what is necessary to accomplish tradition and what terminates the state of transitus in questions of stoppage. As a question of tradition, part delivery by a

SUBSECTION III.—TRANSFERENCE OF GOODS AND MERCHANDISE WHILE IN THE HANDS OF SHIPMASTERS AND CARRIERS.

[198] Goods sold may already be in the hands of a shipmaster, carrier, or other person employed to transport them; or they may be delivered to the carrier or shipmaster expressly for the buyer. The completion of the transfer in these two distinct cases depends on different principles.¹ The former case I shall consider here; the latter falls under the next section.

A transfer of goods in the hands of a carrier most frequently happens while the goods are at sea. In the direct passage of goods by land carriage, and even in the regular carriage by smacks, so universally established now in the coasting trade, the buyer has it commonly in contemplation to obtain a direct delivery to himself. And only a receipt is given for the goods, deliverable to the buyer, or according to the address. In the importation of goods from foreign countries, the intention more frequently is, that the consignee should, in the way of general sale, take advantage of the market to which the goods are sent. In such cases, the obligation of the shipmaster is so conceived as to facilitate a sale of the goods, even before their arrival. The shipmaster grants to the shipper a BILL of LADING, acknowledging that goods of a particular description have been delivered to him in good condition; and binding himself to deliver them at the port of destination, either to the shipper, or his order or assigns, or to the bearer, or to the consignee or buyer by name, or his assignees. When the consignee's name is not expressed, the consignor endorses his own name on the bill, either filling up the endorsement with an order to a particular person, or leaving it custodier on the vendor's order will imply the custodier's previous assent to hold the whole goods as the vendee's agent, unless there be express indications of an intention on his part to deal differently in relation to distinct portions of the goods. The change of constructive possession, where it is authorized by the order or contract without any physical acts required to be first done, is effected at once by the custodier's assent to convert himself from the seller's into the buyer's agent. That assent is an indivisible mental act, which in this case instantly completes the transference of the property; and the physical delivery which is afterwards given by the custodier, as now the agent of the vendee, cannot affect the question. Where the custodier, before delivery can be given, is bound by his authority to perform some physical operation on the goods, consisting of a series of separate acts—as to weigh and deliver a number of barrels, or count and deliver the whole of an unascertained number of hides—nice questions may arise as to whether the constructive possession is changed as to each portion of the goods as it undergoes the operation, or whether the change is suspended till the operation be completed upon the whole goods. That there is nothing inconsistent in the idea of the constructive possession being in certain cases changed progressively or by instalments, according to the progress of the preliminary operation on the goods, is proved by the case of Black v Rowan, 1867, 6 Macph. 136; but the conditions of the question will not always be the same. There can, however, be no question that the tradition is perfect as to each portion which the buyer actually receives from the vendor's actual possession into his own possession, of a larger quantity in the course of protracted delivery. The solution of the questions alluded to as possible in the case where a countermand is given while a custodier has performed this preliminary operation as to part only of the goods, would probably depend on the nature and objects of the operation: whether, as in the case of weighing the contents of 50 barrels, it is complete as to each barrel without reference to the weight of the rest; or whether, as in the counting of the hides, it is only complete after the whole have been included in the operation;—whether, in short, with reference to its meaning and purpose, it is a divisible or indivisible operation. As the custodier's assent may be given prospectively and in advance (Salter v Woollams, 2 M. and G. 650; Wood v Manley, 11 Ad. and El. 34; Benj. Sale, 503, 615), the inception of the preliminary operation would probably be held to establish that assent as given prospectively as to the whole, but subject to the proper and sufficient performance of the condition; and the sufficiency or insufficiency of the performance in part, as compliance with the order of the seller, will then present a question having the same conditions as if the vendee had been in course of receiving delivery from the custodier of portion by portion as the operation was performed; or as if, instead of one custodier acting for the time in two characters, there had been two separate agents for vendor and vendee engaged in the operation, the one receiving the parts as they were weighed or counted by the other. (See Brodie, St. App. 877.) But all these questions are quite different from the question in Slubey v Heyward (whether partial delivery by the carrier or middleman ended the state of transitus as to the whole cargo); and the question in Slubey v Heyward was again quite different from that in Hammond v Anderson, which was, whether a warehouseman (not a carrier) who had no preliminary operation to perform in the interest of the vendor (for the weighing was merely for the buyer's own satisfaction; and, besides, it was completed as to the whole lot), did, by allowing the vendee to weigh the whole and remove part, indicate thereby an assent to become agent to hold for the vendee. If he did so assent, he necessarily in those circumstances assented as to the whole goods at once.]

¹ See the editor's note appended to this section, page 214.

blank in the name of the consignee. In the former case, the bill has the same effect as if taken originally to the person named in the endorsement; in the latter, it is equivalent to an undertaking to deliver to the holder of the bill of lading. The shipmaster is, in the common case, to hold himself as trustee for the person by whom fulfilment of the obligation in the bill of lading is demandable; for the consignee named in the bill or in the endorsement; or for the person holding a legal conveyance from him; or for him who holds the blank endorsement.

The endorsement and delivery of the bill of lading is thus, without intimation, good delivery to the buyer. The nature of the shipmaster's contract is, that he binds himself to deliver to the holder the goods shipped, and to hold those goods for him who shall, by endorsement, acquire right to the bill of lading. No intimation, therefore, is necessary to convert the possession; but the delivery of the document, upon the sight of which the shipmaster is bound to give up the goods, and without which he cannot be forced or entitled to do so, transfers at once the right and the civil possession.¹

In England this doctrine is well established.² The cases which have occurred in Scotland upon bills of lading are comparatively few; but they establish this principle clearly, [199] that the assignment of the bill of lading is a complete transference of the property, where the question turns not upon the right to stop in transitu. This doctrine was held in a case so early as the middle of last century;³ a few years afterwards there was a similar determination;⁴

¹ [Barber v Meyerstein, 21 Feb. 1870, Law Rep. 4 H. L. 317. In this case it was also held, affirming judgments in C. P. and Ex. Ch., that as long as the shipmaster's engagement is not completely fulfilled (landing at a sufferance wharf not being such fulfilment), the bill of lading is a current instrument; and the first person who, for value, gets a transfer of one of the set of bills of lading, acquires the property of the goods represented, assuming always that the endorser has authority to sell (p. 214, note 2).] In France, no sale of a ship at sea could deprive the creditors of the seller of their right to it, but goods might be sold by the bill of lading. Valin lays down the law thus: 'We must conclude, then, that the negotiation or assignment of an invoice or bill of lading completes the transference to the person receiving them, without waiting for the actual tradition, or requiring notice, like the endorsement of a letter of exchange, or a note payable to the bearer' (vol. i. p. 608).

² 'If goods by bill of lading are consigned to A, A is the owner, and must bring the action against the master of the ship if they are lost; but if the bill be special, to be delivered to A to the use of B, B ought to bring the action. But if the bill be general to A, and the invoice only shows that they are upon the account of B, A ought always to bring the action, for the property is in him, and B has only a trust. Per totam curiam, and per Holt, Chief Justice, the consignee of a bill of lading has such a property as that he may assign it over. And Shower, J.; said that it had been adjudged so in the Exchequer.' Evans v Martlet, 1 Lord Raymond 271.

In Wright v Campbell (according to a note of it taken by Mr. Justice Buller, though it is differently reported by Sir James Burrow, vol. iv. 2046-51), Lord Mansfield laid it down, 'that ever since the case in Lord Raymond, it had always been held that the delivery of a bill of lading transferred the property at law.' 2 Term. Rep. 74.

In the case of Lickbarrow v Mason, Mr. Justice Buller said: 'It has been argued at the bar, that no case has yet been decided that a bill of lading does transfer the property; but in answer to this, it is to be observed that all the cases upon the subject (Evans v Martlet, Wright v Campbell, Cald- well v Ball), and the universal understanding of mankind, preclude that question.' 2 Term. Rep. 75. [See Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 804.]

³ M'Lauchlan & Drummond, merchants in Maryland, having borrowed from Robert Swan of Annapolis in Maryland £152, gave him an endorsed assignment to a bill of lading of 38 hogsheads of tobacco, consigned by them to James Johnston, merchant in Glasgow. The bill of lading bore delivery at the aforesaid port of Glasgow unto Mr. James Johnston, or to his assigns. The cargo was delivered to Johnston before the bill of lading came to hand, and was arrested in his hands by the creditors of the consignors. A competition arose between Swan, the endorsee to the bill of lading, and those creditors of the consignors; which, of course, turned upon the point, whether the cargo remained still the property of the consignors, or was legally transferred to the endorsee? 'It was the opinion of the Court,' says Lord Kaimes, 'that the assignment on the back of the bill of lading made a complete transference of the property to Robert Swan;' and upon that medium he was preferred. Buchanan & Cochran v Swan, 1764, M. 14208. Lord Kaimes, in reporting this case, has omitted to mention the assignable nature of the bill of lading.

⁴ In 1765, Dunlop, in Virginia, consigned some tobacco to Hastie & Jamieson, the proceeds to be applied in payment of the price of goods which Dunlop had received from them. This bill of lading was to H. & J. and their assigns. The ship arrived, and the cargo was arrested by a creditor of Dunlop, the consignor. The consignees pleaded that the property was transferred; and founded on the mercantile practice of Holland, Britain, and America. The Lord Ordinary and the Court of Session found, 'That there appears no sufficient evidence that the said Archibald Dunlop was divested of the property of the cargo in favour of Hastie & Jamieson, and consequently that the same was liable to be affected by the diligence of his creditors.' But in the House of Lords the judgment was reversed, and it was declared that the appellants Hastie and Jamieson have a special property in the cargo, and the principle was afterwards very strongly confirmed, first in the Court of Session and afterwards by the House of Lords,¹ and is now settled law.

But the custody thus held by a shipmaster is regarded as so peculiar, and so much is attached to the notion of passage while the goods are still on their voyage and undelivered, that as between the seller delivering over a bill of lading and the buyer receiving it, the delivery is not considered as equivalent to actual delivery, nor the custody as transferred to the full effect already noticed in the case of wharfingers and other custodiers. The transitus [200] is still held to subsist, and the goods may be stopped. And there is only one exception to this rule, viz. in the case of third parties who have purchased from the vendee on the faith of the bill of lading as a negotiable instrument. This important doctrine will afterwards be fully considered.²

preferable to the respondent's arrestments. Hastie & Jamieson v Arthur, M. 14209, 2 Pat. 251.

¹ Monteith was consignee of a parcel of sugars, and had a blank endorsed bill of lading. He sold the goods to Bogle while they lay on board in the harbour of Greenock, and gave over to him the bill of lading blank endorsed. Bogle gave an obligation to Dunmore & Co., the shipowners, for payment of the freight; and Monteith having become bankrupt, Dunmore & Co., as creditors of Monteith on another account, unshipped the goods, put them into their own warehouse, and refused to deliver them up till Monteith's debt was paid. There were two questions: 1. Whether, supposing the property not to be transferred to Bogle by the transference of the bill of lading, Dunmore & Co. could claim a lien or retention for a former debt? And, 2. (which is the question we are at present considering), Whether there was a transference of the property or not? 'A majority of the Court was of opinion that the proper possession of the goods was held, not by the shipmaster or owner, but through them by the shipper, and then by the endorsee to the bill of lading animo; delivery of possession being made in an effectual manner, and such alone as the case was capable of: and therefore they sustained Bogle's claim for the goods as legally transferred to him. Bogle v Dunmore, 1787, M. 14216. This judgment was affirmed on appeal.

But the Court found, in the case of Young v Stein's Crs., 1789, M. 14218, that an endorser of a bill of lading to a factor was not such a transference of the possession as to entitle him to insist that the vessel, when driven back to her port, should set sail, that he might have retention for advances previously made. [See also Balfour v Baxter, 1852, 24 Jur. 290.]

² [Much misapprehension as to the precise legal effect of the endorsement of a bill of lading having arisen from the famous opinion of Buller, J., in Lickbarrow v Mason, so often referred to by Professor Bell, and the misapprehension having also apparently extended itself to the cognate subject of delivery orders of other kinds, it may be proper to point out that most of the positions on this subject of endorsement of bills of lading contended for by him in that case were overruled, and that the course of subsequent decisions has gone to affirm the doctrine laid down on this point by Lord Loughborough in Exchequer Chamber. Mr. J. Buller's doctrine was, that the endorsement of a bill of lading of itself transfers the property in the goods, in the same way that the mere endorsement of a bill of exchange of itself carries to the endorsee the right to the contents. It is now settled that the mere endorsement of a bill of lading, irrespective of the endorser's title to or authority over the goods, and of any antecedent contract between endorser and endorsee for the transfer of the property, absolute or qualified, does not confer on the endorsee any legal right of property or possession in the goods. The validity and measure of the right or interest transferred by endorsement of the bill of lading depends on the title of the endorser, and the terms of the transaction in furtherance of which the endorsement is made. All that the mere endorsement confers on the endorsee is a bare authority to receive the goods; and that authority may, as matter of evidence, go far to show that he has also acquired, by some valid titulus transferendi domini underlying the endorsement, a right of property and possession in them (see Dracachi v The Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Co., Law Rep. 3 C. P. 190, 37 L. J. C. P. 71); but unless there be such a title or authority in the endorser, and such a bargain with the endorsee as would, independently of the endorsement, give an interest in the goods, the endorsee acquires no interest in them by the mere endorsement. If the holder of the bill of lading has no interest in the goods, and no authority from the real owner to sell an interest in them, he cannot (in cases to which the Factors Acts do not apply) give to his endorsee any title in the goods, although the endorsee has bona fide given value for the endorsement. The endorsement of a bill of lading gives no better right to the goods than the endorser himself had (except in cases where an agent entrusted with it may transfer it to a bona fide holder under the Factors Acts); so that if the owner should lose, or have stolen from him, a bill of lading endorsed in blank, the finder or thief could confer no title upon an innocent third person, even for value paid. The actual possession which the shipmaster holds is constructively the legal possession of the owner of the goods; and that possession will, by the endorsement, become constructively the legal possession of the endorsee for all purposes (except that of terminating the transitus as between vendor and vendee), provided the endorsement is made by the owner or by his authority, and in furtherance of a transaction intended to confer the legal possession on the endorsee; but not otherwise except under the Factors Acts. Neither the property and possession, nor the legal right to the property or the possession, runs with the endorsement and delivery of the paper. (Lord Loughborough in Mason v Lickbarrow, 1 H. Bl. 357; Eyre, C. J., in Haille v Smith, 1 B. and P. 570; Lord Ellenborough in Coxe v Harden, 4 East 211; Newsom v Thornton, 6 East 17; and Waring v Coxe, 1 Camp. 369; Patten v Thompson, 5 M. and S. 350; Gurney v Behrend, 3 E. and B.

SUBSECTION IV.—TRANSFERENCE BY DELIVERY TO A THIRD PERSON AS REPRESENTING THE BUYER.

The acts of delivery which have been enumerated may, as already said, be performed either to the buyer in person, or to those employed to act as his hands,—his servants,

622, 23 L. J. Q. B. 265—per Lord Campbell, C. J.; and see Coventry v Gladstone, L. R. 6 Eq. 44; Blackburn on Sale, pp. 270–297.) Of course the title of bona fide third persons receiving an endorsement for value from the vendee will prevail against the vendor who has actually sold and transferred the bill of lading to the vendee, although he may have been induced by the vendee's fraud to do so. (Pease v Gloahac, L. R. 1 P. C. App. 219, 3 Moore P. C. N. S. 556. See Benj. Sale, pp. 318–330; Brown, Sale, Nos. 599–602.) The endorsement of a bill of lading, though made without qualification appearing in græmio of the writing, will create only a right of security, and not of property, if the agreement on which it is given is restricted to that purpose (Re Westzynthus, 5 B. and Ad. 817; and Blackb. Sale, p. 295. Spalding v Ruding, 6 Beav. 376, 15 L. J. Ch. 374; Berndtson v Strang, L. R. 4 Eq. 486, note); and its effect will be restrained, if it is made with some more limited purpose, to what the maker intended, unless the endorsee be a factor within the Acts. In Lickbarrow's case, Lord Loughborough laid down the law in terms which deserve to be kept in view in reference to the whole class of documents which are intended to regulate the transfer of possession. 'A bill of lading is the written evidence of a contract for the carriage and delivery of goods sent by sea for a certain freight. The contract in legal language is a contract of bailment. 2 Lord Raym. 912. In the usual form of the contract the undertaking is to deliver to the order or assigns of the shipper. By the delivery on board, the shipmaster acquires a special property to support that possession which he holds in the right of another, and to enable him to perform his undertaking. The general property remains with the shipper of the goods until he has disposed of it by some act sufficient in law to transfer property. The endorsement of the bill of lading is simply a direction of the delivery of the goods. When this endorsement is in blank, the holder of the bill of lading may receive the goods, and his receipt will discharge the shipmaster; but the holder of the bill, if it came into his hands casually, without any just title, can acquire no property in the goods. A special endorsement defines the person appointed to receive the goods; his receipt or order would, I conceive, be a sufficient discharge to the shipmaster, and in this respect I hold the bill of lading to be assignable. But what is it that the endorsement of a bill of lading assigns to the holder or the endorsee? A right to receive the goods, and to discharge the shipmaster as having performed his undertaking. If any further effect be allowed to it, the possession of a bill of lading would have greater force than the actual possession of the goods. Possession of goods is prima facie evidence of title; but that possession may be precarious, as of a deposit; it may be criminal, as of a thing stolen; it may be qualified, as of things in the custody of a servant, carrier, or factor. Their possession without a just title gives no property; and the person to whom such possession is transferred by delivery must take his hazard of the title of his author. . . . Bills of lading may be assigned for as many different purposes as goods may be delivered. They may be endorsed to the true owner of the goods by the freighter, who acts merely as his servant. They may be endorsed to a factor to sell for the owner. They may be endorsed by the seller of the goods to the buyer. They are not drawn in any certain form. They sometimes do, and sometimes do not, express on whose account and risk the goods are shipped. They often, especially in time of war, express a false account and risk. They seldom, if ever, bear upon the face of them any indication of the purpose of the endorsement. . . . To such an instrument it seems impossible to apply the same rules as govern the endorsement of bills of exchange. . . . If bills of lading are not negotiable as bills of exchange, and yet are assignable, what is the consequence? That the assignee by endorsement must inquire under what title the bills have come to the hands of the person who takes them. Is this more difficult than to inquire into the title by which goods are sold or assigned? . . . Is it, then, nothing that an assignee of a bill of lading gains by the endorsement? He has all the right the endorser could give him—a title to the possession of the goods when they arrive. He has a safe security if he has dealt with an honest man. . . . The conclusions which follow from this reasoning, if it be just, are: 1st, That an order to direct the delivery of goods endorsed on a bill of lading, is not equivalent, nor even analogous, to the assignment of an order to pay money by the endorsement of a bill of exchange. . . . 3d, That it is not negotiable as a bill, but assignable; and passes such right, and no better, as the person assigning had in it. This last proposition I confirm by the consideration, that actual delivery of the goods does not of itself transfer an absolute ownership in them without a title of property; and that the endorsement of a bill of lading, as it cannot in any case transfer more right than the actual delivery, cannot in every case pass the property; and I therefore infer that the mere endorsement can in no case convey an absolute property.' This reasoning is confirmed by Lord Campbell, C. J., in Gurney v Behrend, where he said: 'The bill of lading only represents the goods, and the transfer of the symbol does not operate more than a transfer of what is represented.' It places bills of lading, and the endorsements of them (except where the Factors Acts interfere), on the footing of being mere documents regulating or symbolically representing physical possession, and not in themselves, and apart from an antecedent titulus, carrying any title or right of any kind but the naked authority to receive or hold that possession. However unqualified the terms of the order to deliver possession may be, it is not to be dealt with as an ex facie absolute title to the goods, or as a document professing to deal with right or title at all. It requires no qualification to prevent it operating as a conveyance of the holder's title; for it is to be taken as meant exclusively to regulate the mere physical possession of the goods, which must be the same, whether it is to complete a sale, a security, a donation, or a bailment. Yet, of course, even in this view it may be qualified; for even a naked authority to receive physical possession may be intended to operate only on condition. See Mitchell v Ede, 9 L. J. Q. B. 187. The same law must apply to any other delivery order. Yet the Court of Session, in Hamilton v The Western Bank, 1856, 19 D. 152, and in subsequent cases, have dealt with such orders as ex clerks, and agents, having orders from him to take final delivery in his name, and into his stock.¹

1. Where a buyer sends his servant, or commissions his clerk, or empowers any third party as his factor and special agent, to receive delivery of goods bought by him, the delivery so received will be considered as effectual to divest the seller, and effect a complete transfer of the property, as if the delivery were made into his own hands.²

2. Delivery even to a wharfinger, authorized to receive goods in his warehouse as into the buyer's stock, and where the buyer is accustomed to hold goods so delivered as at their ultimate destination for his behoof, is delivery as effectual as if made into the buyer's own warehouse.³

[201] 3. Delivery to a third person for behoof of the buyer, and to abide the buyer's orders for their future destination, is complete delivery, to all purposes.⁴

facie absolute written titles to moveables, disregarding the real purpose of the antecedent transaction, which these orders for delivery of possession were meant to explicate. See Pochin v Robinow, 1869, 7 Macph. 622; and also as connected with this subject, Connal & Co. v Loder, et al., 1868, 6 Macph. 1095; and the observations of the Lord President in MacKinnon v Nanson & Co., 1868, 40 Sc. Jur. 560. Hamilton v Western Bank is seriously invalidated by Young v Lambert, 1870, 39 L. J. P. C. Ca. 21, on all the points taken in the judgment of the Inner House. There appears to be grave reason for reconsidering these determinations.]

¹ 'Per procuratorem, tutorem, curatoremve,' says Paulus, 'possessio nobis acquiritur.' And Ulpian says: 'Procurator si quidem mandante domino rem emerit protinus illi acquirit possessionem.' Dig. lib. 41, tit. 2; De acquir. vel. am. possess. l. 1, sec. 20, and l. 42, sec. 1. See also Cod. lib. 7, tit. 32; De acquir. poss. l. 1.

The doctrines of the civil law on this point are well summed up in a few words by Pothier:—'La tradition réelle est celle qui se fait par une préhension corporelle de la chose, faite par celui à qui on entend en faire la tradition, ou par quelqu'un de sa part. Lorsque la chose est un meuble corporel, la tradition réelle s'en fait à une personne, en la remettant entre ses mains, ou en celles d'une autre qui la reçoit pour elle de son ordre. Par exemple, si j'ai acheté un livre chez une libraire, ce libraire me fait la tradition réelle de ce livre en me le remettant entre les mains, ou entre les mains de mon domestique par qui je l'ai envoyé querir.' Pothier, Tr. du droit de Propriété, No. 195, vol. iv. p. 417. See also Tr. de la Possession, No 49 et seq., vol. iv. p. 539.

Possession is by Lord Stair defined 'the holding or detaining of anything, by ourselves or others, for our use;' and he proceeds to show, that a person 'who detains or holds a thing not at all for his own use, but for another's, who doth detain by him as a servant or procurator, doth not possess:' the possession is in the principal. B. ii. tit. 1, sec. 17. And in another place he lays down the law, that a mandator, or agent, empowered to act for others, 'may acquire, transact, or contract, immediately in name of his constituent; in which case the real right stands immediately in the person of the mandant, and the obligation constitutes him creditor,' etc. B. i. tit. 12, sec. 16.

² Such, accordingly, is pretty universally the law of the continental states. Cassaregi Discursus de Commercio, Disc. 38, Nos. 51, 52.

This doctrine was very early admitted by the Court of Session in the case of Prince v Pallet, where goods having been ordered to be sent by a particular shipmaster, were held actually delivered when put into the shipmaster's hands. Udney having ordered three tuns of wine from Bordeaux by one Gillespie's ship, the wine was delivered to Gillespie, who put it on board. Udney's circumstances becoming suspicious, the foreign merchant wrote to a correspondent in this country to receive the goods from the skipper when they arrived, and to prevent them from coming into Udney's hands. A competition arose between the seller and a creditor of the buyer arresting the goods in the hands of the shipmaster. The Court found, that the wine being delivered to the skipper upon Udney's order, the property was stated (vested) in Udney. 1680, M. 4932.

In England the doctrine seems never to have been questioned.

³ The doctrine I have laid down seems first to have been delivered by Mr. Justice Chambre in the case of Richardson v Goss, where it was not, however, necessary to determine the point. 'If it were necessary to determine the point, I should strongly incline to think, that if a man be in the habit of using the warehouse of a wharfinger as his own, and make that the repository of his goods, and dispose of them there, the journey would be at an end when the goods arrived at such warehouse.' 3 Bos. and Pul. 127.

This doctrine was adopted very fully in the subsequent case of Scott and others v Pettit. Berkly, a merchant in London, ordered goods from Walker of Manchester, which were forwarded to his address at the Bull and Mouth Inn, London. From that inn they were sent to the house of Pettit, a packer, in consequence of a general order to send all goods thither directed to Berkly. Berkly lived in lodgings, and had no warehouse of his own; and on the goods arriving at Pettit's house, they were booked for Berkly, and unpacked by Pettit on his account. Berkly absconded, and the seller reclaimed the goods. In a question between him and the assignees of Berkly's estate, the question was, Whether the goods were actually delivered? and the Court of Common Pleas held that they were, that there was no ulterior destination, and that the transitus was at an end. 3 Bos. and Pul. 469. [See also Rowe v Pickford, 8 Taunt. 83; Wentworth v Outhwaite, 10 M. and W. 436. Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 554. Add. Cont. 6th ed. 203.]

⁴ Dixon v Baldwen, 1804. Battiers, traders in London, were in the custom of sending orders to Baldwen for goods to be forwarded to Metcalf & Co. at Hull, in order to be shipped

4. Delivery to a factor authorized to dispose of the goods, or to send them on a new destination, or to the best market, has been held complete delivery to all intents and purposes.¹

5. Delivery to a person on the part of the buyer, though not for the purpose of terminating the transit, and bringing the goods to their ultimate destination, but merely that the goods may be forwarded in their journey and transitus to the buyer, on the ultimate destination which he has given them, is good delivery, the price being paid. But it has been held, that where in such a case the price is not paid, the transit is not irrevocable. The person who receives the goods is considered merely as a middleman; receiving goods as for the buyer, but still holding a lien as for the seller.² See sec. 2, Stopping in transitu.

for Hamburg; and when the goods arrived at Hull, the Battiers sent orders to Metcalf & Co., where and to whom to send the goods at Hamburg. The goods in question were thus sent: They were, by direction of the Battiers, sent in packages with a certain mark, 'for order, and to be forwarded to Messrs. Metcalf & Sons, to be shipped for Hamburg as usual.' The Battiers failed; the sellers went to Hull and stopped the goods, four bales having been actually on board for Hamburg. One question in the case was, Whether the delivery had been completed to the buyer? Lord Ellenborough thought the delivery complete: 'The goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey, that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantive destination, and without such orders they would continue stationary.' Lawrence and Le Blanc, J., agreed with him. Grose, J., held 'that the right to stop in transitu was not at an end when the vendors took possession of the goods.' 5 East 175, 188.

¹ Leeds, etc. v Wright, 1803, 3 Bos. and Pul. 320. The doctrine confirmed, 5 East 175. Dixon v Baldwin. See preceding note. [Add. Cont. 203.]

² [Throughout these pages it must be kept in view that the author's desire to treat stoppage in transitu, not as an anomalous remedy of equitable origin, but as a natural and consistent development of the legal principles of the contract of sale, have forced him to remould the legal doctrine of delivery in a quite inadmissible way. It is sometimes said that stoppage is an extension of the seller's lien in England, and his right of retention in Scotland; but this statement, which is only a rude and imperfect illustration, becomes with the author a statement of the precise legal principle and rationale of stoppage. But then the impossibility of conceiving a lien or right of retention to exist after the goods have been delivered to the vendee or his agent, forces him to assert the principle, that wherever stoppage is competent there has been no delivery, or only an imperfect, or, as he calls it, a constructive delivery; and hence a great many refinements and distinctions between acts which are and those which are not delivery; and sometimes, as here, the same act and tenure of possession is held to be or not to be delivery on a criterion, such as payment or non-payment of the price, which has nothing to do with the possession, but solely with the right of stoppage. The author holds that goods are liable to stoppage because they are not yet perfectly delivered, nor the exercise of the vendor's lien or retention yet rendered impossible, and that stoppage is just an exercise of these rights prolonged. But when the question comes round to this, On what principle goods put on shipboard for a vendee can be held imperfectly delivered, or the possession of the owner not given up,

—really his answer is just an attempt to set up their liability to stoppage as a criterion to distinguish between perfect and imperfect delivery, and so his argument moves round in a vicious circle. In the text, he deals with the case of goods shipped to a vendee. If the price is paid, of course they cannot be stopped; if it is not paid, they can. But suppose there are two separate portions of one cargo shipped by a vendor to a vendee, under the same bill of lading, one paid and the other not paid: there is no distinction in regard to the delivery given, or the possession held, which can be drawn between the one and the other. Yet, as there is a distinction between the portions in the matter of liability to stoppage, and as, according to the author, stoppage is a consequence of incomplete delivery, he is forced to make the incompleteness of delivery, which he asserts to exist in the one case, consist in the fact that the price has not been paid, and the completeness of the delivery in the other in the payment. But the payment or non-payment cannot alter the fact as to the nature of the possession received and held by the master under the single bill of lading, the terms of which apply to both portions of the cargo alike. For whom the master holds possession of the goods, is a matter depending on the terms and conditions on which the vendor put them into his custody, as these are expressed in the bill of lading; and if the result is, as to one portion, that he holds them for the vendee, then how—the same terms being applicable to the other portion—can his possession of the latter portion be different from his possession of the former? The simple question in regard to the transference of the property is, For whom does the shipmaster receive and hold the possession entrusted to him by the vendor? Is it for the vendor or the vendee? Of course, if a seller wishes to prevent the legal possession and the property from passing from him, he may deliver the goods to the shipmaster on such terms as shall make the latter his own agent, to receive and hold the actual possession for him, and not for the vendee. (Turner v Trs. of the Liverpool Docks, 20 L. J. Ex. 393, 6 Ex. 543; Ellershaw v Magniac, 6 Ex. 570; Van Casteel v Booker, 2 Exch. 691; Waite v Baker, 2 Ex. 1; Walley v Montgomery, 3 East 585; Jenkins v Brown, 19 L. J. Q. B. 286; Abbot, Shipping, 11th ed. p. 284; MacLachlan, Shipping, 589.) But where the bailment is not of this special character, but is merely a delivery of goods to a shipmaster as a common carrier for conveyance to the vendee, there is no question that the law holds the carrier to represent the vendee, as his agent for the purpose of receiving and holding the goods for him, and that the possession of the carrier is the possession of the vendee. It is well settled that the delivery of goods to a common carrier, à fortiori to one specially designated by the purchaser, for

6. Where goods are bought to be delivered to the buyer at a distance,¹ and having arrived at their journey's end, are put into the hands of a wharfinger, or into a public warehouse or cellar, not at the desire and appointment of the buyer, but for the convenience of the carrier or shipmaster, and to wait the appearance of the buyer to claim them,—this is not delivery to pass the property: the goods are still in the hands conveyance to him or to a place designated by him, constitutes a receipt by the purchaser. In such cases the carrier is in contemplation of law the bailee of the person to whom, not of the person by whom, the goods are sent; the latter, in employing the carrier, being considered as an agent of the former for that purpose. (Dawes v Peck, 8 T. R. 330; Waite v Baker, 2 Ex. 1; Fragano v Long, 4 B. and C. 219; Dunlop v Lambert, 6 Cl. and F. 600; Meredith v Meigh, 2 El. and Bl. 364; Cusack v Robinson, 1 B. and S. 299; Hart v Bush, E. B. and E. 494, 27 L. J. Q. B. 271; Smith v Hudson, 34 L. J. Q. B. 145; Dutton v Solomonson, 3 B. and P. 582—per Lord Alvanley, C. J.; King v Meredith, 2 Camp. 639; Vale v Bayle, Cowp. 294; Abbot, Shipping, 284, 11th ed.; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 130, 514; Atkinson on Sale, p. 199 et seq.; Harle v Ogilvie, 24 Jan. 1749, M. 10095; Prince v Pallet, M. 4932; Brodie, Stair, App. 859; Brown, Sale, No. 522.) If, however, the vendor should sell the goods, undertaking to make the delivery himself at a distant place, the carrier is the vendor's agent; Dunlop v Lambert, 6 Cl. and F. 600; Benj. Sale, p. 514. Such, then, in the ordinary case, being the character in which the carrier receives and holds the goods, viz. as the agent of the vendee, it is obvious that the constructive possession acquired by the vendee through him amounts to tradition of the property, just as in the case of constructive possession acquired through a warehouseman who has assented under a delivery order from the vendor, to assume the character of agent for the vendee. The notion that the carrier 'receives the goods as for the buyer, but still holds a lien as for the seller,' or, as it is put at p. 233, 'receives the goods for the preservation of the seller's lien on the one hand, and the buyer's right of property on the other,' is quite untenable. It seems to be an attempt to escape from the consequences of the fact, that the corporeal possession of the goods had been given up to a person representing the buyer, which, as the author admits, vests the property in the buyer. This can only be accomplished by delivery; yet, as the right of stoppage may still exist, the attempt is made to represent the carrier's agency to receive possession as neutral or as double, and the delivery of a peculiar and imperfect kind. Without referring to the difficulties of the carrier holding, while possessing for the vendee, the English vendor's adverse right of lien for the unpaid price, it is sufficient to say that the notion of a neutral or double agency is quite inconceivable on the principles of Scotch law. By that law the seller has no lien; his right of retention is the assertion of a right of undivested property. How the carrier whom the seller, as the buyer's agent for that purpose, has employed to receive and hold the goods for the buyer, and as the buyer's property, can have employed him at the same time to hold them as his, the seller's, undivested property, or how the carrier could undertake both agencies at once, it is difficult to conceive.

The right of stoppage in transitu is not a consequence of the seller's property or possession being undivested, and its competency does not interfere with, but presupposes, delivery.

'To put goods in a state of transitus, the seller must have parted with the possession of the goods. Unless the seller has parted with the possession, his remedy is not stoppage in transitu, but in Scotland retention, and in England an exercise of the seller's right of lien.' Per Lord President in Black v Rowan, 1867, 6 Macph. 136.]

¹ [The case meant is, where the buyer stipulates or the seller undertakes that he, the seller, shall make delivery, not on shipboard, but at the place of the buyer's residence, or some other place of delivery at a distance from the seller. In such a case the buyer has not the usual animus to receive possession on shipboard, nor any animus to receive but at the place designated, nor the seller authority to employ the carrier to receive and hold for the buyer; and the corporeal possession of the carrier, therefore, does not vest the buyer with the property. (See Warnkenig, Inst. Juris Rom. Privati, sec. 303; Benj. Sale, p. 514.) Where the buyer has given orders as to the particular carrier or class of carriers by whom the goods are to be sent, the animus to receive or hold possession by any other agent being wanting, it seems that delivery to any other as on the buyer's account will not merely make the risk return to the vendor, but will prevent the property itself from passing to the vendee by means of the corporeal possession of one whom the vendee has excluded from being his agent. See Harle v Ogilvie, 1749, M. 10095, where the buyer having ordered sugars to come with convoy, and the seller having sent them by a vessel sailing without convoy, which escaped capture, but arrived with the sugar damaged by water, the Court held, not only that the seller stood to all risks on the voyage, but, in the words of Lord Kilkerran, that 'the property itself was certainly not transferred by the putting on board, as it would have been had the ship come under convoy: that was in suspense till her arrival. Till they arrived at the port of delivery, the property of the sugars was not transferred to the defender.' In all these cases the carrier is the seller's agent; and his possession, the seller's possession, till it is divested by delivery to the buyer, or some agent entitled to receive possession for him, or in his right. Any sub-agent employed by the carrier (who is himself in this case the vendor's agent) as a hand to continue his possession, will not by such employment be an agent to receive or hold possession for the vendee. His possession, like the carrier's, will be the vendor's possession. But he, as well as the carrier, may enter expressly or by implication into a new agreement, distinct from the original contract to carry or to hold as the hand of the carrier—to hold for the vendee as his agent; and such agreement will be effectual to change the possession from that of the vendor to that of the vendee, provided the vendee had right at that time and place to take possession, or to waive further carriage or custody by the vendor under the contract between the vendor and vendee. Allan v Gripper, 3 Cr. and Jer. 218, 2 Tyr. 217; Foster v Frampton, 6 B. and C. 107. Acts of the vendee, such as claiming, marking, or sampling, do not of themselves consti-

of the seller's agent, till they are taken possession of by the buyer. But if, while the goods remain in this situation, the buyer claim the goods, and mark them as his, the delivery is completed.¹

7. The exercising of any other act of ownership on goods in the above-mentioned [202] situation, such as tasting and taking samples, would seem to be sufficient to complete the transit.² But it would rather seem, that a creditor arresting the goods while under detention, would not be held to have taken actual delivery on the part of the buyer, his debtor. His right as arrester is entirely dependent on that of his debtor; and he has no power as representative, or under any conveyance, express or tacit, to take possession of his debtor's property.³ The trustee or assignee for the general creditors may, in England, take delivery for the buyer; and the courts of England have held the marking of the goods by the [203] assignee as actual delivery.⁴

8. There is another important class of cases, where goods are delivered to shipmasters and carriers for carriage to the buyer. We have already considered the case of goods transferred while in the hands of shipmasters or carriers: the point now to be considered is, how far the shipmaster or carrier to whom goods are delivered for the purpose of being transported to the buyer, or according to his order, takes delivery for the buyer? 1. Where the goods are delivered to the shipmaster of a GENERAL ship, on a bill of lading taken in name of the seller or consignor, and afterwards endorsed to the buyer; or on a bill of lading to the bearer, which is afterwards delivered to the buyer;⁵ or on a bill of lading to the tute a change of the constructive possession in the hands of the carrier or sub-agent, and have not in themselves any effect as matter of law on the character in which the possession of the goods is held. They are no more than evidence showing the intention of the parties as to the capacity in which that possession is to be held; see Jones v Jones, 8 M. and W. 431; Dixon v Yates, 5 B. and Ad. 313; Blackb. Sale, p. 252. It is clear that the mere arrival of the goods at the spot where the purchaser meant them to be taken possession of, is not equivalent to his possession without something amounting to a delivery of actual possession to him or his appointee, or an agreement to change the character of the custody; James v Griffin, 2 M. and W. 623; Crawshay v Eades, 1 B. and C. 181; Bolton v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 35 L. J. C. P. 137.]

¹ Ellis, etc. v Hunt, 3 Term. Rep. 464, 470.

See also Stoveld v Hughes, 14 East 308.

² See the cases of Wright v Lawes, and the case referred to by Lord Ellenborough, as adjudged in the House of Lords, supra, p. 196, note 4. The inference from those cases to the point stated in the text seems to be clear.

³ In Trompousky & Co. v Niesh, 1807, Hume 693, the question was in some degree complicated, but the result rather tends to confirm this position. Niesh bought hemp from Trompousky & Co. of Riga. The goods did not arrive till after Niesh had failed, and left Arbroath. There being no person to receive them, the shipmaster lodged them in a public warehouse, where they were arrested by a creditor of Niesh's. The shippers afterwards, in the action of forthcoming, appeared by a mandatory, to whom they had endorsed the bill of lading, and pleaded that this appearance was equivalent to stoppage in transitu. The question lay between the seller and the arresting creditor. The Judge-Admiral preferred the arresting creditor, 'in respect the hemp in question was not attached or stopped in transitu by the vendors prior to the arrestment.' The Court of Session altered this judgment, and preferred the sellers, on the ground that the buyer had left Arbroath before the goods arrived, and that there was no person to receive delivery.

Smith v Goss, 1 Camp. 282, was a similar decision in England. Scaiffe ordered from Smith of Birmingham some packages of hardware, which he directed to be forwarded to him at Newcastle; 'and if sent by London, to be addressed to the care of Goss, Bull Wharf, with directions to send them by the first vessel for Newcastle.' The goods were so sent accordingly to Goss; and, while with him, Scaiffe wrote to Smith that he was insolvent, and declined accepting the goods. On this Smith stopped the goods in Goss's hands. In the meanwhile, the goods were attached by process out of the Lord Mayor's Court, at the instance of a creditor of Scaiffe. Lord Ellenborough held Smith entitled to recover his goods, as they had been sent to Goss for the purpose of being forwarded to Newcastle, were merely at a stage upon their transit, and could not be considered as having reached their final destination when at the wharfinger's in London. He also held, that the right of the seller to stop in transitu could not be defeated by the process out of the Mayor's Court, at the suit of the attaching creditor, who could have no greater right in the goods than Scaiffe himself.

⁴ See the case of Ellis v Hunt, note 1.

⁵ [As to documents the effect of which, if valid, would be to give a floating right of action to any person who may become possessed of them, such as a bill of lading deliverable to the bearer might perhaps be considered to be, see Dixon v Bovill, 3 Macq. H. L. C. 1. Query, 1. Whether there is any general mercantile usage to support such a bill of lading; and, 2. Whether a bill of lading, not being a document of itself purporting to confer a title, but requiring an antecedent contract or titulus to support it (see Dracachi v Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Co., L. R., 3 C. P. 190, note, ante, p. 214), is within the scope of the Lord Chancellor's observations?]

buyer by name,—the goods are effectually delivered¹ to pass the property, but are still subject to stoppage.² 2. Where goods are delivered to a common land-carrier;³ or to the wharfinger of a smack company; or on board a smack with an address to the buyer,—the goods are effectually delivered to the buyer, so as to pass the property; but while they remain in the hands of the carrier or shipmaster, they are subject to stoppage.⁴ 3. Where,

¹ This case has already been considered. See above, pp. 216, 217, with the cases in notes.

² See below, Of Stoppage in transitu.

³ Dunlop v Scott & Co. Bowie, a travelling merchant, ordered goods from Scott & Co. of Glasgow. The goods were sent in a chest to the carrier between Glasgow and Edinburgh, and the carrier's clerk gave this receipt for the chest: 'Received from Scott & Co. a chest, directed to William Bowie, Edinburgh, which we promise to deliver in good order, and which was directed to lie till called for.' On arrival, the chest was placed in the warehouse of the carrier's agent at Edinburgh, and was there arrested by a creditor of Bowie. Scott & Co. then demanded the goods as unpaid for; and the Court held them entitled to stop them as in transitu. 22 Feb. 1814, 17 Fac. Coll. 576.

⁴ [Delivery by a vendor to a carrier or shipmaster of goods to be conveyed to a vendee is, in the ordinary case, delivery to the vendee, whose agent the carrier or shipmaster becomes (Abbott, p. 284). A fortiori will delivery on board ship be prima facie delivery into the vendee's possession, if the vendee is owner of the ship, or even, where the vessel is not the vendee's property, if she be chartered by him under a charter-party whereby the master is not the servant of the shipowner, but the immediate servant of the vendee. Ogle v Atkinson, 5 Taunt. 759; M'Taggart v Kymer, cited 3 East 396; Blackb. Sale, 243. But, by means of a special bailment or contract with the carrier, the vendor may reserve to himself the possession while the goods are in the hands of the carrier, who in that case becomes his special agent to hold possession for him; and delivery of the goods on such terms will be effectual to continue the legal possession in the vendor, even though the ship be the vendee's property, or the master his immediate servant. The essential question is, on whose behalf the possession is received and continues to be held by the master; and in the case of a shipment, the evidence of that will largely, but not entirely, turn on the form of the bill of lading, and how it is dealt with, and also to some extent on the invoices, correspondence, etc., between the parties. In Turner v The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (20 L. J. Ex. 393), a vendor delivering goods into the vendee's own ship was held to have restrained the effect of such delivery by taking bills of lading for the goods deliverable to his own order, or assigns, and that although they also contained the clause, 'he or they paying freight nothing,—being owner's property.' Mr. J. Pattison says: 'There was not, therefore' (i.e. on account of the terms of the bill of lading), 'a delivery of the cotton to the purchasers as owners, although there was a delivery on board their ship. The vendors still reserved to themselves, at the time of delivery to the captain, the jus disponendi of the goods, which he by signing the bill of lading acknowledged, and without which it may be assumed that the vendors would not have delivered them at all.' Then, after referring to the terms of the invoices, which stated that the cotton was shipped 'by order and for account and risk of the vendees, and addressed to order;' and to the expressions in the bill of lading as to freight, which had been relied on as showing that the delivery on board the ship was made with intention to pass the property absolutely, it is said: 'But the operative terms of the bill of lading and letter . . . show too clearly for doubt, that, notwithstanding the other terms of the bill of lading and invoices, the vendors had no intention, when they delivered the cotton on board, of parting with the dominion over it, or vesting the absolute property in the bankrupts. . . . The only effect to be attributed to the form and expression of the invoice or bill of lading would be as indicating the terms upon which the goods were delivered.' It was further held, that it made no difference on the fact of the master's possession being the vendor's, that the master, by signing a bill of lading deliverable to order or assigns, might have exceeded his authority. (It will be noticed that, this being an executory sale of the cotton, the delivery was necessary to pass the property and right of possession, and that such a case is quite available to us as a decision on the point of delivery. See Atkinson, Sale, 199.) In Ellershaw v Magniac (6 Ex. 570), it was held, notwithstanding various correspondence tending to show an opposite intention, that the vendors who, under an executory contract of sale, had shipped linseed on board a vessel specially sent by the vendee for it, had, by taking a bill of lading for the linseed deliverable to their own order or assigns, clearly shown the intention to preserve the right of property and possession in themselves, until they should make an assignment of the bill of lading to some other person, and that there was therefore no such delivery as to vest the right of property or possession in the vendee. So in Waite v Baker (17 L. J. Ex. 307), where the contract of sale was executory, and the charter-party made by the vendor in the vendee's name, but the bill of lading taken to the vendor's order or assigns, Parke, B., in delivering judgment, said: 'By the original contract, no property passed. Therefore, to deprive the original owner of the property, you must show that at some subsequent period the property passed. Now, in this case, it is said that the delivery on board ship is equivalent to a delivery to the vendee, because the ship was engaged by Lethbridge (the vendor) as agent for the defendant. But assuming that were so, the actual delivery on board was not a delivery to the defendant, but a delivery to the captain, to be carried under a bill of lading. Now the bill of lading indicates for whom the master of the vessel is to carry the goods; he agrees thereby to carry them as agent for and on account of Lethbridge, and to deliver them to Lethbridge if he does not make an assignment of the bill of lading, and to deliver to the assignee of the bill of lading if it is afterwards assigned. Then the master continues in possession of the property, not as in the case of an ordinary common carrier, but as a person carrying on behalf of Lethbridge. . . . Therefore the act of delivery did not pass the property in this case.' So in Van Casteel v Booker (18 L. J. Ex. 9), it was held that the taking of a bill of lading by the vendor for goods to be for goods so delivered, a receipt is granted to the buyer by the carrier or clerk of the shipping company, with the consent or by the direction of the seller, this is effectual delivery delivered to his own order, though shipped freight-free on board the vendee's own vessel, proved prima facie that the goods were shipped for the vendor, and that the possession would continue his possession till determined by his subsequent dealing with the bill of lading; but that it was a question of fact for the jury, in the whole circumstances, notwithstanding the form of the bill of lading, whether or not the goods were put on board to be carried for, and on account of, the vendees; and that, in case they were put on board with that intention, shipment on board the vendees' own ship would be final delivery, barring both right of stoppage by the vendor and power of rejection by the vendees. The jury found, notwithstanding the form of the bill of lading, that the intention had been to make a delivery vesting the property at once in the bankrupts, and the Court refused to set the verdict aside. See also Falke v Fletcher, 34 L. J. C. P. 146; Schotsman v Lanc. and Yorkshire Ry. Co., L. R., 2 Ch. App. 332; Shepherd v Harrison, 38 L. J. Q. B. (Ex. Ch.) 177.

The cases seem to establish that the fact of making the bill of lading deliverable to the order of the vendor is, when not rebutted by evidence to the contrary, decisive to show his intention to preserve the jus disponendi, and to prevent the property from passing to the vendee (see, in addition to the above cases, Wilmshurst v Bowker, 2 M. and G. 792; Jenkyns v Brown, 19 L. J. Q. B. 286); but the prima facie conclusion, that the vendor reserves the jus disponendi when the bill of lading is to his order, may be rebutted by proof that in doing so he acted as agent for the vendee, and did not intend to retain a control over the property, and it is always a question of fact for the jury to determine what the real intention was; Brown v Hare, 29 L. J. Ex. 6; Joyce v Swan, 17 C. B. N. S. 84. In Moakes v Nicholson (34 L. J. C. P. 273), a sale of coals not ascertained having been made by Josse to Pope for cash, the coals were shipped by Josse, who took three bills of lading making the coal deliverable to 'Pope or order.' Of these only one was stamped, and that Josse kept in his own hands, sending on the second with invoice to Pope. Josse being unable to get the price, sent the stamped bill to his own agent, who induced the master to give delivery to himself. The Court held that no title had passed to Josse from Pope, the retention of the stamped bill of lading being a clear indication of his intention to reserve the jus disponendi, and that his real intention was a fact for the jury. The vendor may, by a similar use of the bill of lading, retain a jus disponendi over goods shipped to order, until the performance of some condition precedent on which he is entitled to make the passing of the possession and property to the vendee depend. Thus, when the goods are agreed to be paid for by the buyer's acceptance against bills of lading, and the vendor wishes to retain the possession and property till his draft is accepted, as in this case he is in virtue of his contract entitled to do, the master will be required to give bills of lading to the order of the vendor, by whom one part unendorsed will be forwarded to the vendee, with invoices, etc., to notify the shipment, and the other part endorsed, to the agent of the vendor at the place of the vendee's residence, along with the drafts for the price, and instructions to deliver up the endorsed bill of lading to the vendee, if and when the condition of accepting the draft has been implemented; and if it is not, to receive the cargo for the vendor when the vessel arrives. Brandt v Bowlby (2 B. and Ad. 932) was a case of this kind. The Court held that the property did not vest in the vendee unless the bills of exchange sent to the agent with the endorsed bill of lading were accepted. In the earlier case of Coxe v Harden (4 East 211), the facts at first sight appear much the same, though the result was different. The property and possession of goods shipped under an executory contract on bills of lading deliverable to the vendor, were held to have passed by delivery to the vendee, notwithstanding that the endorsed bill of lading was sent to the vendor's agent for the purpose of securing the amount of his bill on the vendee, and only the unendorsed copy bill of lading went with the invoice to the vendee. The goods were actually received by the vendee's sub-purchaser, and the agent holding the endorsed bill of lading brought trover for the goods, raising the question, whether the right of property and possession had ever passed to the vendee or his sub-purchaser? The difference of this case from Brandt v Bowlby appears to be, that the original agreement between vendor and vendee was one which did not entitle the vendors to retain possession till the bills were honoured; that the directions to the captain not to deliver to the vendee, signified by the bill of lading being unendorsed, were not authorized as against the vendee, and that the actual delivery obtained from the captain, though the vendee could not have enforced it, being supported by the terms of the contract, removed any difficulty as to the terms of the bill of lading out of the way. (See Blackb. on Sale, p. 142; and also Benjamin, Sale, p. 275; Abbott, p. 293; and MacLachlan, p. 344, for other attempts at explaining Coxe v Harden.) It is quite possible by a distinctly suspensive condition to prevent the property of goods sold from passing, even though they are delivered; Macartney v Macredie's Crs., 1799; M. Sale, No. 1. If such a condition appear on the bill of lading itself, it will of course affect all persons taking it in right of the person bound by the condition; Barrow v Coles, 3 Camp. 92; Busk v Spence, 4 Camp. 329. But it will materially affect the question of construction, whether or not a condition not entered on the bill of lading is meant to be suspensive, that, instead of sending the bill of lading to an agent to see the condition performed before the bill of lading is delivered to the vendee, the vendor sends it to the vendee himself, merely asking performance of the stipulation alleged to be suspensive. (See Key v Cotesworth, 22 L. J. Ex. 4.) In Ogle v Atkinson (5 Taunt. 759) it was held that the property had passed, the goods having been delivered on board the vendee's own ship to the captain, who received them on behalf of the vendee, and as being the vendee's own goods; and the effect of that delivery was not rescinded by the vendor afterwards, by fraudulent misrepresentations, procuring bills of lading from the captain in his own favour, which were transmitted, endorsed, to an agent, with orders to transfer to a third person, unless the vendee should accept draft, which the vendor had no right to ask him to accept. (On the subject of this note, see also Blackb. Sale, pp. 135-146; Benjamin, Sale, pp. 272-289; Abbott, 283-298, 11th ed.; of the goods.¹ Such receipt is much the same with actual delivery to the buyer, and a subsequent embarkation of the goods by him on a receipt to himself. But such receipt or bill of lading by a shipmaster or carrier to the buyer will not transfer the property, if it shall have been granted without the seller's authority. And it has been ruled, (1.) That a restrictive receipt, in the seller's name, prevents the shipmaster from giving a bill of lading to the buyer. (2.) That even a general receipt is a bar to such a bill of lading, without assent [204] by the seller.² And, (3.) That while no receipt has been granted, though required by the vendor, a bill of lading granted to the vendee will not transfer the property.³ (4.) Receipts are seldom taken unless either there is an intermediate person, as a lighterman, between the shipper and the shipmaster, who is to be acquitted by the receipt; or where the goods are sent by a shipping company. In the former case the receipt is intermediate; in the latter, it generally stands instead of a bill of lading.⁴ The bill of lading is often settled without any previous receipt; but whether a receipt has been previously given or not, without authority, the master has no right to grant a bill of lading to any one but the shippers.⁵ What shall be deemed authority to this effect, is a question of usage or of evidence; in which it may occur to be tried, whether the seller, permitting the ship to sail, without [205] taking care to obtain a bill of lading, is not to be held as giving implied assent to the bill of lading that may have been granted by the master.

9. Where, after notice to stop, delivery has by accident been made, it is not delivery to the effect of passing the property.⁶

The various kinds of delivery now enumerated have the effect of transferring the property, wherever the vendee has not failed in observing or fulfilling any of the essential parts of his contract: the goods pass out of the estate of the vendor, and become part of the estate of the vendee: the creditors of the former cannot take them as part of his divisible estate: the creditors of the latter may vindicate them as the property and part of the estate of their debtor.

So far all is clear. But where the vendee has failed to observe any essential part of Maclachlan, pp. 343-348.) As to mate's receipts operating in the same way to preserve the vendor's control over goods shipped, see, besides the cases quoted by the author, Covasjee v Thomson, 5 Moore P. C. C. 165; Schuster v M'Kellar, 7 E. and B. 704, 26 L. J. Q. B. 281; Evans v Nichol, 4 Scott N. R. 43; Bryans v Nix, 4 M. and W. 775; Blackb. Sale, p. 144.]

¹ Fragano v Long, 1825, 4 Barn. and Cress. 219; Noble v Adams, 1816, Holt 248, 2 Marshall Rep. 366. [See Meletopulo v Banking, 6 Jur. 1095—per Lyndhurst, L. C.; Morton v Abercromby, 1858, 20 D. 362.]

The doctrine which was thus fully laid down had been taken for granted in Craven v Ryder, 1815 and 1816, 2 Marshall 129. See note 2. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 180.]

² Craven v Ryder, 1815, 1816, 2 Marsh. 126, 6 Taunt. 433, 1 Holt 100. Lord Chief Justice Gibbs said: 'Independently of the particular form of the receipt, I take it that the regular practice is, that the person who is in possession of the receipt is alone entitled to the bill of lading; and the captain, therefore, ought not to give the bill of lading except to the person who can give the receipt in exchange. Consequently, the person holding the receipt has a control over the goods till he has exchanged it for the bill of lading.' Mr. Justice Dallas: 'I think the jury determined properly. They said it was contrary to the course of business, and to the defendant's duty, to give up the bill of lading without the receipt; and that the plaintiffs had never parted with the property, as they kept possession of the receipt.'

³ Ruck v Hatfield, 1822, 5 Barn. and Alder. 632, where rum was bought at 1s. 5d. free on board, invoices sent to the buyer, a bill drawn and accepted, and the rum shipped, with the tender to the mate (master not on board) of a receipt as 'shipped on account of the vendors.' This was not signed, and afterwards the master signed bills of lading to the buyer's correspondent at Hamburg. On the seller again tendering the receipt, the master refused to sign it. The question was, Whether the goods were stopped as in transitu? The seller had a verdict; and a new trial was refused. See also Craven v Ryder, 1816, preceding note.

⁴ [But, as to the endorsement and transference of such receipts and shipping notes, see Jenkyns v Usborne, 7 M. and G. 678; Townley v Crump, 4 A. and E. 58; M'Ewan v Smith, 6 Bell's App. C. 340; Ackermann v Humphrey, 1 C. and P. 53; and American cases referred to by Parsons, Contracts, 3, 488, note.]

⁵ See cases of Craven and Ruck above, notes 2 and 3.

⁶ Litt v Cowley, 1816. Here a carrier, after notice to stop, had, by mere mistake, delivered the goods to the buyer. Under the direction of Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, a verdict went for the sellers against the assignees of the buyer, a bankrupt; and the Court of Common Pleas refused a new trial. 7 Taunt. 169.

his bargain, stipulated or implied as a condition of the transference—where, for example, he is unable to perform his engagement by paying the price—those cases of real or supposed hardship arise to which I have already alluded, and exceptions have been contended for and admitted, which confound in no small degree the simplicity of the doctrine.

I shall, in the following section, consider the grounds of these exceptions to the general rule.

SECTION II.

OF THE SELLER'S RIGHT OF RETENTION FOR THE PRICE, AND OF STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

According to the settled law of MUTUAL CONTRACT, if either of the parties in sale be unable or refuse to perform his engagement, the other may withhold performance of his part of the contract, while still in the course of execution; and may demand, besides, damages for any loss he may sustain.¹ If the BUYER fail while the goods are still with the seller, the seller may withhold delivery, and claim the direct damage which he has suffered by the disappointment: if the goods have left the seller, but are still on their way, not yet come into the buyer's possession, the seller may follow the goods, stop them on the way, and resume possession. This privilege, then, of stopping goods in transitu is truly a qualified extension of that rule of mutual contract, by which either party may withhold performance, on the other becoming unable to perform his part.

SUBSECTION I.—HISTORY OF THE DOCTRINE OF STOPPAGE OF GOODS IN TRANSITU.

It is a little more than thirty years since the doctrine of stopping in transitu was introduced into the law of Scotland by a decision of the House of Lords. Whether on this occasion the course of our own practice should have been entirely set aside, and a rule [206] adopted from England, where different principles regulate the contract of sale, this is not the place to inquire: it is enough that the revolution thus occasioned has been confirmed by uniform practice and many decisions since; and that the doctrine of stoppage in transitu is now law in Scotland. At the time when this doctrine was introduced, our lawyers were little versed in English determinations, even on mercantile questions; and, in particular, they were very much at a loss for the rules and distinctions of the new doctrine which had been promulgated among us. I had soon after, while employed in the first composition of this work, much communication with Lord Thurlow, who presided in the House of Lords when the decision alluded to was made; and both in his written and oral communications on the subject, he expressed himself as very sensible of the difficulties which were to follow on this decision, and which then were felt in England. He saw the increasing danger of yielding to mercantile convenience, as affecting the purity and uniformity of legal principle; the difficulty of reconciling the doctrine (even to the length to which it had then been carried) with the settled rules of law; and the necessity of questioning and denying much that had been decided, in reducing this department of jurisprudence to a system.²

¹ 'In mutual contracts, if either party be unable to perform, the other has a double remedy: either a process for damage and interest; or, if he please, a declarator concluding that the contract should be found void in respect of non-performance, and each party restored to his place.' 1 Dict. 595. See also the authorities there relied on: Raith v Wolmet, 1670, M. 9154; Maitland v Laird of Gight, 1675, M. 13382.

Non pretium continet tantum empti iudicium, sed omne quod interest emptoris. Dig. lib. 19, tit. 1; De act. Empt. l. 43.

² In the first edition of this work, I expressed the general result of these communications; and in revising now, at the distance of more than twenty years, the statement of a doctrine not even yet reduced to perfect uniformity, I think it not unfit to restore from that early edition the passage to which I allude: 'When we come to contemplate the effects of the admission of acts of constructive delivery upon the doctrine as occurring in bankruptcy, we find it often productive of very wide deviation from principle. Instead of a

[207] Since that time the determinations both in England and in Scotland have been numerous; and although a distressing degree of uncertainty has prevailed, it may now be assumed as the general principle which rules the whole doctrine, that goods may be stopped by the seller for the unpaid price, where they are still in the hands of a middleman, and in the course of transit to the buyer, or to the destination which he has appointed for simple doctrine, we find one so complex and inconsistent that an act which in one situation is held a good delivery and effectual transfer, is in another held to be wholly unavailing. In short, those ideas of hardship, which at first sight seem so natural, are found most deceitful and delusive, leading to arbitrary and ill-settled rules, such as should either be carried further or not indulged so far. A creditor who has lent money to his friend, or one who has bought a bill, and sees the acceptor become bankrupt before the day of payment, suffers the loss without exciting in a judge any commiseration, except that general regret which belongs to the condition of every creditor. But where a seller has parted with his goods without receiving the price, and the goods are still in existence and distinguishable; or where a buyer has paid the price, and is likely to lose the goods for which he has paid, a degree of hardship is thought to exist fit to be relieved by courts of justice. And yet between the condition of these several creditors there is truly, and in principle, no distinction to be taken. What appears in one view to be a hardship, is, when properly considered, merely the event of a risk which the parties thought it their interest to run.

Considering the doctrine under this aspect, and not in its gradual rise and establishment, the true principles would appear to be these:—In contracts relative to the transference of goods, the parties are, previous to delivery, under personal engagements to each other: they are mutually debtors and creditors, and it depends on the nature of their contract whether the one or the other is entitled to take precedence in the demand of performance. In the general case, and without speciality in the agreement, neither party can without performance or tender of his part call upon the other. But this may be differently arranged. The seller may give time for payment, or the buyer for delivery; and where they do so, the delay and the risk are compensated in the rate of the price. As the parties are, prior to payment or performance, equally debtor and creditor to each other, so, after performance or payment on one part, the right of the person so paying or performing is not a jot improved: he is a mere creditor still. The delivery of the goods to the buyer does not make the seller less a personal creditor for the price than before: it does not transmute his jus ad rem into a jus in re, entitling him to any preference for the price of his goods over the other personal creditors; nor, on the other hand, can the payment of the price to the seller bring about any alteration of the buyer's right, or convert his claim from a personal into a real right over the goods.

If principle, then, were to be adhered to in this branch of law, the real right of the buyer or of the seller ought to be judged of by the simple fact of delivery, unswayed by the circumstance of performance on the one part as altering the right of him who has performed. And the following principles may be stated as almost self-evident:—

'1st, That declaring any act to be a delivery, in case the price is paid, which would not be adjudged a delivery in any other case, is declaring, in other words, that delivery is not an essential requisite to the transfer of property.

'2d, That declaring any act to be no delivery, in case the price is not paid, which in any other case would be adjudged delivery, equally violates that fundamental rule of law.

'3d, That not only the value of the time given for performing a contract of sale, but the risk also ensuing thereon, is considered and compensated in the terms of the contract. And,

'4th, That the event of such risk, for running which the party suffering has already received a consideration in terms of his contract, furnishes no reasonable ground for further relief.

Such seem, à priori, to be unquestionable principles in the general doctrine of delivery. But even in departing from them, no strict principles of exception have been followed. On the contrary, the ideas of hardship so freely admitted have occasioned deviations even from what at first appears a fair line of distinction.

'(1.) The supposed hardship of not receiving goods for which the price has been paid, has led to the chief departure from the simple rule of actual delivery, by admitting constructive deliveries as equivalent to real delivery in that particular case. But the arbitrary nature of the principle on which this exception has been received, has been productive of much doubt and uncertainty with regard to the description of constructive delivery; whether it be necessary to send the goods by a carrier, or to deliver them to some intermediate person? or whether it is not sufficient to set them apart, mark them, or put them in packages for the buyer, or to do any other act denoting the settled and irrevocable purpose to deliver a particular subject? And the risk which, by a common rule of law, is laid on the buyer, even before delivery, has been brought into consideration as materially affecting the question of hardship.

'(2.) The hardship of losing the price of goods delivered, has induced courts to find distinctions and pretences for allowing the seller to recall goods, even after such delivery as falls within the true and correct definition of actual delivery; such as delivery to an agent of the buyer, delivery into a ship freighted by him, etc.

'(3.) The hardship of the goods being at the risk of the buyer, while the property continues untransferred, has misled some into an opinion that the question of risk forms the only true criterion of transference.

Thus the law loses its certainty and becomes a mass of decomposed principles, occasions of litigation are multiplied, new distinctions are taken, new principles of decision adopted, a continual uncertainty and wavering of judgment is encouraged, and the law becomes a disease, not a relief.

[The desire to find a natural root for stoppage in transitu in the principles of our law, instead of looking on it as a foreign graft, has certainly led to the difficulties the author speaks of. But the difficulties disappear, if we will only be them. But it may still be useful to retain the statement of the progress and history of this doctrine.

The principle on which this doctrine depends is well known in the law of Scotland, but the remedy to the seller was formerly carried with us a good deal further. There formerly prevailed in Scotland, as on the Continent, a doctrine of more extensive application, which superseded almost entirely the distinctions that were found necessary in England. Restitution was allowed to the seller on the ground of presumptive fraud within three days of the bankruptcy of the buyer. It was held that the impending bankruptcy must have been known secretly to the buyer, and that he was guilty of a fraud in not communicating it. And this presumption threw the onus probandi on the buyer or his creditors, to show perfect fairness in the bargain. On the Continent the matter was carried still further. The influence of the doctrines of the civil law, and of certain notions of commercial expediency, led almost universally to the rule, that a seller was entitled, even after actual delivery (not merely on a presumption of fraud subject to inquiry, but in all cases), to have restitution of his goods, if unchanged in form, and distinguishable plainly from the rest of the buyer's stock.¹

content to deal with the doctrine of stoppage as a subject per se, and to alter per se into theoretical conformity with it no doctrines native to our legal system, except those which are absolutely and practically irreconcilable on any terms with its existence.]

¹ The French legislators, in constructing the Code 'de Commerce,' rejected the old law of revendication in mercantile dealings, and adopted that of stopping in transitu. The grounds of this change are thus explained in the Discours des Orateurs du Gouvernement: 'Les auteurs du projet du Code de Commerce avaient demandé l'abolition de la revendication, comme contraire à l'intérêt du commerce: des chambres et des tribunaux de commerce avaient applaudi à cette proposition; mais d'autres avaient voté pour le maintien de la revendication, s'appuyant principalement sur cette raison, qu'il ne fallait pas changer sans nécessité un usage anciennement établi en France, et suivi dans quelques pays étrangers. On a reconnu que l'usage de la revendication était une source de procès et un moyen de fraude; que son plus grand inconvénient était de laisser, à l'aide de ce privilège, le sort des créanciers à la merci de la volonté du failli, qui pouvait à son gré favoriser l'un et sacrifier l'autre, en maintenant ou dénaturant les signes qui peuvent constater l'identité, et en retardant ou accélérant la vente des effets qui lui auraient été livrés. C'est d'après ces considérations, que l'on s'est décidé à ne permettre la revendication que comme il est dit en notre article 577 et suivans. On a espéré, par ces moyens, rendre un service essentiel au commerce, tarir la source d'une foule de procès, et remplir le vœu de la majorité des chambres et des tribunaux de commerce dont on a consulté l'opinion.'

It is rather remarkable to find, in contrast to this passage, written to vindicate the adoption of the rule which prevailed in England, a suggestion from English jurists, that 'perhaps it would be wise to adopt a regulation similar to that which we perceive, from certain cases and authorities, to be the law of Russia and of France, viz.: That if a seller can identify the property, though it may be in the possession of the insolvent vendee, yet that he shall be entitled to have it back again.' Eden's Bankrupt Law, 295. But see Abbott on Shipping, 375.

The whole title of the Code de Commerce is comprehended in the following extract, in which the leading principles of the doctrine of stoppage are well and clearly given:—
VOL. I.

'576. Le vendeur pourra, en cas de faillite, revendiquer les marchandises par lui vendues et livrées, et dont le prix ne lui a pas été payé, dans les cas et aux conditions ci-après exprimés.

'577. La revendication ne pourra avoir lieu que pendant que les marchandises expédiées seront encore en route, soit par terre soit par eau, et avant qu'elles soient entrées dans les magasins du failli, ou dans les magasins du commissionnaire chargé de les vendre pour le compte du failli.

'578. Elles ne pourront être revendiquées, si, avant leur arrivée, elles ont été vendues sans fraude, sur factures et connoissemens ou lettres de voitures.

'579. En cas de revendication, le revendiquant sera tenu de rendre l'actif du failli indemne de toute avance fait pour frêt ou voitures, commission, assurance ou autres frais, et de payer les sommes dues pour mêmes causes, si elles n'ont pas été acquittées.

'580. La revendication ne pourra être exercée que sur les marchandises qui seront reconnues être identiquement les mêmes, et que lorsqu'il sera reconnu que les balles, barriques, ou enveloppes dans lesquelles elles se trouvaient lors de la vente, n'ont pas été ouvertes, que les cordes ou marques n'ont été enlevées ni changées, et que les marchandises n'ont subi en nature et quantité ni changement ni altération.

'581. Pourront être revendiquées, aussi longtemps qu'elles existeront en nature, en tout ou en partie, les marchandises consignées au failli, à titre de dépôt, ou pour être vendues pour le compte de l'envoyeur: dans le dernier cas même, le prix desdites marchandises pourra être revendiqué, s'il n'a pas été payé ou passé en compte courant entre le failli et l'acheteur.

'582. Dans tous les cas de revendication, excepté ceux de dépôt et de consignation de marchandises, les syndics des créanciers auront la faculté de retenir les marchandises revendiquées, en payant au réclamant le prix convenu entre lui et le failli.

'583. Les remises en effets de commerce, ou en tous autres effets non encore échus, ou échus et non encore payés, et qui se trouveront en nature dans le porte-feuille du failli à l'époque de sa faillite, pourront être revendiquées, si ces remises

[208] The last case in which the rule of presumptive fraud was admitted in Scotland, was decided in 1789; but, in an appeal to the House of Lords, this doctrine was, on the authority of Lord Thurlow, rejected; and it has since been entirely abandoned.¹ The [209] law of Scotland has from that time adopted the doctrine of STOPPING IN TRANSITU as established in England. And on that footing many cases have been decided; while the practice of trade has been regulated by this principle.²

It has been much doubted what is the true principle on which this doctrine was established. While some have held the seller, in stopping his goods, to be in the exercise of his strict legal rights, looking on him as a proprietor, undivested, till the moment of actual delivery; others have considered the property as in law changed from the moment even of constructive delivery, and the right of the seller as an equitable interposition, for the purposes of justice, to prevent goods from coming into the stock of a man who cannot pay for them.³ The latter of these views seems not only to accord with the history of the doctrine, but to be more consistent with all the more minute details, and to afford a more simple and satisfactory principle for regulating the questions that have occurred in this department. And it seems now to be considered as the true doctrine in England.⁴

This doctrine was first admitted in England towards the end of the seventeenth century. At law, upon a case ordered out of Chancery, the assignees of the bankrupt purchaser had a verdict, although the goods had been stopped before the ship sailed from the port of the sellers. But Chancery gave relief on this ground, that the goods were still the proper goods of the foreign merchant; and 'therefore that the vendee, having paid no price for them, if the vendor could by any means get his goods again into his hands, or prevent their coming into the hands of the bankrupt, it was but lawful for him so to do, and very allowable in equity.'⁵ ont été faites par le propriétaire avec le simple mandat d'en faire le recouvrement et d'en garder la valeur à sa disposition, ou si elles ont reçu de sa part la destination spéciale de servir au paiement d'acceptations ou de billets tirés au domicile du failli.

¹ 584. La revendication aura pareillement lieu pour les remises faites sans acceptation ni disposition, si elles sont entrées dans un compte courant par lequel le propriétaire ne serait que créancier; mais elle cessera d'avoir lieu, si, à l'époque des remises, il était débiteur d'une somme quelconque.

² 585. Dans les cas où la loi permet la revendication, les syndics examineront les demandes; ils pourront les admettre sous l'approbation du commissaire: s'il y a contestation, le tribunal prononcera, après avoir entendu le commissaire.'

Code de Commerce, 1807, l. 3, tit. 3, De la Revendication.

³ Allan, Stewart, & Co. v Stein's Crs. At the bankruptcy of Stein, part of large quantities of grain deliverable under a current contract, had been actually delivered, part stopped in the very act of unloading, and part stopped before bulk had been broken. The Court of Session decided the case on the ground of presumptive fraud, as entitling the seller to restitution even of what was delivered. Lord Chancellor Thurlow, however, laid it down, and the House of Lords adopted it in their judgment, that the notion of a presumptive fraud was untenable; that the sole question in such a case is, Whether the goods have been stopped while in transitu, according to the rule which had within a hundred years been introduced into England? The cause was accordingly remitted to apply this rule.

The opinion of Lord Thurlow, in so far as respects the doctrine of presumptive fraud, will find a fitter place hereafter. Of what he said on the question of stopping in transitu, the following note was taken at the time: 'The question is, Whether the respondents (vendors) were entitled to stop certain cargoes of grain which were consigned or forwarded by them to Stein the bankrupt, before the actual delivery to him, the bankruptcy having intervened? By the law of England, and, as I conceive, by the law of Scotland also, the shipping of goods to one who commissions them, or the delivery of them to a carrier to be conveyed to him, was a completed sale. But within the last hundred years a rule has been introduced from the customs of foreign nations, that, in the case of the vendee's bankruptcy, the vendor might stop and take back the goods in transitu, or before they came into the hands of the vendee; and this is certainly now a part of the law of England, and I understand it to be law likewise in Scotland.' 1790, M. 4951, 3 Pat. 191.

⁴ [In M'Ewan v Smith, 6 Bell 355, Lord Campbell said: 'What is the doctrine of stoppage in transitu? It is this: that where a vendor of goods has to send them to a vendee at another place, and has parted with his goods into the hands of the captain of a vessel or a carrier, while they remain in the hands of the captain or carrier, and before they have been delivered to the purchaser, upon the insolvency of the vendee, they may be stopped by the vendor. This is a most equitable doctrine. It has been introduced into our commercial law, and I would by no means circumscribe it.']

⁵ See two sketches of the history of this doctrine, delineated by the hands of masters: by Lord Rosslyn, in the case of Lickbarrow v Mason, 1 Henry Blackst. 364; by Mr. Justice Buller, in Ellis v Hunt, 3 Term. Rep. 464. [See Add. Cont. 6th ed. 200; Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 548.]

⁶ Selwyn's Law of Nisi Prius, 1826, vol. ii. p. 1207. [See note on this subject, infra, subsection 6.]

⁷ Wiseman v Vandeput, 21 March 1790.

As this case shows the equitable extension of the right of property to maintain the powers of the seller, notwithstanding a constructive delivery, the next case that occurred may throw some light on the principles by which the judges thought themselves restrained from carrying it the length of a right of restitution, after delivery actually completed. The case to which I allude was decided by Lord Chancellor Hardwicke in 1743.¹ The doctrine to be collected from it, so far as concerns the present inquiry, seems to be, 1. That for goods given to a carrier to be delivered to the consignee, and which are countermanded by [210] the consignor, on hearing of the bankruptcy of the consignee, no action of trover will lie for the assignees, because the goods, while they are in transitu, are subject to be countermanded; and, 2. That where bills of lading are taken blank to the consignor's order, and delivered to the consignee, there being no substantial reason for refusing to a consignor the right of recovering the goods after actual delivery, unless it proceeds on the general credit gained by the possession of the goods; so, while goods are not in the consignee's hands, but still with the consignor, there can be no reason for refusing to give effect to a countermand by the consignor.

The doctrine which thus took its rise in courts of equity was soon adopted in courts of law in England, and is now daily administered by those courts as part of the established law

¹ Snee, etc., Assignees of Tollet v Prescott, etc., 1743. Tollet consigned to Raguenan & Co. at Leghorn, German serges, to be sold or bartered for Italian goods. R. & Co. made agreements for Italian goods, half to be paid in Tollet's goods, half in money; and they put on shipboard the goods (silks), and sent Tollet one of the three bills of lading for twelve bales. The bills of lading were taken to the order of R. & Co., endorsed by them in blank, and thus transmitted to Tollet. Tollet had borrowed money from Julian & Le Blon, and in security assigned the bill of lading, and failed. R. & Co. were in advance for Tollet, on these transactions, £2757. Prescott, their correspondent in London, hearing of Tollet's failure, wrote to R. & Co. to take measures for preventing the silk coming into his hands; and they sent the two parts of the bill of lading which they held, and an order on the shipmaster to deliver to Prescott. The ship having arrived, Julian & Le Blon, to whom the bill of lading was assigned, demanded the goods; the shipmaster refused to deliver them. The question arose among the three parties: 1. Prescott for R. & Co. claimed the goods as still in R. & Co., untransferred, and subject to stoppage; 2. Snee, etc., claimed the goods as transferred to Tollet, and now the fund of his general creditors, subject to the claim of those who held the bills of lading in security; and, 3. Julian, etc., claimed payment of their loans out of the subjects of the bill of lading. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke viewed the case in this way: 1. That it was a harsh demand by the bankrupt's creditors against Raguenan & Co. to seek these goods without reimbursing them for their advance upon them, but leaving them to come in as creditors for half-a-crown in the pound; that R. & Co. have now the goods in their custody, under a specific lien, for such advance; and that a court of equity will lay hold of anything to save this advantage to them. 2. That as R. & Co. would have had a specific lien for their advance had the goods not been consigned, so the consignment makes no difference in the case; for, 'suppose goods are actually delivered to a carrier, to be delivered to A, and while the carrier is upon the road, and before actual delivery to A by the carrier, the consignor hears that A, his consignee, is likely to become bankrupt, or is actually one, and countermands the delivery, and gets them back into his own possession again, I am of opinion that no action of trover would lie for the assignees of A, because the goods, while they were in transitu, might be so countermanded.' He then argues that here there was no consignment to a particular person, but the bills of lading were rather in the nature of an authority; and in stating the evidence on the custom of merchants as to the effect of bills of lading endorsed, he holds the strongest proofs to be with the consignor's having in them a sufficient power to countermand. 3. That 'though goods are even delivered to the principal, he could never see any substantial reason why the original proprietor, who had never received a farthing, should be obliged to quit all claim to them, and come in as a creditor, only for a shilling perhaps in the pound, unless the law goes upon the general credit the bankrupt has gained by having them in his custody. But while goods remain in the hands of the original proprietor, I see no reason why he should not be said to have a lien upon them till he is paid, and reimbursed what he so advanced; and therefore I am of opinion the defendant Prescott had a right to retain for himself and Company.' 4. That if the bankrupt's assignees had, by strictness of law, recovered in an action of trover, the courts of law would not have suffered execution on the whole goods; and the Chancery would, on a writ of inquiry, have ordered the half-price paid by R. & Co. for the silks to be deducted—à fortiori, this ought to be done in a court of equity. 5. 'If the defendant Prescott had got the goods back again by any means, provided he did not steal them, I would not blame him; and I am of opinion, that to take them from him would be extremely inequitable.' The judgment was for the master to take account of the money received by Prescott on the sale of the silks, and to charge him and his partners with it: that the produce of the bales over which the pledge extended was to be applied, in the first place, to pay the share of R. & Co.'s advance upon those bales, and next to the persons holding the pledge: that the pawnors, if they were not fully paid, should come in as creditors under the commission; and if a surplus, it should go first to pay costs, and next to the assignees of Tollet. 1 Atk. 245, 251.

of England in the sale of commodities.¹ As such, it had for a century been established, when it was adopted into the jurisprudence of Scotland.

[211] It has already been observed, that the principle on which it rests was not unknown to the law of Scotland, though the doctrine of restitution superseded its application, and probably prevented a series of distinctions in making out the detail of its application to practice, similar to that which has taken place in England. There are cases to be found in our books which seem to point to some such train of decisions, had it been necessary to have recourse to them. Thus it was decided, that a person who, having sold land, had delivered to the buyer a precept of infeftment, which, without any further act of the seller, enabled the buyer to complete his real right, was entitled to process for stopping the infeftment, when the buyer became unable to perform his part.² And, on the same principle, where the purchaser of a house had got into possession, but had not received sasine, which alone is effectual tradition of heritable property, the seller was held entitled to have the sale annulled, on the purchaser becoming insolvent.³ But whatever might have been the progress of the Scottish jurisprudence on this point, had it been left to its natural course, there can be no doubt that the doctrine of stoppage, as established in England, with all its modifications, so far as they are consistent with sound principle, is now to be held as the law of Scotland. And in what remains to be discussed of this subject, the cases and authorities in the English law, with such distinctions as necessarily arise from difference in the system on which this doctrine was grafted, are to be relied on, as of the same efficacy in this country as in England. The Court of Session has repeatedly acknowledged their authority, and permitted them to be quoted as precedents before them.

The great difficulty has been, to distinguish the cases in which the privilege of stopping in transitu is to be exercised; or rather, to find a rule according to which the cases may be arranged in which it is to be admitted or rejected.

The first principle of classification adopted was that by which delivery is distinguishable as ACTUAL or CONSTRUCTIVE. And this had the sanction of those eminent judges in England whose determinations were in greatest credit at the time the doctrine was introduced into

¹ The principles on which this adoption is to be justified are thus explained by Mr. Justice Buller in the case of Tooke v Hollingworth: 'I have always thought it highly injurious to the public that different rules should prevail in the different courts on the same mercantile case. My opinion has been uniform on that subject. It sometimes indeed happens, that in questions of real property, courts of law find themselves fettered with rules from which they cannot depart, because they are fixed and established rules, though equity may interpose, not to contradict, but to correct the strict and rigid rules of the law. But in mercantile questions no distinction ought to prevail. The mercantile law of this country is founded on principles of equity; and when once a rule is established in that court as a rule of property, it ought to be established in a court of law. For this reason, courts of law of late years have said that, even where the action is founded on a tort, they would discover some mode of defeating the plaintiff, unless his action were also founded on equity; and that, though the property might on legal grounds be with the plaintiff, if there were any claim or charge by the defendant, they would consider the retaining of the goods as a conversion.'

In the concise and excellent treatise of Mr. Cullen, the following passage contains, in one proposition, the general result of the determinations on this subject: 'When goods are not delivered immediately to the vendee, but sent or consigned from a distant place, and delivered in the first instance to a third person, as a carrier or master of a vessel, to be carried and delivered to the consignee; in that case, if the goods have not been paid for beforehand, and the consignee becomes insolvent or a bankrupt before the arrival and delivery into his possession, it has been determined in a multitude of cases (Wiseman and Vandeput, 2 Vern. 203; Exp. Clare, Cook's B. L. 405; Exp. Frank, cited 1 Atk. 250; Snee and Prescott, ib. 245; Exp. Walker, Cook's B. L. 419; Exp. Wilkins, Amb. 400; D'Aquila and Lambert, ib. 399; Birkins and Jenkins, Cowp. 296) that the consignor may stop them while they are yet in transitu; and if he can obtain possession of them again by any means short of violence or fraud before actual delivery, he will be entitled to retain them against the consignee or his assignees. This is perfectly settled as between consignor and consignee.' Cullen's Principles of Bankrupt Law, 260.

² 'If, in consequence of a mutual obligation (contract), one disposes with procuratory and precept, process is competent to stop infeftment and draw back the disposition when the other party becomes insolvent without power to implement the mutual cause.' Selkirk v Selkirk, 1721, M. 9167.

³ Sandieman v Stewart, in 1771. [These decisions present no analogy to cases of stoppage in transitu. In them there has been no sasine, which is delivery in heritable subjects. The peculiarity of stoppage is resuming possession after delivery. See Brodie's note, Stair, App. 863.]

Scottish jurisprudence; particularly Lord Mansfield, the father of the mercantile law of England, and Mr. Justice Buller.

But further experience demonstrated the necessity of discriminating a little more correctly; for cases occurred which it was impossible to doubt came under the description of constructive delivery, and yet where the privilege of stopping in transitu was justly denied: as where goods were in a warehouse, and notice of sale was given to the warehouse-keeper to change the custody; or goods in the bond warehouse were transferred by a dock warrant; or a transference was made in the books of the warehouse-keeper. And so of constructive deliveries, those which carried the goods at once to the buyer or his servants or special agents, were distinguished from those which left the goods still in the hands of a middleman, and in the course of their transit.

The result seems to be, 1. That in no case of actual delivery is it competent for [212] the seller to reclaim possession of the goods for security of his price; 2. That in certain cases even of constructive delivery, the privilege of stopping is not to be exercised; 3. That wherever the constructive delivery goes no further than to forward the goods on their course towards the buyer in the charge of a middleman, they may be stopped for the price.¹

¹ [It will conduce greatly to a clear understanding of the doctrine of stoppage in transitu, and to avoiding the misconceptions into which the author is apt to lead the student, if it be distinctly kept in view throughout the following sections: 1. That non-delivery or imperfect delivery of the goods is not what gives the right to stop in transitu (see text, p. 230). The question is not, and never can be, whether the goods are undelivered, or not yet perfectly delivered: it is not a question of delivery at all; it is simply this, Whether they are, at the time when the seller stops them, in a state of transitus? If the goods in course of fulfilment of a sale have left the actual possession of the seller, or the actual possession of those who are his agents to retain or keep possession for him (which is his constructive possession), they are delivered. 2. The possession into which they pass may be the actual possession of the buyer, or the actual possession of some one who is his agent to receive and hold possession for him, which is his constructive possession. The purpose of the possession held for the buyer by such agent may be custody and disposal under the orders of the buyer; or it may be solely and exclusively that of carrying the goods, or doing something to render complete a contract for their carriage. And this carriage, again, may be intended to convey the goods immediately from the possession, actual or constructive, of the seller TO OR TOWARD the buyer; or it may be intended to convey them away FROM the buyer to some foreign destination, without their being meant ever to come to his hands. In all these cases the goods are delivered; and whether the possession acquired by the buyer be actual possession by himself or the actual possession of an agent to receive for him, which is his constructive possession, the goods are equally delivered,—delivery being just as complete and perfect in the one case as the other. There is no such thing as imperfect delivery: goods are either delivered or they are not. 3. That no question of stoppage in transitu can arise except the goods are stopped while in a state of transitus; and the state of transitus to which the remedy applies is nothing but an actual state of transit or conveyance from the seller to or toward the buyer (not away from him). It is not of any importance whether the goods are actually on a journey or not: if held for the purpose of being forwarded from seller to buyer, they are as much in transitu as if they were actually moving; though in general there is more difficulty in ascertaining, as a fact, in what capacity goods are held by an intermediate depositary, than in what capacity a carrier holds them when they are actually in his waggon or his vessel. The privilege of stoppage only applies to goods which—having left the actual and constructive possession of the seller, and not yet having reached the possession of the buyer, or of any agent for him other than an agent for carriage to or towards him—are at the time of stoppage either in the hands of a carrier or of some person, such as a wharfinger, who is doing something to complete a contract of carriage intended to convey them immediately from the seller, or from some forwarding agent of the buyer (not from any previous non-forwarding agent for the buyer), to or towards the buyer. The whole question whether such goods are in a state of transitus turns on this: Whether the person in whose hands as agent for the buyer they are, has them solely as an agent to forward them to or toward the buyer, or as an agent to hold or keep them for the buyer in some other capacity than as a mere agent so to forward them; and it is only in the hands of an agent for the buyer whose agency is to forward them immediately from the seller, or from some mere forwarding agent for the buyer in their progress to or toward the buyer, that stoppage in transitu is competent. 4. That as goods can only be stopped while in a state of transitus, and as the state of transitus only arises after they have left the possession, actual or constructive, of the seller, the goods must in every proper case of stoppage in transitu have already been delivered; and that if they have not been delivered—if they have not left the seller's possession, actual and constructive—the unpaid seller's remedy is not stoppage in transitu, but in Scotland RETENTION (the assertion of his right of property in them as yet undivested by any delivery), and in England an exercise of the seller's right of LIEN, which rests on the possession being still held actually or constructively by the seller. Both of these remedies are quite distinct from stoppage in transitu, and from each other. And as we have seen (ante, p. 220, note), goods may even in England be held by a carrier as the special agent of the seller, by a contract of bailment through which the seller has sought to reserve the jus disponendi or property and possession of the

SUBSECTION II.—RULES OF RETAINING GOODS, OR STOPPING IN TRANSITU.

CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH GOODS MAY BE STOPPED.—In explaining more particularly the cases which fall under the general rule now stated, the circumstances in which goods may be stopped first demand attention.

I. It is a general rule, that where goods sold have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer, or his clerks or servants,¹ there is no longer any right to the seller over those goods: the property is passed beyond recall. And they are held so to be delivered, although within the premises of the seller, if they are locked up, and the key given to the buyer.²

To this rule, however, two exceptions have been admitted: One in the case of a sale made under the express condition that the price shall be paid in cash and no credit given, or that good discountable bills shall be exchanged for the goods, and the vendee has, without fulfilling this condition, and without any waiver or consent to depart from it on the part of the seller, obtained possession of the goods. The other exception is, where the buyer, conscious of insolvency, takes the goods into his warehouse custodiæ causa, but without intending to complete the transference. These exceptions, however, will demand attention hereafter; the former in considering restitution after delivery, the latter in treating of the vendor's rejection of goods.

II. Where, on the other hand, the actual possession continues with the seller, there is stoppage for the price on the buyer's insolvency. But it is not a continuance of such possession if the goods, though in the seller's premises, are locked up and the key delivered.³

In England, exceptions have been admitted to this rule which do not seem to be recognised in Scotland. Where goods have been sold, and lodged in the seller's hovel for the purpose of the vendee taking them away; or where they are to remain in the vendor's warehouse till it shall be convenient for the buyer to remove them; we have already seen, that in England the bare lodging of the goods in the hovel, or the payment of warehouse rent, or the marking of the goods for the vendee, are held good delivery, not only to pass the property, the price being paid, but also to divest the vendor of his lien:⁴ the only limitation of this doctrine being, that the goods shall be in a place where it may be understood that goods of others than the proprietor may be found.⁵ In Scotland, the only case which gives the least countenance to such a doctrine is that of Broughton,⁶ which was much doubted at the time, and in regard to which it may be observed, 1. That the price was paid, and there was no question of stoppage; and, 2. That if doubts were to be entertained in such a case, they ought to be doubly strong in a question of stoppage or retention.

III. The above form the extreme points, between which are to be found the difficult [213] cases under this doctrine. It is not enough, generally speaking, to give the right to stop, that the delivery is of the kind called constructive; but, on the other hand, there are goods. These cases must be carefully distinguished from stoppage in transitu. 5. The points therefore are: (a) Have the goods left the actual and constructive possession of the seller? (b) Have they never been in the hands of the buyer, or of any previous agent for the buyer, other than a forwarding agent; and are they at the time of stoppage on their way from the seller or some previous forwarding agent of the buyer to or toward the buyer, and in the hands of some one solely for the purpose of being so forwarded? Or (c) are they, though under contract for carriage, in course of conveyance away from the buyer, and never meant to come nearer him, or into his hands? or have they arrived at a point on their journey towards the buyer, where the original impetus given to them by the seller has ceased, and into hands where, for the time, they are not held under any contract of carriage? It will be found that the chief difficulties of the subject resolve into that of ascertaining, as matter of fact, in what capacity—for what purpose—the agent for the buyer held possession at the time of stoppage. See the general observations of Lord President (Ingles) in Black v Rowan, 40 Sc. Jur. 79, and Blackb. Sale, pp. 244, 248.]

¹ See above, pp. 215, 216. [Schuurmans & Son v Goldie, 1828, 6 S. 1110.]

² See above, p. 186.

³ See above, and p. 186.

⁴ See above, p. 190, Goodall v Skelton, Hurry v Mangles, and Stoveld v Hughes, notes 2 and 4. [Sm. Merc. L. 7th ed. 554.]

⁵ Ibid. note 3.

⁶ See above, p. 191, note 1.

constructive deliveries which take away the privilege. The distinctions, so far as they are yet settled, seem to be the following:—

1. Where goods are delivered into a warehouse, whether of a public warehouseman or a bond warehouse, for the buyer, and entered there in his name, not merely as in the course of their journey, but to abide the market or the order of the buyer, the delivery is good not only to pass the property,¹ but to deprive the seller of his right to stop.²

¹ See above, p. 184. [Hammond v Anderson, 4 Bos. and Pul. 69; Hawes v Watson, 2 B. and Cr. 540; contrast Tucker v Humphrey, 4 Bing. 516.]

² [Goods are liable to stoppage as long as they remain in the possession of the carrier from the seller, quâ carrier, and 'before they are actually delivered to the vendee, or some one whom he means to be his agent to take possession of and keep the goods for him' (per Parke, B., in James v Griffin, 1 M. and W. 20, 2 M. and W. 633). When goods are delivered into a warehouse to which they have been sent by the vendor on the purchaser's orders, they may still be in transitu. The sole question is, In what capacity the warehouseman holds the goods? Is it as the buyer's agent to keep the goods? or as the buyer's agent to forward them to that destination on their passage from seller to buyer intended at the time the goods were put in transit by the seller? If a merchant in New York order goods from Manchester, and they are stopped in a warehouse at Liverpool, the warehouseman may be the buyer's general agent in this country to sell goods, or export to different markets abroad, as well as to forward goods to the buyer. If the buyer ordered the seller to send them to the warehouseman at Liverpool to be forwarded to himself at New York, and they be there awaiting shipment to New York in pursuance of the buyer's original order to the seller, they are still in transitu,—the warehouseman being merely an instrument to expedite the goods on their way—an agent to assist in the forwarding on their intended destination. But if the New York merchant order the goods to Liverpool only, and the warehouseman receive them to await the buyer's instructions as to what is to be done with them, they are no longer in transit after delivery at the warehouse. When goods are delivered at a warehouse, wharf, or inn, without any statement whether they are to be received as a step on their progress to the buyer by force of the original delivery to the carrier, or in order to be kept till the buyer gives fresh orders, and the innkeeper or wharfinger accepts the goods with the intention of acting in that capacity in which he shall discover they were meant to be delivered to him, the capacity in which he holds the goods will apparently depend on what was the place of destination originally contemplated by the purchaser; and if the purchaser send him directions to forward the goods, the question whether he is acting under the control of the purchaser, as in Dixon v Baldwin, or merely as an agent to forward, would probably depend on what was the original destination. But though this is material to explain the capacity in which an agent holds possession where it is ambiguous, it is not material otherwise (Blackb. Sale, p. 253). It is only the place to which by the terms of the contract the goods are intended originally to be carried that is of importance: any unknown or ulterior destination to be given at some future time, according to circumstances, does not form matter for consideration, but only the place contemplated as the stopping place of the goods for the present, and as far as regards the original contract of sale (Story on Sale, p. 396, and cases there). The question as to the capacity in which the goods are held becomes very difficult where the holder acts in two capacities, e.g. both as a carrier and as a warehouseman, and may therefore have goods in his warehouse either as a place of deposit connected with the carriage, or as a place of deposit subject to the orders of the buyer; or where he is a wharfinger, who sometimes receives goods as agent for the shipowner who has brought them so far on their way, and sometimes as agent of the buyer to whom they are addressed. In such cases the fact of possession is ambiguous, unless explained by minor facts throwing light on the intention of parties with regard to the purpose for which the goods are held. The intention is often not clearly known to the parties themselves, and the acts done are often equivocal. The carrier himself, and à fortiori any depositary in the course of the completion of the carriage, may certainly agree with the buyer to change the capacity in which he holds as a mere expeditor into that of a special agent to hold for the buyer, and that without abandoning his lien as carrier. But it seems that both the depositary and the buyer must assent to a common placitum that the goods are to be held for some purpose or in some capacity distinct from those connected with the completion of the contract of carriage, before the agency for mere carriage can be converted into an agency of a kind which shall terminate the transit, although there may be an exception where the buyer has demanded delivery from the carrier, who refuses delivery without any right whatsoever as carrier to retain possession against the buyer, and so becomes involuntarily a mere warehouseman for the buyer. (See Blackb. Sale, pp. 248–250; Benj. Sale, p. 640; James v Griffin, 2 M. and W. 623; Jackson v Nichol, 5 Bing. N. C. 508; Whitehead v Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518; Lackington v Atherton, 8 Scott N. S. 38; Bolton v Lancashire & Yorkshire Railway Co., 35 L. J. C. P. 137; cf. Bentall v Burn, 3 B. and C. 423; and see note, ante, p. 218.) The cases are nearly all dependent on their respective specialties, which go to indicate the intention with which the goods were held by the agent, whether as a mere stage and instrument to forward them from the seller to the buyer, in pursuance of the common intention of seller and buyer at the time the seller put them in transit, or as agent to keep the goods, subject to the orders of the buyer. See, where the transit was held to be ended, and the goods held for other purposes than in the mere way of completing the original contract of carriage, Leeds v Wright, 3 B. and P. 320; Scott v Pettit, id. 469; Valpy v Gibson, 4 C. B. 837; Wentworth v Outhwaite, 10 M. and W. 436; Dodson v Wentworth, 4 M. and Gr. 1080; Cooper v Bill, 34 L. J. Ex. 161; Smith v Hudson, 34 L. J. Q. B. 145; Rowe v Pickford, 8 Taunt. 83; Richardson v Goss, 3 B. and P. 119; Dixon v Baldwin, 5 East 175. The following are cases where the transitus was considered not at an end, though the goods had been delivered to an agent for the buyer, that agent's duty

2. Where goods are delivered to the buyer's own shipmaster, or into a ship hired by him on time, or for the voyage, it has been held that the property passes, and the right to stop is discharged.¹

being merely to forward them :—Smith v Goss, 1 Camp. 282; Coates v Railton, 6 B. and C. 422; Jackson v Nichol, 5 Bingh. N. C. 508; Tucker v Humphrey, 4 Bingh. 516; Hunt v Ward, cited 3 T. R. 467; Rodger v The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, Law Rep. 2 P. C. 393. And see Paley on Principal and Agent (Lloyd's ed.), pp. 347–357.]

¹ Fowler v M'Taggart, 7 T. R. 442; and Bohtlingk v Inglis, 3 East 381, supra, p. 185. [So held, even where the shipment was made in a general ship known to belong to the purchaser (Schotsmans v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., L. R., 2 Ch. App. 332), by Lord Chelmsford, reversing judgment of Lord Romilly, M. R. See also authorities in Tudor's Merc. Ca. pp. 660 sqq. Add. Cont. 6th ed. 201; Sm. Merc. L. 553.]

Even where the goods are delivered on board the buyer's own ship (and à fortiori in the case of another ship), the master may nevertheless, by signing bills of lading to the order of the seller, prevent the property from passing, and hold the goods in the capacity of agent for the seller, and not as the buyer's servant, even though in doing so he may be guilty of a breach of his duty to the buyer. See ante, note, p. 220. Where the buyer does not send his own vessel, but employs a ship belonging to a third party to fetch the goods, and the form of the bill of lading does not decide the matter, the point is to ascertain the character of the captain, whether he acts as a carrier or as the special servant of the buyer; and how this may be, seems to depend on the nature of the contract between the shipowner and the charterer for the employment of the vessel. 'In the majority of cases the shipowner does not part with the possession of the vessel: he does no more than contract to employ the vessel and the services of the master and crew for a time, exclusively for the benefit of the charterer; so that the master remains the servant of the shipowner, and not of the charterer, and his possession is the possession of the shipowner and not of the charterer, in any case in which their rights come in question. But though this is the usual contract between the shipowner and the charterer, they may in law, and in practice sometimes do, agree that the charterer shall during the voyage have the possession of the vessel, and that the master shall during that time be the servant of the charterer. In other words, though a charter-party usually is a contract on the part of the shipowner to use the ship and services of the crew in a particular manner, it may amount to a demise of the vessel, and of the services of the master and crew.' Blackb. Sale, 242. It is now regarded as a question about the intention of the parties to the charter-party, whether or not the possession of the ship is thereby transferred to the charterer, and whether the contract is a locatio operis vehendarum mercium by the merchant, or a locatio navis et operarum magistri by the shipowner. See MacLachlan, Shipping, 307–315; Maude and Pollok, pp. 296–8; and Sandemann v Scurr, 36 L. J. Q. B. 58; Abbott, pp. 240–250. When, therefore, goods are put on shipboard, where the shipowner remains in possession through the master, the master is the shipowner's servant, and the possession of the goods is a possession by him as a carrier on behalf of the buyer, under a contract of carriage with the buyer; and the goods are, while in his hands in this capacity, in a state of transitus. But where the master is not the servant of the shipowner, but the immediate servant of the buyer as conductor of the vessel and of the master's services, the goods, by being put into the hands of the master, are put in the possession of the buyer as completely as if he had sent his cart for them; so completely, that even the shipowner's lien for the freight cannot exist, except indeed by special agreement. See MacLachlan, pp. 308 and 437. The master being the buyer's servant, the goods are held by him not merely as a carrier or agent to forward under contract of carriage, but as a mere hand to receive, hold, and deal with them at the orders of the buyer. The buyer, as charterer under such a charter-party, is considered owner pro hac vice (Abbott, MacLachlan, and M. and Pol. ut supra), and the case as to delivery of goods on board a vessel during such ownership is the same as if the ship were his own permanent property. Then the whole case, whether transitus is or is not competent after delivery of goods on shipboard to be carried towards the vendee, in cases where the vendor has not specially reserved the jus disponendi, 'turns,' as Wood, V. C., expressed it in Berndtson v Strang (L. R. 4, Eq. 481, 36 L. J. Ch. 879), 'upon whether or not it is the man's own ship that receives the goods, or whether he has contracted with some one else quâ carrier to deliver the goods; so that, according to the ordinary rule as laid down in Bohtlingk v Inglis, and continually referred to as settled law on the subject, the transitus is only at an end when the carrier has arrived at the place of destination, and has delivered the goods.'

There are, however, other circumstances that may terminate the transitus with delivery on board, even though the buyer be not in possession of the ship, and though the master remain the shipowner's servant, and act quâ carrier in receiving and holding the goods. 1. Where the goods are taken on board, not for the purpose of transmission to the vendee, but for the purpose of transmission away from the vendee, as e.g. to a foreign market. Where goods are shipped on board a vessel for transmission to the vendee, a subsequent and actual possession by the vendee is provided for; but if they are to be carried on a mercantile adventure, and not to the vendee, no other possession than that created by delivery on shipboard is contemplated or can be made under the circumstances, and such a reception of them is the only reception of them which is contemplated by the buyer. In such a case the transit is ended by delivery on shipboard: the captain is not a middleman between the vendor and vendee. Fowler v M'Taggart & Kymer, 7 T. R. 442, note, 1 East 522, note; and observations of Lawrence, J., in Bohtlingk v Inglis, 3 East 381. See per Parke, B., in Van Casteel v Booker, 18 L. J. Ex. 9; Paley, Prin. and Agent, 352, 354, Lloyd's ed.; observations of Wood, V. C., in Berndtson v Strong; Brodie, Stair, App. 881; Story on Sale, pp. 396–399–401, 402; Kent, Comm. ii. 545; Parsons on Contracts, i. pp. 604, 606, notes (j) and (n), where see judgment of Parsons, C. J., in Stubbs v Lund, 7 Mass. 453, and the other American cases, ib. cit. 2. Where the seller, in contracting for the carriage of the goods, which he does as agent for the vendee (see note, ante, p. 220), takes a receipt or bill of lading for them, as not merely deliverable to,

3. Where the goods are in the hands of a warehouseman for sale, or a manufacturer for some operation of his art, notice to the warehouse-keeper or manufacturer, transference in their books, payment of warehouse rent or of the hire of the workman's labour, or marking of the goods for the buyer, are sufficient acts of final and conclusive delivery to deprive the vendor of his right to stop.¹*

4. Where goods are in the bonded warehouse, entry of the transfer in the officer's books, where the seller of the goods is proprietor of the warehouse;² or notice to the warehouse-keeper; or marking the goods for the buyer, paying of warehouse rent, and such other acts of ownership as give notice of the transfer,—are effectual to pass the property, and take away the right of stopping.³*

5. Goods in dock warehouses are effectually transferred by transfer and endorsement of the dock warrants, so as to prevent stoppage by the original seller.⁴* But in such cases the right of stoppage will not be destroyed, unless the endorsee be in bona fide, and give a valuable consideration for the transference.⁵

6. Where goods are on their passage from the seller to the buyer, in the hands of a middleman, that is the proper case for the exercise of the right of stopping. But even this proposition involves many doubtful cases. The law is fixed in favour of the right to stop, where goods are either in the hands of the vendor's shipmaster, carter,⁶ etc., or in the hands of a common carrier by land or water, including shipping companies. Masters of ships on general freight, lightermen, waggoners, and all those who hold themselves out as carriers for the public, are properly middlemen, who hold a neutral character, and receive goods for the preservation of the seller's lien on the one hand, and of the buyer's right of property on the other.⁷ Wharfingers and warehousemen, porters, and all necessary auxiliaries of the carrying trade, are classed also as middlemen. But it but shipped by the vendee. The master carrying under such a bill of lading is obviously not carrying from the vendor to the vendee, but from the vendee to the vendee's order, or to some specified consignee. Noble v Adams, 2 Marsh. 366; Fragano v Long, 4 B. and C. 219; Meletopulo v Ranking, 6 Jur. 1095; Morton v Abercromby & Co., 1858, 20 D. 362, as to both this and preceding head. The case of Baxter v Pearson, 8 July 1807, F. C. and Hume 688, where the Court upheld stoppage, though the mate's receipt bore that the wheat was received from the buyer, and the bill of lading that it was shipped by him, is an unsound decision. 3. Where the contract of sale amounts to an agreement that delivery is to be held as having been actually made to the vendee on board a particular vessel, or at the port of shipment. By the custom of merchants in London, when goods are sold 'free on board' a ship named, it is the seller's duty to ship at his own cost, but the buyer is considered as the shipper. The transitus was held to cease on shipment. Cowasjee v Thompson, 5 Moore P. C. 165. The ratio of this case seems to be the same as that of the cases under the preceding head. But there were, besides this, the fact that the voyage was away from the vendees in London to new vendees in Bombay, and a point that, when the sellers had the option, they preferred to be paid by bills instead of cash, which was absolute and not conditional payment. The weight of the judgment seems laid on the evidence that, by the custom of trade, when goods are sold 'free on board,' the buyer is considered as the shipper, or as having received actual delivery at the ship's side, and then shipped them himself.]

¹ See above, pp. 194–197.

² See above, p. 204.

³ See above, p. 208 sqq.

⁴ Keyser v Suse, 1 Gow, N. P. Cases 58. See the cases quoted p. 206 et seq. [It does not appear to be yet determined whether, in the inland trade, receipts or delivery orders for goods may be endorsed to the same effect with dock warrants and bills of lading. See Bryant v Nix, 4 M. and W. 775; Jenkins v Usborne, 7 M. and Gr. 678; Kingsford v Merry, 1856, 11 Exch. 577, 1 H. and N. 503; Tudor's L. Ca. p. 724.]

* [These are not cases of stoppage, but questions of delivery or no delivery, as to which, see ante.]

⁵ See below, those qualifications of the endorsee's right in the case of bills of lading, p. 237. [If the constructive possession of the goods is changed by intimating the transfer of the documents, retention in Scotland and the seller's lien in England are gone; and the goods not being in transitu, there is no room for the equitable remedy of stoppage. The mere endorsement and delivery of the document will not, however, change the possession, as in the case of a bill of lading. (See note, ante, p. 206.) In Scotland (we do not know how the matter would stand in England), if the endorsee knew ever so clearly that the price was not paid, and himself took delivery as a donation, still he would not be liable to any claim at the instance of the original seller, unless the seller should make out that he was particeps criminis in an attempt to swindle, or should proceed on the ground of the nullity of a gratuitous right granted by an insolvent in fraudem creditoris. But neither of these remedies is stoppage in transitu, or analogous to the qualifications of the endorsee's right in favour of the unpaid vendor in the case of bills of lading here referred to.]

⁶ [This is a case of retention in Scotland. See note 2, p. 217; also note 1, p. 229.]

⁷ [See note, p. 218, ante.]

is important to observe the limitations and exceptions under which this general rule must be received.

(1.) Goods in the hands of a shipmaster may be excepted from the common rule of stoppage, by the terms of the RECEIPT, if expressly taken to the vendee;¹ or under the terms of the BILL of LADING, where it is taken deliverable to endorsees, the right to stop may be discharged, if the bill have in consequence been endorsed to a third party, buying in bona fide on the faith of it.

In a question with the buyer and his general creditors, indeed, the price not being paid, the delivery of a bill of lading will not bar stoppage in transitu. Whether the bill of [214] lading be taken to the consignor, and endorsed by him to the buyer;² or taken to the buyer³ by name; or taken to the consignors, and transmitted to the buyer with a blank endorsement;⁴ whatever, in short, may be the form in which a bill of lading is expressed,⁵ the seller is not thereby deprived of his right to stop in transitu, where the question is with the buyer, or his general creditors alone. But it is of great importance to trade that a merchant shall have it in his power, while goods are in the course of their voyage, to dispose of them and carry on his trade as if they were actually arrived. The rapidity of commercial operations is thus most beneficially increased, and the purchaser of goods is enabled to provide a fund for answering the bills for the price of those very goods, when their arrival happens to be long delayed. Such sales while goods are at sea are accomplished by transferable bills of lading; and the object cannot in its full extent be attained, unless those bills of lading give a power of unconditional disposal, untrammelled by the particular state of accounts [215] between the original seller and buyer, and in every respect as complete as if the holder of the bill had the goods themselves to deliver over. It has always been understood accordingly by merchants, that such documents are negotiable like bills of ex-

¹ See above, p. 219, [and note 1, p. 232.]

² Hall of Salisbury had written to Askell & Co. of Malaga to send him 20 butts of olive oil. Askell accordingly bought them, and shipped them on three bills of lading to his own order. He sent an invoice, and one of the bills endorsed to Hall; and to Jones, his correspondent in England, he sent a bill for the price, with another of the bills of lading endorsed. Hall not having paid his bill, Jones applied to the shipmaster, who promised to deliver the oils to him. The ship not having been reported to the custom-house, the oils could not instantly be delivered; and before they were delivered, Hall borrowed £200 on the faith of an endorsement to his bill of lading, and the endorsee applied for the goods. The shipmaster, however, delivered them to Jones. 'The jury were directed by the Chief Justice to find a verdict for the defendant, which they accordingly did.' The defendant was the shipmaster. Fearon v Bowers, 28 March 1753, 1 H. Blackst. 364, note.

The case in which the doctrine of stopping in transitu was first applied in Scotland, was also a case of a bill of lading taken to the consignor, and endorsed to the vendee. Allan & Stewart had, in execution of an agreement with Stein, purchased and shipped grain on bills of lading to their own order: they endorsed the bills to Stein. The goods were stopped; but all inquiry into the particular situation in which they were in respect of actual delivery having been suspended in the Court of Session, by the particular view taken of the case as involving a question of fraud, the House of Lords sent it back to ascertain the facts, as with relation to the point of stopping in transitu. Allan & Stewart v Jeffrey and other Crs. of Stein, 1788, 23 Dec. 1790, M. 4951, 3 Pat. 191.

³ Burghal in London had given an order to Bromley at Liverpool to send him a quantity of cheese. Bromley accordingly shipped a ton of cheese on a bill of lading, deliverable to Burghal in London. Burghal having become bankrupt before the ship arrived, the shipmaster was ordered, on the behalf of Bromley, not to deliver the goods; and accordingly refused, though the freight was tendered. The action was on the case upon the custom of the realm against the shipmaster as a carrier. 'Lord Mansfield was of opinion that the plaintiffs (the assignees of Burghal, the vendee) had no foundation to recover; and said he had known it several times ruled in Chancery, that where the consignee became bankrupt, and no part of the price had been paid, it was lawful for the consignor to seize the goods before they came to the hands of the consignee or his assignees; and that this was ruled, not upon the principles of equity only, but upon the laws of property.' Coram Lord Mansfield, 1 Hy. Blackst. 365, note, Ass. of Burghal v Howard.

⁴ In the great case of Lickbarrow v Mason, it was held that there is no distinction between a bill of lading blank endorsed, and an endorsement to a particular person. 2 Term. Rep. 63. See below, p. 235. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 205; Tudor, Merc. Ca. 2d ed. 661.]

⁵ [This very general expression must be understood as being confined to bills of lading ejusdem generis with those specially described, e.g. a bill of lading making the seller shipper, and the vendee the person entitled to receive delivery; but not such a bill of lading as makes the vendee shipper, or contains a contract to carry the goods not to, but from him. See ante, p. 232, note 1.]

change; and while the necessities of trade require such unlimited powers in the holders of the bills of lading, the original seller, who transmits the bill of lading, if he has not sufficient confidence in the buyer's credit, may insert some qualification in the bill, or make the goods deliverable in such a way as to form an exception from the common rule, and carry notice to every person who may be desired to deal on the credit of that bill of lading.

On this question very different doctrines have been delivered by two of the greatest commercial lawyers of Europe. VALIN has maintained that although, by the law of France, a ship cannot be effectually sold at sea to the prejudice of the creditors of the seller, the law is different with respect to a cargo or merchandise on board; and that bills of lading are negotiable like bills of exchange. EMERIGON, on the other hand, maintains, in opposition to Valin's doctrine, that there can be no sale of commodities at sea, so as to prejudice the claim of the seller for the price; and that bills of lading are not negotiable instruments. The reasonings of such men, and their enlightened and liberal views of mercantile jurisprudence, cannot be too much recommended to the perusal of the profession.¹

In England it would appear that an unconditional bill of lading has always been considered in mercantile practice as negotiable, unclogged with any power of stoppage against the stranger endorsee. The question was, however, held to be very doubtful in point of law. Judges of great name differed in opinion—even the Courts of King's Bench and Exchequer Chamber were at variance; and two very opposite views were taken, both of the principle of the right of stoppage in transitu, and of the nature and effect of a bill of lading.²

In the Court of King's Bench, the right of stopping was found to be ineffectual against the endorsee of a bill of lading for value, and without notice of non-payment. The Court proceeded upon these grounds: 1. That by the transmission of a bill of lading, in which the goods are made deliverable to the consignee by name, or to the shipper's order, with an endorsation either in blank or to the consignee expressly, the property is legally vested in the consignee. 2. That the bill of lading is a negotiable instrument, and the property vested by it may be as effectually transferred by endorsation and delivery, as the right to the sum in a bill of exchange may be transferred to an endorsee. And, 3. That the privilege of stopping in transitu having been introduced merely as an equitable exception on the buyer's failing to pay the price, it cannot operate against his endorsee, who has given a valuable consideration, trusting to the endorsement of the negotiable instrument, as he would have advanced money on an endorsation to a bill of exchange; and against whom, therefore, no claim of equity can lie, available to a person who, by his own act, has enabled the consignee to deceive him.

In the Exchequer Chamber, the judges of the Common Pleas and Exchequer sitting in review reversed this judgment, after a very elaborate argument of Lord Rosslyn, who delivered the opinion of the Court. It was held that a bill of lading is merely the evidence of a contract for the carriage and delivery of goods; the shipmaster having a special property to support his possession as in right of another, and to enable him to perform his undertaking; and the general property remaining with the shipper until he is divested by some act [216] sufficient to transfer property: that bills of lading are not negotiable like bills of exchange, but merely assignable; the endorsation being an assignment of the goods themselves simply, or rather a direction of the delivery of the goods, entitling the endorsee to discharge the shipmaster; but only such an assignment as that of goods in pawn, or of goods bought and not delivered, which transmits no right, without its attendant burden: that such assignment differs from an endorsement of a bill of exchange, which passes the whole interest so completely as to leave the endorsee unaffected even by the creditors of the endorser: that bills

¹ Valin, Nouveau Comment. sur l'Ordonnance de la Marine, vol. i. pp. 572-6; Emerigon, Tr. des Assurances et des Contrats à la Grosse, vol. i. pp. 319, 320.

² This discussion took place in the great case of Lickbarrow

v. Mason, which came first into the King's Bench on a demurrer, was afterwards decided in the Exchequer Chamber, and finally in the House of Lords.

of lading may be endorsed for many purposes, and therefore always imply an inquiry before credit can be given to them implicitly; while bills of exchange never are endorsed but for the unqualified transfer of the debt; and that, consequently, the endorsee of a bill of lading must inquire under what title it is held by the endorser, and can acquire no better right than the endorser had: that it is a begging of the question to say, that the consignor gives a power to the consignee to deceive third parties; for that power depends entirely on the legal effect of a bill of lading, and the extent of the right of the holder. But from the oldest times the payment of the price is a condition precedent in sale, the sale not being executed before delivery, and delivery not being complete, entirely to divest the seller, till the goods have come into the buyer's possession: and this was held to be not an equitable exception, but a right, proceeding upon the legal title as owner not divested; to show which, Lord Loughborough took an elaborate review of the judgments hitherto pronounced.¹ This judgment, in its turn, was reversed in the House of Lords on a point of form, and a new trial was ordered after the judges had delivered their opinions. In this new trial a special verdict was found of the same facts which had been formerly set forth, with this addition: 'That by the custom of merchants, bills of lading expressing goods or merchandises to have been shipped by any person or persons, to be delivered to order and assigns, have been, and are, at any time after such goods have been shipped, and before the voyage performed for which they have been or are shipped, negotiable and transferable by the shipper or shippers of such goods, to any other person or persons, by such shipper or shippers endorsing such bill with his, her, or their name or names, and delivering or transmitting the same so endorsed, or causing the same to be so delivered or transmitted to such other person or persons; and that by such endorsement and delivery or transmission, the property in such goods hath been and is transferred and passed to such other person or persons; and that by the custom of merchants, endorsements of bills of lading in blank, that is to say, by the shipper or shippers, with their names only, have been, and are, and may be filled up by the person or persons to whom they are so delivered or transmitted as aforesaid, with words ordering the delivery of the goods or contents of such bills of lading to be made to such person or persons; and according to the practice of merchants, the same, when filled up, have the same operation and effect as if the same had been made or done by such shipper or shippers, when he, she, or they endorsed the same bills of lading with their names as aforesaid.'² The judges of the Court of King's Bench, saying only that they retained their former opinion, gave judgment as at first. The case was again brought into the House of Lords, but the writ of error was afterwards abandoned; and it is now the admitted doctrine, that the consignee may, by endorsement of his bill of lading for value, and without notice, confer an absolute right on the endorsee, indefeasible by the consignor attempting to stop in transitu.³

[217] Strictly speaking, this was not a final determination, establishing any clear distinct proposition, the case having gone off upon what is technically called a Venire de novo. But it is understood to have established that the consignee of goods, by the assignment of the bill of lading to a third person for valuable consideration, confers an absolute property upon such assignee, indefeasible by any claim on the part of the consignor.

The doctrine thus understood to be settled in England, has not been established by any express decision in Scotland;⁴ but the law has been considered here, as well as in England,

¹ 1 H. Blackst. 357. [See Pennell v Alexander, 3 Ell. and Bl. 283; Gurney v Behrend, 3 Ell. and Bl. 622; Pease v Gloahac, 1 Law Rep. P. C. 219; The Tigress, 32 L. J. Ad. 97.]

² 5 Term. Rep. K. B. 683. Lord Kenyon had in the meanwhile been promoted to this Court, and in another case (Salomons v Nissen, 2 Term. Rep. 674) had expressed his approbation of the first judgment pronounced, as grounded on principles of policy and common honesty.

³ Abbott 373.

⁴ In the case of Bogle and Dunmore, the question was not, Whether the consignor could stop in transitu for the price against an onerous endorsee of the bill of lading? but, Whether a creditor of the consignor, and who had possession of the goods, could stop them as the property of the consignor, and as in his possession, subject to a right of retention on the consignor becoming bankrupt, for all debts due to the person holding the possession? 1787, M. 14216.

Again, the question may at first sight seem to have been to be conclusively fixed, and cases have been determined in which it has been so assumed and reasoned upon, both at the bar and on the bench.¹

(2.) It is important, however, to mark the LIMITATION under which the right of the endorsee is admitted to control the vendor's right of stopping in transitu; and, 1. It is to be observed, that the whole weight of the decision in the case of Lickbarrow rests upon the understood negotiability of bills of lading, and on the implied conclusion which the endorsee is entitled to draw, that he will be exposed to no latent claims by persons in the right of the seller as against the buyer. But it seems to follow, from the very necessity of admitting an implication in the transaction, that the endorsee of a foreign bill of lading must lay his account with such right as the foreign vendor may have to seize the goods while under the jurisdiction of the foreign country. Now it was formerly the general rule of law in foreign states, that a seller may, even after actual delivery, seize his goods for the price, on the bankruptcy of the buyer. And this rule was in some countries strengthened by special regulations. In Holland, under the former jurisprudence, before the French conquest, the courts interposed while goods were still on shipboard, not having left the country, and ordered them either to be unshipped, or new bills of lading to be made to a consignee of the shippers, where the buyer became a bankrupt without payment of the price; and to that jurisprudence it is now to be presumed they have returned.² In Russia, a country with which we have a very close intercourse in trade, the same rule is observed, and [218] implicated in the case of L. Arbuthnot v Bisset's Crs., 1798, M. 14220. But the judges were anxious to prevent the possibility of their being understood to have decided that point. The tenants in that case were bound to deliver grain to Lord Arbuthnot, and he gave to Bisset an order on the tenants, which they accepted. In considering whether this was sufficient to bar the right of stopping in transitu, as in a question with the creditors of Bisset, it was natural incidentally to consider the question as it would have stood with a purchaser from Bisset, had he carried his documents to market. But although a very high authority rather seemed to intimate that in such a case he would have thought the sale effectual, and Lord Arbuthnot divested of his right to stop in transitu, he wished, and the rest of the judges concurred with him, that the judgment of the Court should be understood as not in any shape including a decision on that point. [The case of Morton v Abercromby, 1858, 20 D. 362, was very similar, though not identical in its circumstances, with Lickbarrow v Mason. The purchasers took the bills of lading in their own names, and afterwards endorsed them for value to a third party. It was held that delivery was complete, and that the seller was not entitled to interdict to prevent the goods from being forwarded to their destination.]

¹ Lord Woodhouselee, in his Dictionary of Decisions, at the suggestion of Lord President Campbell, entered the case of Lickbarrow v Mason as settling this question. 4 Dict. 252. And in the case of Tod v Rattray, 1 Feb. 1809 (see above, p. 208, note 2), the great question was, Whether an order of delivery of goods in the king's cellar was a negotiable document, to be disposed of according to the rule of Lickbarrow's case, taking the rule of that case to be law. 15 F. C. 132. [The doctrine is also recognised in the U. K. statute 18 and 19 Vict. c. 111.]

² Lord Rosslyn, in Lickbarrow's case, thus reports a case before him at Guildhall, Trinity Term, 1789: 'It appeared in evidence that one Bowering had bought a cask of indigo of Verrulez & Co. at Amsterdam, which was sent from the warehouse of the seller, and shipped on board a vessel commanded by one Tulloch, by the appointment of Bowering. The bills of lading were made out and signed by Tulloch, to deliver to Bowering or order, who immediately endorsed one of them to his correspondent in London, and sent it by the post. Verrulez having information of Bowering's insolvency before the ship sailed from the Texel, summoned Tulloch, the shipmaster, before the Court at Amsterdam, who ordered him to sign other bills of lading, to the order of Verrulez. Upon the arrival of the ship in London the shipmaster delivered the goods, according to the last bills, to the order of Verrulez. This case, as to the practice of merchants, deserves,' says his Lordship, 'particular attention; for the judges of the Court at Amsterdam are merchants of the most extensive dealings, and they are assisted by very eminent lawyers.' 1 Henry Blackst. 364.

The following case was laid before two advocates (Juris Utriusque Doctores) of the city of Amsterdam:—'A, at Amsterdam, upon the written order of B, empowered by C at Glasgow, purchased and sent to Rotterdam, for the purpose of being expedited to Leith in Scotland, 50 bales of Phernambuck cotton, for the amount of which A, in conformity to the orders he received, drew upon D at London, who accepted the draft. The foresaid cotton having arrived at Rotterdam, was there loaded on board the ship the Magnet, Captain John Moyes, destined to Leith. This being accomplished, the captain signed the bills of lading drawn out to the order of B. Then, before the vessel could sail, A was informed by B that the house of C at Glasgow had failed. B, in the meantime, put into the hands of A, which was endorsed by B to A, the bill of lading of this cotton (he, B, having already transmitted to the foresaid house at Glasgow one of the other bills of lading), upon which bill of lading A made the cotton be unshipped against payment to the captain of three-fourths of the freight, free-keeping him of all after demands in regard to the bill of lading which had been transmitted to Glasgow, and which unshipping A conjectured he might do with the more safety, as he was not paid for the cotton; and also, that is indeed laid down expressly in the code of mercantile and navigation laws of the empire.¹ Wherever these rules are established in foreign countries, it would appear that the purchaser of a bill of lading from that country should be held to lay his account with an interruption.²

2. What has hitherto been said applies only to the case of a purchase of goods on a bill of lading for a fair price, and in the course of the market, and without notice of any circumstances which render the bill of lading not fairly and honestly assignable. But if the bill [219] of lading be endorsed upon a confidential footing; and especially if there be an agreement to participate in the right of the consignee; or with notice that the price, stipulated to be in ready money, is not paid; or that the stipulated security is not given; the endorsee is entitled to no privilege, but comes into the place of the original holder.³ It is not sufficient that the endorsee should know, at the time when the bill of lading was the house in London upon which A had drawn had happened to fail. The captain having arrived at Leith with his ship, was, however, required to deliver the cotton, conform to the bill of lading sent to Glasgow, which had been hypothecated, or put in pawn, by the house at Glasgow.

‘It is therefore asked,—

“If A, according to the laws and usages of this country, could not, or might not, in this case, so conduct himself as he has done? and if the captain also was not bound and obliged, upon presenting, and in consequence of the overgiving and endorsement of the bill of lading by B to A, to redeliver the foresaid cotton to the said A?”

‘Answer.—“29th Sept. 1803.—Seen by us undersigned, J. U. Doctores and Advocates, residing within the city of Amsterdam, the before case; and in answer to the questions therein proposed, we think (under correction) that A, according to the laws and usages of this country, so could and might have conducted himself as he has done; and that the captain was bound and obliged, in consequence of the overgiving and endorsement of the bill of lading by B to A, to redeliver the cotton mentioned in the before-written case to the said A.”’

¹ The following attestation by three judges of the Custom-house Court of St. Petersburg, delivered in consequence of an imperial ukase, is good evidence of this law: ‘By his Majesty’s imperial ukase, and resolution of the Custom-house Court of St. Petersburg, this attestation is given to the St. Petersburg merchants of the first class, Bohtlingk & Co., upon their request; that concerning a suit at law, having in London, with the London merchant, T. Crane, they wanted an attestation of the 138th section in the mercantile navigation laws, and that this law is generally received and acted upon; wherefore they demanded a testimony of this tenor, that the seller or shipper of merchandise, if he have reason to suspect the circumstances of the purchaser or consignee, and being not yet paid for his merchandise, has a right, by virtue of the said law, to reclaim and take back this merchandise out of the ship in which it may be loaded, although the bills of lading were already transmitted, and without regarding that the ship has been chartered abroad, or here, or out of the house, warehouse, or other place belonging to the purchaser; and that the merchandise must be given back to the seller or shipper, and is not brought in *concur*s. And whereas it is ordered, in the above-mentioned mercantile navigation laws, published the 25th June 1781, in the 138th section: If, in the case of unpaid debts or bankruptcies, anybody has reason to suspect that the debtor or bankrupt has any thought of making the creditor lose, and therefore loadeth on board of ship or vessel goods or cargo; in such a case the creditor is to give notice, in town to the head judge of the court, in districts to the chief, that the ship or vessel, or goods, or the whole cargo, should be retained time enough, until the full payment is made to whom due. In consequence whereof, and by virtue of this law, if the seller or shipper, in case of bankruptcies, can identify that this merchandise belonging to him, is here in ship, warehouse, or wherever they may be; in such a case the goods must be given back to the seller or shipper, being his property, and cannot be brought in *concur*s. In consideration, this attestation is given to them, Bohtlingk & Co. Underwritten by the preceding judges, and sealed by the seal of St. Petersburg Custom-house Court, the 25th September 1800.’ Bohtlingk v Inglis, 3 East Reports 386.

² There may be some doubt whether a shipmaster, who has signed bills of lading, deliverable at a particular place, will be liberated, by delivering the goods before the voyage is completed or begun; at least where he delivers the goods voluntarily, knowing the rule of the country, and takes indemnity from the foreign merchant. But it would appear, 1st, That a bill of lading must be taken in all cases, with the qualification attached to it by the law of the country where it is made; and 2dly, That, on the principles of international law, effect must in our courts be given to the rules of law and decisions of courts of foreign countries. Perhaps the law of bills of exchange may be taken as furnishing analogies for illustrating the doctrine of bills of lading. The acceptor is bound to pay against a particular day; if he pay before that time, he exposes himself to a second demand. (Chitty on Bills of Exchange, p. 125.) But if, by the laws of a foreign state where the acceptance was made, the obligation is by any means vacated, it will no longer have any obligatory force in this country. Ib. p. 83.

³ Salomons v Nissen. Hagues bought 705 pigs of lead for £1000 from Nissen & Co. in Liverpool, and ordered it to be shipped to Rouen. It was shipped in the Jane, the bill of lading endorsed blank, and sent to Hagues. Salomons on 16th March gave Hagues an acceptance for £700, and in return Hagues delivered the bill of lading to them, with an obligation: ‘In case the lead is not remitted for by the time these bills fall due, they shall be renewed for two months longer.’ The acceptances were paid when due. On 21st March, Hagues and Salomons agreed to a partnership concern in the lead, which was to be accounted for to Salomons, the profits divided, etc. The vessel was forced back to port by a storm, and the Nissens stopped the goods as not paid for. The endorsed and delivered to him, that the consignor had not received payment in cash for his goods, but had only taken the consignee's acceptances, payable at a future day not then arrived;¹ for that suggests nothing which makes it unfair in the consignee to assign, or in an endorsee to accept the assignment of the bill of lading. But if he also knew at the same time that the consignee was insolvent, and could not pay his bills, then his taking the right to the goods is palpably to disappoint the just rights and expectations of the seller, and amounts to a fraud on the right to stop.² On this point some confusion arose formerly from the use of the word notice, 'If the indorsee shall not have notice.' But this has been clearly expressed to mean, 'notice of such circumstances as rendered the bill of lading not fairly and correctly assignable.'³ 3. Questions have arisen on this matter in relation to factors. And, (1.) If a bill of lading has been endorsed to the buyer's factor, who in conse- [220] quence comes under acceptance to the buyer, or even receives it as a security for acceptances already undertaken, the factor will be entitled, as any third party would be, to have the goods in opposition to the vendor, as fully transferred by the endorsed bill of lading.⁴ (2.) If such endorsement be made as a consignment on general account, and where the factor question was, whether Salomons were entitled to prevent the exercise of this right of stoppage.

The distinction taken by the judges between this case and Lickbarrow's was, that by the contract of 21st March Salomons not only made themselves partners with Hagues quoad this transaction, but also became paymasters, and must take the bill of lading, subject to the same rights with the original consignee, especially since, though Hagues acted as the visible owner, it appeared on the agreement that he had not paid for the goods. 2 Term. Rep. 674. [See Stoppel & Son v M'Laren & Co., 1849, 11 D. 676, and 1850, 13 D. 61.]

¹ It is laid down by Cullen, 'that if an assignee purchase, with notice of the goods not being paid for, he must stand in the same situation with the consignee himself, and that the consignor may stop in transitu, and retain possession as against such assignee.' Cullen's Principles of Bankrupt Law, 266, 267.

This doctrine I questioned in my former edition, but I was not then aware of a case in which my doubts are confirmed (Cuming v Brown, 1808, 9 East 506). Here the original seller stipulated on the invoice, 'Payable by bill on London at three months.' The bill was drawn and accepted. The buyer afterwards endorsed the bill of lading to another for a full and valuable consideration, and in two months afterwards absconded, leaving his acceptance unpaid. It was admitted by the endorsee of the bill of lading, that he had taken this endorsement as a security for £500 already due to him, and of a further advance of £1300; and that he was aware the goods had not been actually paid for, but that he believed them to have been acquired in the course of trade, and that they would be paid for. The question turned on this, whether notice that the goods had not been paid for in money was notice which ought to have prevented the endorsee from taking the endorsement? The Court held the assignment unexceptionable; and Lord Ellenborough, in pronouncing judgment, observed these points: 1. That against the assignee of the bill of lading it should have been shown that the consignor had bargained for payment before assignment of the bill of lading; or, 2. That he had assisted in contravening the terms of the bargain, or had reasonable expectations or rights connected therewith, as by knowledge of insolvency, and the want of likelihood that the bill should be retired or the price paid.

² [In the course of the argument before the Privy Council in Rodger v Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, Law Rep. 2 P. C. 393, also separately reported by Mr. R. C. Fisher (Stevens, London, 1869), Lord Chelmsford said: 'It is curious to remark that the right to stop in transitu only exists where there is an insolvent vendee. Then a person, knowing of the insolvency of the vendee, takes an assignment of the bill of lading. By that very act he prevents the right of stoppage in transitu. It would seem, therefore, as if the knowledge of insolvency alone ought to be sufficient' (Fisher's Rep. p. 15). In Vertue v Jewell, 4 Campb. 32, Lord Ellenborough distinctly laid down the same doctrine, that a transfer of a bill of lading, with notice of insolvency, would have been insufficient to defeat the vendor's right of stoppage. It thus seems that a proposed endorsee of a bill of lading, who is aware of his endorser's insolvency, and that the transitus of the goods is still undetermined, is bound to assume, from the very fact of insolvency, the probability of there being an unpaid vendor with a right to stop in transitu. The insolvency should put him on inquiry, the neglect of which it seems will, if it afterwards turn out that there is an unpaid vendor who stops, amount to notice of such circumstances as render the bill of lading not fairly and honestly assignable. Compare, as to the obligation to inquire, and consequences of neglecting it in operating constructive notice of everything to which it is afterwards found that inquiry might have led, Whitbread v Jordan, 1 Y. and Coll. 328; Newcome v Thornton, per Lawrence, J., 6 East 43; Evans v Trueman, per Lord Tenterden, 1 Moody and Ryan 10; May v Chapman, per Parke, B., 16 M. and W. 355; Kennedy v Green, per cur., 3 Bingh. and Lee 719; and see Mr. Fisher's preface to his report of Rodger's case, infra. Although in Rodger's case there are other points, still it appears strongly to countenance the doctrine, that if the endorsees know of facts which would raise a presumption in the minds of reasonable men that the vendors of the goods represented by the bill of lading were unpaid, that should put them on inquiry; and no inquiry being made, the endorsement is not bona fide, and will not defeat the right to stop.

³ Cuming's case, above. [See Rodger v Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, Law Rep. 2 P. C. 393; Bateman v Green, 2 Ir. R. Q. B. 166; Pease v Gloahec, L. R. 1 P. C. 219.]

⁴ Vertue v Jewell, 4 Camp. 31. [This case has never been

takes only in his relation as factor, and nothing beyond that character, it would seem that the factor has not, for any balance of debt already in account with his principal, a right to consider the transfer as complete. And, (3.) Where such endorsement, though not made as a specific pledge for advances, is in the course of a continued practice of acceptance, and the factor comes under new acceptances accordingly on general account, the vendor has, even in such a case, been held entitled to stop the goods as still in transitu. These two points are illustrated in the cases quoted below.¹ Where, in cases of this description, the endorsee to the bill of lading is himself a bankrupt, and incapable of performing the engagements undertaken as the consideration for the endorsement, it does not appear that he or his creditors can interfere to alter the rights of vendor and vendee, as they would have stood independently of that endorsement.²

overruled, but, if correctly reported, is very questionable law. See Blackb. Sale, p. 220; Benjamin, Sale, p. 632. See 5 and 6 Vict. c. 39. Where the buyer transfers the goods in security of debt, the seller's right is not thereby defeated, though he must exercise it subject to the security. Westzynthius v La Page & Co., 5 B. and Adolph. 817; Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 556.]

¹ Haille v Smith, 1 Bos. and Pull. 563.

Patten v Thomson, 1816, 5 Maule and Selw. 351. Wheat was sold by Patten to Hickman & Co., put on shipboard, bills of lading taken, deliverable to Hickman & Co.'s assigns, which were transmitted, and bills drawn and accepted at three months for the price. Hickman & Co. sent the bill of lading to their Liverpool correspondents endorsed. The Liverpool house were in the course of receiving consignments, bills, etc. from Hickman & Co., and of accepting their drafts, and about this time accepted very extensive drafts for Hickman & Co. They both failed while the wheat was on shipboard, and the provisional assignee of the Liverpool house went on board and claimed it, and afterward succeeded in getting possession of it on the one hand, while the creditors gave notice to stop on the other. The Court of King's Bench (Lord Ellenborough, and Abbot, Bayley, and Holroyd, J.) were clear that there was still a right to stop. The action was by the vendors against the assignee of the Liverpool house, to recover the value of the wheat. Lord Ellenborough said: 'If it is to be taken that the cargo was consigned to the Liverpool house as a security for advances made by them, this may afford a ground for their claim to detain the same until such time as they are indemnified against these advances, or the responsibility they have contracted in respect of the cargo. But the case, as it now stands, seems to me to go further, and that the defendant, in order to succeed in his claim, must make out this position, that wherever a principal consigns goods to his factor for sale, and is at the same time in a course of drawing on the factor upon account, this single circumstance of there being mutual credits between them, does of itself give to the factor a right not merely to detain such consignments as shall come to his hands, but to anticipate the possession, and keep it against the unpaid seller. If there had been any specific pledge of this cargo in the course of the transaction—if bills had been accepted by the Liverpool house on the credit of this particular consignment, or if it had been so stipulated—this would have been a different case. But it appears from the whole transaction that this is a mere naked case of a factor, to whom a quantity of wheat is consigned for the purpose of being sold by him, and who is to account for the sale, and render the proceeds to his principal. In such a case, if the factor has received the proceeds, he will be entitled to his lien upon them, to the extent of his indemnity; but he can have no rights antecedently to possession, in respect of the consignment, but such as he has in his representative character of factor, in order to effectuate the object of the consignment.' He adds: 'It seems to me, that this is neither the case of a pledge by way of security for advances made, nor of an assignment of the bill of lading, except for the purpose of enabling the factor to receive the property, and carry it to the account of his principal; that here the unpaid vendor is not deprived of his right, in consequence of the failure of the vendee to stop in transitu. And therefore these plaintiffs are entitled to judgment, they having done all in their power to stop the cargo by laying claim to it, which was frustrated only by the messenger under the commission of Hodgson & Co. seizing the cargo in spite of the captain's undertaking to hold it for the plaintiffs; and I am not aware of any authority which clashes with this case thus considered.'

Mr. Justice Abbot (now Lord Chief Justice) observed a peculiarity which may deserve attention in other cases, and expressed some doubt on the general point. 'I am not,' he said, 'prepared to say that, upon the facts here stated, it might not be fairly argued that the Liverpool house accepted the drafts enclosed to them, in the letter of the 8th June, upon the faith of this very cargo, the bill of lading for which they received by the same letter. This, perhaps, was a question of fact for the jury. But, taking this case as one between principal and factor, who were engaged in a general course of dealing, the principal consigning to his factor from time to time cargoes to be sold for his account, and remitting bills, and drawing upon him in such manner as to form a general account between them, I should have required further time, as I have already stated, to consider whether, if the factor might have retained this cargo had it come to his possession, he would not also have had a right to insist upon taking possession, in order that he might retain. Kinloch v Craig differs in this respect, that there the bill of lading was unendorsed. Perhaps, however, my doubt might, upon consideration, turn out to be not well founded; and it is not material upon the present occasion, because here not only did the factors not take possession of the cargo, but they were not in a condition to do so, or to perform the trust upon which it was sent to them, they having become bankrupts.' Mr. Justice Bayley and Mr. Justice Holroyd unqualifiedly agreed with Lord Ellenborough.

² Patten v Thomson, supra, note 1.

(3.) A middleman may, by the agreement of the parties, be converted into a SPECIAL AGENT of the buyer; so that the goods in his hands, or ship, or warehouse, in that character, will not longer be subject to stoppage. One example of this has already been referred to in the case of a shipmaster granting his receipt or bill of lading, with consent of the vendor, to the buyer himself.¹ So, where a wharfinger's warehouse is made the final repository of the goods for the buyer, in which they are either to abide the market or wait for further orders from the buyer, the wharfinger is considered no longer as a middleman, but as special agent or custodier for the buyer; and stoppage is not competent.²

Whether the converse holds, viz. that a special agent may be converted into a middleman, by the act which he is directed to perform being only in furtherance of the passage of the goods to the buyer? is a question which seems doubtful. Not only in such a case is the special agent of the buyer not selected by the seller, or entrusted with the preservation of any right of his; but he seems to be as exclusively the representative of the buyer as when a middleman is converted into a special agent of the buyer. Yet the cases leave this matter undetermined, and indeed seem rather to tend towards the establishment of some such distinction as this: That where there is any interval between the delivery of the goods and their progress farther, during which the person receiving them is in suspense till a new direction or order is given by the buyer, they are to be considered as still in their transit, and liable, on the buyer's insolvency, to be stopped.³ Such a rule would dispose [222]

¹ See above, p. 219.

² Such are the cases already quoted, p. 216 et seq., note 3. [So, when goods in the hands of a carrier had been directed by the buyer to be kept by the carrier for his accommodation, the transitus is at an end. Foster v Frampton, 6 Barn. and Cress. 107, 2 Car. and P. 469. An opposite decision in Scotland, Black v Cassels, 1828, 6 S. 894, seems to be questionable.]

³ [Jackson v Nichol, 5 Bing. N. C. 508.] Also Stokes v La Riviere, 3 Term. Rep. 466. A fuller report of this case is in 3 East 397. Stokes being a ribbon weaver, Messrs. Duhems of Lisle, who had just arrived in London, applied to him for a quantity of ribbons. He made up the bale, value £186, and delivered it to La Riviere & Co. to be forwarded to Lisle. The goods were accordingly, with other goods from one Twigge, forwarded to Bine & Overman, La Riviere's correspondents at Ostend, with directions to send them to the order of Duhems. On the receipt of the goods, Bine & Overman wrote to Duhems an acknowledgment, and that they waited their directions. On 12th June Duhems stopped, and consented by instrument to Twigge's taking back his goods; but not having fulfilled some engagement to La Riviere & Co., and being in debt to them, they had (31st May) countermanded the orders to Bine & Overman as to the delivery of the goods, and directed them to alter the marks, and deliver them to their order, which was accordingly done. La Riviere & Co. contended that, on delivery of the goods by Stokes to them, the property vested in Duhems, so as to entitle La Riviere & Co. to retain it as theirs. At the trial of the cause Lord Mansfield said: 'The fact I take to be this: The Duhems bought goods of the plaintiff, which were ordered to be delivered to La Riviere to be shipped to Duhems, who are since become insolvent, after the goods were sent to a factor at Ostend. The defendants, who have got them back again, stand as they originally did. No point is more clear than that, if the goods are sold, and the price not paid, the seller may stop them in transitu,—I mean in every sort of passage to the hands of the buyers. There have been a hundred cases of this sort. Ships in harbour, carriers, bills, have been stopped. In short, where the goods are in transitu, the seller has that proprietary lien. The goods are in the hands of the defendants to be conveyed: the owner may get them back again.' 18 Dec. 1784, Sit. at Guildhall before Lord Mansfield.

Hunter, etc., Assignees of Blanchard & Lewis, v Beal. Steers & Co. of Wakefield sent to Beal, an innkeeper, a bale of cloth directed for Blanchard & Lewis. Beal's bookkeeper gave immediate notice to Blanchard & Lewis that a bale was arrived for them; and at the same time Steers & Co. sent them a bill of parcels by post, the receipt of which they acknowledged, and wrote that they had placed the amount to the credit of Steers & Co. Blanchard & Lewis then gave orders to the bookkeeper at Beal's to send the bale down to the galley quay, in order to ship it on board the Union for Boston. This was accordingly done; but the ship being loaded, the bale was carried back to Beal's. Within ten days afterwards, a clerk of Blanchard & Lewis went to Beal's warehouse, when Beal asked him what should be done with the bale. He was ordered by the clerk to keep it in his custody till another ship sailed, which would happen in a few days. Blanchard & Lewis soon after became bankrupt, and Steers & Co. sent orders to Beal not to let the bale out of his hands. Accordingly, when the bankrupts applied for it, he refused to deliver it. Lord Mansfield was clearly of opinion that the goods in question might be legally delivered to the buyer for many purposes; yet as for this purpose (of an entire divestment of the seller) there must be an absolute and actual possession by the bankrupt, the goods must have come to the corporal touch of the buyer, otherwise they might be stopped in transitu, delivery to a third person to convey them not being sufficient. Sittings before Lord Mansfield, Trin. Term 1785, 3 Term. Rep. 466.

Of this case, however, Lord Ellenborough has said: 'I cannot but consider the transit as having been once completely at an end, in the direct course of the goods to the vendee, i. e. when they had arrived at the innkeeper's, and were afterwards, under the immediate orders of the vendee, differently of goods, which the buyer desires the seller 'to deliver to his agent A B, to be forwarded to him,' and of goods which the seller is desired 'to deliver to his agent A B,' such agent being subject to the buyer's order to send the goods to him; and yet a distinction like this seems to rest on no intelligible or useful principle.

7. As the right of stopping in transitu subsists only for the purpose of enforcing payment of the price, or securing the seller in the performance of the engagements which make the counterpart of the delivery of the goods, two things are necessary to entitle the seller to exercise this right. The price must be still unpaid, and the buyer must be unable to perform his engagement. 1. Although there can be no stoppage where the price has been paid, the payment of a PART OF THE PRICE is not sufficient to take away the right of stopping. A question of this kind was in England raised on the ground that there can be no stoppage of that part of the goods the value whereof has been paid; and that as the contract is entire, there can be no apportionment, but the partial payment must attach to the whole. But this plea, though it had the effect at first to induce the Court of King's Bench to order the question to be solemnly argued, was finally rejected, as not in any degree sufficient to raise an exception to the general rule.¹ 2. As to the circumstances of the buyer which entitle [223] the seller to stop in transitu (although the first act of stoppage must be permitted periculo petentis), the point of true importance in the inquiry is, What degree of INSOLVENCY on the part of the buyer will entitle the seller to proceed in his remedy? And to this it may be answered, (1.) That absolute bankruptcy is the proper and legitimate justification; for the inability to proceed with the contract is then complete, so far as the buyer is concerned; and the only possibility of going on with it must arise from the new proposal from the creditors to pay the price, or find security for it. But, (2.) Insolvency, or such an alteration of circumstances as shall throw the buyer into gross suspicion of inability to thence actually launched, in a course of conveyance from him, in their way to Boston, being in a new direction, prescribed and communicated by himself. And if the transit be once at an end, the delivery is complete; and the transitus for this purpose cannot commence de novo, merely because the goods are again sent upon their travels towards a new and ulterior destination.' See Dixon v Baldwin, 5 East 184.

Hodgson v Loy. - E. Ward, a butter merchant in Cumberland, purchased 60 firkins of butter from Couper, and paid him one halfpenny by way of earnest. It was agreed that on a certain day Ward should pay £40 in part. He on that day got 44½ firkins of butter, and paid £30, which, with a debt due to him by Couper, made £50, and he gave a bill for the balance, being £100. He purchased also 34 firkins from Wilson; and both Couper and Wilson agreed to deliver the butter to Golding, a carrier, and to mark it 'C. W.,' being the initials of the name of the buyer's brother, to whom it was to be sent to London, to be sold for the buyer. The butter so marked was delivered to Golding, who was desired by Ward to forward it (as usual) to Wilkinson, the wharfinger usually employed by Ward at Stockton, to be by him shipped for London. Golding swore on the trial that he carried it to E. Ward's account, and that he entered it in his book and waybill in E. Ward's name, the sellers telling him that E. Ward was to pay the carriage. Golding delivered the butter at Bowes to Savage, another carrier, who received no other instructions than from the waybill. He proceeded with it to Stockton, and delivered it to Wilkinson the wharfinger, who had general directions to send such butter to C. Ward in London. Wilkinson received the butter as on E. Ward's account, and immediately wrote to him, acknowledging the receipt of it. And he wrote also to C. Ward, acquainting him with his having received it, and telling him the name of the ship by which it was to be forwarded to London. Before the butter reached London, both the Wards stopped payment, and the agent for Couper & Wilson got possession of the butter on its arrival in the river. The question was, whether the delivery was still merely constructive, so as to sanction this stoppage in transitu? Lord Kenyon said, 'that on the general question respecting the right of the vendors to stop these goods in transitu, no doubt could be entertained; for that this case could not be distinguished from those cited, in which that doctrine had been established and recognised, and that the case of Hunter v Beal was much stronger than the present.' 7 Term. Rep. 440.

See also Ellis v Hunt, 3 Term. Rep. 464. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 202; Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 553.]

¹ In Hodgson v Loy this doubt was moved. 7 Term. Rep. 440. Lord Kenyon, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said the rule was of too much importance to be disturbed by trivial circumstances. 'We would not have it supposed,' said he, 'that there is any doubt on this question.' The verdict went for the plaintiff, he repaying what had been paid by the bankrupt. See above, p. 241, note 3.

Feise v Wray, 3 East 93. A bill had been accepted, and was endorsed, and of course, in the endorsee's hands, might and would be ranked on the vendee's estate. This was said to amount just to a partial payment, which by the above case did not prevent the stoppage. [Van Casteel v Booker, 2 Exch. 702; Edwards v Brewer, 2 M. and W. 375; Add. Contr. 200.]

proceed with the contract, will also justify stoppage.¹ In running over all the cases, this will appear a point taken for granted and admitted. The criterion to which the question is to be brought would appear to be the same with that which is applicable to an arrestment in security. In circumstances where such arrestment would be loosed without caution, a court would probably refuse to sanction stopping in transitu.

8. Although an act of ownership, or even of virtual possession, exercised on the goods when the sale is unconditional, and after the goods have got to the end of their journey, has been held sufficient to put an end to the transitus; as, for example, the vendee placing his mark on the goods after the completion of their voyage or journey,² or claiming³ them at the close of the journey;⁴ it is, notwithstanding, to be observed that these acts of possession will have no such effect if done conditionally or before the voyage is completed.

(1.) In England, if delivery of the goods be made conditionally and not absolutely, the seller has still the privilege of stopping.

Thus, if, before delivery, the seller annex the condition that security shall be given before taking possession, or that the price shall be paid in ready money, or that a bill shall be delivered, the property will not pass by the mere act of the buyer's attaining the possession.⁵ No case or authority is to be found in the Scottish law to this effect. But if the

¹ [Sed quære, where the vendor, on a general accounting, is indebted to the purchaser. Sm. Merc. L. 6th ed. 557. The election by the vendor to take a bill instead of cash held a waiver of the right of stoppage. Cowasjee v Thompson, 5 Mor. P. C. C. 165. See Benjamin on Sale, p. 541.]

² Ellis v Hunt, 3 Term. Rep. 464.

³ Holst v Pownall, 1 Esp. N. P. Cases 240.

⁴ Northey v Field, 1 Esp. 613. [As to stoppage after partial delivery, see Townley v Crump, 4 Ad. and El. 58, and authorities cited in Tudor's Mercantile Cases, 2d ed. 655 sqq.]

⁵ It appears from the case of Bohtlingk v Schneider, 3 Esp. 58, that this is the doctrine of English law. Goods were there ordered from Russia, and shipped in a vessel ordered by the consignor. This was held good delivery (erroneously; see above, p. 185); but another point arose. The plaintiff's counsel gave in evidence a letter, dated 19th October, from the plaintiff, requiring the vendee to give security to their correspondent in London before the goods were delivered. Lord Kenyon said: The whole question is, Whether there was a delivery to Crowe of the goods before this letter was written or not? Before the delivery the party may annex any condition to it, but not after.

[As to the effect of a sale of goods on credit, Mr. Smith states the law to be, that 'where by special agreement between the parties the day of payment is to be subsequent to that of delivery—in other words, where the goods are sold on credit—the vendor may be obliged to deliver up the goods without payment or tender of the price.' But he adds: 'Yet even in such a case, though the vendee has a right to possession without payment or tender of the price, that right is not indefeasible, and will be defeated if he become insolvent before he has actually taken possession.' Smith, Merc. Law, p. 507; Inglis v Usherwood; Bohtlingk v Inglis, supra, p. 185. See Milne v Gorton, 2 C. and M. 504, where a bill had been granted by the buyer, and part of the goods was delivered to a sub-vendee, but the buyer became bankrupt before the bill fell due; the seller was held entitled to retain the residue of the goods. See also New v Swain, 1 Dan. and Lloyd 193; Patten v Thompson, 5 Mau. and Selw. 350; Edwards v Brewer, 2 M. and W. 375. Idem, if the bills granted for the price have been refused acceptance or dishonoured, Dixon v Yates, 5 B. and Ad. 345. In the Scotch case of Dryden & Co. v Hamelin & Co., July 1853, a question touching this point arose which is not reported. It was heard in presence of the whole Court, and the following is a statement of it, so far as relates to the point of law:—Hamelin & Co. of Greenock, in March 1845, agreed to sell 200 tons of guano, then in their possession, to Langdale & Sons, Stockton, for £1400, by bills at four months. H. & Co. sent 100 tons, and got a bill for £700 from Langdale & Sons, who thereafter, in expectation of the remaining 100 tons being forwarded to their agents, Dryden and Co. of Glasgow (in order to be shipped to them by these agents), sent to Hamelin & Co. another bill for £700. Before the bills fell due Langdale & Co. became bankrupt, and the remaining 100 tons being still with Hamelin & Co., they refused to deliver to Dryden & Co., to whom Langdale & Sons were owing a large balance. A special question arose, Whether Hamelin & Co. had not come under an obligation to deliver to Dryden & Co.; but the Court held these agents to be identified with Langdale & Sons, their employers, and so could not claim the guano, the bills being unpaid. On the general point the following opinions were delivered:—The Lord Justice-Clerk: 'On the merits, the case of the defenders does not seem to be opposed by any difficulties, if the principles of the law of Scotland are attended to. Some recent cases, e.g. Melrose v Hastie, have cleared away some loose notions originating of late in the inaccurate application of the term lien, and much increased from a frequent reference to English cases, notwithstanding the important and valuable distinction between our law as to the contract of sale of moveables, and the less simple rule of the law of England. The seller retains the article in Scotland if the price is not paid, because the right of property remains in him until the price is paid; and if called on to deliver, the buyer or party in his right must be ready to pay the price for it. This is clear law. A seller, however, may come under an obligation to deliver, although the price is not paid, and may so word such obligation that he is prevented from founding on his right to retain. But such obligation must be express and distinct, and must have been granted with that intention, and taken and relied on as con-buyer, foreseeing his bankruptcy, reject the goods, he may receive them into his own warehouse, custodiæ causa;¹ or his clerks may place them in a warehouse conditionally for custody, so as to prevent the transit from being concluded.²

(2.) Acts of virtual possession or ownership are held insufficient to destroy the right of stopping in transitu, where the voyage and proper transit of the goods has not been terminated, but the buyer has by anticipation marked the goods for his, though still detained on the voyage; or where a creditor has attached them while the transit is not over. But it would appear that the doctrine in questions of this description must be limited to cases in which no actual delivery has been taken by the buyer, but only such equivalent acts have passed as at the end of the voyage might have stood for delivery, had it been impossible to get the goods actually into the buyer's custody. If the doctrine be carried so far as to deny to the buyer the power of taking actual delivery during the transit, it seems to be destitute of any sound principle.³ The right of stopping in transitu is not stipulated between the parties, so that such anticipation cannot be considered as a breach of contract. The transit is meant merely to convey the goods to the buyer; and if he should meet them on the way, there seems to be no rational impediment to his abridging their voyage, and taking them into his custody. If he has happened to sell them to one residing at a point of the journey nearer to the original seller, shall he be prevented from taking them out of the carrier's possession there, instead of allowing them to make a useless journey, to be immediately sent back?⁴ If, indeed, the circumstances should amount to a fraud in thus stituting such an undertaking, and such a renunciation of the seller's undivested right of property.' Lords Murray and Wood concurred in this opinion. Lord Curriehill, with concurrence of Lord Anderson, observed: 'It is indisputable that Langdale & Son themselves, or their general creditors, could not then have demanded delivery of the goods from the defenders without paying the price. In a question with them, the defenders might even have stopped the guano in transitu, if the shipment had taken place before the bankruptcy; a fortiori, they might have retained it, since it still remained in their own possession, and subject to their jus domini.' Lord Deas said: 'It is true the sale was on credit. The vendees may have been anxious to get delivery, and it may have been merely accidental that they had not got delivery. But the vendors were nevertheless entitled, upon the emerging bankruptcy of the vendees, to avail themselves of the accident—if it was one—of the guano being still in their own possession, to retain it against the vendees and their general creditors for the unpaid price, just as they would have been entitled to stop it in transitu had it happened to be in the hands of a shipmaster or common carrier to whom they had entrusted it for delivery.' Lord Ivory considered that the sale being on credit, and bills actually got, Hamelin & Co. could not retain the guano. The Court assoilzied Hamelin & Co.]

¹ See below, Of the Vendor's Rejection of goods. Stein v Hutchison, 16 Nov. 1810, F. C.

² Gowans v Phin, 12 July 1813, n. r.

³ [Mills v Ball, 2 Bos. and P. 457; Wright v Lawes, 4 Esp. 82; Jackson v Nichol, 5 Bing. N. C. 508.] Accordingly, in all the cases of this sort which appear in the books, it is only where the goods have been marked as delivered, but not actually taken away, that the seller has still had his privilege preserved. Thus, an attachment by a creditor of the buyer, used at Ostend while the goods were in the course of their voyage, was found unavailable against the seller stopping in transitu. Stokes v La Riviere, 3 Term. Rep. 466.

Again, in Holst v Pownall, the assignees under a commission of bankruptcy issued against the buyer went on board a vessel which was ordered to quarantine, and opened the packages, etc., and, as far as they could, took delivery. But Lord Kenyon, at Nisi Prius, is reported to have found this insufficient to make an actual delivery; and the Court of King's Bench is also said to have confirmed the opinion on a motion for a new trial. 1 Espinasse, Cases at N. P. 240.

⁴ In Mills v Ball: Goods having been carried part of the way by water, were delivered to a wharfinger to be forwarded by land to the buyer, and placed to his account. The buyer having failed, refused to receive the goods; and the question was, Whether the transfer was not completed by actual delivery, so as to preclude the buyer from renouncing them? Lord Alvanley took occasion to say: 'If, in the course of the conveyance of the goods from the vendor to the vendee, the latter be allowed to exercise any act of ownership over them, he thereby reduces the goods into possession, and puts an end to the vendor's right to stop them. So, though it has been said that the right of stoppage continues until the goods have arrived at their journey's end, yet if the vendee meet them upon the road, and take them into his own possession, the goods will then have arrived at their journey's end with reference to the right of stoppage.' 2 Pull. and Bos. 461.

Here the latter part of the opinion seems quite sound; but it is doubtful whether it be correctly extended to any other act of ownership short of actually taking possession of the goods.

And in conformity with this opinion of Lord Alvanley, Chambre, J., in his judgment in the case of Oppenheim v Russell, 3 Bos. and Pull. 42, says: 'Perhaps the consignee himself may intercept the goods in their passage; and, indeed, I have little doubt but that if he do intercept them in their passage, before the consignor has exercised his right of stopping in transitu, and do take an actual delivery from the anticipating the natural time of delivery, such fraud would not be permitted to defeat the seller's equitable remedy.¹

SUBSECTION III.—BY WHOM THE RIGHT OF STOPPING MAY BE EXERCISED.

In determining who may stop goods in transitu, the general rule is, that the right of stoppage exists only as between seller and buyer. And so, between principal and factor this right does not exist.² Neither does it subsist between one having a lien, and the [225] owner of the goods.³ Nor has a surety for the price of goods any right to stop them in transitu.⁴

But it is sufficient that he who stops the goods shall stand substantially in the relation of seller to the insolvent.⁵ And so, in the sense of this rule, a consignor who buys goods by order of the consignee, and transmits them, charging a commission on the price,⁶ is held to be a carrier before the goods get to the end of their journey, such a delivery to him will be complete.⁷

¹ [See The London and North-Western Railway Co. v Bartlett, 7 H. and N. 400; 31 L. J. Ex. 92, and cases there.]

² In Kinloch v Craig, the general state of the fact was, that Sandeman & Graham acted as factors for Stein; that they were under very large acceptances for them on the credit of consignments to be made; that, while one consignment was on the way, Sandeman & Graham, by want of remittances from Stein, failed; that, when the vessel arrived, they did not take delivery; and that Stein also having failed, the trustee on his estate got the consignment and sold it. The action was for restitution of the price to Sandeman & Graham's estate. Here the right of property remained in the consignors: the only right to which the consignee could lay claim was a lien by agreement. But lien requires 'possession, and the goods had never reached the consignee's possession. Lord Chief Baron Eyre, in delivering the opinion of the judges in the House of Lords, said 'that the transaction between the parties with respect to the consignments was as between principal and factor, and not as between vendor and vendee; that, therefore, Sandeman & Graham could have no property in the cargo; and the right of stopping in transitu was out of the question, that never occurring but between vendor and vendee; and for this he relied on Wright v Campbell, 4 Burr. 2047, 3 Term. Rep. 119 and 783.

[See Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 552; Add. Contr. 6th ed. 200.]

³ Gard, a clothier, employed Pym, a fuller. He was indebted to him for work a large general balance, and by the custom of the trade Pym had a lien. Pym had cloth in his possession to be fulled, and on finishing he shipped them to Gard; and soon after the vessel sailed, hearing of Gard's bankruptcy, Pym overtook the goods, and got possession. Lord Eldon, at the Exeter Assizes, held that the lien expired with the possession, and that Pym could not stop in transitu, so as to revive the lien. The Court of King's Bench refused to grant a rule, on the ground that a delivery to the shipmaster was equivalent, as between such parties, to actual delivery to Gard. [Sweet v Pym, 1 East 4; Leuckhart v Cooper, 3 Bing. N. C. 99; Morley v Hay, 3 M. and Ry. 696; Freeman v Birch, 3 Q. B. 492, note.]

⁴ Skiffen, Assignee of Browne, v Wray. Here Browne of London ordered Dubois & Co. of Dantzic to ship for him 200 lasts of wheat, in addition to 200 already ordered, and to value for them one-third on him, one-third on Fritzing, his agent at Hamburg, and one-third on Wilson of London, his corn factor. The wheat was sent, and bills drawn accordingly. Dubois & Co. sent to Fritzing two bills of lading, endorsed in blank; and Fritzing sent them forward to Browne, and they arrived after his bankruptcy. On this he delivered the bills of lading to Wray as agent for Fritzing, and he got possession of the wheat, and sold it; the proceeds to abide the decision. The question was, Whether Browne's assignees were entitled to recover? The Court held they were. Lord Ellenborough said: 'Wray had no authority from Fritzing, for Fritzing himself had no right to stop the goods in transitu. His situation in this transaction was very different from that in Feise and Wray. There he was liable in the first instance for the price of the goods, and therefore the Court considered him as a vendor quoad the bankrupt, to whom he had shipped them.' 6 East 371. [See Lowson v Craik, 1842, 4 D. 1452; Gurney v Behrend, 3 E. & B. 622; Pennell v Alexander, 3 E. & B. 283, as to the operation of the 5th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act (England), 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, on the question of the surety's right to stop. Benjamin on Sale, p. 629. And consider whether a surety in Scotland would not have the same rights at common law.]

⁵ [The right of stoppage may be exercised by an agent acting under sufficient authority. See the leading case of Whitehead v Anderson, 9 M. and W. 518, Tudor Merc. Ca. 632; Nicholls v Le Feuvre, 2 Bing. N. C. 81. And a stoppage by a general agent of the vendor acting without instructions is valid if the act is afterwards ratified by his principal. Hutchins v Nunes, 1 Moore P. C. N. S. 243. But the vendor's ratification after actual delivery to the vendee will be unavailing where the stoppage has been made by a person acting without any previous authority. Bird v Brown, 4 Exch. 786.]

⁶ Feise v Wray. In June 1801 an order was given by Browne to Fritzing, his correspondent abroad, to purchase wax for him. F bought it accordingly of persons strangers to B, there being no privity between B and those who sold to F. F shipped the wax for B, and drew for the price, and sent the invoice and bill of lading. Browne becoming bankrupt, Aitkens on the part of F obtained the goods, and the bills finally were not paid. [The Court held F to be essentially the seller. Mr. Justice Grose said: 'If this were the case of factor and principal merely, I should find great difficulty in saying that it did. But here Fritzing may in reality be considered as the vendor, for the name of the

[226] seller of those goods. A person sending goods to be sold, on the joint account of himself and the consignee, is also held entitled to stop in transitu.¹

SUBSECTION IV.—UPON WHAT CONDITIONS THE SELLER IS OBLIGED TO ALLOW THE GOODS TO PROCEED.

The buyer may really be solvent, while, as we have seen, there may be circumstances of suspicion strong enough to authorize the seller to stop in transitu. His friends may come forward to support him: even his creditors may choose, upon his bankruptcy, to take the goods, and go on with the transaction. How, then, are the goods to be relieved?

1. If the bills for the price have not yet been accepted (as it is sometimes the practice not to sign the bills till the goods arrive), the seller may insist that good bills shall be given at the terms stipulated. He is not obliged to content himself with the bankrupt's bills, and a bond of caution, or other unmarketable security; but he is entitled to have, according to the spirit of his original bargain, bills which he may use in the market, as he could have done the buyer's, if in full credit.

2. If bills have been accepted, and are not yet due, the goods must be relieved, on security being given for payment when the bills fall due. The stoppage in transitu operates with an effect similar in this respect to that of the common arrestment in security, which may be loosed on caution if the debt be future or contingent.

3. If the price be already payable; if the bills, for instance, drawn from abroad, have fallen due before the goods arrive, the buyer or his creditors must pay before they can demand the goods. The vendor is not bound to take security in place of payment. Just as in the case of an arrestment in execution, the goods may be kept under the attachment till payment be offered; and it is not permitted to loose the arrestment on caution.

But, 4. Objections may be stated to the price on account of deficiency, etc., in the cargo.

original owner was never made known to the bankrupt. There was no privity between them; but the goods were purchased and the bills drawn in Fritzing's own name, and therefore he stands in the situation of vendor as to Browne. The defendant, acting under an authority from Fritzing, applied, upon the bankruptcy of Browne, for the purpose of getting security for the goods, and received the bill of lading from the bankrupt's brother, as he honestly might, and which the other acted honestly in giving up to him.' And afterwards he adds: 'I am not satisfied that there is any distinction in law between the case of a vendor and a factor consigning goods; but if there be any such difference, Fritzing was, in regard to the bankrupt, the vendor in this case, particularly as the bills were drawn payable to himself.'

Lawrence, J., said: 'I am of the same opinion, that the plaintiffs have no right to recover. It has been contended that the right of stopping in transitu does not attach between these parties; that Browne must be considered as the principal for whom the goods were originally purchased, and that Fritzing was no more than his factor or agent, purchasing them on his account; and that the right of stopping in transitu does, in point of law, apply solely to the case of vendor and vendee. If that were so, it would nearly put an end to the application of that law in this country; for I believe it happens, for the most part, that orders come to the merchants here from their correspondents abroad to purchase and ship certain merchandise to them; the merchants here, upon the authority of those orders, obtain the goods from those whom they deal with; and they charge a commission to their correspondents abroad upon the price of the commodity thus obtained. It never was doubted but that the merchant here, if he heard of the failure of his correspondent abroad, might stop the goods in transitu. But at any rate, this is a case between vendor and vendee: for there was no privity between the original owner of the wax and the bankrupt; but the property may be considered as having been first purchased by Fritzing, and again sold to Browne at the first price, with the addition of his commission upon it. He then became the vendor as to Browne, and consequently had a right to stop the goods in transitu.'

Lord Ellenborough, Ch.-J., then said, 'that having been engaged in the cause (though he did not recollect on which side), he had not taken part in the discussion, but that he entirely concurred in the opinions delivered by the other judges. It was substantially the case of a vendor, only adding to the original price of the goods the amount of his commission. And the case of Hodgson v Loy showed that a part payment did not destroy the vendor's right of stopping in transitu; it only reduced his equitable lien pro tanto, when he got the goods into his possession.' 3 East 93. [Hawkes v Dunn, 1 Tyr. 413; Oakford v Drake, 2 Fos. and Fin. 493.]

¹ Newsom v Thornton, 6 East 17. See also Fenton v Pearson, 15 East 419. [A person to whom a transfer of a bill of lading has been made bona fide by the vendor has been held entitled to stop the goods in transitu. Morison v Gray, 2 Bing. 260, 9 Moo. 484. And the right has been conceded to a person who has merely an interest in the goods under a contract to deliver to him. Jenkyns v Osborne, 8 Scott, N. S. 505, 522.]

If there be such a ground of objection as will justify a judicial suspension of the seller's demand for payment, there seems to be little question that, although bills have been signed for the price, yet, to the extent of the sum included in the objection, the seller will be obliged to accept of security instead of payment.

SUBSECTION V.—OF THE MANNER OF STOPPING GOODS IN TRANSITU.

In England it is now held, though not without expressions of great regret on the part of the judges as well as of the bar, that the bankruptcy of the buyer is not equivalent to a stoppage in transitu; that the buyer's warehouse continues open, notwithstanding, for the reception of goods; and that even the assignees under the commission, or provisional assignees named for the purpose, may take goods from a carrier or shipmaster, leaving the seller to rank as a creditor.¹

¹ Haswell v Hunt, 1772. 'Lacey came to Haswell and bought a parcel of tobacco, to be paid for in ready money. This was in the morning. He left orders at his house for receiving the tobacco, and the same day went to France, to absent himself from his creditors. After he was gone, Haswell's servant brought the tobacco to Lacey's house; but he had no orders to make any demand of the money, but only to deliver the goods. The question was, whether this was a complete sale, so as to vest the property in Lacey? or whether his bankruptcy, between the sale and delivery, was such fraud as voided the sale by non-payment of the money? Lord Chief Justice Eyre held that the sale was made complete by the act of the plaintiff Haswell, who, by delivery of the goods without demand of the money, vested the property in Lacey, by his own assent, as a complete sale ab initio, without ready money.' 5 T. Rep. King's Bench 231.

In Ellis v Hunt (see above, p. 219), where the provisional assignee took delivery, both Lord Kenyon and Mr. Justice Buller said 'that bankruptcy is not of itself a countermand, and that no case to that effect had ever been decided.' 3 Term. Rep. 467.

In Tooke v Hollingsworth the question came incidentally to be considered. Lord Kenyon said: 'It never yet has been decided whether or not a person who, acting under a previous agreement, sends goods to another against whom a commission of bankruptcy has been issued at the time, and who is not only an insolvent person, but disabled by the laws of his country from dealing at all, can recover these goods again, under an idea that the situation of that other with whom he meant to deal was so altered, that it could not be considered to be a contract with him. If the purchaser were dead at the time when the goods arrived, must they go to the executor? And other cases of the same kind might be put, which would considerably distress the argument in the affirmative of the proposition, that the assignees should take these goods, although the vendee were a bankrupt when they were sent. It may be proper to discuss these questions when they arise; but I will now forbear entering into a discussion of that which appears to be an arduous task, because it is not necessary for the determination of the present case.' Mr. Justice Buller, in the same case, said: 'The next point to be considered is the effect of bankruptcy, and I think that some points have been made by the defendant's counsel which have not been answered. They contended that, when these goods came to the hands of the assignees, the property was vested in them; and if so, that nothing has happened since to divest it. This is an important part of the case, and therefore it is material to consider whether or not this property was vested in the assignees. It has been held that bankruptcy does not put an end to the contract. That was so stated by Lord Kenyon and myself in Ellis v Hunt; and that doctrine was not then new, for in Haswell and others v Hunt and others, assignees of Lacey, the same point was ruled. (Here Mr. Justice Buller read the above note of that case.) It seems, then (continued Mr. Justice Buller), that bankruptcy does not in all events put an end to the contracts of the bankrupt. After the bankruptcy several contracts have been binding on the bankrupt, though the creditors could not prove their debts under the commission.' 5 Term. Rep. 226 and 230.

In Scott v Pettit, Lord Alvanley, who tried the case at Guildhall, suggested that, as the goods were not sent from Manchester till after the bankruptcy of Barclay, that event might be deemed a revocation of the previous order, so as to prevent any right from vesting in Barclay's creditors. But this point was abandoned by Mr. Sergeant Best when the cause came to be argued on a motion for a new trial. He said 'that, though suggested by the Lord Chief Justice, before whom the cause was tried, yet he felt it too late, after so many decided cases in which a similar circumstance had occurred, without effecting any alteration in the right of the assignees of the bankrupt to claim goods on their arrival, to make this objection, however desirable it might be to establish a different rule from that which had hitherto prevailed.' Lord Alvanley said: 'At the trial I could not help forming a wish that the question, how far the bankruptcy of Barclay had operated as a countermand of his previous orders to the pursuers, Walters, should be considered by the Court; but on looking into the cases, I find that question to be completely closed in Westminster Hall, and that we therefore are bound to hold that, though a bankrupt has altogether ceased to be a trader, yet that his warehouse continues open for the purpose of receiving goods; and that the assignees have a right to take possession of everything that may come into their hands, without paying a single farthing, even though the consignors of the goods are not entitled to come in under the commission. In Ellis v Hunt, Lord Kenyon says that it never had been decided that bankruptcy was of itself a countermand of an order; and in Bohtlingk v Inglis, 3 East 381, the goods in question were not delivered on board the ship which was to bring them from Russia to the consignee in London, until

[227] It can scarcely be said, that in Scotland this point has been directly or authoritatively decided; but the opinion of the Court has been uniformly inclined in the opposite direction from that of the English determination on this point. And this opinion seems to be growing stronger.¹

[228] Without presuming to determine what ought to be the decision on this question, it may be allowable to suggest, that if a feeling of hardship attend the application of the English rule, it seems, on the other hand, to be doubtful whether, laying aside the expediency of having opposite rules in England and in Scotland, there be any clear principle for supporting a determination opposite to that which has been followed in England. Bankruptcy does not annul a previous contract. If the seller choose, he may insist on the bankrupt or the creditors taking the goods, and allowing him to claim under the contract. If the creditors choose, they may pay the price and take the goods. The contract, then, being in force, and the order to deliver the goods effectual unless recalled, the question comes to be, Whether the bankruptcy is a countermand of the order to deliver, so as to annul the delivery, as made without authority? or, Whether there be a fraud entitling the seller to restitution? But, 1. The bankruptcy cannot be a countermand otherwise than by presumption—that if the seller had known of this event, he would have recalled the goods,—an inference which is far from being unavoidable; for the vendor may have chosen to act differently; and, 2. As to restitution, supposing the delivery once made, there seems to be no ground for it in this more than in a hundred other cases which occur in bankruptcy. By the civil law and the jurisprudence of the Continent, restitution was given of goods, not only where the contract of sale was induced by fraud, but where undue concealment or deceit led the seller at the time of delivery into a false credit for the price. In the law of Scotland, restitution is given only where some act of fraud attaching to the original consent to transfer taints the whole contract; and subsequent occurrences are accounted misfortunes, which equally may attach to all the creditors. The property which by constructive delivery has passed at law, may be resumed if the seller entitle himself in equity to do so; but if not resumed, the transference becomes irrevocable.

In cases where this difficulty has no place, there does not appear to be any specific form or solemnity necessary for stopping goods in transitu.

1. Where goods are sent by sea, the bill of lading is taken in various forms, according to the views of the parties; and the shipmaster is discharged, by delivery to any one holding after the consignee had committed an act of bankruptcy. No doubt, therefore, for the purpose of receiving goods, the assignees stand in the place of the bankrupt.' 3 Bos. and Pul. 471. [Gibson v Carruthers, 8 M. and W. 321, 343.]

¹ In the case of Cave's Crs., in 1736, a claim for restitution of goods delivered was made on the ground of fraud. The Court first found that in the contract itself there was no fraud. It was then contended that the date of the delivery is the only period to be considered as to this question; for, supposing the contract fair, yet if, at the time of the delivery by which the property is transferred, the bankrupt is designing cedere foro, and to give up his effects to his creditors, it is fraudulent in him to receive the subject sold, when he has no prospect of doing justice by paying the price. The Lords found the time of delivery must be the rule. Inglis v The Royal Bank, 1736, M. 4937.

In the subsequent case of Stein's Crs. with Allan & Stewart, this doctrine was very much questioned both at the bar and on the bench. But there was no occasion to decide the question, or to fix any point as to the effect of bankruptcy in putting an end to the contract, or as a countermand of delivery. M. 4951, 3 Pat. 191.

In the case of Robertson & Aiken v More (trustees on Sinclair & Williamson's estate), 1801, M. App. Sale, No. 3, the vendees were bankrupt at the time when part of the goods were taken possession of by them. It was not necessary to decide the case on this ground, as it was held that the goods had been legitimately stopped before delivery. But it was observed on the bench, 'that Sinclair & Williamson, by taking possession of the grain after their avowed insolvency, were guilty of a wrong, by which neither they nor their creditors ought to profit.'

In Collins v Marquis' Crs., it was incidentally said on the bench, that though bankruptcy be no stoppage by the law of England, it is so by the Scottish law, delivery taken after actual bankruptcy being fraudulent and ineffectual. This opinion was not necessary to the decision of the case, and is therefore to be taken, not as a judgment on the question, but merely as indicative of the bias of opinion in our courts. In the case, as reported in the F. C., 23 November 1804, this incidental opinion is not taken notice of.

Lord President Blair took occasion, in the case of Steins v Hutchison, 16 Nov. 1810, to deliver an opinion to the same effect.

a bill of lading legitimately transferred. The presentment by the seller's agent of one of the bills of lading will complete the stoppage. Where a bill of lading is not at hand, the most unquestionable stoppage is by the warrant of a judge.¹ But that is not precisely [229] necessary; a private countermand is sufficient, even though verbal.² It is right, however, in order to avoid disputes, that the countermand should be in writing. The seller has been held effectually to stop his goods, by entering them at the custom-house in order to pay the duties for them, although the bankrupt or his assignees had, at landing the goods, forcibly got possession of them.³

2. Where goods are not sent by sea, but by a land carrier, or other person entrusted to transport them, and where, of course, there is no written and transferable document like a bill of lading, but a verbal engagement, or an understood obligation to deliver according to the address; it is still less necessary for the seller on the one hand to proceed by warrant of a judge, or on the other to attain the actual possession of the goods. A bare countermand has been held sufficient. The carrier is to be considered as the middleman or trustee between the parties; and, as on the footing of a verbal undertaking, accountable to either of them for the due execution of his engagement, he is in some degree subject to the orders of them both,—so far at least, that he is not entitled to disregard the directions of him who put the goods into his hands, although differing from the original directions, in consequence of circumstances unforeseen at the time of sending away the goods.⁴

3. Where the stoppage is made, not by the seller himself, nor by the holder of a bill of lading, or of other legal authority for interfering, but by the usual agent of the seller interposing as negotiorum gestor, the stoppage should be accomplished by judicial authority. An application from such a person to a judge will be entertained. It is most salutary, and quite consistent with the principle of negotiorum gestio, that the person who in general acts for a foreign merchant, though he hold no special commission, should be allowed, on the sudden bankruptcy of a buyer, to apply for and obtain the necessary warrant to stop. This is very frequently done; and although it is generally objected to, the judge never refuses, under proper precautions, to sanction an act which is necessary for the protection of the foreign merchant.

4. If it be not sufficient to entitle the seller to restitution of his goods, that the buyer has become a bankrupt before delivery, neither will it avail him that he has given notice to the buyer's creditors, that he intends to stop the goods, or that he is in the course of obtaining a judicial warrant for so doing. The bankruptcy brings everything to a fair question of competition, depending upon the legal completion of the real right; and whoever is most vigilant in making his right finally and completely effectual, will, according to the common rules of competition, be preferred. A creditor who has received from the bankrupt an assignation long before bankruptcy, but who has not taken the due means of completing his right before the completion of that of the trustee under the bankrupt's conveyance, is

¹ [In Stoppel & Co. v. Stoddart, 1850, 13 D. 61, it was held that 'an application for interdict was an effectual exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu, although the buyer at that time had not been sequestered, and although the ground of action ultimately sustained had not been founded on in the application.']

² In the case of Sinclair and Williamson's Crs. v. Robertson and Aiken, 1801, the seller had verbally intimated to the shipmaster that he meant to stop the cargo, desiring him not to deliver to the buyer or the creditors, and told him that he was about to apply for a warrant to obtain possession of it. In the meanwhile, application for delivery was made on behalf of the buyers' creditors, and they received delivery accordingly. The Court held that the verbal countermand was sufficient. M. App. Sale, No. 3. [See Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 557.]

³ Ex parte Walker and Woodbridge, 1756, Cooke 419. ['To make a notice effective as a stoppage in transitu, it must be given to the person who has the immediate custody of the goods; or if given to the principal, whose servant has the custody, it must be given, as it was in the case of Litt v. Cowley (7 Taunt. 169), at such a time and under such circumstances that the principal, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, may communicate it to his servant in time to prevent the delivery to the consignee.' Per Parke, B., in Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. and W. 518.]

⁴ In Ellis and Hunt's case (3 Term. Rep. 467) it was not questioned that the letter from the seller would have been a good stoppage of the commodity, had not the provisional assignee already taken delivery.

cut out. And so, in the same way, must the seller be cut out from that security which is still in his power, if he do not take the legal way of getting those goods again into his possession. It will not do to interdict the other creditors, who are in the fair pursuit of the very same legitimate object which the seller is seeking, viz. the securing of themselves from the loss which the credit given to the bankrupt threatens to bring on them.

5. But what if the seller interdict the bankrupt himself? Suppose, for example, that the seller, meaning to stop in transitu, gives notice to the bankrupt that he has applied for [230] a judicial warrant, and in the meanwhile the bankrupt takes delivery;—it would appear that in this case also the delivery is unobjectionable.¹

6. As the privilege of stopping in transitu is an equitable power to resume that possession which in strict law has passed from the seller, the seller must take some active step for resuming the possession.² In the preceding section it has been stated that the attachment of goods deposited in a public warehouse to be delivered does not appear to be sufficient as actual delivery.³ Perhaps this should be stated more as a matter of doubt, because the property which at law must be held as transferred by even a constructive delivery, may well be considered as sufficient to support the diligence of the buyer's creditors; and accordingly, in the case quoted in the above note, one very eminent judge held the arrestments as effectual against the right of the seller.

SUBSECTION VI.—EFFECT OF STOPPING IN TRANSITU.

It is a question which has not hitherto been determined, whether the seller who stops in transitu is entitled both to resume possession of his goods, and to claim against the divisible estate for damages? And it is not easy to find a clear principle of decision, where the doctrine itself, of which it forms a part, presents so many anomalous and incongruous propositions.

1. In such questions it is natural to recur to the analogy of retention by the seller, while yet the goods are in his own hands undelivered; in which case it is generally held that the seller may take the full benefit of his lien, and at the same time claim as a personal creditor on his contract for the balance. And certainly, if the right of the seller to stop in transitu be precisely of the same kind with the right of withholding goods while in his own warehouse undelivered, there should be no difference in the decision. But the distinction seems to lie here, that the property at law has passed in the former case, while in the other it remains still in the person of the seller undivested, and under lien. Where the goods are

¹ In the case of Sinclair and Williamson's Crs. v Robertson and Aiken, 1801, the sellers intimated to the bankrupts that they had applied for a warrant to stop in transitu. But this would not have been deemed sufficient, had it not been accompanied by a notice also to the shipmaster, which of itself, without any judicial warrant, was a sufficient stoppage. The only judge who took notice of the intimation to the bankrupts said: 'This notification was nothing; the bankrupts could not interfere. They could have no right to refuse the goods, had they been brought to them for delivery.' M. App. Sale, No. 3.

² This was held in the case of Fotheringham v Somerville & Co., 26 May 1809, F. C., in the Second Division of the Court of Session. The case was somewhat complicated; and, in particular, there were circumstances of fraud which were held sufficient to annul the sale, and so to supersede the question of stoppage. But the question was argued, and opinions delivered upon these facts:—The goods had been sent from Leith, addressed to Omand at Stromness. On landing, they were placed in a seller of the shipowner's, and there arrested by certain creditors of the buyer. On this, they were by the competing creditors removed to a public warehouse, and an action of multiplepoinding brought into Court for settling the claims of the several arrestors, and the general creditors. While the goods lay in this situation, the sellers appeared, and claimed as stoppers in transitu. On the bench it was said by Lord Meadowbank that here there was no stoppage. Delivery, whether actual or constructive, he held to transmit the property as by tradition; while stoppage in transitu is a resumption of the possession, entitling the seller, after having recovered the goods, to a defence in equity against a demand for the goods till the price shall be paid. To make his right effectual, therefore, and give place for the equity he must rely on, it is necessary for him to follow the property without delay: he must give no faith to the buyer further by raising diligence, etc.; he must get hold of the goods. But here the seller was not vigilant: he did not get the goods into his possession; he suffered creditors to arrest, and the goods to come into public custody for the benefit of the arresting creditors.

³ See p. 219.

still with the seller undelivered, the decision is to be regulated by the common rule of mutual contract, whereby the party able to perform withholds on account of the other's incapacity; and being bound only by a personal obligation, the condition of which is [231] implement by the other party, he may retain his property without any destruction of the contract itself, but, on the contrary, with full reservation of his right to claim damages for non-performance. Where goods have been constructively delivered, the real right of property is gone from the seller; his consent to transfer has been given by the legal token of tradition; and, without the interposition of equity to annul this legal consequence of the contract, the property must remain with the buyer. But in permitting the interference of equity to annul this transfer, and deprive the general creditors of the buyer of property which in strict law has passed to their debtor, it has been considered as equitable, on the other hand, that it should be accompanied by a rescinding of the whole contract, and a renunciation of any further claim; since it would be a great hardship to give a preference to the seller over the other creditors, and subject the divisible funds, which have derived no benefit from the contract, to a further claim of indemnification.

2. Another analogy naturally occurs in considering the question. Not only may the seller stop his goods while not actually delivered, but the buyer, foreseeing his failure, or having failed, may reject the goods; in which case it seems impossible to say that the seller shall be obliged to take them back, without having his claim reserved for the loss, which, by the imprudence of the speculation and fall in the market, may arise on them. But the answer to this is, that the seller is not obliged to take his goods. He may insist on their being kept for the estate, and his claim for the price admitted.

3. Although there are many difficulties either way, it appears, on the whole, most consistent with the great lines of this doctrine of stoppage in transitu, that the extension of the seller's security over the goods sold, though perhaps in a large sense of the nature of a lien,¹ is given by equity originally, on the condition that the seller shall take back the goods

¹ The right was spoken of as in the nature of a lien in the case of Fiese v Wray (see above, p. 245, note 5). The buyer had accepted bills which, having been endorsed, might, it was said, be proved against his estate, and so draw a dividend; and therefore it was contended that the seller could not stop in transitu, without relieving the estate of those bills. Sir S. Lawrence said: 'If the vendor have a right to stop the goods in transitu, and have stopped them, he has a lien on the goods till the whole price be paid.' Again, he said: 'Having lawfully possessed himself of the goods, the vendor has a lien on them till the whole price be paid, which cannot therefore be satisfied by showing a part-payment only.' Le Blanc, J., thought 'that the vendor had a right to stop the goods in transitu, unless the acceptance of his bills by the vendee made any difference. But if the full price of the goods be not paid to the vendor, it does not take away his right to stop in transitu.' Lord Ellenborough assented, and said 'that a part-payment does not destroy the vendor's right of stopping in transitu; it only reduces his equitable lien pro tanto when he gets the goods into his possession.' 3 East Rep. 93.

The same expression had been used by Lord Mansfield, incidentally, in the case of Vale v Beale: 'A vendor, in a question with the general creditors of the vendee, who becomes a bankrupt, has, before actual possession by the vendee, a lien upon the goods he sends; and if he can get them in transitu, to be sure he has the benefit of that lien.' Cowper 296.

This expression of a lien is not altogether unexceptionable. 1. Because a person cannot have a lien over his own property, its proper application being to property in the hands of another than the proprietor, and which, by the implied condition of his holding it, the custodier is entitled to keep in security of the proprietor's engagement to him; and, 2. Because lien expires with possession, delivery to a carrier putting an end to it. It may, however, be in some measure justified by a sort of fiction, that the goods having been recovered before reaching the buyer, may be held as never having effectually left the seller.

[In the law of England a distinction is recognised in the sale of goods between the effect of the contract in transferring the right of property and that of possession. The right of property is by the personal contract, and without any delivery, absolutely transferred to the buyer; and, as a general proposition, the person who has the property has prima facie, but not necessarily, the legal right to the possession of them. And, in general, he who has the property and legal right to the possession has, in contemplation of law, the control over them, though in point of fact the actual holder may wrongfully refuse to obey his directions; i.e. he has all the legal rights and remedies which actual possession would give, i.e. he is in technical language possessed of the goods. But the right of possession does not necessarily pass by the sale along with the property: it is a matter of agreement. Parties may agree that, though the property vest immediately by the sale, the right of possession shall remain with the seller until fulfilment of any conditions they please. Where nothing is said about delivery or payment, the law presumes that payment and delivery are to be contemporaneous, in which case the right of possession does not pass till payment is made;

as if the contract were ab initio recalled. The expressions made use of by Lord Thurlow in Allan and Stewart's case, when the House of Lords introduced into the Scottish law the doctrine of stoppage in transitu, although perhaps (as delivered to us) not guarded with all the care with which so great a judge may be supposed to have expressed himself, indicates what appears, on the whole, to be the true principle for the determination of such questions.

that is, the seller has a lien or right to retain actual possession. This is the proper lien of the seller, depending on the untransferred right of possession, which by the agreement of parties was not to pass till payment of the price. But if credit is given for the price, and nothing said about delivery, this lien is waived and gone, or rather it never existed: the buyer has right to possession before payment, i.e. he has the legal possession in the sense before explained; but still his right of possession, as in a question with the vendor, is not indefeasible. It only becomes an indefeasible right of possession by payment of the price, or by obtaining actual possession. Till then it remains defeasible, on his insolvency, by the seller; notwithstanding his waiver of his original lien, for a new right springs up in the seller out of the buyer's insolvency, which interferes with the buyer's right of possession. This also, since the seller has retained the actual possession, is generally denominated the seller's lien, because it confers on the seller the right of using his actual possession to prevent the buyer's right of possession from operating till payment of the price. But it seems to be an anomalous kind of right springing out of insolvency, of a nature akin to stoppage in transitu. It is divested by delivery to a carrier for conveyance to the vendee, and therein differs from stoppage in transitu, and also by other modes of 'delivery;' but Mr. Benjamin (Sale, p. 566) suggests that it is a right that might be termed 'a stoppage ante transitum.' Or it may be considered a revival of the seller's original lien, on the view that the waiver of that lien implied in the giving of credit was a waiver conditional on the buyer's good credit continuing,—an implied condition of credit given familiar to our own law. The exercise of this right, whatever it be, depends on the vendor's having retained the actual possession, though he has given up the right of possession to the vendee; nay, he may have agreed to hold the actual possession as bailee for the vendee, and in his right, and still, on the insolvency of the vendee, he will acquire the right to refuse him possession. In Griffiths v Perry (28 L. J. Q. B. 204), Crompton, J., said that where bills had been taken—i.e. credit given—for the price, 'there is no lien in the strict sense of the word; but if afterwards an insolvency happens, and the bill is dishonoured, the party has a right analogous to that which a vendor who exercises the right of stoppage in transitu has. . . . No right to a strict lien has ever existed: . . . the transitus has not commenced. . . . Yet where goods remain in the party's hand, and insolvency occurs, and the bill is dishonoured, there a right analogous to that of stoppage in transitu arises, and there is a right to withhold delivery of the goods.' An unpaid vendor in actual possession (i.e. by transit, or a custodian holding for him) of the goods sold, acquires, by the insolvency of the vendee, with the price unpaid, and in spite of his having originally given by the contract the right of possession to the vendee, the power of refusing to give up the possession, where he holds himself, till the price is paid,—the power of countermanding his own delivery order on his bailee where he holds through another, before the bailee has attorned to the buyer; and the power of so refusing or countermanding, not only as against the buyer or his creditors, but as against a sub-vendee, unless where he has, when informed of the sub-sale, so acted as to assent expressly or by implication thereto, and estop himself from pleading his lien or right of retention against the sub-vendee. But this lien extends only to the price: it does not even cover warehouse charges incurred on the goods while detained. It is, however, more than a mere lien: it is a special property, analogous to that of a pledge. But the vendor has no right, in a question with the vendee, to re-sell, notwithstanding the vendee's default in payment, unless he has expressly reserved that power by agreement, in which case the sale is rescinded. But in no other case is the sale rescinded by the exercise of the right of lien. In no other case does it amount to a resumption by the vendor of the right of property, but simply of the right of possession. See Blackburn on Sale, pp. 197-202, 221-2, 308-337; Benjamin, Sale, pp. 565-624. The analogy of this peculiar right to that of stoppage in transitu explains how naturally the English lawyers come to look on stoppage as merely a revival of this ante transitum lien, after it has ceased by delivery to a carrier. It also throws a strong light on the question whether the effect of stoppage in transitu is to rescind the contract, and divest the vendee of the property, or merely to replace the vendor in the position of exercising his lien for the price in the same way as he would have been able to do before parting with the actual possession. This question in regard to stoppage has not been directly decided, but there seems to be no longer any doubt that at common law it does not rescind the contract; and that must now be taken as settled doctrine in equity, because on the theory of a rescission the equity courts could have no power to exercise the jurisdiction in stoppage which they now continually assert. See Lord Cairns in Schotsmans v Lanc. & Yorkshire Railway Co., L. R. 2 Ch. App. 332. Certainly, if the stoppage be wrongful, it does not effect a rescission, or deprive the vendor of his action for the price; Re Humberston, 1 De Gex 262; Gillard v Brittan, 8 M. and W. 575. See, as to the general nature of the right and the question of rescission, the opinions in Wentworth v Outhwaite, 10 M. and W. 451; Martindale v Smith, 1 Q. B. 389, and authorities in Tudor, Merc. Ca. 2d ed. p. 670. See also Blackburn, Sale, pp. 339-344; and Benjamin, Sale, pp. 660-2. And as to Scotland, see Stoppel v Stoddart, 1850, 13 D. 61, where it was held not to rescind the contract. The question in Scotland is, whether the resumption of the possession is resumption of all the ceding of possession transferred, i.e. the dominium; or whether it is a resumption of possession only to the special effect of giving a lien for the price, leaving the transference of the dominium untouched, as in England. Mr. Brodie has some valuable observations, which throw much light upon the conditions of the question, in his Supplement to Stair, though his conclusions are wrong.]

He said: 'The view taken in the Court of Session excluded all attention to this point,—that, as the title to stop in transitu arises from a avoidance of the contract, and the act [232] of stopping puts things into the same situation between the vendor and vendee, or factor and principal, as if there never had been any transaction between them relative to the goods so stopped, the stopper certainly can raise no charge against the bankrupt's estate, as for freight, insurance, damage, or anything else, respecting such goods, though the contract had in part been fulfilled by carrying them so far, or insuring them.'¹

This doctrine was not embodied, it is true, in any judgment pronounced on that occasion, the cause having been extrajudicially settled on the footing of Lord Thurlow's opinion. But in a subsequent case it was adopted in the Court of Session, first by Lord Justice-Clerk M'Queen, and afterwards by the whole Court.² This case was, however, a good deal involved in circumstances; and from its having been withdrawn from the House of Lords before having been heard, it may be considered as not having settled the question.³

SUBSECTION VII.—OF THE BUYER'S REJECTION OF GOODS SOLD, FOR WHICH HE IS UNABLE TO PAY.

The counterpart of the seller's right to stop in transitu, is the buyer's duty to reject the proffered delivery, if unable to pay the price.

The doctrine laid down in the English cases on this subject is: 1. That it is the part of an honest man, when he finds himself unable as buyer to pay the price, but is not yet a bankrupt, to reject goods proffered to him for delivery by a carrier, or other person to whom they have constructively been delivered for him;⁴ and that this act of honesty, when [233]

¹ This note was taken at the time, and was founded on in the case of Kincaid v Murray & Henderson in 1799 (see next note), and there held as correct. See 3 Pat. 196.

² Kincaid v Murray & Henderson, 1798. Without going into a very minute statement of this case, it may be sufficient to say that Howden & Co. shipped grain by agreement for Leslie & Kincaid, and drew bills for the price on Murray & Henderson, the bankers of the buyers; and that in the meanwhile, the buyers having failed, an agent of the seller stopped the grain on its arrival, Murray & Henderson having approved of what he had done. The bills were paid to the seller by Murray & Henderson, and one of the buyers had made partial remittances to Murray & Henderson, but still a large sum was unprovided for. The sellers afterwards gave a power of attorney to Murray & Henderson, who, having first applied the remittances, claimed indemnification for the balance of the bills, and all the additional expense of insurance, etc., out of the grain as stopped in transitu. At first Lord Justice-Clerk M'Queen held 'that the stopping of goods in transitu was not an acquittal to the vendee of any further claim of damages.' But in his subsequent judgment, he found 'that, agreeably to the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Messrs. Allan & Stewart v Stein's Crs., the contract was rendered null.' And this judgment was twice adhered to by the Court.

An appeal was taken to the House of Lords, but the circumstances of the parties prevented it from being tried.

³ Arnot v Boyter is a case which may at first sight appear to decide this question. Moens & Son, of Rotterdam, shipped goods by order of Boyter; but having some suspicions, they sent them consigned to their own agents in Scotland. Boyter was at the arrival of the goods insolvent. The agents tendered the goods, and protested for damages, if it should be necessary to sell them by auction. Boyter refused to give security for payment; and on application to the Judge-Admiral, a warrant was granted to sell the goods, and decree pronounced finding Boyter liable for any deficiency that should arise. And the Court of Session affirmed this judgment. 1803, M. 14204.

But it is proper to observe: 1. That the Court held this not to be a case of stopping in transitu, but one in which the goods never had left the seller's hands; and, 2. That care was taken (by Lord Meadowbank particularly) to make it be understood that 'this decision left the question open and undetermined whether a vendor, in a proper case of stoppage in transitu, is entitled to claim for damages.' [See Stoppel & Co. v Stoddart, 1850, 13 D. 61, where it was held that 'the seller, even although he had exercised the right of stoppage, had not thereby rescinded the contract of sale, but was a creditor for the price, and entitled to use all the remedies of a creditor.' In England the question seems to be still undecided. Tudor, Merc. Ca. 670. And as to the right of the assignees of the bankrupt to enforce the contract, see Gibson v Carruthers, 8 M. & W. 321.]

⁴ Atkins v Barwick, 4 Burr. 2239, Cowp. 125. Cripps and Quorum in Cornwall received goods from Barwick in London, which, on finding their affairs declining, they sent to a third person, with orders to redeliver them to Barwick; and soon after becoming bankrupt, they wrote to London to inform Barwick of their bankruptcy, and of the fate of his goods. Barwick was found entitled to the goods. Atkins v Barwick, 1 Strange 165. Lord Mansfield, in subsequent cases, said that the reasons given for the judgment turned on a subtilty: the true ground was the honesty of the case, and that the trader very honestly refused to accept the goods, and returned them. He added, the Court of Chancery would have interposed, and said the assignees should not have the goods without paying the price.

Salte v Field, 5 Term. Rep. 211. Dewhurst resided as a performed, is to be held by courts as effectual, provided the seller assents to the rescinding of the contract.¹ 2. That this power in the buyer, of rejecting the goods and rescinding the bargain, subsists only while the goods are in transitu:² after actual delivery they become identified with his stock, and cannot, in contemplation of bankruptcy, be restored to the sellers in preference to the other creditors.³ 3. That after an act of bankruptcy committed, [234] the buyer has no power to return goods to the seller, this being necessarily a pre-trader in New York, and had also a house in London under J. Hill, his clerk. Salte sold to Hill, for Dewhurst, 176 pieces of calico, and they were (3d May) delivered at his house to Hill, who sent them to Field, a packer, to be shipped for Dewhurst at New York. In April, Dewhurst had written a letter to Hill, which arrived after the goods were so delivered to Hill, desiring him to buy no more goods, to countermand all orders, and give back such goods as might be furnished. Hill immediately informed Salte of this, who agreed to take back the goods. The goods were in Field's hands as packer, and several attachments were used in his hands by creditors of Dewhurst. A meeting of the creditors was called; and on a demand by Salte against Field for the goods, which were refused, an action was raised. The Court of King's Bench held that the principal was entitled to disavow and rescind the contract, if that proposition was assented to by the buyer; and that though the goods remained with the packer, it was not for the original purpose, but after the rescinding of the contract the property revested in the seller, and the buyer's creditors were not entitled to attach the goods. [Bartram v Farebrother, 4 Bing. 579.]

¹ It was held in the several cases cited in the last note, that his assent would be intended, unless he should actually dissent.

² [James v Griffin, 2 M. and W. 623; and Parke, B., in Van Casteel v Booker, 2 Exch. 691, 18 L. J. Ex. 14.]

³ Smith v Field, 5 Term. Rep. 402. This was a case similar to Salte v Field (see above, p. 253, note 4); and the circumstance of the seller having, instead of acceding to the buyer's rejection of the goods, attached the goods as for a debt (viz. the price), was held to pass the property so absolutely, that there could be no subsequent rescinding of the contract. The case arose out of the very same circumstances, and the same bankruptcy; but Smith, the seller, thinking it impossible that Hill could deliver back the goods, made affidavit of the price, and attached the goods in Field the packer's hand. The Court drew the distinction here, that the renunciation proposed was not assented to. It was held, that when the offer was made to the sellers by Dewhurst, they might have rescinded the contract, but that they declined doing it; for the instant they made affidavit that Dewhurst was indebted to them for their goods, it operated like a positive declaration by them that they did not rescind the contract. But now the interests of other parties intervene—the general mass of Dewhurst's creditors.

Barnes v Freeland, 6 Term. Rep. 80. Freeland sold to Lloyd 44 tons of iron, and delivered it. Lloyd accepted a bill at nine months for the price. Four months afterwards, Caldwell & Co., the bankers of Lloyd, failed, and this made Lloyd insolvent. Lloyd called on Freeland and told him this, and offered him back the iron, which still lay in the warehouse where it was at the time of the sale. Freeland agreed to take it back. The transaction was managed by Lloyd delivering to Freeland a bill of parcels, dated two days before this conversation, for 50 tons, including the above and another parcel in a similar situation, and giving him the key of the warehouse. It was entered in the books as a sale of 16th March. Lloyd, on the day of the above transaction, wrote circular letters; he did no more business, and three days after committed an act of bankruptcy. The Court of King's Bench held the circumstance of the goods having been actually delivered, and the property of the bankrupt until he became insolvent, as decisive against his renunciation of the bargain. The goods here were originally sold and delivered to the buyer, said Lord Kenyon, and they were locked up in his warehouse: therefore there was a complete transfer of the property from the seller to the bankrupt at the time; and the question is, Whether, when the latter became insolvent, he could redeliver it to the seller in specie? It was held, that the contract being complete, and the property transferred, it could not be rescinded by any subsequent act of the parties, so as to affect the interests of third persons.

In the subsequent case of Dixon v Baldwin (see above, p. 216, note 4), where the goods were in the possession of the sellers, upon a claim of right to stop them in transitu, it was held that a fair and bona fide renunciation by the buyers, on consulting with some of their creditors, was effectual. The Battiers, while the right of the sellers to stop was undecided, called a meeting of their creditors, and a case was laid before counsel, who advised the goods to be given up, and they were given up accordingly. Lord Ellenborough on this point thought that the bankrupts were competent to rescind, and had in fact rescinded, the contract for the sale of these goods. The circumstance of deliberation, consent of creditors, advice of counsel, and the publicity which attended the whole of the measure, exempted it from being considered as a fraudulent preference in contemplation of bankruptcy. That the Battiers must have considered themselves in a state of insolvency and impending bankruptcy at the time, cannot be doubted; but until an act of bankruptcy, the jus disponendi over goods remains by law with the trader, unless he exercise it by way of a voluntary and fraudulent preference of a particular creditor in contemplation of bankruptcy. But here the goods were given up, if not from a threat of litigation, at least under an idea of the right being probably adverse to the claim of the bankrupts and their creditors; and voluntary favour towards the defendants did not operate as any inducement with the bankrupts to recede from their rights on this occasion. From this opinion Mr. Justice Lawrence dissented, holding the communication from the bankrupts not to amount to a consent to rescind the contract, but merely to notice of the meeting, and of an apparent disposition of the creditors who had met to the giving up of the goods. The other judges (Grose and Le Blanc) concurred with Lord Ellenborough in thinking this a question fit for the jury, who had affirmed the bankrupts to have acted bona fide, and who had negatived any voluntary preference. 5 East 175.

ference given to a particular creditor.¹ 4. That after bankruptcy the buyer cannot interfere to reject goods which, being in transitu, are tendered for actual delivery. This has been held with expressions of regret. The distinction between this case and that of an insolvent, first above taken notice of, is extremely nice; though it may certainly in the subtilty of law be contended, that the contract of sale being completed by the consent of parties, they are from that moment creditors of each other, the buyer for delivery of the goods, the seller for the price; that by the delivery of goods to a carrier, etc., the property is passed to the buyer and to his creditors, subject to resumption by the seller, if he shall be vigilant enough to take them before reaching the buyer's stock; that if the buyer refuses to receive the goods after his bankruptcy, he may be said actively to interfere with the rights of his creditors, and to take from them property which has already by tradition been vested in him for their behoof, conferring thereby on the seller a preference; and that under the statutes of bankruptcy he is chargeable with having alienated, in favour of one who at the moment is merely a creditor, property which would otherwise go as part of his divisible estate.²

In Scotland the doctrine is fully established on the sound principles of justice, untrammelled by distinctions so nice as the English judges have permitted to interfere with the dictates of honesty.

1. In an old case it was held, that where goods have been actually delivered, the buyer, being a bankrupt, cannot return the goods, so as to give a preference to the seller.³

2. In another case, decided about the same time, a person on the eve of bankruptcy was held entitled to reject the goods when not finally delivered.⁴ And in a later case, the English doctrine on this subject was pleaded, and sustained, to the effect of supporting a rejection of goods sold and constructively delivered, the buyer finding himself unable to implement his contract.⁵

¹ This proposition, however, is not settled by any determination; it is the result only of dicta in the cases quoted in the preceding note.

² [See Benjamin on Sale, p. 375; Parsons, Contr. i. 609; Siffken v Wray, 6 East 371; Heinekey v Earle, 28 L. J. Q. B. 79; Bolton v Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Co., 35 L. J. C. P. 137; Whitehead v Anderson, 9 M. and W. 518, 529; De Tastet v Carroll, 1 Stark. 89, and Selwyn N.P. 200; Richardson v Goss, 3 B. and P. 119; Neate v Ball, 2 East 124; Fidgeon v Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 539; Brown on Sale, p. 543 et seq.; and a copious commentary on the earlier English cases, in Brodie, St. App. 888-93, notes.]

³ Hamilton v Barrow & Reynolds, 5 Dec. 1767, n. r. Smith bought from Hamilton, a cabinetmaker, furniture to fit up his house for receiving lodgers. The furniture was delivered, and some time afterwards Smith was imprisoned. From prison he wrote to Hamilton, declaring his inability to fulfil his contract, and desiring him to take back his furniture. Hamilton accordingly received back his goods. A creditor afterwards arrested those goods in Hamilton's possession as the property of Smith. The Sheriff of Edinburgh held the property to have been vested in Smith, and that he had no power to prefer the seller. Lord Pitfour confirmed this judgment; and a petition drawn up by Crosby against the interlocutor was refused.

⁴ Wallace, Gardyn, & Co. v Miller, 1766, M. 8475. A person on the eve of bankruptcy was allowed to reject a proffered bargain in the very last act necessary for perfecting it. An offer was made by him to buy goods which were in his own possession as a bleacher. It was agreed to, and bills desired to be sent. At that moment the insolvency appeared, and the buyer said he should keep the goods only to manufacture them, not to the effect of completing the sale. Found he could do so, to the effect of excluding pointing by his creditors. [The case as given in the note, and as decided by the Court, turned on the incompleteness of the proposed sale; it is not a case of incomplete delivery. See Brodie's note, Stair, p. 895.]

⁵ M'Millan v Drake, 1807, Hume 691. Maccoul, a timber merchant, commissioned two cargoes of timber from Drake. One of them was delivered to Maccoul; the other was on board of a ship to be carried to him, the invoice and bill of lading endorsed being in his hands. Finding his bankruptcy inevitable, he took the opinion of counsel, and was advised not to take delivery of this latter cargo. He accordingly wrote to his law agent, M'Millan, and endorsed the bill of lading to him, as trustee for all concerned: 'I enclose the invoice and bill of lading, concerning which I am very much perplexed, because, finding that I am no longer able to keep my credit, and that I must be under the necessity of immediately applying for a sequestration, I am at a loss to know whether I should take delivery of this cargo, which will bring in Mr. Drake among my other creditors, or allow it to remain, subject to the order of him or his agent.' He then stated the necessity of landing the cargo, to prevent demurrage; and that he thought it right to endorse to him, the agent, as trustee for all concerned,—'for behoof of my creditors in general, or Mr. Drake in particular, whichever of them shall afterwards be found to have the best right thereto.' Five days afterwards, Maccoul's estate was sequestrated. About a month after sequestration, the agents of the seller took a protest against M'Millan, requiring delivery of the cargo. M'Millan deferred answering this question till the creditors should be consulted. The question in the sequestration was, whether the seller was entitled to the proceeds of this cargo. The

[235] 3. But it is not actual delivery in this question, if goods have been brought from a distance, and are still on the carts at the cellar-door of the buyer. Nay, the buyer may even take the goods into his warehouse custodiæ causa, and still the goods will be sufficiently rejected by writing to the seller that they have been so taken for his behoof.¹

4. Goods may be rejected even after they have been taken into the custody of a clerk or warehouseman, acting without express authority from the buyer. And,

5. It has been said in several Scottish cases, that it amounts to a fraud by the bankrupt and the creditors to take delivery of goods which are still subject to stoppage.²

SECTION III.

OF RESTITUTION OF GOODS AFTER DELIVERY.³

The seller may be entitled to claim restitution of his goods even after delivery, either in consequence of certain conditions in the contract, or as a remedy against fraud.

SUBSECTION I.—OF CONDITIONS IN SALE.

[236] Such conditions are reduced to two classes—suspensive conditions, and dissolving conditions; the former suspending the transfer till the condition be fulfilled, the latter annulling the transfer after it is completed.

By the Roman law, both those conditions were held real. Delivery of the thing sold did not transfer the property, unless the price was paid or credit given for it: a condition was implied suspensive of the transference.⁴ And even where credit was given, it was trustee in the sequestration (who happened to be the same person, M'Millan, that had been made endorsee of the bill of lading, though this made no difference on the case) rejected the seller's claim, on the ground that the cargo was not in transitu at the time of the bankruptcy. Lord Robertson found, that the estate of Maccoul was sequestrated on 25th January 1804; that no claim was made by Drake for the cargo till 21st February; that the letter from Maccoul, and the endorment of the bill of lading, cannot be considered as a renunciation of the contract, as it was in trust, not for behoof of Drake, but of all concerned; that there was no stoppage in transitu by Drake, the property having been vested in the trustee for the creditors in general, by the act of sequestration, before any claim by Drake; and therefore he repelled his claim for the proceeds of the cargo. The Court unanimously altered this judgment, and found Drake, the seller, entitled to the proceeds of the cargo. [Mr. Brodie thinks Lord Robertson's judgment was right in this case (Stair, pp. 895, 884, notes); and on comparing it with Heincke v Earle, 28 L. J. Q. B. 79, it may be doubted whether there was any sufficient rejection. See Schuermans & Sons v Goldie, 1828, 6 S. 1110.]

¹ Steins v Hutchison, 16 Nov. 1810, 16 Fac. Coll. 33. Adams ordered two casks of spirits from Steins: they were sent, and arrived at Adams' cellar-door about nine o'clock in the morning. About an hour afterwards, Adams got letters which decided him in applying for sequestration; and he then took advice what to do with the goods, which could not be left in the street. He was advised to take them into his cellar cus-

todiæ causa, and did so, writing to the seller to that effect. The question was between the sellers and the general creditors of the buyer. The Court held the goods to have been sufficiently rejected to prevent the passing of the property. [Inglis v Port Eglinton Spinning Co., 1842, 4 D. 478; Brown v Watson, Hume 709.]

² In Steins v Hutchison, 16 Nov. 1810, Lord President Blair intimated his opinion that a bankrupt might reject goods, and even that it was very questionable whether it were not a fraud to take them; and whether, on that ground, restitution would not be given.

See what Lord Mansfield says in Atkins v Barwick, above, p. 253, note 4, in fin. [In Watt v Findlay, 1846, 8 D. 532, Lord Mackenzie said: 'I should not wish to be held as adopting Professor Bell's view of President Blair's opinion in the case of Steins v Hutchison, that if a bankrupt were to take delivery of goods bought as a solvent man, this would be a fraud, which would entitle the seller to redress. I do not think the opinion went so far. Mr. Bell does not agree with it.]

³ In the first edition of this work, while the doctrine of stopping in transitu was recently introduced, and was only in the course of supplanting the remedy which by our own law was given to vendors on the principle of restitution on account of fraud, actual or presumed, this chapter had an importance which it does not now possess. I think myself entitled, therefore, to abridge the discussion, and dispense with many of the authorities.

⁴ Inst. De Rer. Div. lib. 2, tit. 1, sec. 41; Dig. lib. 18, tit.

lawful to stipulate that the contract should become void, if the price was not paid against a day certain.¹

In the application of these rules to mercantile practice, some controversy was maintained on the question, Whether the seller was to be held as giving credit for the price, from the mere fact of delivering the goods without receiving the price?² The result seems to have been, that in order to transfer the property without payment of the price, it was in the Roman law enough if the seller agreed to the appointment of a future day of payment, and delivered the subject in the meantime, without any condition of eventual dissolution; but that delivery alone did not infer an unconditional transference; passing the property only if the price was paid.³

This doctrine is found prevailing as the former law of the Continent, with such particular exceptions as in various states appeared expedient or necessary.⁴

But in Great Britain there is no hypothec or right of restitution for security of the price after actual delivery. The moment the goods are actually in possession of the buyer, by the vendor's authority, as sold to him, the transference is completed, and the price becomes matter of personal credit merely.

1. In England this rule is settled as applicable to chattels, and consequently to mercantile concerns. It is indeed laid down in the older books,⁵ that payment of the price, day not being given, is a condition precedent implied in the contract of sale; so that the buyer cannot take the goods, nor sue for them, without tender of the price. But day is held to be given by delivery of the subject unconditionally.⁶ And although an express condition annexed to the transference of chattels is effectual,⁷ it is not held a valid condition that, on the buyer being unable to pay the price, the seller shall take back the property as under a lien for the price.⁸

2. The Scottish law rejects hypothecs of moveables as destructive to commerce, [237] except in a few special and well-ascertained cases, to be afterwards discussed.⁹ It gives no sanction to the idea that a seller continues proprietor of a subject which he has delivered over to the buyer on the title of sale.—‘Sale being perfected,’ says Lord Stair, ‘and the thing delivered, the property thereof becomes the buyer’s, if it was the seller’s; and there is no dependence of it till the price be paid or secured, as was in the civil law; neither hypothecation of it for the price.’¹⁰ And although it may have been intended that the sale

1. De Contrah. emp. l. 19. See also Ulpian’s rule, Dig. lib. 14, tit. 4, l. 5, secs. 17 and 18. De Tribut. Act.

¹ ‘Lex Commissoria est ea, quæ inter venditorem et emptorem convenit, ut si intra præfinitum diem pretium solutum non sit, res sit inempta.’ Pothier, Pandect. lib. 18, tit. 3, sec. 1. And it is proper to mark the spirit of this rule, as delivered by Ulpian in the first law of this title: ‘Si fundus, commissoria lege, venerit, magis est ut sub conditione resolvitur emptio quam sub conditione contrahi videtur.’

² Casaregi (Disc. 38, sec. 28) says: ‘Traditio non sola sufficit ad probandum venditorem habuisse fidem de pretio.’ See also secs. 29 and 30.

Vinnius, Com. in Inst. lib. 2, tit. 1, sec. 41, p. 181.

³ Pothier, Tr. du droit de Propriété, No. 239. See above, p. 242.

⁴ Van Leewin Censura Forensis, lib. 4, c. 19, sec. 20. Bynkershoek Quaestiones, Jur. Priv. c. 15. Pothier, Cont. de Vente, No. 324, vol. i. p. 389.

⁵ Hobart’s Reports, p. 41, and the authorities there referred to.

⁶ See, as an authority for this, the case of Haswell v Hunt, quoted above, p. 247, note 1.

A different rule is held as to land: the seller seems to be considered as having given only a conditional right to the land till payment of the price, the purchaser being considered as trustee for the seller. 1 Vernon 267.

⁷ See below, p. 258.

⁸ Holroyd v Gwynne, 2 Taunt. 176. Gwynne sold some growing timber to Lee at public auction. A contract was executed by which Lee had ingress to the lands to cut down and carry away the timber, and to hold it as his own proper chattels to his own use. But a condition was introduced, that if Lee should fail to pay the purchase-money at the day, or should become bankrupt previously, it should be lawful for Gwynne to secure, distrain, take away, and convert to his own use all the timber and trees, growing or cut, and to sell them, and with the money pay the price, rendering the overplus to Lee. Lee entered, and cut and converted the timber. He failed before paying the price; and Gwynne repossessed himself of what was not sold, and disposed of it by auction. The action was trover for the value by the assignees under a commission against Lee. The Court held Lee to have had the disposition of the goods, and, on the statute of James, that the assignees were entitled to the price.

⁹ See below, in Book IV.

¹⁰ Stair i. 14. 2.

‘The Lords found in vendition, that venditor postquam should be a ready money bargain, yet if the subject is delivered by the seller himself, or by his express order, unconditionally, without receiving the price, the property is altered, and the claim for the price is merely personal.¹

The same effect would not, however, follow if the goods were delivered by mistake; as, if the vendor's servant, misapprehending his orders, were to deliver goods which it was agreed should be paid for in cash at delivery, without demanding the money, the property would not pass by such delivery.²

But although the law rejects, both in England and Scotland, any implied condition or hypothec for the price, it admits express conditions; and an important question arises on the effect of such conditions as against third parties. As already said, they are either suspensive or dissolving conditions; and the effect of these is very different.

1. SUSPENSIVE CONDITIONS are such as suspend the sale and stay the transfer till something be done. These are admitted to the effect of preventing the delivery from passing the property; although, perhaps, it is to be regretted that sanction should have been given to any latent real right controlling the apparent ownership which arises from possession.

The effect of such suspensive conditions as real rights has the support of our institutional writers, and has been taken for granted in practice. Lord Stair, while he holds all personal and ineffectual against the real right, where third parties are concerned, lays it down, that a condition suspensive prevents the right of the buyer from being completed by delivery.³ And Mr. Erskine delivers the same doctrine in nearly the same terms which [238] Lord Stair has used.⁴ According to these doctrines, the vendee, previously to the existence of the condition, will be held to possess as a mere depositary, or in whatever character the contract will authorize; there being till then no consent to transfer, and two things being necessary to transmit property—consent and tradition.

In England, 'where an agreement is conditional, it shall not be completed till the condition be performed.'⁵ So, if a sale be on trial, that is to say, if the buyer has the power of rejection should the commodity not please on being examined, the delivery does not pass the property.⁷ So, again, if the buyer is to give bills for the price, or to retire the bills of convenit de pretio might not claim his goods, albeit the price was not paid to him.' Park, 26 June 1621; Hope, Maj. Pract. ms. vol. ii. p. 48.

In the case of Prince v Pallet, 1680, M. 4932, the Court decided 'that the wares, being delivered to the skipper on Udney's order, the property was vested in Udney; and that there is no hypothec in ware for the price by the law of Scotland.'

¹ On the Continent, in some places, delivery was held to complete the transference, even where ready money was stipulated. Consuet. Middleb. tit. 8, sec. 3; Bynkersh. Quest. Jur. Priv. lib. 3, tit. 15, vol. vi. p. 496.

² In England this doctrine was laid down in the case of Bishop v Shillito (p. 259, note 1). Mr. Justice Bayley said: 'If a tradesman sold goods to be paid for on delivery, and his servant by mistake delivers them without receiving the money, he may, after demand and refusal to deliver or pay, bring trover for his goods against the purchaser.' [Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 487.]

³ After showing that reservations of a power to redeem are not real rights, but merely personal obligations, his Lordship proceeds thus: 'As to other pactions adjected to sale, sometimes they are so conceived and meant that thereby the bargain is truly conditional and pendent, and so is not a perfect bargain till the condition be existent; neither doth the property of the thing sold pass thereby (though possession follow) till it be performed: as, if the bargain be conditional only upon payment of the price at such a time, till payment

the property passeth not to the buyer.' Afterwards he says: 'If such conditions do stop the transmission of property, and be so meant and expressed, then, as is said before, the bargain is pendent, and the property not transmitted, and the seller remains the proprietor.' Stair i. 14. 4 and 5.

See also Annotations on Stair, p. 80 et seq.

⁴ Ersk. iii. 3. 11.

⁵ Cowan v Spence, 1824, 3 S. 42. Cowan, tenant of a paper-mill, sublet it with the machinery, which was his own, and stipulated 'that as the whole machinery belonged to him in property, he has now delivered the same to A. Nasmyth for his free use and benefit during the lease, declaring that at the expiry thereof, and upon all the rents, etc., hereby contracted to be paid being fully paid up, the whole said moveable machinery shall be held to be the absolute and exclusive property of the said A. Nasmyth.' On Nasmyth's bankruptcy in possession under this agreement, his creditors claimed the machinery. But the Court held the machinery not to be transferred; the event, both in point of time and of payment, not having taken place on which the transference was to depend. [Wight v Forman, 1828, 7 S. 175.]

⁶ Com. Dig. Agreement, A. 4.

⁷ Ib. same section. Ellis v Mortimer, 1 New Rep. 257; Humphries v Carvalho, 16 East 45. In these cases, the buyer had by the bargain power within a certain time to disapprove and reject; and while it was so, the property was held to be in the vendor.

the seller in the circle, the property is not passed by delivery under such condition till the act stipulated be performed.¹

In Scotland the doctrine has been applied in similar circumstances. In the case below there was much doubt whether the condition was suspensive, or whether it was not rather a dissolving condition; but on the idea of its being properly suspensive, the doctrine as laid down by Stair and Erskine, and practically applied in England, was admitted as effectual against creditors.² So, if it be stipulated as the condition of a bargain, or if goods be [239] sent accompanied by a draft to be accepted and returned, and the goods are received, but the acceptance not sent, the property is not passed—the goods are still unsold.³

¹ Bishop v Shillito, 1819, 2 Barn. and Ald. 329, note. Here iron was to be delivered on condition that certain bills were to be taken out of circulation. Part was delivered, but the condition was not fulfilled. The vendor stopped further delivery, and brought an action of trover for what had been delivered. This action can proceed only on the ground of property in the plaintiff. And the Court of King's Bench held this only a conditional delivery; and the condition being broken, the plaintiff might bring trover. Abbot, Chief Justice, said he had left it to the jury to say whether the delivery of the iron and the redelivery of the bills were to be contemporary, and that the jury found that fact in the affirmative; and Bayley, Justice, concurred with the observation already quoted. Supra, p. 258.

² M'Cartney v M'Credie's Crs. M'Credie purchased cattle from M'Cartney, and granted a bill at three months for the price. The cattle were committed to two servants, one of M'Credie's and one of M'Cartney's, to be driven to M'Credie the vendee's farm. The vendor having heard something to the discredit of the vendee's circumstances, followed the cattle and stopped them on the road. This stoppage in transitu put the parties on the footing on which they stood before the bargain; and a new bargain was made by the following letter, written by M'Credie, the vendee, to the vendor:—'18th August 1798.—Sir, I acknowledge to have bought, and received from you, twenty-one beasts at the agreed price of £5, 7s. 3d. per beast, which I have granted my acceptance for of £116, 15s.; and if the bill is not punctually paid when it falls due, you are to be allowed to take back your own cattle, and to pay me £10 sterling for grass.' The cattle were on the vendee's farm till the beginning of November, when, previous to the term of payment of the bill, he gave notice that he could not pay the bill; and that the vendor might therefore come and take back his cattle on paying the stipulated £10 for grazing. The vendor accordingly sent for his cattle; but the vendee's landlord stopped them as the property of his tenant, and subject to his hypothec. The vendor offered the £10 to the landlord, but it was refused, and he brought his action for recovery of his cattle. The Sheriff decided: 'That, by the transaction between M'Cartney and M'Credie, the property of the cattle in question was transferred by the delivery thereof; and that the interest of M'Credie's creditors cannot be affected by a missive of so collusive a nature as that produced and founded on appears to be.' The late Lord Meadowbank, in the Bill Chamber, remitted to the Sheriff, with instructions 'to find that, by the bargain (as established by the letter), the sale of the cattle to M'Credie was not suspended, but only a resolution of the sale stipulated, in the event of the price not being paid in terms of M'Credie's acceptance; and that as M'Credie became bankrupt before the event happened on which the bargain was to be resolved, the agreement to resolve the bargain cannot afford the vendor any claim to the ipsa corpora of the cattle in competition with the other creditors of M'Credie: so that M'Cartney must be satisfied with ranking for the price of the cattle as originally stipulated, or for damages for non-implementation if he conceive these to exceed the said price.' The Court altered this judgment, and 'found M'Cartney entitled to restitution from M'Credie and his creditors of the cattle in question, upon payment of the £10 of grass-mail, or payment of the contents of the bill granted for the price of the cattle.' There was much difference of opinion on the bench. It was very strongly urged by some of the judges that this was a condition not suspensive of the transference, but merely dissolving a vested right; that in moveables no such conditional bargain as this can be effectual, and that the false credit to which they give birth forms a complete bar to their having effect against creditors or purchasers. The prevailing opinion was, that the condition was of a suspensive nature; that the property never was vested; that the condition not being illegal, it must have effect, since there was no fraud on either part, nor design of either bestowing an undue preference or raising a false credit. 26 Nov. 1799, Sess. Papers penes me; M. App. Sale, No. 1. [See Cowan v Spence, 21 May 1824; Wight v Forman, 1828, 7 S. 175.]

³ A case of this kind occurred in which the goods had not reached the buyer; but if they had got into his possession, the result would have been the same. Brodie v Tod & Co., 20 May 1814, 17 Fac. Coll. 609. This was a purchase of clover, said to be paid for by a bill payable in London at three months. In transmitting the bill of lading, the vendors sent the stipulated draft payable in London, adding, 'which please return in course.' Not receiving the draft accepted in due course, the vendors relanded the goods. The Court held the sale conditional. [It is impossible to conceive how, after a completed sale containing nothing about 'a bill in course,' the sellers could effectually adject to the contract a new condition of that nature. On examining the Faculty Report attentively, it will appear that this was rather a case where there never was a concluded bargain at all. Arnott seems to have ordered seed; Tod & Co. proceeded to execute the order; but in their letter in reply to the order, indicated that they would execute it only on this condition, which not being complied with, they desisted from executing the order. On any other ground the decision cannot be maintained.]

See, however, the reasoning of the English courts as to the construction of a similar stipulation in Wilmshurst v Booker, 7 M. and G. 882, and Key v Cotesworth, 22 L. J. Ex. 4. No Difficulties sometimes arise in the construction of the conditions thus annexed to sales, as to the description of the security to be given by the buyer; but these are points which will be more properly considered in treating of sale as a contract. See below, Book III.

2. DISSOLVING CONDITIONS in a sale have an effect very different from that of conditions suspensive.

It is settled as law in Scotland, that an express paction, made by the seller when delivering the property, that the property shall be reinstated in him if the price be not paid against an appointed day, is quite ineffectual against the buyer's creditors. This is the Pactum Legis Commissorie of the Roman law, which had not the effect of making the sale conditional, but of making it conditionally dissoluble. Mr. Erskine, in treating of conditions incidental to the contract of sale, lays it down that the Pactum Legis Commissorie, though it has no effect in suspending the transference of the thing sold, yet has this effect, that 'if the buyer fail to pay the price within the time limited, the sale resolves, and the property returns from him to the seller.'¹ But this doctrine is too loosely expressed, and is not to be understood as applicable to cases where third parties are concerned. Accordingly, we find that this doctrine is diametrically opposite to that which is delivered by Lord Stair.² Lord Stair draws that distinction which is of chief importance in practice, and to which the [240] present discussion requires particular attention. The question he proposes for discussion is this: 'Whether a clause, irritant or resolutive, in a sale ("that if such a condition were or were not, in that case the bargain should be null and void, as if it had never been made or granted"), be a personal obligation only, which, though it may annul the property or bargain if it remain in the hands of the contractor (buyer), cannot reach it if it be in the hands of a third party?' His general doctrine is, that 'when the buyer once becomes proprietor, the condition that he shall cease to be proprietor in a certain case is but personal; for property or dominion passes not by conditions or provisions, but by tradition, and the other ways prescribed by law.' And taking this as the general doctrine, unless where common law or statute have otherwise established (as in the alienation of feudal rights without consent of the superior, the not-payment of feu-duty, etc.), he next lays down that such conditions have not the effect of a real burden, even when mentioned in the body of the contract, and where, of course, the condition appears openly; that they have no effect against creditors using diligence, for they know nothing of the nature of the right; nor against creditors taking voluntary conveyances ex necessitate, having no other probable way of payment; nor even against voluntary acquirers, who, if they see the condition, are entitled to consider it as a jus ad rem, not a jus in re. There may, indeed, be fraud in such voluntary acquisition, precise words are requisite to constitute a condition precedent, and no formal words will do so if it is obvious from the whole instrument, or from the subject-matter to which it relates, that this was not the understanding or intention of the parties. It is to be collected in each case from the terms of the entire deed or the necessities of the transaction, and the reason and sense of the whole affair. See Tindal, C. J., in Glaholm v Hays, 2 M. and G. 266; Ellenborough, C. J., in Ritchie v Atkinson, 10 East 295; Parsons, Contr. vol. ii. pp. 526-9.]

¹ Ersk. iii. 3. 11.

² In contrasting the authority of these great lawyers, it may be observed that they wrote in a very different spirit, and with their minds turned to different objects. Mr. Erskine composed his Institute as a course of academical instruction, following out the several divisions and train of his course with admirable perspicuity, but without having his attention turned to the shock of principles which in actual practice, and especially in the keenly contested competitions that bankruptcy produces, brings out the true principle. And this respectable author often follows in the train of the Roman jurisprudence; and delivers almost a translation of a Roman rescript as the law of Scotland, without distinguishing the difference of manners and change of principle which materially affect the law, or the qualifications it receives in the opposition of contending rights.

Lord Stair composed his Institutions in a very different spirit: he had practised at the bar for nearly twenty years with eminent success; he had sat as a Senator of the College of Justice for nine years, and for eleven years more he had been President of the Court; and thus, with his mind continually turned to practice, and the application of legal rules and principles in the business of life, he had, as he himself tells us, 'followed the study and practice of the law constantly and diligently for nearly forty years.' The effects of this course of study are manifest in his book. He seeks with a liberal and learned spirit for the principle of all his doctrines; but he is in general careful to submit them to the test of practice, and to examine rights and obligations with reference to their effects on purchasers and creditors.

which may expose the acquirer to a claim of damages ; but even that claim is merely personal, and will not pass with the property.¹

There appears to be no decision of the Court of Session tending to support the Pactum Legis Commissorie, as bestowing on sellers a right to restitution of moveables against creditors, where the transference was completed in the person of the buyer.²

SUBSECTION II.—OF RESTITUTION ON ACCOUNT OF FRAUD IN THE CONTRACT OF SALE.

‘Nunquam nuda traditio transfert dominium,’ says Paulus, ‘sed ita, si venditio aut aliqua justa causa præcesserit, propter quam traditio sequeretur.’³ On the foundation of this great principle rest several important exceptions to the effect of delivery in passing property.

Although, lawful consent and actual delivery once concurring, the real right to [241] the subject sold is vested in the purchaser, and the seller has no privilege of restitution as a resource against the bankruptcy of the buyer, yet where the consent is only apparent, there is no effectual transference ; but the seller is entitled to restitution against the creditors of the buyer. Restitution will therefore be given, not only against the buyer, but even against purchasers from him, where the seller is incapable of full and legal consent ; or where the sale has proceeded from such fear and compulsion as in law annuls and makes it void. Where the sale has been induced by fraud, the seller is to be considered as having given his consent ; but in consequence of the deceit, that consent is held to be revocable to the effect of grounding an action for reduction and restitution, which, though not available against purchasers bona fide,⁴ is good against the buyer and his general creditors.⁵

¹ Stair i. 14. 5.

² In the sale of lands there are two cases of which it is proper to take notice. In a competition between the Crs. of Jap and David Baird, the judgment seems to imply (and that is all the length to which I carry it) that, if the conveyance had been delivered, the purchaser's right would have been held complete, notwithstanding a private paction. Baird sold a house to Jap, and gave him possession, but retained the conveyance and title-deeds, delivering nothing but an inventory. A letter was written by Baird, binding himself to deliver up the titles on receiving the price. Jap failed, and his creditors claimed the house ; but the Court found ‘that Baird, in respect he never delivered the disposition, is entitled to the house or to the price.’ Baird v Jap, 1758, M. 14156.

In the case of Young v Dun, 1785, M. 14191, a house having been sold for £2500, it was conditioned that the price should be paid at the next term, or that the sale should be void, and the buyer as tenant should pay a rent of £225. The buyer did not pay, and the seller proceeded without further notice to sell the house to another, and then brought an action of removing, in which he was found entitled to succeed. But here, 1. There was no third party concerned. 2. The property was not transferred, for sasine had not been taken, and the possession of the house might be ascribed to the contract of lease included in the bargain.

³ Dig. lib. 41, tit. 1, l. 31.

⁴ Elliot v Wilson, 1826, 4 S. 429, N. E. 435.

⁵ In England, it is a doctrine of equity that the property which passes at law on the footing of the contract is restored in equity on proof of fraud. And although strictly it is in equity only that this remedy is to be obtained, yet, as it is available against creditors as well as against the bankrupt himself, the English courts of law have more recently come to regard it as consistent with the sound administration of the law to avoid wasting the bankrupt's funds by adjudging to the assignees, as vested in them by law, what it only requires a bill in equity to force them to refund. Scott v Surman, Willis 402 ; Gladstone v Hadwen, 1 Maule and Selw. 517. [Campbell, Robertson, & Co. v Shepherd, 8 Nov. 1776, 2 Pat. 399. See Add. Contr. 6th ed. 825.]

To protect a bona fide purchaser from one who obtains goods by fraud, there must have been on the part of the original owner a consent to sell—not merely to yield up possession—on some causa not capable, even when followed by delivery, of passing the property. And there must have been a consent to sell to the fraudulent person from whom the bona fide purchaser acquires. If the fraud is only successful in inducing the owner to part with the goods without any intention of selling them at all ; or if it only creates in his mind, as the inductive cause of the transaction, a belief that he is selling them to some other person, or any other error in substantialibus, the effect of which is to render the transaction simply a nullity : in neither case will the bona fide purchaser be able to resist the original owner's rei vindicatio. In the one case, though there is consent, it is not consent to transfer property ; in the other there is no consensus in idem placitum between the parties : in neither case, therefore, is there a habile titulus transferendi domini, or sufficient causa to enable the tradition to carry the property to the fraudulent person so as to enable him in turn to transfer it to the bona fide purchaser. See Kingsford v Merry, 26 L. J. Ex. 83 ; Higgons v Burton, 26 L. J. Ex. 342 ; Hardman v Booth, 32 L. J. Ex. 105 ; Pease v Gloahec, L. R. 1 P. C. 220, 3 Moore N. S. 566 ; Oakes v Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. Ca. 325 ; Stevenson v Newnham, 22 L. J. C. P. 110.]

In the further prosecution of this subject, I shall confine myself to the question relative to that species of fraud which consists in the concealment of bankruptcy.

Wherever a transference has been brought about by fraud, such as utterly to subvert the contract, and destroy the original consent to transfer, the objection will be available not only against the buyer himself, but also against his creditors, entitling the seller to restitution of his property. But here it is necessary to recur to a distinction already taken notice of between the law of this country and the Roman and foreign laws; a neglect of which might lead to misapplication of authorities, and a neglect of the true principles and doctrine of our own jurisprudence.

In the Roman and Continental law, however fair, regular, and unobjectionable the contract of sale might be, the property was not transferred by the delivery following upon that contract, so as to divest the seller, unless at the time of delivery the seller, by a kind of secondary contract, expressly gave credit for the price, and renounced his hypothec. The consequence of this was, that not only such frauds as undermined the original contract, but such deceptions or concealments as should induce credit at the time of delivery, were sufficient to entitle the seller to restitution, by reinstating him in the full enjoyment of his hypothec for the price. But in the law of Scotland there is no such necessity for special credit being given at the time of delivery, in order to constitute a real right in the buyer; since that law acknowledges no hypothec for the price, requiring to be renounced. The contract of sale, once concluded, is, when accompanied or followed by delivery, an irrevocable transference, leaving to the seller no other ground of restitution than such as will be sufficient to overturn that contract, and annihilate the original consent.

Thus, there is a material difference between the Scottish and Continental laws not only in the direction of the challenge on the ground of fraud, the one being pointed to the original contract, the other to the credit given at delivery, but in the force and degree of the fraud necessary to accomplish the restitution; as much slighter circumstances must be held to undermine the consent to give credit, than would be sufficient to overturn ab initio the original bargain.

The civilians define fraud to be 'Calliditas, falacia, machinatio, ad circumveniendum, fallendum, decipiendum alterum adhibita.'¹ But it is not in every case that fraud, machination, [242] or deceit entitles to restitution in sale. The principle already explained requires that the fraud shall have formed the inductive cause of that consent which is the essence of the contract. It must be a deceit practised by the buyer, so as essentially to alter, in the mind of the seller, his conception of the bargain into which he is entering, and to induce and give birth to a consent which would not otherwise have been given. Hence the distinction of fraud into that 'quod causam dedit contractui,' and that 'quod tantum in contractum incidit.' Fraud of the former kind annuls the contract; fraud of the latter species gives only an action for restitution or damages.²

¹ Dig. lib. 4, tit. 3, l. 1, sec. 2.

² These two species of fraud are thus distinguished by Voet: 'Causam dare contractui dicitur dolus, cum animum contrahendi non habens, ad contrahendum inducitur, nullatenus contracturus si dolus defuisset. Incidere vero in contractum tunc censetur, cum quis sponte quidem contrahit, sed in modo contrahendi, veluti in pretio aut aliter, decipitur.' Lib. 4, tit. 3, sec. 3.

[Fraud, even ubi dedit causam contractui, does not with us annul the contract; that is, the contract, though induced by fraud, is not ipso jure null and void, but only voidable ab initio at the instance of the injured party. (See Addie v Western Bank, 1867, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 145, and the authorities cited there in argument for the Bank; Kerr on Fraud, pp. 7, 8.) Nor is avoidance of the contract the only remedy competent in such a case. Fraud of this kind gives the defrauded party the option of avoiding the contract or bringing an action of damages. (Stair i. 9. 14.) The former remedy, however—avoidance ab initio—implies a restitutio in integrum, and is lost where that cannot take place (Addie's case, ut supra), and it may be barred otherwise; yet even though, from inability to give restitution, or other causes, the party may not be able to rescind the contract, it does not follow that the other remedy of damages is not still competent to him. (See Leake on Contracts, p. 195; Kerr on Fraud, p. 264; Sugden, Vendors and Purchasers, pp. 204 and 211.) The distinction taken by the author between Dolus dans causam contractui and dolus incidens is stated in precisely the same manner by Pothier, Oblig. No. 31; Duranton, vol. x. liv. 3, sec. 169; Toullier, Droit Civ. 3. 3. 2. 5, art. 90;

Fraud may consist either in misrepresentation or in concealment.

1. Fraud by misrepresentation is the more distinct and definite species, and generally the more capable of proof, whether it consists in express misstatement, or in that silent kind of misrepresentation which is accomplished by means of certain arrangements calculated to deceive.¹

2. Concealment of circumstances may often as strongly deceive a purchaser as the most express misrepresentation. But it is not every concealment which will taint a contract, and give a preference to the seller over the creditors of the purchaser. Where the circumstances left untold are such as the purchaser ought to know, or easily may become acquainted with, and for information regarding which he has no occasion to rely upon the other contracting party, concealment will not be held to injure the contract.² But wherever the circumstances are of a secret nature, or such as a purchaser does not usually or naturally think of inquiring into, or which he can learn only from the seller's information, the concealment is a fraud; and if that concealment have given birth to the contract, it will annul it.

In England, the question in all such cases seems to resolve into this, Whether the goods have been obtained on false pretences? The doctrine, taken in this way, circumscribes the cases in which restitution is to be given on account of fraud within narrow limits, but limits which, after all, are perhaps the most fit for a practical doctrine. It brings the question to a criterion on which a jury can fairly give their verdict, instead of leaving the matter [243] ambiguous and arbitrary.³

Bedarride sur Dol. p. 45. It is familiar to the civilians, but made with a view to other distinctions as to the remedies for fraud which have no place in our law. See Bankt. i. 10. 64-5; Heinecc. Pand. l. 4, t. 3, sec. 481; Brown, Sale, No. 582, and note. Dolus dans causam contractui is exactly what the English writers designate material fraud, and it is only material fraud that will found either damages at law or a suit for rescission in equity. (Leake, p. 189; Kerr, p. 31, and cases cited by both.) Lord Brougham, in Attwood v Small, 6 Cl. & Fin. 395, said: 'Dolus dans causam contractui is the language of the civil law, not dolus malus generally; not the mere fraudulent conduct of one party trying to overreach his adversary; not mere misconduct and falsehood throughout, unless dedit locum contractui. . . . The materiality as well as the falsehood or fraud, and the knowledge of the party in making any false statement that it was untrue, must concur in order to give relief in equity (by setting aside the contract), or to give an action of damages at law,—the two remedies being co-extensive, and acting in exactly the same circumstances. . . . The fraud must be that which dedit locum contractui. General fraudulent conduct signifies nothing, . . . unless this dishonesty of purpose, this fraud, this intention and design, can be connected with the particular transaction, and not only connected with the particular transaction, but must be made to be the very ground upon which this transaction took place, and must have given rise to the contract.' If material fraud—dolus dans causam contractui—be necessary alike to reduction or damages, then what the author says of incident fraud, fraud not inducing the contract, fraud not material, giving remedy by damages, though not by reduction, is without foundation. The distinction is not recognised either at law or in equity in England. (Story on Sale, sec. 163; Kerr, p. 31, note; Leake, p. 189.)]

¹ 1. Christie & Co. v Fairholmes, 1748, M. 4897. The seller of goods having required the security of a certain individual along with the purchaser, the purchaser sent him a bill signed by himself, and by another who bore the same name with the man whose security was required. The Court, in a question with the purchaser's creditors arresting the goods on ship-board, found the sellers entitled to restitution of the goods procured by this fraud. See below, Of the Effect of Fraud and Personal Exceptions.

2. Dunlop v Cruickshanks & Co., 1752, M. 4879. Forbes having, as partner in a joint concern with Cruickshanks, commissioned goods from Dunlop, had afterwards occasion for some for himself, and wrote in the plural number, as if still acting for the joint concern. By this device he deceived Dunlop into a belief that the purchase was made by the company; and having failed and absconded, the Court seemed to consider the sale as absolutely null, and preferred Dunlop to the creditors of Forbes arresting the price unpaid, finding 'that the property of the goods was not transferred from, but remained with, the said John Dunlop, and preferred him for the price of the said goods to all the arrestors,' etc.

3. Love v Kemp's Crs., 1786, M. 4948. Goods having been sold to Kemp upon the condition that his father, James Kemp, should become guarantee for the price, Kemp signed, without any authority from his father, a letter of guarantee, with the signature, 'James Kemp & Son, military agents, Leith.' The Court found this fraud sufficient to annul the sale in a question with Kemp's creditors, and ordered restitution to the seller.

² 'Neque enim id est celare quicquid reticeas; sed cum, quod tu scias, id ignorare, emolumenti tui causa, velis eos, quorum intersit id scire.' Cic. de Offic. lib. 3, c. 13.

Of this doctrine some good illustrations may be found in the decisions upon warrandice, representations, etc., in policies of insurance. [The analogy of the contract of insurance is deceptive as to the general question of concealment. See Kent, Comm. ii. 489, note.]

³ The two following cases will sufficiently illustrate the English doctrine:—

Gladstone v Hadwen, 1813, 1 Maule and Selw. 517. Sill

In distinguishing the cases of fraud which will entitle to restitution, and particularly looking to fraudulent concealment of insolvency, it, in the first place, is not necessary that a merchant who commissions goods should send a state of his affairs to the person with whom he proposes to deal. His proposal is to be accepted or rejected upon proper inquiries being made into his credit and circumstances, and character as a fair and honourable merchant. If it be accepted, the person who deals with him acts upon his own risk, in expectation of such a profit as may repay him for the interest of his stock, for his labour, and for the risk of the transaction. But if there be any particular circumstances in the situation of him who proposes the transaction, which make it impossible that he can answer for the price, or which plainly indicate a fraudulent design to get hold of the goods without [244] value, the contract will be voidable, and the property unavailable to the creditors, as obtained on fraudulent and false pretences.

There is some difficulty, however, in fixing what circumstances it is necessary for a person in such a situation to disclose.

At first, perhaps, it was natural to hold, that if a man were really insolvent, and especially if from his books it could be made to appear that he was so at the time of

& Watson on 25th November applied to Watson for £5000 in loan on ample security. The security was an order for 250 tierces of coffee (which, however, he had no right to pledge); on which Watson gave Sill bills of exchange for £1860, and a draft on his banker for £2139. Sill sent the bills to his partner to be applied to pay Richardson, Overard, & Co. certain bills due 27th November. On 26th Sill resolved to stop payment, and sent a messenger to prevent the paying away of Watson's bills. All were stopped except one bill for £49, which had been discounted, and from the proceeds of which he delivered back to Watson, along with the bills, two Bank of England notes for £5 each. This restitution was made after, and on the same day with, an act of bankruptcy and a commission being issued. The question in an action by the assignees was, Whether the property had not so passed, that to restore it was a fraudulent preference? and this, again, depended on the validity of the right of Sill & Watson, in the circumstances, to the bills delivered by Watson. Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said: 'The bills were obtained by the bankrupt Sill under a false pretence of giving the defendant Watson an ample security, by delegating to him a right to hold coffee; whereas the coffee, which was the security pretended to be given, was the property of another person over which Sill had no control or lien; or if he had, had already pledged it in favour of another creditor. The bills therefore appear to have been obtained by a criminal fraud. It has been argued, indeed, on behalf of the assignees, that the property vested in them under the commission; and in support of the argument, it is supposed that, by analogy to cases in the criminal law, the property may be considered as having passed from the defendant to Sill & Co.; but if it did, it was under such circumstances as a court of equity, on a bill filed, would have directed the property to be restored. If that be so, we think it would be useless for a court of law to permit that to be recovered which could not be retained one moment.' As to the bank-notes, he added: 'We think that as they were not mixed with the rest of the bankrupt's property, and are capable of being distinctly traced, they stand in the same position as the bills themselves, and cannot be recovered.'

Noble v Adams, 1816, 2 Marsh 336. In this case two points were raised, viz. stopping in transitu and restitution for fraud. Of the former I have already taken notice. The circumstances which led to the latter were, that Noble, dreading insolvency, went to Glasgow to purchase goods in order to enable him to go on and pay his creditors; that he previously wrote to Malcolm, one of his creditors, of his intention, and informed him of the insolvency of Outhwaite & Co., with whom he stood connected. At Glasgow he bought goods from Cross & Co., and paid for them by a bill of Outhwaite & Co., and another of Malcolm, which he presented to Malcolm to sign for his accommodation. The jury found the transaction fraudulent, undertaken knowingly and with intent to deceive Cross & Co. of the goods. The Court of Common Pleas granted a new trial, 'because, without defining exactly what may or may not amount to such a fraud as would render the sale in question absolutely void, we are of opinion that the evidence, as it stands, does not show any conduct on the part of Noble sufficient to convince us that the transaction was void. It was proved that he knew that Outhwaite's bill was worth nothing, and that he considered his own credit in England as nearly gone; that he went to Glasgow, intending to purchase goods there from persons unacquainted with his credit, or with the character of his bills. But by what means he prevailed on Cross & Co. to sell him the goods is not in proof; and unless his representations amounted to the offence of obtaining goods under false pretences, we cannot take upon ourselves to say that the contract was altogether void. Without, therefore, saying what proof the case may be capable of, seeing that there is strong presumption of fraud, we grant the new trial only on the ground that the proof as it stands is not sufficient to fix fraud to that extent on the plaintiff.'

[The criterion of fraud suggested in the text, with reference to claims of restitution after delivery, was approved by the Court in Morton & Co. v Abercromby, 1858, 20 D. 362, 369.

On the subject of fraud, both by misrepresentation and concealment, in contracts of sale, see Story on Sale, secs. 158-182; Story on Contracts, sec. 519 et seq.; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 313-377. With regard to the English and American law as to concealment by a purchaser of this state of his affairs—where there has been no active misrepresentation on the subject—see Story, Sale, sec. 176 and notes.]

entering into the contract, it was his bounden duty to disclose this circumstance; and that concealment of it amounted to fraud in the contract. Such, accordingly, was the opinion entertained by our judges in the end of the seventeenth century.¹ But this doctrine is inconsistent with an advanced state of commerce. The most flourishing and successful merchants are exposed to accidental losses, which may for a moment make them insolvent on the face of their books: but they still go on in full credit; and if no other misfortunes overtake them, proceed in the fair road to affluence. If a merchant, whatever might be his prospects or resources, were obliged, the instant that his ledger presented to him the view of insolvency, to relinquish his trade, and call his creditors together, the general trading interest would suffer; but most especially his individual creditors would feel the loss. A merchant's capital is in continual fluctuation; and an interruption to his trade, in consequence of every such threatened danger, would prove a death-blow to all the speculations in which he might have embarked his capital, and his funds would be recalled before the regular profits which were to redeem him from insolvency could return.

It is now settled, accordingly, that the mere appearance of insolvency from the books is not sufficient to infer fraud in the contract of sale;² nor is it enough that a purchaser is struggling even with impending bankruptcy, if there be room for the attempt to retrieve his affairs, and if he be persevering honestly in that attempt.³

¹ In the case of Prince and Pallet, they found a plea urged in support of the challenge—viz. that the purchaser was to be presumed insolvent within three months from his public bankruptcy—not relevant, ‘unless it were proven by his oath, or by his books, that his debts exceeded his estate the time he gave the order, which they found would have been relevant to annul the contract of vendition.’ 1680, M. 4932.

² This was fixed in the case of Cave's Creditors, where the Court rejected the doctrine assumed hypothetically in Prince and Pallet's case. Found it not relevant to reduce any bargain entered ‘into between Joseph Cave and Sir John Inglis, etc., for the purchase of barley in October 1734, that it appears by his books that at the time of the sale he was insolvent, since he continued his trade till the 21st January thereafter, and his bankruptcy was not discovered till that time.’ Sir John Inglis v The Royal Bank, 1736, Elchies, Bankrupt, No. 9.

Lord Bankton and Mr. Erskine do not seem sufficiently to have respected this decision; for they both lay it down, that a person purchasing ‘where he knows himself to be insolvent,’ does not acquire the property. And although this be not a doctrine directly in the face of the above decision, it is too loosely expressed after such a decision had been pronounced.

³ The case of Allan & Stewart v Stein, 1778, M. 4949, 14218, is very instructive upon this point. In October 1787, Mr. Stein, by whose singular skill, industry, and spirit the Scottish distilleries were pushed to an amazing extent, entered into an agreement with Allan & Stewart, by which, 1. All his grain was to be purchased through the medium of Allan & Stewart; 2. They were to receive a commission of two and a half per cent.; and, 3. Stein was to give bills at seven months. Allan & Stewart under this agreement purchased grain in their own name, taking the bills of lading deliverable ‘to them or their order,’ and these they endorsed to Stein. His bankruptcy took place while several of the cargoes were in the course of delivery, and Allan & Stewart entered into a competition with his creditors for all the grain that was extant. Of the undelivered part they stopped delivery; and of that part which had been delivered on the eve of bankruptcy, they claimed restitution on the ground of fraud. A condescendence or specification of the circumstances of the alleged fraud was required. But Allan & Stewart failed in their endeavour to distinguish their own case from that of the other creditors. They showed, indeed, that in October 1787, when their contract was entered into, Stein was struggling with bankruptcy; they exposed many of the schemes by which he contrived to support the extensive range of circulation which alone prolonged his existence as a trader; they showed the history of the four months preceding his bankruptcy to have been a series of plans for shunning a bankruptcy, which seemed almost unavoidable. But the creditors at large explained satisfactorily all that at first seemed reprehensible in Mr. Stein's conduct. They showed that, after a most unlooked-for refusal of permits, by which a very large stock of spirits was lost to Mr. Stein, the Scottish distillers met with a formidable opposition from those of London, who, trembling for the consequences of what the Scottish distillers were able to accomplish, at last, as the sole hope of their rivalry, applied to Government for an alteration of the duties on importation. It was during this struggle, on which depended the ruin either of the English or of the Scottish distillers, that Mr. Stein resorted to the resources for supporting his credit so much found fault with; and it was the passing of the law on the 18th February 1788, which involved the ruin of the Scottish distillers, that forced Mr. Stein to stop payment on the 22d. The Court found the facts ‘and allegations stated in the condescendence not relevant to infer fraud, so as to entitle Messrs. Allan & Stewart to restitution of the grain delivered by them more than three days prior to the bankruptcy of James Stein.’

In deciding the case, the judges proceeded on the following grounds:—That in a case of this kind, where all are sufferers, and by the same means, something very precise must be made out to distinguish any particular creditor from another, and to entitle him to plead for a preference: that if distinct proof of fraud should be shown applicable to a particular bargain, it will annul it, and entitle the seller to restitution; but that in this case there was no such thing: that in October, when this contract began, though Stein's affairs were in disorder, [245] But from the moment the final resolution is taken to abandon everything, cedere foro, the bankrupt acts fraudulently in entering into contracts. It is very difficult, however, to select circumstances which may be sufficient to establish this resolution.

1. The most obvious is, Contiguity in time to the public bankruptcy; and it is with regard to this point chiefly that the peculiarity of the civil and continental laws, already hinted at, had influence.

It was established in the continental jurisprudence as a legal presumption of fraudulent concealment of bankruptcy, that the buyer had failed within a few days after receiving the goods.¹

It does not appear that this rule was ever admitted without qualification into the law of Scotland; but when first pleaded in this country, the Court of Session so far gave their sanction to the doctrine, as to hold contiguity of public bankruptcy a circumstance of very powerful effect, taken in conjunction with insolvency and other indications, to establish a case of fraud. When the question first occurred, the Court ordered restitution of all grain delivered within three days of the public bankruptcy.² The cessio fori within three days was [246] not, however, taken as irrefragable evidence of fraud. The true spirit of the decision seems rather to be, that, conjoined with prior insolvency, this was to be considered as a circumstance almost decisive of a fraudulent purpose. Neither was the above presumption admitted, as of itself sufficient, in the next case that occurred; for there the contiguity of the bankruptcy was combined with several strong indications of fraud.³ The question did they were not desperate; he had not at that time any intention of stopping payment; he tried, indeed, every possible resource which an active and enterprising mind could suggest for avoiding bankruptcy; but he flattered himself with hopes of success, not altogether without reason, since amidst all his difficulties he still went on till the 23d of February, when the passing of the Act for an additional duty on Scottish spirits gave him the coup de grâce, as he himself called it: that it were of the worst consequence in a commercial country, if all a man's acts were to be annulled from the moment of his insolvency;—he may struggle long, he may retrieve his affairs, or he may fail at last; but to annul all bargains which, from an investigation of books, etc., shall be found to have been made after what may appear even irretrievable insolvency, would put an end to commerce, and is a rule quite unfit for a trading nation.

When the cause came to the House of Lords, the judgment of the Court of Session, finding Allan & Stewart not entitled to restitution on the footing of Stein's having obtained the grain from them by fraud, was fully approved of. Lord Thurlow declared 'that there were no circumstances condescended on which inferred fraud; on the contrary, it seemed to be made out that Stein had no intention of stopping, or giving up his trade, till 23d February 1788; and consequently till then he had a right to make contracts, or to receive goods delivered in performance of contracts previously made, just as any merchant or dealer would do in the usual course of trade.' The interlocutor of the Court of Session on this point was therefore affirmed.

¹ Straccha, Tract. de Decoctoribus, p. 3, n. 31; Carpovius, Jurisprud. foren. Rom. Saxon. p. 257, Dec. 18; Van Leewin, Censura Forens. lib. 4, c. 19, n. 20; Rodriguez, De Privileg. Cred. art. 7, No. 67, 76; Voet, lib. 6, tit. 1, sec. 14.

² Inglis v The Royal Bank, 1736, M. 4936. In October 1734, Joseph Cave agreed with Sir John Inglis and others to purchase barley, which was accordingly delivered to him by parcels in November, December, and the beginning of January. Cave became bankrupt, and conveyed his effects to trustees for his creditors, 21st January 1735, and a claim was made by the sellers for restitution. Their plea was at first rested upon the insolvency of Cave; but this (see above, p. 265, note 2) was rejected by the Court. Then they pleaded a presumptive fraud, and argued, 1. That the date of delivery was alone to be considered in judging whether the transference to Cave was attained by fraud; and, 2. That upon the analogy of the Act 1696, c. 5, the debtor must be presumed to have determined on bankruptcy sixty days before it was declared. These pleas were opposed by the creditors, who, with regard to the presumptive fraud, seem to have been anxious only to prevent so long a period as sixty days from being taken as the presumptive term; and they founded on Van Leewin's authority, contending that the presumption could be carried no further back than three days. The Court admitted the presumptive term of three days, and ordered restitution of whatever grain was delivered within that time.

³ Crawford Newall v Mitchell, 1765, M. 4944. In that case, Mitchell having on the 17th May bought some cattle and given his bill for the price, was on the 18th proceeding with them towards England, when he was overtaken by two of his creditors, who pointed the cattle; and a question arose between them and Crawford Newall the seller, who alleged fraud in the purchase. The case is contained in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, who found, 'that as Mitchell was not denied to have been insolvent at the date of the sale, and that he fled the country the day after the purchase of the cattle, and that it appeared from a letter dated 19th May (the second day after the purchase) that he had intimated a meeting of his creditors and acknowledged his bankruptcy, the bargain was to be held fraudulent, and the property of the cattle untransferred to Mitchell, so as to be attached by his creditors in prejudice of the seller.' To this judgment the Court adhered.

not again occur till 1788, when it formed a point in the case of Allan & Stewart against the Creditors of Stein;¹ and in the course of deciding that case, the whole doctrine of presumptive fraud intra triduum was overturned, as already explained in treating of the doctrine of stopping in transitu.

2. Although the declaration of bankruptcy within three days be thus rejected as grounding a presumptio juris et de jure of fraud, yet if any particular dealing shall be immediately followed by bankruptcy, it is a circumstance which, taken with others, will have considerable weight. Wherever the dealings of the bankrupt appear to have for their object, not his fair restoration to solvency, but the preference of some favourite creditors at the expense of a stranger; or the bankrupt's own emolument; or the advancement of some secret and selfish scheme which is not for the general behoof; these circumstances, [247] joined with insolvency, and quickly followed by bankruptcy, have been held to indicate fraud sufficient to annul the bargain.²

3. If, instead of being merely insolvent, and still finding it possible, with fair hopes of success, to continue the struggle, the buyer, when actually bankrupt, shall, without disclosing his condition, enter into a bargain, he is guilty of a fraud which will entitle the seller to restitution.³

¹ Allan & Stewart v Stein's Crs., 1788, M. 4949, 14218. See above, p. 265, note 3. As to the grain delivered within three days of Stein's bankruptcy, the sellers contended that they were entitled to restitution, because by the law of Scotland the supervening bankruptcy inferred fraud in all dealings within three days prior to the actual declaration of bankruptcy, and because this was a presumptio juris et de jure which could not be repelled by contrary evidence. To this argument the Court of Session gave their sanction, conceiving themselves to be bound by former decisions. The judgment in the case of Cave's creditors was chiefly relied on by the judges, and that of Crawford Newall as a strong confirmation of it. It was held that, by the former of the cases above taken notice of, a rule was laid down absolutely, which had for half a century been considered as inviolable, and which it would be extremely dangerous again to throw loose. The Court therefore ordered restitution of the grain delivered within three days from the 23d February 1788, when Stein stopped payment.

When the cause came into the House of Lords a very different view was taken. Lord Chancellor Thurlow declared that, after attentively examining the adjudged cases relied on in support of the judgment of the Court of Session, he could not perceive that the Court had ever proceeded on that positive rule which the sellers had contended to be now fixed law. It rather was his opinion, from the examination of those cases, that the Court had considered the failure within three days as one circumstance only from which fraud might be presumed, but not as that from which singly fraud was to be absolutely inferred, though other circumstances might show there was none. In the present case, his Lordship observed, there was not a single circumstance condescended upon which applied more to the three days immediately preceding the bankruptcy than to an earlier period; and he concluded upon this point with declaring, that the buyer's failing within the three days after the transaction, or after the receipt of the goods, was not per se sufficient to void the contract, and that such a rule would be inexpedient and unjust. The judgment of the Court of Session on this point was therefore reversed. Jeffrey v Allan, Stewart, & Co., 23 Dec. 1790, 3 Pat. 191.

² Thus, in the case of Sandeman & Co. v Kemp's Crs., 1786, M. 4947, there can be no doubt of the intention to defraud, and yet there was no bankruptcy for forty-nine days after the sale. His insolvency was beyond hope in September 1785, and in this situation Kemp entered secretly into partnership with two notorious insolvents. He then from every quarter commissioned goods fit for a foreign market, and in particular a quantity of linens from Sandeman & Co., for which he said he would pay on delivery. To prevent an attachment of those goods, he executed a mock sale upon their arrival to his own clerk, who granted bills for the value. After this he conveyed the goods secretly to different towns on the Frith of Forth, and had a ship prepared to convey them abroad. No trace of all this appeared in his books. A sequestration was applied for, and the goods recovered by the factor under the sequestration. Sandeman & Co. petitioned the Court for restitution of their goods; and the Lords unanimously found 'that the sale of the goods in question, by the petitioners to Gavin Kemp, was brought about by fraud on the part of Gavin Kemp,' and found the same therefore void and null, and that the petitioners were entitled to restitution of their goods.

³ Thus, in the case of Forbes v Main & Co., 1752, M. 4938, it was found that a person who had obtained a cessio bonorum, concealing that circumstance, and commissioning goods from a foreign merchant with all the confidence of a dealer of credit, was guilty of a fraudulent concealment sufficient to annul the bargain, or at least to give the foreign merchant a preference for the price.

This was a very strong case; for, 1. The cessio bonorum had been obtained no less than two years before the goods were commissioned; and, 2. The bankrupt had twice during this interval commissioned wines, which had faithfully been paid for. The grounds upon which the Court proceeded are reported by Lord Kilkerran: 'They considered the bankrupt's concealing his circumstances,' says his Lordship, 'to be fraud, especially when dealing with a merchant in a distant country; and it was further said not to be a clear point, that even a dealer in this country at a distance would be presumed to know that the person with whom he contracted had obtained

4. If, in addition to insolvency, the buyer shall have been imprisoned and bankrupt, according to the definition of the Act 1696, c. 5, he is guilty of fraud if he enter into a contract without disclosing his situation.¹ But bankruptcy in this sense is frequently considered only as insolvency, which does not close a trader's dealings; and although, correctly speaking, the effect of the bankruptcy cannot be extinguished otherwise than by restoration to solvency, or by a discharge from his creditors, either voluntary or under the sequestration statutes, enabling him to commence a new course of trade and raise a new credit, yet the Court has sustained a sale, though there was no such restoration from a state of insolvency.²

[248] 5. If the contract have been fairly entered into, the buyer being then in full credit and solvency, and bankruptcy or insolvency have taken place only before delivery, it does not appear that by the law of Scotland the delivery is ineffectual, or the transference voidable. Yet Lord President Blair took occasion in one case³ to say, that if a bankrupt were to take delivery of goods which he had bought as a solvent man, this would be a fraud which would entitle the seller to redress; and that although the doctrine of presumptive fraud intra triduum is now abandoned, the law remains unaltered in the case of actual fraud. In this question, the distinction formerly hinted at ought not to be lost sight of, wherever an attempt is made to argue from the authority of civilians or foreign writers. The attention of foreign lawyers is confined to the question of credit; and every circumstance which can influence the credit, as at the moment of delivery, is essential, and every concealment or fraud which touches it a ground of restitution. But with us the consent on which the efficacy of the contract rests is already passed, and the tradition is referred to that preceding consent, uninfluenced by intermediate circumstances. If, in the language of the English law, the goods have not been obtained on false pretences; and if, in the language more familiar to us, there is no dolus dans causam contractui, the contract will stand, and the property be transferred by it. The intermediate circumstances are in the nature of misfortunes, which equally attach to all the creditors; and the seller of goods, whose contract is completed, though the transference is not perfect, is a creditor entitled no doubt to stop in transitu, but not to restitution.⁴

a cessio; for that no man alive, in the knowledge that a person had got a cessio bonorum, would deal with him without taking care to be paid upon delivery.'

¹ In the case of Robertson's Crs. v Udnies & Patullo, 1757, M. 4941, the buyer was bankrupt by insolvency, diligence, and absconding, and there were, besides, other circumstances grossly fraudulent. Thus, at the time the commission was given, Robertson was at Hull—he dated his letters falsely at London; he went to London to accept the bills, and having got the goods into his hands, sent them off for Scotland to his son-in-law, in whose hands diligence was used. The Court preferred the seller to the buyer's creditors doing diligence in the hands of the son-in-law.

² Gordon v Gardner, 1784, M. 4946. Dalzel, who had been under ultimate diligence, and was forced to retire to the sanctuary of Holyrood House, bought about a year afterwards two copper stills of considerable value from Gordon, and in three months after he was imprisoned on the old diligence, and was unable to pay the price. Gordon sought to annul the transaction on the ground of fraud, and was opposed by Dalzel's creditors. The Court found, 'that the circumstances of the case did not establish a deception or a fraud sufficient to set aside the sale.' But it will be observed that in this case the parties appear to have lived in the same place, so that the case might be supposed to come under the exception indicated in the case of Main & Co. above, p. 267, note 3.

³ Steins v Hutchison, 16 Nov. 1810, F. C.

⁴ In the case of Cave's Crs., it was questioned (upon the assumption that concealment of impending bankruptcy amounted to fraud sufficient to annul a sale) whether it was necessary that the fraudulent concealment should have taken place at the date of the contract, or whether it was not enough that it occurred at the time of delivery. The Court found it sufficient, though it attached merely to the delivery. Sir John Inglis v Royal Bank, 1736, M. 4937.

In the subsequent case of Allan & Stewart v the Crs. of Stein, this doctrine was questioned both at the bar and on the bench, and an opinion delivered by some of the judges that both the taking of delivery and the contract itself must be chargeable with fraud. There was no occasion, however, to decide the point either here or in the House of Lords. [See 3 Pat. 191. See also Lord Mackenzie's opinion in Watt v Findlay, 1846, 8 D. 532.]

SECTION IV.

OF REPUTED OWNERSHIP OF MOVEABLES, AS RAISING A RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DEBTS OF THE POSSESSOR.

We have been employed in the preceding sections in discussing the various questions which may arise relative to the completion of the transference of moveables, and are now to consider a subject of some importance, where, in consequence of such possession as may raise the credit of ownership, goods and effects are held responsible for the debts of those in whose hands they are found. The numerous class of questions of great nicety which fall under this branch of inquiry will at once be suggested to any one who considers, on the one hand, that possession is the badge of property in moveables; and, on the other, the many occasions on which the necessities of human affairs require that the fact of possession shall be separated from the right of property.

I propose, first, to consider the cases of collusive possession and reputed ownership which, raising a credit to the possessor, entitle his creditors to attach the goods in their debtor's hands, as if they were his own; and secondly, to point out the cases in which, [249] for lawful purposes, the possession and the right being necessarily separated, no such effect is produced.

ARTICLE I.—OF REPUTED OWNERSHIP.

While it is often necessary that the possession of moveables should be held by persons who have not the property, personal credit must in a great degree depend on the appearance of wealth which a trader is thus enabled to assume. And as, in general, possession of moveables presumes property, and the true owner ought to be aware that while the power of disposing of his goods remains uncontrolled, or ostensibly so, in another, it may raise a false credit to that other, as if he were proprietor of the effects; so every apparent ownership of moveables, which is either fraudulent, or at least careless or collusive, as not being necessary in the course of honest contracts, should entitle the creditors of the holder to take the subject, as if it actually were his property.¹ This rule is admitted both in England and in Scotland, but upon different footings and to a different extent. In England it is the mere creature of statute; in Scotland it is a rule of the common law grounded on the principles of equity.

In England the rule of the common law is, that the proprietor may, wherever he can find his property, recover it. This formerly was accomplished by the action of Detinue, now by the action of Trover and Conversion, which has succeeded in its place;² but a statute was made with a view to bankruptcy, for subjecting to the creditors, as a fund of payment, all goods and chattels which, by consent of the true owners, a bankrupt is allowed

¹ [The operation of this principle, however, is somewhat modified by the 1st section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 60.]

² Detinue was an action for the specific recovery of goods and chattels, or damages for the detainer; but as it was an action competent against bailees, borrowers, etc., it was in the old law thought not unfit that the plaintiff, who had at first trusted to the good faith of the defendant for the restoring of his property, should in the action be held to trust to his oath, and therefore the defendant was allowed the privilege of waging his law, or swearing with compurgators in his own favour.

The inconvenience and injustice of this could not fail, with the increase of commerce, to be felt; and therefore a remedy of the nature of an action on the case, called an action of Trover and Conversion, was introduced, proceeding on the ground of the defendant having, by finding, etc., come into possession of the plaintiff's goods and converted them to his own use, and demanding specific delivery or damages. In this action the defendant has no privilege of waging his law.

so to possess as to appear owner of them.¹ This law has been held in the courts of England to be 'a wise regulation, passed at a time when the commercial interests of the country were extremely well understood, and in a reign where as many wise provisions were made for regulating both the external and internal trade of the country, as 'were ever made in [250] any equal number of years.'² But for more than a century after it passed, this statute does not appear to have been in observance. And since it has been revived in English practice, the terms of it were held dark and ambiguous, from the section which was meant as mere recital (but which by misprint was made a separate section) being more narrow than the enacting part; so that for a long time it was supposed that the Act applied only to property which had once been in the bankrupt, and was left in his order and disposition. In the course of a very long train of decisions, the system of its policy as applicable to trade was evolved, and settled to be, that while the bankrupt statutes are intended to place all those creditors who have equally trusted to the personal credit of the bankrupt on the same footing, this statute regards collusive possession held by a bankrupt without necessity to be equivalent to a consent on the part of the real proprietor to be considered as a mere personal creditor on account of that property which, according to the ordinary disposition of the law, he should on any other footing have had in his own possession as proprietor; and this construction has proceeded partly as a penalty on the owner of the property, and partly as construing his conduct to be a declaration of his personal trust in the bankrupt.³ This statute has been re-enacted in the words of the 11th section (but without the words of recital in the 11th), as the 72d section of the new Bankrupt Act of England.⁴

The effect produced in England by the statute of James I. is in Scotland accomplished by the operation of the common law; and the rule may be stated in this proposition, That where one is unnecessarily, or by the collusion or gross negligence of the true owner, permitted to give himself an appearance to the world, as if he were proprietor of goods and wares not belonging to himself, and this by exercising acts of ownership, and by holding a possession seemingly uncontrolled, his creditors will be entitled to proceed against the goods as if they really belonged to him.⁵

1. In order to make property liable for the debts of the possessor, not being the true proprietor, the possession should be accompanied by that uncontrolled power and disposal of it which belongs to an owner. In England it has this effect by the statute; in Scotland, such possession will have the same effect, independently of the aid of statute on the one

¹ This is the statute 21 James I. c. 19. After a preamble, sec. 10, 'That it often falls out that many persons, before they become bankrupts, do convey their goods to other men upon good consideration, yet still do keep the same and are reputed the owners thereof, and dispose the same as their own;' the statute proceeds in the 11th section to provide, that 'if any person shall become bankrupt, and at such time as they shall so become bankrupt shall by the consent and permission of the true owner and proprietor have in their possession, order, and disposition, any goods or chattels whereof they shall be reputed owners, and take upon them the sale, alteration, or disposition as owners, that in every such case the said commissioners, or the greater part of them, shall have power to sell and dispose of the same to and for the benefit of the creditors which shall seek relief by the said commission, as fully as any other part of the estate of the bankrupt.'

This last section now is re-enacted in the late consolidating Act of Bankruptcy in England.

[See the corresponding provisions of the more recent statute, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, sec. 125. Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 696 et seq.; Addison on Torts, 335-347, 3d ed.]

² Lord Kenyon in Gordon v The East India Company, 7 Term. Rep. 234.

³ This law is largely discussed and laid down by Lord Hardwicke, Lord Chief Baron Parker, and Mr. Justice Burnet, in Ryal v Rolfe, 1 Atk. 165, 185. See Cullen's Principles of the Bankrupt Law, where the general view of the statute is very concisely given, p. 286 et seq.; Holt's Nisi Prius Cases 559, note.

⁴ 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, sec. 72; Eden on the Bankrupt Law, 256.

⁵ [The above definition was adopted in Anderson v Buchanan, 1848, 11 D. 281-3, by Lord Moncreiff, whose observations deserve to be carefully noted, as insisting strongly on the elements of fraud and collusion as essential to reputed ownership,—a point which, though clearly enough stated by Mr. Bell in this passage, he seems to have rather overlooked elsewhere. See post, p. 485. The first section of the Mercantile Law Act has been thought to interfere with the doctrine; but having regard to the distinction taken in Sim v Grant between simple custody and possession with the power of using the goods, Lord Moncreiff's definition still holds good. See the case, 1862, 24 D. 1033; also Edmond v Mowat, 1868, 7 Macph. 59.]

hand, or of any supposed vestige of property (as in cases of sale retenta possessione) on the other.¹

2. But while the law protects creditors from being deceived by such false grounds of credit as may be produced by collusive arrangements, they must so far protect themselves as to avoid giving credit too easily. They must be aware of the many honest occasions of possession independently of property which the varied business and connections of life require, and must distinguish such temporary possession as may arise in the fair course of a legal contract, from that which naturally indicates property: they must take care also to make allowance for the possibility of the true proprietor being abused and defrauded in the use to which his property is applied: and they must satisfy themselves that the circumstances are such as to entitle them to charge him with blameable carelessness or collusion, or simulation in the bankrupt's unfair attempt; or to regard him as holding himself out as a personal creditor, and abandoning his right as proprietor.

Thus the possession must be unequivocal to justify credit; it must imply a full [251] power of disposal; and it must be such as actually to raise a reputation of ownership. If, therefore, in point of fact, the goods are notoriously not the property of the possessor, the rule of reputed ownership derived from possession will not make them available to creditors. The presumption is in such case refuted by the fact.² In cases, for example, where a public sale by auction has taken place under a landlord's sequestration, and the price has been paid or secured by bills of the purchasers with cautioners, the possession being still with the tenant, from the difficulty of removal, as growing crop, etc., will not give to creditors the privilege of attaching the property as their debtor's.

1. The doctrine of reputed ownership from possession properly applies to moveables only, not to land or other heritable estate.³ So far as here discussed, it rests on the presumption of property in moveables arising from possession, and continued or conferred without due regard to the right of creditors. In England it is by the statute limited to 'goods and chattels;' but this, though not extending to any interest in lands or houses, includes more than moveables: it comprehends stock, bills of exchange, choses in action, policies of insurance, and similar rights.⁴

2. By the law of England, if the possession be left with the vendor, it does not prevent the property from passing at law by the mere contract; but it is sufficient under the statute to raise a reputed ownership, of which the vendor's creditors may avail themselves. And the only exception admitted to this, is in the case where, by express agreement, the possession is to continue with the vendor, in circumstances which by usage gives implied notice to persons dealing with the vendor, of the possibility of the goods being the property of another.⁵ In Scotland, the law is so far different, that no circumstances appear to be sufficient to pass the property at law, while the possession continues

¹ See below.

² Gurr v Rutton, Holt's Nisi Prius Cases 327. Gibbs, C. J., permitted evidence of contrary reputation. He said: 'Reputation of ownership is made up of the opinions of a man's neighbours; it is a number of voices concurring upon one or two facts. Are we to count the voices on one side and not on the other?'

Muller v Moss, 1813, 1 Maule and Selw. 335. See below, p. 274, note. [So possession of furniture by a liferenter is not relevant to infer reputed ownership. Scott v Price, 1837, 15 S. 916. But where a widow had right to furniture under a bequest by her husband, it was held liable to be attached for the debt of a second husband, although by a post-nuptial contract he had renounced his jus mariti. Shearer v Christie, 1842, 5 D. 132. See Campbell v Stewart, 1848, 10 D. 1280; Ross v Fleming, 1850, 13 D. 373. See contra in England,

Simmons v Edwards, 16 M. and W. 838; Jarman v Woolton, 3 T. R. 618; Martin ex parte, 19 Vesey 493.]

³ A very important class of cases will be discussed hereafter, where a similar principle applied to heritable rights and rights incorporeal has sometimes raised questions of great interest to creditors and purchasers. See below, Of the Effect of Fraud and Personal Exceptions, Book ii., concl. [As to the case of a latent assignation of a lease, with machinery, etc., see Benton v Craig, 1864, 2 Macph. 1365; Union Bank v Mackenzie, 1865, 3 Macph. 765. The First Division of the Court of Session appear to have thought it could apply to heritable estate in Abbott v Mitchell, May 1870.]

⁴ See Eden on Bankrupt Law, p. 258.

⁵ See above, p. 190. See below, p. 273, Horn v Baker, note, id. pag.

In Thackthwaite v Cook, 1811, supra, p. 190, note 3, unaltered with the vendor; and in this, the law of sale and the rule of reputed ownership concur.

3. In what is delivered of this doctrine by our institutional writers, they seem to place the doctrine entirely upon fraud and collusion on the part of the true owner;¹ and there [252] does not appear to be any ground for questioning that in proper cases, under the doctrine of reputed ownership, this is the true principle, though it may concur, as already observed, with the imperfect right of the vendee where delivery has not taken place.

4. There are two classes of cases in which this question may be raised: one, where property belonging to the debtor has been sold by him, and either not delivered at all, or redelivered to the vendor so as to appear in his possession and disposal; another, where the debtor has moveables placed in his hands which did not previously belong to him. In the former of these classes, the rule of property, as already said, may concur with that of reputed ownership; or if the property has passed by delivery, and has again found its way into the debtor's hands, the doctrine of reputed ownership alone must be relied on. The other class of cases is strictly under the rule of reputed ownership.

There is a considerable difference in the strength of the presumption for collusion, between the case of a bankrupt being left in possession of goods originally belonging to him, and acquiring the possession of goods with which he had formerly no connection. In the former case, all the presumptions on which the doctrine now under consideration rests, are much stronger; the aptness towards the belief of the bankrupt's right greater, the honesty of his possession less probable, than in the latter case, where a man comes newly into possession of goods or property. For many occasions of such possession arise in the course of affairs, independent altogether of any title whereon credit can fairly rest.² In the latter case, the justification of the possession rests upon the proof of an honest occasion, requiring temporary custody. In the former, the justification is often more difficult, and requires a greater detail. And where no such justification can be made out, the new acquirer may not only be held to have no effectual right, but be subjected in damages for any opposition he shall give to the diligence of creditors.³

5. It is not a sufficient justification of a continuance in the possession of moveables, Mansfield, C. J., delivered the opinion of the Court: 'It seems to the Court, and the more I consider it the more I am strengthened in that opinion, that though the custom of a trade may have the effect referred to in Horn v Baker, it must be a custom much more clearly proved than this is, and such that persons dealing with the traders may see and know that the goods may possibly not be the property of the possessor. Here is a custom to put no mark on the hops, so that no person may perceive or know that they are not the property of the seller. The reason is, that after hops have lain a year they deteriorate; and therefore if A B or any other ear-mark were visible, it would hurt the sale when that mark got old and known; and therefore they are not to be distinguished from the common stock of the seller. There is not, therefore, such a clear, distinct, and precise custom proved as would enable others to see that these may not be the hops of the possessor. The custom is to let hops which are sold remain in such a manner that it may not be known there has been a sale. The objection against disclosing the real owner would be easily obviated by having a separate warehouse for hops held there for the benefit of the persons who had bought them.' 3 Taunt. 487.

¹ Lord Stair lays down the doctrine: 'Fraud gives remedy by reparation to all that are damnified thereby against the actor of the fraud, either by annulling of the contract, etc., or by making up the damages sustained by the fraud.' And he proceeds to say, that under fraud are comprehended collusion and simulation, of which he gives conveyances retenta possessione as an example: 'For although the disposition be delivered, and that there be instruments of delivery of the goods disposed, yet if the natural possession be retained, the disposition is presumed simulate, and others affecting the things by legal diligence or by natural possession are preferred.' B. 1, tit. 9, secs. 12 and 14. See also b. 2, tit. 3, sec. 27, and b. 3, tit. 3, sec. 21.

² Where a debtor's furniture, under an execution by a creditor, was purchased by the wife from her separate estate, and the husband still continued in possession, Lord Kenyon, at Nisi Prius, said: 'Undoubtedly the plaintiff (the wife's trustee) must be held to great strictness of proof, as the possession continued as before the goods were sold; but where such change of property is made out, the mere possession is not sufficient to warrant us in saying the goods shall be deemed the property of the husband.' Cross v Glode, 1798, 2 Espi. 574, 575; Carse v Halyburton, 1714, M. 13970. [McDougall v Whitelaw, 1840, 2 D. 500; Fyfe v Woodman, 1841, 4 D. 255; Anderson v Buchanan, 1848, 11 D. 270; Brown v Fleming, 1850, 13 D. 373.]

³ See this distinction strongly stated by Mr. Justice Bayley in Lingard v Messiter, 1 Barn. and Cress. 312. See below, p. 274.

that the conveyance was only in security; for, by the law of Scotland, there is no effectual conveyance of moveables in security without possession. Delivery must take place fairly in such a conveyance, as well as in an absolute sale; and therefore the Court preferred a creditor doing diligence against shop goods and furniture, to a creditor who had received a disposition omnium bonorum in security.¹

The same doctrine prevails in England. 'The law,' said Lord Mansfield, 'has declared that a trader cannot mortgage his effects, and at the same time keep possession.'² And it is no answer, that as, where property is let on hire, the possessor and property are [253] justifiably separate, so the possession may be continued to the debtor on the footing of location.³

6. In England, it seems to be a sufficient justification of possession, that the conveyance is 'conditional only, to take effect on the performance of a condition at some future time.'⁴ In Scotland, in the case of a conveyance in relief to a cautioner, although a doctrine similar to that of the English law seems to have been started, and listened to at first, the Court finally decided that a conveyance of a flock of sheep, in relief of a cautionary obligation, being followed only by symbolical delivery, was not effectual against a person purchasing the sheep from the debtor, in whose possession they were allowed to remain.⁵

7. Here, in reverting to a question formerly discussed, it naturally occurs to be determined what effect the principles of the doctrine now under review should have on a suspending condition in a sale.⁶ And although it appeared to be the result of the cases above stated, that creditors must henceforth lay their account with such a condition in giving credit, and not conceive themselves entitled absolutely to rely on the property as irrevocably vested in their debtor; this must always be understood under the qualification that there is perfect honesty in the arrangement, and no design on the part of the seller to aid the buyer's credit, without risk to himself.

8. In all cases of possession on temporary contracts, it is important to observe whether the thing in the bankrupt's possession is of a kind that is usually let out and held separately from the ownership, or whether there be any other circumstance to counteract the reputed ownership. If there be not, as the possession tends to raise credit to the possessor, the parties ought to avoid such ambiguous dealing. On this principle, it is difficult to admit a justification of the retained possession of furniture, or stock, or implements of trade; as such possession very strongly implies a continued ownership, and the mere fact of possession a power of disposal and of property.⁷ In England, a known usage to rent such implements, or a public sale giving notice of the change of ownership, or acknowledged notoriety of the change, have been admitted to counteract the reputed ownership.⁸ This doctrine was laid down by Lord Ellenborough and Mr. Justice Lawrence,⁹ and was afterwards followed [254]

¹ Boys v Watson, 27 July 1708. See also Carse's case above, and 1 Dict. 156.

² Lord Mansfield in Bryson v Wylie, 1784, 1 Bos. and Pul. 83, note.

³ In the case of Bryson v Wylie such an arrangement was disregarded. See also Lingham v Biggs, 1 Bos. and Pul. 82, below, note 7.

⁴ Cullen's Principles of the Bankrupt Law, 300.

⁵ Sir William Ker v Elliot, 1695, 1696, M. 9122. It should be observed, that in this case the question arose with a purchaser of the sheep, not with the general creditors of the owner.

⁶ See p. 258.

⁷ In the case already cited of Carse v Sir J. Halyburton, M. 13970, the circumstances were indeed very strong to confirm the inference of ownership; but in a later case, a debtor having conveyed the furniture of his house to his creditor on the 16th of May, and having afterwards continued in possession of it only till the 8th of August, when, another creditor proceeding to do diligence, the first creditor as purchaser received actual possession, the Court found the possession of the debtor collusive, and annulled the conveyance. Chalmers v M'Auley, 1739, M. 11590. In England the same rule has been followed.

So in Lingham v Biggs, 1797. Here the furniture of a coffeehouse was taken in execution, and without being removed hired to the debtor after the execution of a bill of sale, for the value found by the Sheriff. It was held a case of reputed ownership. 1 Bos. and Pul. 82.

⁸ [Storer v Hunter, 3 B. and C. 368; Watson v Peache, 1 Sc. 149; Hornsby v Miller, 28 L. J. Q. B. 99; Burton v Hughes, 9 Moore 334.]

⁹ Horn v Baker, 1808, 9 East 215. This was a case of machinery and utensils at one time used by a company, and belonging to one of the partners; but this partner having out in several cases.¹ But the fact of taking in execution is not evidence of any transference to the creditor, but only of the execution.² The same principles would be admitted in Scotland.

9. It is a strong point in the seller's justification, in all cases of possession allowed to be retained for a fair purpose, that the seller has taken the best means he could to inform the public of the circumstances, as by public advertisement.³

10. But although the creditors of the reputed owner get the benefit of the goods thus in his possession, these goods cannot be held as forfeited. The owner must still be entitled to claim as a creditor for the value.

ARTICLE II.—OF POSSESSION LEGITIMATELY SEPARATED FROM THE OWNERSHIP.

Although possession be the usual badge of property in moveables, and, when collusive, has the effect of raising a liability for the debts of the possessor, there are situations in which it is necessary that the possession and the property should be separated; and contracts, on which the existence of commerce depends, often require a temporary possession in those who have no real right as proprietors. These legitimate occasions for a possession separate from the property, are, in the question of reputed ownership, justifications of the possession, and have the effect of excluding liability on that ground. Those who are thus, in the course of such contracts, obliged to yield a temporary possession, are held, on the bankruptcy of the person entrusted with the possession, entitled to have their property separated from the bankrupt's funds, and restored to them, subject to such claims as the bankrupt would have been entitled to set off against it.

This is the general rule, but it receives several modifications, and may be perplexed [255] with difficulties amidst the varying circumstances in which a bankrupt's affairs and the property in his possession may be found. To explain these, it may be proper, 1. To lay down and illustrate the general rule, as applicable to the several contracts which require a temporary possession in another than the owner without any change on the subject; and, withdrawn, left them in possession of a new partnership. Here the Court of King's Bench held that the utensils were in the order and disposition of the new company, to the effect of raising reputed ownership, and credit sufficient to ground a liability for the possessor's debts. As to the effect of usage, Lord Ellenborough said: 'If, as in some manufactories where the engines necessary for carrying on the business are known to be let out to the several manufacturers employed upon them, there had been a known usage in this trade for distillers to grant or hire the vats and other articles used by them for the purpose of distilling, the possession and use of such articles would not in such a case have carried the reputed ownership. But in the absence of such a usage, there is nothing in the case which qualifies the reputed ownership arising out of the possession and use of the things in their trade.' Mr. Justice Lawrence said: 'It may happen, from the course of certain trades, that masses of machinery are let out by the owners to the mechanics engaged in them; and the notoriety of such a usage in the trade may rebut the presumption of ownership which would otherwise arise from the possession; but in general, the possession of utensils of trade must be taken to be by the owners of them.' 9 East 239, 243.

¹ Muller v Moss, 1813, 1 Maule and Sel. 335. Here the transfer was notorious. Gurr v Rutton, supra, p. 271, note 2; Watkins v Birch, 1813, 4 Taunt. 823, where, after goods were taken in execution, there was a public sale, at which the creditor becoming purchaser, afterwards allowed the debtor to retain the possession for a rent.

² Lingard v Messiter, 1823, 1 Barn. and Cress. 308. The subject was machinery taken in execution and sold to the creditor, but not by public sale, and afterwards delivered to the debtor for rent. The verdict was for the bankrupt's creditors, and the Court discharged the rule for a new trial. Bayley, J., said: 'It has been held, that where there has been a public sale of property under an execution, the new owner may permit the former owner to continue in possession; and that in the event of the bankruptcy of the latter, the property will not pass to his assignees. In that case the change of property becomes notorious by the public sale. If the vendor, however, permits the former owner to continue in possession without making the change of property notorious to the world, the consequence will be, that in the event of his bankruptcy it will pass to his assignees, as being in his order and disposition within the statutes of James.' In this Holroyd and Best, Justices, concurred. Holroyd said: 'The fact of the goods having been seized under an execution, etc., was at most only evidence of the notoriety of their having been taken in execution.'

³ In Bamford v Baron, 2 Term. Rep. 594, the transaction was with the trustees of the owner's creditors, and the permission to possess was publicly advertised.

2. To inquire into the modifications which the right of the proprietor suffers in consequence of the loss of identity, by changes in the shape, appearance, or nature of the subject while in the bankrupt's possession.

SUBSECTION I.—OF GOODS AND EFFECTS IN POSSESSION OF ANOTHER THAN THE OWNER IN THE COURSE OF LEGAL CONTRACTS.

Several of the known and definite contracts, and many of the arrangements convenient in trade, require or produce a temporary separation of the property and possession.

1. CONTRACT OF LOAN.—This contract is either commodate or mutuum; loan for Use, or loan for Consumption. Where a thing is lent in COMMODATE, or for use only,¹ the borrower binding himself to return it specifically, there is, of course, no transference of the property or real right. Where the thing is lent in MUTUUM, or for consumption, as in the case of all fungibles,² the obligation of the borrower being to return it in equal value or quantity, the absolute property is transferred to the borrower,³ and the lender becomes a mere creditor for the value. If the borrower fail while the things lent are still unconsumed, his creditors have a right to them as part of the divisible fund.

2. CONTRACT OF HIRING.—LOCATION is in general defined: A contract by which the temporary use of a subject, or the work or service of a person, is given for an ascertained hire.

It may be distinguished into three classes:—

First, IN THE HIRING OF A SUBJECT (LOCATIO CONDUCTIO REI), by which the hirer acquires for a price the right of possessing a thing for a particular period or purpose, the property remains unaltered, and the owner has a right to recover it from the hirer and his creditors, subject to the stipulated right of possession and use.⁴ But where property has been sold privately, and immediately afterwards let out to hire by the purchaser to the former owner, the separation of possession as owner and as tenant is so thin, and the collusion so difficult to be detected, that this seems a case proper to be disposed of on the principle of reputed ownership. See above, p. 271. This is a transaction which frequently takes place where the machinery used in trade is attached by the diligence of a creditor: the goods or implements being purchased or given over to the creditor, he grants the use of the machinery to the debtor for a rent, and the business goes on as before. In such cases, the creditor of the person holding possession has been held entitled to take the property as his, unless the change of property has been made notorious.⁵

Secondly, IN THE HIRING OF WORK (LOCATIO OPERIS FACIENDI): as, where a [256] carpenter receives wood to be made into a waggon; or a tailor, cloth to be made into a coat; or a bleacher or dyer, cloth to be bleached or dyed,—the employer, if he furnish the materials, has, on the workman's failure, a claim for the specific subject delivered, as being his undivested property, subject, of course, to the claim of the workman for his labour bestowed.⁶ But it has already been observed, that difficulties often arise from the complica-

¹ Nemo commodando rem facit ejus cui commodat. Dig. lib. 13, tit. 6, De Comm. l. 6.

² Fungible is not an English word. In the civil law it was taken to mean res quæ pondere numero et mensura constant; and this is its meaning in Scottish law: whatever consists in quantity, and is regulated by number, weight, or measure, is a fungible—as corn, money, wine. It is a word adopted in the same sense by the French lawyers. 2 Denizart 449.

³ Paulus says, 'Appellata mutui datio ab eo quod de meo tuum fiat.' Dig. lib. 12, tit. 2, De Reb. Cred. l. 2, sec. 2.

⁴ 'Non solet locatio dominium mutare,' says Ulpian, Dig. lib. 19, tit. 2, Loc. Cond. l. 39; Non solet being (as Cujacius, lib. 8, Obs. c. 39, and Bynkersh. Obs. Jur. Rom. lib. 8, c. 4, learnedly show) used to express that it has the force of a negative rule.

⁵ See above, p. 273.

⁶ This is a rule so well established, that authorities are unnecessary. It is taken in the English cases, for example, as a resting point of argument, but never as in itself questionable. See Collins v Forbes, for example, 3 Term. Rep. 328. See also Eyre, Ch. Justice, in case Lingham v Biggs, 1 Pull. and Bos. 89. [Carruthers v Payne, 2 M. and P. 429; Bartram v Payne, 3 C. and P. 177; Wilkins v Bromhead, 7 Sc. N. R. 921.]

tion of this contract of Locatio operis faciendi with that of sale.¹ It is strictly requisite to the contract of the Hire of Work, when simple, that the locator, or person who hires the labour, should furnish the materials, the conductor only the labour; and in this case, the property of the materials remains with the locator, unaffected by the conductor's temporary possession of them while he is finishing his work. Where the conductor furnishes the materials, or even the principal materials, as well as the labour, it is more strictly sale than location, in which the tradition seems to be completed only by the delivery of the perfect work. It is only from the confusion of the two contracts, that on bankruptcy any question can arise concerning the locator's right of vindication and preference. Where I send a jewel to be set, the jewel continues mine, and cannot be claimed by the creditors of the jeweller. Where the materials of the work to be performed are fungibles, if they be delivered indefinitely to the workman, with an order 'to make the thing wanted,' the property of them has, in the subtilty of the Roman law, been held as transferred to the workman; but if with a particular order to 'make it from those very materials,' the property is not changed. Such is the rule laid down by Alfenus and by Pomponius in the Roman law. Alfenus, in the celebrated law, 31,² lays it down that there is a difference in the right of the person employing the workman, when he gives him a subject to be specifically restored (as clothes to a fuller), and when he delivers materials to be restored in kind; as silver to a goldsmith, with orders for a vase; or gold, with an order for a ring. Pomponius³ more pointedly says, that where the order is to manufacture that gold (ex eo auro), the property of the gold is undivested; but where the order is not to manufacture that gold, but merely general (non tamen ex eo auro, sed ex alio), the property is passed to the workman, and the employer becomes a creditor. Perhaps where the materials so entrusted to the workman are not found distinguishable in his hands, this rule would be followed. But if, by the commencement of the work, or any other unquestionable indication, the materials were marked as identically those entrusted to the workman, they would not go to his general creditors; and this is not inconsistent with the general rule respecting all fungibles, that the person receiving them is held to restore only their equivalents. The rules laid down by Alfenus and Pomponius were applied to corn delivered for transportation from place to place, where no care was taken to keep it separate and distinct.⁴

Thirdly, HIRE OF LABOUR IN CARRIAGE (LOCATIO OPERIS MERCIUM VEHENDARUM).—In this contract for carriage of goods, the property does not pass to the carrier—he is a mere possessor for a special purpose; and there is no distinction worth observing between the [257] case of fungibles and other commodities, according to the common practice of trade.⁵

¹ See above, p. 194.

² Dig. lib. 19, tit. 2, Locat. Cond. l. 31.

³ Dig. lib. 34, tit. 2, de Aur. et Argent. Leg. l. 34.

⁴ The rule of the Roman law is followed in England. Blackstone, speaking of the action of Detinue, says: 'In this action it is necessary to ascertain the thing detained, in such a manner as that it may be sufficiently known and recovered. Therefore it cannot be brought for money, corn, or the like; for that cannot be known from other money or corn, unless it be, in a bag or sack; for then it may be distinguishably marked.' 3 Blackst. 152.

⁵ In the case discussed by Alfenus in the law alluded to above—namely, that of a cargo of corn to be delivered to several persons by measurement—a distinction should perhaps be made. 1. As against the creditors in general, the persons interested in the cargo seem entitled to the character of creditores domini, or proprietors of the cargo, and to rei vindicatio; leaving their respective rights to be settled according to their several proportions. 2. As with each other, the several consignees seem to be only personal creditors of the shipmaster or carrier. It is not, however, a likely case to occur, according to the present practice of trade.

In that case, a cargo of corn was loaded on board the ship Saufeius, consisting of grain belonging to several traders in one undistinguished heap. One of the traders had received his share, after which the ship perished with the remainder. The question was, What remedy the others had? It is for the decision of this case that Alfenus lays down the doctrine already detailed; and he applies it in this way,—that if the corn had been kept separate, and each man's quantity specific and distinct, it might have been known whether the person receiving delivery had received his own or not: if he had got the portion of another, the person whose quantity had been given would have had rei vindicatio, with an actio locati conducti against the master; but as they were confounded, each was merely a creditor for a quantity of grain, and the master was justifiable in delivering the quantity required.

Money is almost the only fungible which is now sent otherwise than specifically. In sending money by a carrier, it is common to take his receipt for the sum, with an obligation to pay it according to order. It would rather appear that the sender of the money is in such a case a mere creditor; so that if the carrier fail, he comes in only for a dividend. But if the money be rendered specific by being enclosed in a box or in a sealed bag, there is no question that the property is still with the employer. It is, for example, the custom of banks to send to their branches and country correspondents, or it is often necessary for the branches to send to the bank specie or notes. The banks in the metropolis have branches in the country; or a country bank maintains its credit perhaps by the notes of the Bank of England, or of the Scottish chartered banks, which the public receives as cash. In sending supplies to the country for the use of such establishments, it is necessary to send bank-notes or coin. But if the carrier were to become merely a debtor for the amount, he might pay the debt in the notes of the very company to which he is carrying it, and thus the object of the transaction would be disappointed. He must therefore deliver the specific parcel which he receives. But unless the notes be sealed up, or at least put in a separate parcel or box, the sudden death or bankruptcy of the carrier would leave to the senders of the remittance only a general claim against his estate, and not a specific right of vindication. Perhaps it would be held sufficient specification if the carrier's receipt were taken for particular bank-notes, with an obligation to deliver them according to their numbers and other marks. But a proof of extraneous and collateral circumstances of identification would not probably be admitted, for it is impossible to say where that would stop.

3. CONTRACT OF DEPOSITE.—Deposite is that contract by which one delivers property to another to be kept for the owner's behoof without reward. The depositor has right to have the deposited property restored; the depositary has neither the use nor disposal of it; and the possession and property are effectually separated.¹ The depositary may indeed fraudulently sell the deposit, in which case it may be doubtful whether the purchaser in market will be safe against the proprietor's claim for restitution; but it is certain that while the subject continues in the possession of the depositary himself, his creditors have no right to it, and never can avail themselves of it, as of property belonging to their debtor. But this is true only of what is called PROPER DEPOSITE; in which a special subject is placed with the depositary, to be restored without alteration.² There is another species of the contract which lawyers have called IMPROPER DEPOSITE, with regard to which a distinction is admitted similar to that already marked between commodate and mutuum:³ in improper deposit, money, or other fungibles, are placed in the depositary's hands, to be returned in kind. In the former the possession as well as the real right of the subject remain with the depositor; in the latter the real right is transferred, and the depositor becomes merely a creditor of the depositary for the quantity of fungibles or money which he binds himself to return.

There may be a proper deposite even of fungibles and of money; but then they must be delivered as a specific subject, and be kept distinct; and they must be so put up and marked as to be fairly distinguishable from the debtor's stock, and from all other fungibles of the same kind: they must, as the English judges term it, have an ear-mark.⁴ On this subject, in the Roman law, Alfenus held that money must have been delivered in bags, or sealed and marked so as to be distinguished, otherwise the depositary's obligation resolved

¹ 'Rei depositæ,' says Alfenus, 'proprietas apud deponentem manet sed et possessio.'

² [Parke v Eliason, 1 East 544; Thompson v Giles, 2 B. and C. 431; Sadler v Belcher, 2 M. and Rob. 489; Truck v Walker, 2 W. Bl. 1154; Lombart v Woollet, 2 Mylne and Cr. 389; Tooke v Hollingsworth, 5 T. R. 215, 227; Taylor v Plumer, 3 M. and S. 562, 575.]

³ See above, p. 275.

⁴ 'If an executor,' says Lord Mansfield [in Howard v Jemmet, 3 Burr. 1369, note], 'becomes bankrupt, the commissioners cannot seize the specific effects of his testator; not even money, which can be specifically distinguished and ascertained to belong to such testator, and not to the bankrupt himself.' This is the general rule applicable to all cases of temporary possession and trusteeship; but the difficulty is to lay down rules for distinguishing the identity.

into that of a common money debt. And on the same principle, corn must be put up in sacks or barrels, or in separate and distinct repositories, so that it may be known and distinguished.¹ This doctrine is taken for granted in all those laws of the title in the Pandects, 'Depositi vel contra,' in which the irregular deposit is spoken of;² and Paulus says: 'If I have deposited a money-bag, or money marked and distinguished, and the depositary without my consent has spent it, I have an action of deposit and theft against him.'³

There may be a proper deposit of bills and other documents of debt; but if of a negotiable nature, they must be so deposited that the power of negotiation is not with the depositary, otherwise he may, as in the case of money, pay them away, and defeat the depositor's right. We shall see afterwards, in treating of factory and of pledge, several distinctions that must be observed in questions of this sort.⁴

It appears, then, 1. That where deposited goods are extant and distinguishable, the depositor, in all cases of proper deposit, is entitled to have them set apart from the common fund, and delivered up to him. 2. That where the subject deposited is not to be itself returned, but only in kind, the depositor is only a personal creditor.

4. CONTRACT OF PLEDGE.—The creditor who receives a pledge, holds the possession for the debtor; but the property in the goods continues unchanged. The creditor is said [259] indeed in English law to have a special property in the thing pledged; but the meaning of this is only that he is entitled to keep possession till the claim, in security of which he received it, is satisfied; and that in order to protect himself in the enjoyment of his right, he has all the remedies by which a proprietor is protected.

The pledgor, or person who receives the advance and gives the pledge, is the true proprietor of the subject impledged, under the burden of the debt in security of which the pledge is constituted.⁵ Thus, if one receive an advance from another, and in security deposit in his warehouse a bale of goods, the borrower is on the bankruptcy of the lender bound to repay the money before he can be entitled to redelivery of the bale; but on the other hand, if the money is tendered, or if, on a statement of accounts, the balance is even, the lender is entitled as proprietor to the bale in the bankrupt's warehouse.

Where, instead of money actually advanced upon a pledge, the person to whom the pledge is delivered engages his credit, or accepts a bill, or allows the pledgor to draw on him; and, becoming unable to answer his engagement, the pledgor himself is obliged to provide for the bill; the pledgor is entitled to recover his pledge against the creditors of the pledgee.

5. CONTRACT OF MANDATE OR FACTORY.—In the Roman law the contract of MANDATE was merely gratuitous; but with us, FACTORY, an improper species of mandate, is a more important and useful contract. Perhaps, indeed, the modern contract of factory is more accurately referable to locatio operarum than to mandate, or rather it is a mixed contract

¹ Dig. lib. 19, tit. 2, Loc. Cond. l. 31.

² Lib. 16, tit. 3, Depos. vel Contra, l. 24, l. 25, sec. 1; l. 26, sec. 1. The continental lawyers seem to admit a much looser proof, by indications from the shortness of time between the delivery of the money and the question; the situation of the money-holder; the probability of his having cash elsewhere, etc. Cardinal de Lucca, de Cred. Disc. 1, sec. 12; and Disc. 26, sec. 3.

³ 'Si sacculum vel argentum signatum deposuero, et is penes quem depositum fuit me invito contrectaverit, et depositi et furti actio mihi in eum competit.' Lib. 16, tit. 3, Dep. vel Contra, l. 29.

There are deposits (or what are commonly called deposits) in daily use in trade, which are in law properly referable to the contracts of pledge or of mandate. I allude to deposit accounts and transactions with bankers. The class to which the claims of the customers of a banker for money, bills, etc., in his possession on his bankruptcy are referable, is that of mandate or factory. See below. But frequently, especially in England, jewels, etc. are deposited with bankers merely for safe custody; in which case there is no question that the property remains unaltered. See in a case reported by Strange, a case of jewels, sealed in a bag, and deposited with a banker, who, abusing his confidence, broke the seal, and sold them. The Court gave trover against the purchaser. Harlop v Hoare, Strange 1187.

⁴ See below.

⁵ [There may be cases, however, of sale cum pacto de retro-vendendo, which are difficult to be distinguished from pledge. See Stair i. 14. 4; Latta v Park & Co., 1865, 3 Macph. 508. As to ostensible ownership, see Cooke v Hemming, L. R., 3 C. P. 334.]

composed of those two. This contract is in the English books discussed under the title PRINCIPAL and AGENT. We shall have occasion hereafter to consider the contract itself in relation to the personal claims which arise out of the respective obligations of the parties. At present we have to consider only the disposition of the property which in the course of the factory may be thrown into the possession of others than the owner.¹

The cases of temporary possession which naturally arise either in the course of an occasional and single mandate to act as factor, or in the execution of the duties belonging to a settled course of employment, are very numerous, including mercantile consignments of cargoes, or commodities to be sold for the consignor's behoof; deposits of bills with bankers to be duly and regularly negotiated for the holder; orders for the purchase of goods in the name of the mandant; and, in short, every sort of temporary possession which can occur in the course of a person acting by the order of another, in conducting transactions for him and managing his trade.

The general doctrine is, that where the goods sent by the principal, or acquired for him by his order, are found in the hands of the factor, distinguishable from the general mass of his property, they are not part of the factor's estate, but must be given up to the principal, subject of course to lien.

1. In England, the general rule was distinctly laid down in the following terms, by Lord Chancellor King,² as applicable to goods consigned to a factor, to be sold for the principal, and found in his possession on his bankruptcy: 'When a merchant beyond seas consigns goods to a merchant in London on account of the latter, and draws bills on him for such goods, though the money is not paid, yet the property of the goods rests in the merchant in London, who is credited for them, and consequently they are liable to his debts; but where a merchant beyond seas consigns goods to a factor in London, who receives them, the factor in this case, being only a servant or agent for the merchant beyond seas, can [260] have no property in such goods, neither will they be affected by his bankruptcy: and the Lord Chancellor said he had discoursed with the merchants about the matter, who held this to be the practice among them.' This has always been held as sound law, and particularly by three eminent judges—Lords Hardwicke, Mansfield, and Kenyon.³ This is law in Scotland as well as in England.

2. Where a factor, being ordered to purchase goods for his principal (and being properly reimbursed), has made his purchases in compliance with the orders, and failed with the goods in his warehouse, the goods are not to be taken as part of his divisible estate, but as the property of the principal. This seems never to have been thought doubtful in Scotland,

¹ [On the subject of property and securities in the hands of factors, agents, and bankers, see Paley on Principal and Agent, by Lloyd, pp. 78-97; Livermore on Principal and Agent, vol. i. pp. 261-307; Thomson on Bills, pp. 787-810 (2d ed.), pp. 541-55 (3d ed.); Grant on Banking, ch. vi. As to ostensible ownership of goods in the hands of factors and commission agents for sale, Whitfield v Brand, 16 M. and W. 282; Carruthers v Payne, 2 M. and P. 429, 441; Shaw v Harvey, 1 Ad. and E. 920.]

² Godfrey v Furzo, 3 P. Williams 185.

³ Lord Hardwicke, in the case of Dumas, thus expressed himself: 'Suppose the petitioners had consigned over goods to Julian as their factor, and he had sold them and turned them into money, the principal then could only have come in as a general creditor under the commission; but if the goods had continued in specie, and had been found in Julian's hands at the time of his bankruptcy, it would have been otherwise, and has been so determined in several cases; and even contrary to the express words of the statute, 21 Jac. I., factors have been excepted out of it for the sake of trade and merchandise.' Ex parte Dumas, 1 Atk. 234.

Lord Mansfield, in Mace and Cadell, said that the statute of James 'does not extend to the case of factors or goldsmiths who have possession of other men's goods merely as trustees, or under a bare authority to sell for the use of their principal.' Cowper, 232.

Lord Kenyon, in Tooke v Hollingsworth, said: 'The case of a factor has been so frequently decided, and so much taken for granted, for a series of years past, that it must now be considered to be at rest. If goods be sent to a factor to be disposed of, who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, and the goods remain distinguishable from the general mass of his property, the principal may recover the goods in specie, and is not driven to the necessity of proving his debt under the commission of bankrupt. Nay, if the goods be sold and reduced to money, provided that money be in separate bags, and distinguishable from the factor's other property, the law is the same. Then taking that as an incontrovertible point,' etc. 5 Term. Rep. 226.

when the purchase was made in the principal's name, and the goods were found in the factor's possession.¹ And in England the same rule is observed.

The only doubts that seem ever to have occurred respecting cases of this kind, have been where the factor has purchased in his own name. But even in that case, the doctrine of the English law seems to be clear (and it is the doctrine most consistent with principle), that where the goods are clearly identified as those ordered by the principal, the factor's creditors cannot take them as his. And so a purchase of stock in the factor's name, but entered in his books for the principal, is held not distributable under the factor's commission.²

3. Where the principal remits bills or money to the factor, and the factor becomes a [261] bankrupt with the remittances in his hand, the great distinctions seem to be these:³

1. That to give to the principal, on the factor's bankruptcy, any claim of property in the remittance, the remittance must be made as to a factor, and not on the footing of a sale. 2. That it must be a remittance for a special purpose, and not merely for the liquidation of a general balance. And, 3. That the remittance must be specific, 'money having no ear-mark.'⁴

1. The remittance must be made as to a factor. If one order goods from a merchant abroad, not his factor, and, on receiving the invoice, remit bills for the amount, it is a simple contract of sale; and therefore, if the goods are not sent, and the foreign merchant fail with the bills in his possession, the buyer is nothing more than a general creditor, and cannot demand his bill back, in preference to other creditors. But if one employ a factor to purchase goods, and remit bills to him for the purpose of paying the price, those bills, if found in the factor's repositories, are the principal's, as having been sent to a mere factor to relieve the principal from the claim for the price; so that if the factor fail to pay the price, and the

¹ Spence's case, 1687, M. 3153. A supercargo was employed to export some goods, and to sell them in Holland, and with the price to buy other species of goods. The supercargo fulfilled his commission; and having returned with the goods, wrote to the principal that he had cellared them for his behoof. In this situation a creditor of the supercargo pointed the goods as his; and against an action by the principal for the goods, the creditor defended himself on the ground that possession presumes property in moveables; that there was no bill of lading showing the goods to belong to the principal; that he would not have been bound, had they been lost, to have owned them, or stood to the loss; and that in every view, till delivery, they were to be reputed the goods of the factor. The Court found that the property of the goods was in the pursuer (the principal), and ordered the defender to make restitution.

Hotchkis v Dundee Bank, 1797, M. 2673. The Dundee Bank employed Bertram, Gardner, & Co. to take up their notes from the Edinburgh banks, for which they were put in cash by remittances. Bertram, Gardner, & Co. regularly took up the Dundee bank-notes in the hands of the Edinburgh bankers every Monday and Friday, put them up in parcels, sealed them, entered the amount in their book, notified it by post to the Dundee Bank, and sent the parcels by the first opportunity. On Bertram, Gardner, & Co.'s failure, the manager of the Dundee Bank went to Edinburgh and received a parcel of 1340 notes, which had been taken up, parcelled, entered in the books, and notified to the Bank; and the trustee on Bertram, Gardner, & Co.'s estate claimed these notes as improperly given up by the bankrupt. The Court found that the creditors were not entitled to have the notes back.

² Ex parte Chion, Tr. Term. 1721, 3 Peere Williams 187,

note. A trader in London having money of J. S., who resided in Holland, in his hands, bought South Sea stock as factor for J. S., and took the stock in his own name. In his account-book, however, it was entered as bought for J. S. The trader after this transaction became bankrupt, and the question between the principal and the creditors of the factor was, Whether the stock was liable to the bankruptcy? Lord Parker determined that it was not liable to the creditors.

Lord Parker is here reported to have said that it would lessen the credit of the nation if the stock were to be held as the factor's. This does not appear to have been the ground of the decision, but merely an additional consideration. It may perhaps be imagined that some weight in this question should be given to the circumstance of the money with which the goods are purchased having been the principal's, and the goods, in truth, a mere substitution for it; but this were to mingle two questions. The effect of such change we shall have an opportunity of considering hereafter.

See ex parte Sayers, 5 Ves. jun. 169.

³ Bills perhaps ought to be considered not here, but in a subsequent part of the work; but it is better to show the principle in cases so closely analogous to moveables.

⁴ Lord Mansfield has said of this expression, that 'it has been quaintly said that the reason why money cannot be followed is because it has no ear-mark; but that is not true. The true reason is on account of the currency of it' (1 Burrow, Rep. 457). But it has been well observed by Mr. Paley, that his Lordship was there 'considering the case not of reclaiming money from the person with whom it had been deposited, but of following it into the hands of a third, to whom it had passed in currency; and that it is only in that view that he expresses a disapprobation of the reason alluded to.' Law of Principal and Agent, p. 73.

principal satisfy this claim himself, the factor holds the bills for the principal's behoof alone, just as if they were goods.¹

2. The remittance must be for a special purpose, and not for the liquidation of [262] the general balance. This is distinctly explained in a case which occurred before Lord Hardwicke, where the following principles were laid down:—That if bills are sent by a correspondent to a merchant here to be received, and the money applied to a particular use, and the merchant become bankrupt before the money is received on the bills, the correspondent has a special property in respect of those bills, and the money shall not be divided among the merchant's creditors at large;² but that where bills are sent on a general account between the correspondent and merchant, and as an item in the account, it is otherwise.³

Where there is only one transaction between the parties, the thing entrusted to the mandatory must, of course, be considered as particularly appropriated, as in his hands for a special purpose, not as transferred.⁴

Where there is a running account between the parties, it is frequently a nice question, Whether a remittance be an item in the general account, or specially appropriated? The ¹ In the case of Tooke and Hollingsworth, already taken notice of, there was an agreement of a double nature: 1st, That the bankrupt should purchase of Tooke, at a certain rate, all the light gold he should send, and that Tooke should draw bills for the price at two months. 2dly, That Tooke should be allowed to draw bills on the bankrupt for his accommodation, and that he should in that case remit value to answer them. The bankrupt had accepted much in advance, when Tooke sent him three bills and 213 light guineas, and 19 light half-guineas, to answer his acceptances. Both in the King's Bench, where the case was first tried, and in the Exchequer Chamber, it was thought that if the transaction had stood on the footing of the first part of the agreement, there would have been difficulty in the case; but that, on the footing of the second, Tooke was entitled to recover the property from the creditors.

'If it really were a sale of goods under the first part of the agreement,' said Mr. Justice Grose, 'I should have considerable doubts about the case. If the gold is to be considered as goods sold to the defendant, then bills were to be drawn by the plaintiff on the bankrupt at two months; but in the verdict not a word is said about the bills being drawn for the light gold mentioned in the verdict. The state of the transaction at the time of the bankruptcy was this:—There were acceptances by the bankrupt to the amount of £873, over and above the gold and bills in question. Now, the bankrupt being under such acceptances, what was the probability of the transaction? Not that the plaintiff would sell the gold, but that he would remit goods to discharge the acceptances. However, we are not left to determine on conjecture or probabilities on a special verdict; for it is expressly found as a fact, that the plaintiff, in order to enable the bankrupt to pay the acceptances when they should become due, sent the goods in question; and it is also found by the verdict that those bills were afterwards paid by the plaintiff. Then, the purpose for which the property in question was sent was answered by the plaintiff himself; and that lets in the doctrine of Lord Hardwicke in the case ex parte Dumas, which I consider immediately and directly in point. The instant the acceptances were taken up by the plaintiff, and the end for which the goods were sent was answered, I consider the property as re-vested in the plaintiff. But it has been asked, When and how was this property re-vested in the plaintiff? I consider it to have been a qualified and conditional property in the defendants. It was not vested in them as an absolute and unconditional property by the transmission for a particular purpose. It was vested in them only for a special purpose; and the instant that purpose was answered in another way, the property was re-vested in the plaintiff. Then it was asked, What would have been the case had the acceptance been discharged by the bankrupt? I answer, that in such a case the purpose for which they were sent would have been answered by the bankrupt, and then the plaintiff would have had no property in the goods: then that property which was before conditional would have become absolute in the bankrupt. This case comes directly within that of Dumas: for here the goods were sent for a particular purpose; and as soon as that purpose could not be answered by the bankrupt, or was otherwise answered by the plaintiff, the property re-vested in the plaintiff. And therefore I think he may maintain this action of trover to recover back this property, or the value of it.' 5 Term. Rep. 234. In the Exchequer Chamber a similar view was taken of the agreement by Lord Chief Justice Eyre, who delivered the opinion of the Court. 2 H. Blackstone 501. See also Bent v Fuller, 5 Term. Rep. 494.

² Ex parte Dumas, Julian's bankruptcy, 9 Aug. 1754. See below, p. 282, note 3.

³ Ex parte Oursell, in the same bankruptcy, 1754, Ambler 297. Below, p. 282, note 3.

⁴ M'Kenzie v Watson and Stewart, 1678, M. 10188. M'Kenzie held a blank bond (a kind of security very common in Scotland in the seventeenth century), and being unwilling to do diligence in his own name, he filled up the name of another in the blank, and that other gave an acknowledgment that he held the bond merely in trust. The creditors of this trustee or factor attached the money as his; and a question arose in the Court of Session between them and M'Kenzie, Whether he was not, as principal, entitled to this bond as his property? The Court found that he was entitled to it.

There is a similar case reported, Black v Sutherland, 1705, M. 10189; and another, Monteith v Douglas, 1710, M. 10191.

In England, the case of Parke v Elleason, 1 East 544, affords an illustration of the same position. See below, p. 290.

chief or sole illustrations of the doctrine are to be found in the English cases. It would appear, 1. That it is held a specific appropriation of bills, when bill is pledged against bill, or one transaction against another.¹ 2. That the allotment of a particular account, under a specific title or mark, for a certain class of remittances, will sufficiently distinguish bills [263] which are meant to be specifically appropriated.² 3. That where bills are sent in a letter to answer 'what remains for the sender to pay,' the appropriation has been held sufficient.³ 4. That, where a banker has engaged to accept bills for his correspondent's con-

¹ Bent v Puller, 5 Term. Rep. K. B. 494. Bent had kept a banking account with Caldwell & Co., bankers at Liverpool. This account consisted, on the one side, of bills drawn by Caldwell & Co. in Bent's favour, on Forbes & Gregory, bankers in London. It was filled up by Bent with bills and negotiable securities lodged with Caldwell & Co. An interest account was kept, wherein the bankers, when in advance, debited Bent with interest; and when they were in cash for Bent, gave him credit for interest. The account was balanced every three months, and a commission charged by the bankers of 5 per cent. on the amount of the bills drawn by them. The accounts were balanced in February 1793, with a balance against Bent of £3882. In March he received other bills for £445. On the 18th March he sent them seven excise debentures, to the amount of £674. On the 16th he sent them further fifteen bills for £3953, which, if placed to his credit, would have turned the balance £799 in his favour, on the supposition of Caldwell & Co.'s drafts being good. On the same day, the 16th March, the London banker stopped, and, with the arrival of the post on the 18th, Caldwell & Co. stopped also, and their drafts were returned on Bent; and the question, in an action of trover by Bent against the assignees of Caldwell & Co., was, Whether the bills sent on the 16th were paid to the bankers on a general account, or with a particular appropriation for the answering of the current drafts? The jury, under the direction of Lord Kenyon at Guildhall, and after inspecting Bent's books, held the bills to have been paid to Caldwell & Co. on the general account; and they therefore nonsuited Bent, the plaintiff. On the argument on a rule for a new trial, the Court was unanimously of opinion that Bent could not recover in the circumstances of the case. Mr. Justice Buller said: 'In order to make a specific appropriation of bills, there must be a lodging of a bill for a bill, or at least several deposited at once, as one entire transaction, to answer some particular purpose; whereas here the bills were paid in on a general running account, and the amount of the bills claimed as a deposit, not even corresponding with the amount of those for which they were supposed to be deposited. And the case must be considered in the same manner as if the question had arisen before the bankruptcy of Caldwell & Co., in which case the plaintiffs could not have compelled the bankers to deliver up the bills in question on paying the others.' Lord Kenyon said: 'I agree with my brother Buller, that there must be either a bill pledged against a bill, or a transaction against a transaction; but here the bills were coming in day after day, not for the purpose of opposing a bill on one side of the account to another on the other, but all were paid in one general account. The plaintiff therefore is not entitled to recover these bills, on the ground that the particular purpose for which they were deposited has not been answered, because it does not appear that they were deposited to answer that particular purpose. On the trial, the jury, on inspecting the books, thought that this was a general banker's account, and that there was no specific appropriation of the bills in question: it appears to me in the same light.'

² Ex parte Dumas, 1754, 1 Atk. 232. Dumas & Co. of Paris drew bills on Julian & Son of London for £1115, and undertook to provide for them by remittances. They informed Julians that the transaction was for the benefit of their house at Cadiz, and desired it to be kept in a particular account, distinguished by the letter G. They, in terms of the agreement, sent bills of £1146, and the Julians acknowledged receipt of the bills to the credit of the new account G. The father died, and the son stopped. After taking the resolution to stop, he discounted two of the bills; the rest remained in his drawer. Dumas & Co. gave up all pretensions to the discounted bills in the hands of the bona fide holders, but claimed the others as appropriated to a special purpose. Lord Hardwicke said: 'The present is a very plain case, to give the petitioners a title to those bills which remain in specie unnegotiated. The letter G appears to be the initial letter of the first partner's name at the house at Cadiz. These bills I consider as appropriated to a particular purpose, and intended to answer and reimburse the Julians what they should pay on this special account; for, by being endorsed, they could negotiate and discount them: £580 appears to be the amount of the bills left in specie. Upon all these circumstances, it would be the hardest thing in the world to say these bills should go to the creditors at large; and therefore, on the whole, I am clearly of opinion that the specific bills, amounting to £580, must be delivered up by the assignees of Julian to the petitioners Dumas & Co., or to such persons as they shall empower to receive them, and order accordingly.'

³ In the bankruptcy of the Julians, a case occurred in which the question was, Whether there was sufficient evidence of an appropriation of the bills of exchange remitted by Oursell? Lord Hardwicke said: 'When this matter came on before, it was in a more general way insisted, that where bills of exchange are remitted on a general account, if they can be got at before the money due upon them is received by the merchant here, who becomes bankrupt, it shall not be divided among his creditors at large, but the correspondent shall have them returned. But, in my opinion, that is going too far. The fact now is, Oursell at Paris and Julians at London corresponded and dealt with each other in drawing and redrawing bills of exchange. They kept separate accounts; and in the account kept by Oursell the Julians were indebted to him on balance £2200. In the account kept by the Julians, Oursell was indebted to them £316. Oursell drew several bills of exchange on the Julians, to the amount of £2200, which were protested for non-payment, and returned; and Oursell discharged them, with the cost of the protest. After those bills were drawn, Oursell remitted to Julians two bills, one for £540, the other for £460, payable to Julians. These two last venience, on an agreement to remit for answering them, and the correspondent sends bills accordingly for the purpose of answering acceptances, such remitted bills are in the [264] banker's hand, unapplied in the nature of goods unsold: the property is in the remitter, subject to the banker's lien.¹

3. The money or bills must remain in a state capable of being identified and distinguished from the factor's other property. On this subject some remarks have already been made in treating of deposits.² Where a public bank employs agents in the country to manage the business of their branches, the money entrusted to those agents is the commodity in which the bank deals; and under the agent's management in the office of the bank, and lying in the strong-box, drawers, and desks used in carrying on the bank's trade as dealers in this commodity, it has been held the specific property of the bank, not divisible on the bankruptcy of the agent among his creditors.

The changes which, in the course of the bank transactions, are made in that commodity, may suggest a doubt whether the bank can, on the agent's bankruptcy, claim all the cash in the repositories as their own, although not one note or guinea of the supply originally given to the agent may remain in his possession? In one case which occurred of this sort, the Court of Session held the money in the strong-box to be the specific property of the bank. And so far the decision appears to rest on sound principles. But in the case to which the rule was applied, the agent had been engaged, with the knowledge of the bank, in very extensive business on his own account, and in the course of that business large sums were passing through his hands as factor for other persons.³ And it may well be doubted whether, bills were not paid till after Julians' bankruptcy, and were then received by the assignees. It appears these two last bills were sent to enable Julians to pay the bills drawn on them. When Oursell sent them he wrote a letter to Julian, and in it takes notice that he would send to answer what was remaining for him to pay on his account, not what was due on his account. Argued, that these bills must be on account of the remittances, and were intended in the first place to pay the £316 balance due from Oursell; but that cannot be, for Julians had satisfaction for that balance in their own hands, for they were indebted to him in a greater sum, and the letter imports otherwise. It must be taken as the letter imports. It is a matter of fact, not of law. I am satisfied on the evidence. It amounts to an appropriation, and is within the rule and reasoning I went upon and laid down in the case ex parte Dumas.⁴ Ex parte Oursell, Ambler 297.

¹ Zink v Walker. Jenner was employed as an agent or banker by Zink, who drew bills on him, under an agreement to make remittances to answer the same when due. Jenner sent (November 1776) an account current, including all the accepted bills running on him up to 30th November, amounting to £1022, and making the balance due to himself £1137. Zink sent first a bill for £150, then one for £300; and on the same day on which they were sent Jenner became bankrupt, without having paid any of the drafts, and Zink himself was obliged to retire them. The bills for £450 were, when they came to hand, deposited by Jenner's clerk with Staples & Co., who wrote them short in Jenner's book. Zink claimed his £450, under deduction of £195, for which he stood indebted to Jenner for commission, etc.; and the Court held him entitled to it. The bills were held to be merely deposited with Staples & Co., and to be in Jenner's hands, as factor, till paid in the nature of goods unsold. 2 Blackst. 1154.

² See above, p. 277 et seq.

³ Tooke v Hollingsworth, 1793, 5 Term. Rep. 215, 2 H.

Blackst. 501. The question was concerning the specific appropriation of three bills and a quantity of light guineas. It arose out of an agreement between one Daniel, a goldsmith in London, and Tooke, a merchant in Manchester, under which Tooke, to answer the special purpose of the agreement, sent to Daniel the bankrupt, in a box by the mail-coach, 213 guineas and 19 half-guineas, with three bills, and a letter informing Daniel of their being intended for answering his drafts. The box with its contents was delivered to the officer under the commission of bankruptcy on Daniel's estate; and the Court of King's Bench held, that the bills and money 'remaining in specie, and not blended with the other subjects of Daniel,' Tooke had a right to recover them from the other creditors of Daniel. [See Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 702.]

⁴ Gilchrist v Thomson, as trustee for Christie's creditors, 4 July 1809, F. C. Christie was manager of the British Linen Co.'s branch at Montrose. He received at first a large sum of cash, and this was deposited in a strong-box in the office where the bank business was done, the bank having one key and he another. Christie carried on extensive concerns as a trader, in partnership with others; and he was treasurer for some public institutions, and factor for gentlemen of large estates, whose rents he levied. He failed, when there was found in the strong-box £3000. The bank claimed this as their own money; the other creditors contended that the placing of money in the strong-box being voluntary on the part of Christie, he could not appropriate the cash in his hands to one of his employers more than to another, and that the money there deposited could not possibly be the identical money trusted to his management at the first. There was some difference of opinion on the bench, but the majority held that the money belonged to the bank; that the agent was the mere institor and servant of the bank; that the money taken out and put into the chest in the course of bank operations was the bank's money, sufficiently identified and kept [265] in such a case, an exception ought not to be admitted to the general rule. Indeed, on this ground, and from want of confidence in the decision, the case was afterwards compromised.

From connection with the subject now before us, some cases may here be considered which strictly belong to the next section, viz. cases of Factor, in which the goods in the factor's hands have been changed in the course of his transactions.

1. Where the factor has sold the goods of his principal, and failed before the price of the goods has been paid, the principal is the creditor, and preferable to the creditors of the factor.¹

2. Where bills have been taken for the price, and are still in the factor's hands, undiscounted at his failure, or where goods have been taken in return for those sold, the principal is entitled to them, as forming no part of the divisible fund.²

3. Where the price has been paid in money, coin, bank-notes, etc., it remains the property of the principal, if kept distinct as his. 'If goods be sent to a factor to be disposed [266] of,' says Lord Kenyon, 'who afterwards becomes a bankrupt, and the goods remain distinguishable from the general mass of his property, the principal may recover the goods in specie, etc. Nay, if the goods be sold and reduced to money, provided that money be in separate bags, and distinguishable from the factor's other property, the law is the same; and this,' he adds, 'may be taken as an incontrovertible point.'³ Where not kept distinct, the rule that seems to be adopted on the Continent is, that circumstantial and presumptive proof of identity may be received; such as the evidence of the bankrupt's having no other specific; that the agent may have by fraud augmented this store, for which the bank might be liable, as for their servant; but that the justice to be done on this ground should not be allowed to injure the general principles which made the distinguishable money the property of the bank.

This case was settled out of Court.

¹ Ex parte Murray, Dec. 1783, Cook's B. L. 4th ed. p. 400. Murray consigned linens to Bate & Hankell with a del credere commission, which implies a guarantee by the factor, so that if the purchaser fail the principal does not suffer. They sold the linens, and before receiving the price became bankrupts. Their assignees afterwards received the price from the purchasers, and refused to deliver it to Murray the principal, desiring him to come in as a creditor. Murray petitioned the Lord Chancellor for delivery of the price of his linens, deducting commission, etc. His Lordship was clearly of opinion, after hearing the point of law argued, that the purchaser not having paid for the linens previous to the bankruptcy, Murray the consignor was entitled to receive the price of the linens, and accordingly the assignees were ordered to pay him the money.

In Scotland, the case of Hay v Hay, below, p. 288, note 1, affords an example of the same doctrine. See below, p. 285, note 4.

² In England, in the case of Dumas, Lord Hardwicke mentioned a case in these words: 'The Court of Common Pleas in a case, the name of which I do not remember, determined that, notwithstanding the goods so consigned were sold, yet as the factor took notes instead of money for them, the principal was entitled to the notes, and not the creditors at large.' This was the case of Scott v Surman, Willis' Rep. 400.

In Scotland the following cases may suffice on this point:—

Street v Home & Bruntfield, 1669, M. 15122. Street, a merchant in London, having sent down a parcel of skins to Lyel, his factor at Edinburgh, Lyel the factor sold them, and took a bond for the price in his own name, advising Street of the receipt of the skins, and giving him the names of the purchasers. Lyel died bankrupt, and Street claimed this bond as his property, and obtained a decree of declarator to that effect. Having raised an action for the contents of the bond, the debtors objected that they were not in safety to pay, lest they should expose themselves by payment to a claim for second payment at the instance of Lyel's creditors. The Lords repelled the defence, and found the bond not to be in bonis of Lyel, nor to be confirmable as his goods, but to belong to the pursuer Street.

Sir John Baird v Murray's Crs., 1744, M. 7737. Murray was executor to Sir James Rothead; and having taken the assistance of Gordon in recovering the estate, a balance was struck upon Gordon's intrusions, a bill granted by him to Murray for £286, payable to order, and Gordon completely discharged. Murray died with this bill in his possession; and some of his creditors having attached it, the question arose, Whether they or the next of kin of Sir James Rothead had the preferable right to the bill? The Court found 'that there was sufficient evidence that the sum contained in Gordon's bill was part of the proceeds of Sir James Rothead's executry; and therefore that Sir James Rothead's next of kin are preferable for the sum in the said bill, before the other creditors of Murray.'

A question remains here, Whether the purchaser can have compensation upon debts due to him by the factor? The most respectable of the continental lawyers are decidedly against such compensation. Casaregis, Dis. 75, secs. 23, 24. But of this hereafter, in considering the doctrine of Retention and Compensation.

³ In the case of Tooke v Hollingsworth, 5 Term. Rep. 227. See also Scott v Surman, 1743, Willis 400; Howard v Jemmet, 1763, 2 Burr. 1369; ex parte Sayers, 1800, 5 Ves. jun. 169; Montagu, Bank. Laws, vol. ii., notes, p. 233.

money, or that arising from the shortness of the interval between his acquisition and the question,¹ etc. But such evidence does not seem to be admissible with us.

4. Where a bill received for the goods, or placed with the factor, has been discounted, or where money coming into his hands has been paid away, the endorsee of the bill, or the person receiving the money, will be free from all claim at the instance of the principal, however cruelly the purpose for which they were deposited should be disappointed;² but it has been doubted whether the principal will have a preference for the value on the funds of the factor. This is indeed as much an unlawful conversion of the money and bills to the factor's use, as if he had actually stolen them; or as if, having goods deposited with him, he had made free with them. But the presumption is, that the bankrupt has accomplished the fraud, not so much for the benefit of his general creditors, as for the purpose of embezzlement, and there seems to be no ground for a preference.

5. Where the factor sinks the name of the principal entirely (which may be done without fraud³), it is necessary to distinguish. Wherever a factor, employed to sell goods, receives a del credere commission, for which he engages to guarantee the payment to the principal, it is not the practice to communicate the name of the purchasers to the principal, except where the factor fails. In this situation, there are several points well fixed in England: 1. Where the factor fails, the principal is the creditor of the buyer, and has a direct action against him for the price.⁴ If, therefore, the principal give notice to the buyer, on the factor's failure, not to pay the factor, and the buyer notwithstanding does pay the factor, he will be liable to pay the price over again to the principal. But, 2. The persons contracting with the factor in his own name, and bona fide, are entitled to set off the factor's debt to them. Lord Mansfield thus laid down the law: 'Where a factor, dealing for [267] a principal, but concealing that principal, delivers goods in his own name, the person contracting with him has a right to consider him, to all intents and purposes, as the principal; and though the real principal may appear, and bring an action upon that contract against the purchaser of the goods, yet that purchaser may set off any claim he may have against the factor in answer to the demand of the principal; this being long settled.'⁵ 3. Where the

¹ De Lucca De Cred. Disc. 1, No. 12, and Disc. 26, No. 3.

² Collins v Martin and others, 1 Bos. and Pul. 648; Bolden v Fuller, 1 Bos. and Pul. 539. [See Stewart v Central Bank of Scotland, 1859, 21 D. 1180; Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 200.]

³ Casaregis delivers it as the practice of merchants: 'Introdotto per motiva di prudenza il contrattare senza spiegare la persona per cui fanno il negozio.' Disc. 56, sec. 12.

⁴ See above, p. 284, note 1. This doctrine was first laid down by Lord Chief Justice Lee ineffectually, for the jury would not decide according to his direction. Scrimshire v Alderstone, 2 Stra. 1182. [Add. Cont. 6th ed. 598.]

Afterwards it was fully established, and the assignees were ordered, when they had received the price from the buyer after the bankruptcy, to pay to the principal.

This was first decided where there was no del credere commission. Garrat v Callum, Buller's N. P. 42.

The effect of an obligation under a del credere commission may appear to make an essential difference, and to be decisive against this doctrine (since the principal is not obliged to take the bills of the buyer in payment, but entitled to look only to the factor); but the factor's obligation here is as guarantee, or rather, properly speaking, as insurer; and though he gets a premium to insure the solvency of those to whom he sells, yet where he fails the buyer is the debtor to the principal, the factor debtor only for the loss that may arise from insolvency. Accordingly this was decided in a case where there was such a commission. Ex parte Murray, Dec. 1783, Cook's B. L. p. 400.

⁵ Rabone v Williams, 7 Term. Rep. 360, note (a). Rabone, senior, & Co., of Exeter, were factors for Rabone, junior, and sold goods to Williams. The factors failed before receiving the price from Williams; and he, when called on by the principal, set off a debt due to him by the factors, alleging that the plaintiff—Rabone, junior—had not appeared at all in the transaction, and that credit had been given by Rabone & Co., the factors, and not by the plaintiff. The set-off was allowed.

In the former edition of Cook's Bankrupt Law, a doctrine very opposite was laid down on the authority of Escot v Milward, tried two years before the above case. But Mr. Cook had mistaken the decision, which proceeded entirely upon the ground of fraud between the factor and purchaser, as appears from an accurate note of the case obtained from Mr. Justice Buller, who tried the case. 7 Term. Rep. 361. It was upon the strength of the erroneous report of Escot's case that the new trial was applied for in the above case of Rabone & Co.

A case was, conformably to this doctrine, decided by Lord Kenyon at Guildhall.

George v Olagget. George, a clothier at Frome, employed Rich & Heapy, of London, as factors under a del credere commission. Besides acting as factors, they dealt in woollen cloth on their own account, and all their business was done at one warehouse. Olagget bought woollen cloth from Rich & Heapy for exportation, at the price of £1237. The cloth was taken out of a general mass in the warehouse, and Rich & Heapy made out a bill of parcels in their own name, never disclosing factor is entrusted with property or money of his principal to buy stock, Exchequer bills, etc., and misapplies it, the produce will be the principal's, if still clearly distinguishable. And although it has been attempted to be maintained, that such misapplication not being in execution of the trust, the property acquired could not be held as acquired for the principal, but as added to the general stock of the factor, leaving the principal a creditor; this has been rejected as mischievous in principle, and supported by no authority in law.¹

to Clagget that George was owner of the goods. Rich & Heapy became bankrupts, and George gave notice to Clagget not to pay the price of a part of the goods, amounting to £142, as to that extent the goods were his. But Clagget stood as endorsee of a bill of Rich & Heapy for £1198; and a question arose, Whether he was entitled to set off this bill against the price of the woollen cloth? Lord Kenyon was of opinion that he was. A new trial was applied for, and the Court was clearly of opinion that the direction given by the learned judge on the trial was right, and that the case was not distinguishable from that of Rabone v Williams. 7 Term. Rep. 359. [See the notes to George v Clagget in Smith's Leading Cases, vol. ii.; also in same vol., Paterson v Gandasequi, Addison v Gandasequi, Thomson v Davenport, and notes.]

¹ Taylor v Sir Thomas Plumer, 1815. Sir T. Plumer employed Walsh, a stockbroker. Intending to buy an estate, he consulted Walsh about the proper time of selling out stock, and afterwards gave Walsh an order to sell out. He accordingly sold to the amount of £21,774, 5s. The stock was transferred by Sir Thomas, and Walsh received the money and paid it into Sir Thomas' bankers. It was then proposed to invest it till wanted in Exchequer bills, and Sir Thomas gave Walsh a cheque for £22,000, to be laid out in Exchequer bills, to be delivered on the same day to Sir Thomas or his banker. Walsh bought Exchequer bills with £6500, which he lodged at the bankers. With eleven of the Bank of England notes of £1000, received from the banker, he bought from an American merchant American bank shares and stock of the United States. He with other of the notes bought bullion. He then went off for America, taking the way of Lisbon, and was overtaken at Falmouth, when he surrendered the certificates and bullion, and gave an assignment in trust for payment to Sir Thomas of £15,500, the difference between the Exchequer bills lodged in the bankers and the £22,000; and he also gave a double bond for the sum. A commission having been issued, an action of trover was brought by his assignees against Sir Thomas Plumer. A verdict was given for the plaintiffs for the bank stock and American stock, and for the bullion separately, subject to the opinion of the Court on a case. Lord Ellenborough delivered the opinion of the Court. He said: 'The plaintiff in this case is not entitled to recover if the defendant has succeeded in maintaining these propositions in point of law, viz. that the property of a principal entrusted by him to his factor for any special purpose belongs to the principal, notwithstanding any change which that property may have undergone in point of form, so long as such property is capable of being identified and distinguished from all other property. And, secondly, That all property thus circumstanced is equally recoverable from the assignees of the factor in the event of his becoming a bankrupt, as it was from the factor himself before his bankruptcy. And indeed, upon a view of the authorities, and consideration of the arguments, it should seem that if the property in its original state and form was covered with a trust in favour of the principal, no change of that state and form can divest it of such trust, or give the factor, or those who represent him in right, any other more valid claim in respect to it than they respectively had before such change. An abuse of trust can confer no rights on the party abusing it, nor on those who claim in privity with him. The argument which has been advanced in favour of the plaintiffs, that the property of the principal continues only so long as the authority of the principal is pursued in respect to the order and disposition of it, and that it ceases when the property is tortiously converted into another form for the use of the factor himself, is mischievous in principle, and supported by no authorities of law. And the position which was held out in argument on the part of the plaintiffs, as being the untenable result of the arguments on the part of the defendant, is no doubt a result deducible from those arguments; but unless it be a result at variance with the law, the plaintiffs are not on that account entitled to recover. The contention on the part of the defendant was represented by the plaintiff's counsel as pushed to what he conceived to be an extravagant length, in the defendant's counsel being obliged to contend that, "If A is trusted by B with money to purchase a horse for him, and he purchases a carriage with that money, then B is entitled to the carriage." And indeed, if he be not so entitled, the case on the part of the defendant appears to be hardly sustainable in argument. It makes no difference in reason or law into what other form different from the original the change may have been made, whether it be into that of promissory-notes for the security of the money which was produced by the sale of the goods of the principal, as in Scott v Surman, Willis 400; or into other merchandise, as in Whitcomb v Jacob, Salk. 160: for the product of or substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself as long as it can be ascertained to be such; and the right only ceases when the means of ascertainment fail, which is the case when the subject is turned into money, and mixed and confounded in a general mass of the same description. The difficulty which arises in such a case is a difficulty of fact, and not of law; and the dictum that money has no ear-mark must be understood in the same way, i.e. as predicated only of an undivided and undistinguishable mass of current money. But money in a bag, or otherwise kept apart from other money, guineas, or other coin marked (if the fact were so) for the purpose of being distinguished, are so far ear-marked as to fall within the rule on this subject which applies to every other description of personal property whilst it remains (as the property in question did) in the hands of the factor or his general legal representatives.' His Lordship then went into a discussion of the previous cases, and concluded with saying that the difficulty in respect of proof which occasioned doubt in any of those cases, does not stand between the original proprietor and his rights in respect to the ascertained produce of his own funds

6. Where the factor purchases goods for behoof of his principal, but on his own [268] general current account, without mention of the principal, the goods vest in the factor, and the principal has only an obligation against the factor's estate.¹ But where the factor, after purchasing the goods, writes to his principal that he has bought such a quantity of goods in consequence of his order, and that they are lying in his warehouse or elsewhere, the property would seem to be vested in the principal.

Thus, the general rule may be laid down, that in all cases of factory, where the property remitted by the principal, or acquired for him by his order, is found distinguishable in [269] the hands of the factor, capable of being traced by a clear and connected chain of identity, in no one link of it degenerating from a specific trust into a general debt; the creditors of the factor, who has become a bankrupt, have no right to the specific property. The case quoted below shows the discriminations necessary in the application of the doctrine.²

6. NEGOTIORUM GESTIO.—I may here briefly dispose of the analogous contract of NEGOTIORUM GESTIO, which is a species of spontaneous factory; one interfering, from friendship or benevolence, in the affairs of another, without authority. In this situation, still less than in factory, is there any alteration of the property which comes into the possession of the gestor. Thus, Mr Seton, brother to the Earl of Winton, assumed, during the Earl's absence, the management of his estate, and entered into a contract with Hay, Mitchell, & Gordon for the sale of 400 bolls of the wheat of the estate. He engaged to deliver the wheat at a certain place, and they to pay the price to him, or his order. The wheat was accordingly delivered; but before the price was paid, Mr Seton died; and his creditors having attached on this occasion: 'He has repossessed himself of that of which, according to the principles established in the cases I have cited, he never ceased to be the lawful proprietor; and having so done, we are of opinion that the assignees cannot in this action recover that which, if an action were brought against them, the assignees, by the defendant, they could not have effectually retained against him, inasmuch as it was trust-property of the defendant, which as such did not pass to them under the commission.' 3 Maule and Sel. 562. [See Add. Cont. 6th ed. 588.]

¹ Boylston v Robertson & Fleming, 1672, M. 15125. Boylston in London employed Mackelwood in Halifax to buy linen cloth for him, and sent money for the purpose. The factor sent Palmer, her servant, and purchased the cloth; and having left it in the hands of Robertson, a third party, it was there arrested by a creditor of the factor, Mackelwood. Boylston claimed the goods. Evidence was taken, and two witnesses swore that Palmer subscribed in the transaction as servant to Mackelwood; and that the cloth was bought and received by him in her name, and for her use. Mackelwood deposed that she was employed by Boylston to buy the cloth, and sent the money furnished by him with Palmer, who again swore he bought the cloth for the use of Boylston. The Court found, that the cloth being bought in name and for the use of Mackelwood, the property was thereby stated in her person, and not in the person of Boylston, although she had a mandate or trust from him, which is but a personal obligation. But property or dominion is transmitted or constituted only by possession; and Boylston had got no possession of the linen cloth, either by himself, or by any in his name to his use. Lord Stair (i. 12. 16) and Erskine (iii. 3. 34) lay it down, that the mandatory receiving money from his principal, but buying goods in his own name, becomes proprietor: the real right is in him, and there is an obligation on him to transmit them to his constituent.

² Ex parte Sayers, 5 Ves. jun. 169. Sayers, paymaster of the forces in the island of Dominica, wrote to Cheap & Co. of London to purchase for him certain kinds of foreign coin, and enclosed for them bills upon the paymaster-general for £16,000. For this amount he desired them to give him credit; and he drew upon them for £2000. Cheap & Co. discounted the bills; and not being able to procure the coin in England, they remitted £5000 to Peter & Co. at Lisbon, with directions to purchase the coin wanted, or, if not to be procured, to return the money in good bills. They afterwards sent a similar sum with the same directions. Not being able to procure the coin, Peter & Co. sent back the money in good bills not endorsed by them; and Cheap & Co. having become bankrupts, those bills came into the hands of the assignees, and Sayers petitioned to have them delivered up as specifically his property. Lord Chancellor Loughborough, in deciding this case, proceeded upon the following grounds:—1st, That the money was sent for a particular purpose to Cheap & Co. 2dly, That the correspondence showed the remittance by them to Lisbon to have been made for the specific purpose of executing the trust by making the purchase. 3dly, That if coin had been returned, it would have been specifically the property of Sayers, and not a general debt, as being purchased by his order with money remitted for the purpose. 4thly, That if Sayers had gone to Lisbon he might have stopped the transaction, and taken bills instead of the coin ordered. 5thly, That the bills when sent to London might equally well have been taken by Sayers had he been there; and, on the whole, that the right of Sayers to the bills should be allowed. His Lordship at the same time acknowledged the case to be difficult, and offered to take it for further consideration. The general ground of his decision was this: 'That the money acquired an identity, and a distinction from all the rest of the fund, by the application of it in sending it to Portugal.'

the price, a contest ensued with the creditor of the Earl of Winton, who attached it as the property of the Earl. The Court found that the grain was not Mr Seton's, and therefore that the price could not be claimed by his creditors.¹

There are some other cases of frequent occurrence, which may here be explained, as presenting difficulties respecting the property of goods, or bills, or money.

I.—GOODS SENT ON SALE AND RETURN.

It has been often questioned, Whether goods sent on sale and return, are in the same condition, in respect of the law of reputed ownership, as goods in the hands of a factor?

1. Sometimes goods are sent by a manufacturer or wholesale dealer to a retail trader, in the hope that he may be induced to purchase them, on the understanding that what he may choose to take, he shall receive on the footing of the contract of sale; what he does not take, are to be in his hands for the consignor. Here the goods not purchased are not held to fall under reputed ownership; but they are, on the footing of deposit or factory, in the consignee's hands for benefit of the creditors of the consignor.

[270] 2. Where goods are sent subject to approbation, the simple fact of possession, without some act of acceptance to change the property, will still leave the property undisturbed by reputed ownership.

3. Where goods are sent on the proper footing of sale and return, the transaction is commonly of this nature:—The wholesale dealer sends goods periodically, which the retail dealer is to sell. The settlement is monthly, or quarterly, or annually, at a certain rate (as, perhaps, at invoice price, or with a certain deduction from invoice price), and the stock is to be kept up to a certain proportion. If the retail dealer find the commodity does not take the market at any particular time, he may stop sales, and return upon the consignor what is unsold. This is frequent in the woollen manufactory, in bookselling, and in several other lines of trade. The question is, Whether, in case of a bankruptcy of the retail dealer, the goods which are in his hand unsold are the property of the wholesale trader; or can, on the footing of reputed ownership, be made responsible to the creditors of the retailer? It has been held in England, that the goods so in the hands of the retailer are in his order and disposition, and, by the law of reputed ownership, liable to his creditors.² And the

¹ Hay v Hay, etc., 1707, M. 15128.

² Livesay v Hood, 1809, 2 Camp. 84. By agreement between Livesay, a wholesale hosier, and Almond, a retailer, the former was to supply the latter with hosiery goods upon sale or return, and to keep up the stock to £100; the settlement to be monthly, Almond to pay the invoice price, deducting five per cent. The bill of parcels bore, 'J. Almond from Livesay & Co.' At the end of the first month the account was settled, the articles sold paid for, and the stock agreement made up to £100 worth. About the end of the second month Almond failed, with goods in his shop, furnished as above, to the value of £61. The question was, Whether the assignees under Almond's commission were entitled to the goods? The plea for Livesay was, that Almond was a factor. But Mr. Justice Lawrence directed a nonsuit, as the goods appeared to the world as Almond's property, and this reputed ownership was calculated to gain him a delusive credit. [Shaw v Harvey, 1 A. and E. 920.]

Gibson v Bray, 1817, 1 Holt 556. Here goods were sent to Markham on sale and return, and so expressed in the invoice. Markham not being at home, the goods were taken in, and the carriage paid by his servant. He afterwards became bankrupt, while the parcel containing the goods remained unopened. This was a strong case for the original owner of the goods, and the statute of reputed ownership was held not to apply. Gibbs, Chief Justice, said: 'We all know what is meant by the ordinary terms of sending goods on sale and return. They become the property of the trader so far that he may sell them either for money or credit, and receive the proceeds; but if he is unable to sell them, the seller cannot, as a matter of course, call upon him for the value of the goods, but he has a right to return them in specie. He is not a factor, nor anything like it.' He adds: 'Goods sent upon sale and return, in the ordinary meaning of that contract, are within the order and disposition of the bankrupt: he deals with them as his own stock, they procure him credit; but it is not reasonable that those who so trust him should take their chance with his other creditors. It is, however, a strong feature in this case which sustains the claim of the plaintiff (the consignor), that the parcel so sent was never opened, nor taken to, by any express act of acceptance on the part of the bankrupt.' A verdict was directed for the plaintiff, same decision would probably be given in Scotland; such a transaction, with the uncontrolled power in the consignee, being a fair ground of extended credit.¹

subject to the opinion of the Court. The Court of Common Pleas was of opinion that this was not a case of reputed ownership under the Act.

¹ [The contract of sale and return is one in this country of some importance, from the large amount of property under its operation. It appears not to be well understood as yet by law writers. The author assumes that goods sent on sale and return are not sold, but deposited. Mr. Brown (Sale, p. 37) treats this contract as a sale of goods under a suspensive condition—only sold if re-sold; if not re-sold, to be returned. The question, what the real nature of the transaction is, arises sometimes with regard to the property in the goods, and sometimes as to the periculum in case of their destruction damno fatali while in the hands of the retailer not re-sold. On Mr. Brown's view of its nature, neither the property nor the periculum would pass pendente conditione, i.e. until the first sale became absolute either by a re-sale, or by the lapse, without return of the goods, of a reasonable time, according to the usage of the trade, within which, if not returned, they should be considered absolutely sold. See Brown, Nos. 47, 509–55. In another passage, however, he deals with a similar transaction as a sale with a resolutive condition annexed (No. 625). If the transaction be a resolutive sale, the property passes from the date of delivery, and the risk from that of sale. In Gibson v Bray, supra, Gibbs, C. J., holds that the property passes, which it could not do by an incomplete sale such as a sale on a suspensive condition is. Where the retailer is 'not a factor, nor anything like it,' it is difficult to see whence he has his power of selling at what price he pleases, or of pledging, or even giving away gratuitously,—all which things are understood to be competent to him, if it is not from his jus disponendi as proprietor. Parsons (Contr. i. 539) says that in these 'sales on condition, called contracts of sale and return, the property in the goods passes to the purchaser, subject to an option in him to return them within a fixed period or a reasonable time,' i.e. such contracts are sales under a resolutive condition. See Moss v Sweet, 16 Q. B. 493 (overruling Iley v Frankenstein, 8 Scott N. R. 839; and Lyons v Barns, 2 Stark. 39); Beverley v Lincoln Gas Light and Coke Co., 6 A. and E. 829; Bayley v Gouldsmith, Peake Cas. 56; Neate v Ball, 2 East 116. And see also the American cases cited by Parsons, ib., and by Story (Sale, sec. 249), who seems to regard them as sales upon a condition subsequent or resolutive; for he holds the property to vest by delivery in the vendee. In Delauney v Barker, 2 Starkie 539, Abbott, C. J., held that where goods were delivered to a person on sale and return, he had no authority to pledge them; but unless the circumstances of the pledging indicated a mere intention to obtain goods by swindling, this is contrary to the usual mercantile understanding, which is, that in such a case a retailer's rights of disposal are unlimited. The Contract of Sale and Return is the contractus æstimatorius of the civil law. Heineccius, ad Pand. par. 3, sec. 339 et seq., Dig. 19. 3. 1, 1 pr. See also Pothier, Pand. Justin. 19. 3, vol. i. p. 548; Mackelvey, sec. 449, and places cited. The Roman lawyers were uncertain how to classify it, whether as sale, locatio, conductio, mandate, or partnership; and then ended by appropriating to it—tolendæ dubitationis gratiâ—a peculiar form of action, De æsti- mato. Ulpian, Poth. ubi sup. As to the periculum, Ulpian in one place lays it down that it is his who receives the goods on sale or return; and in another, draws the distinction whether the transaction is gone into at the request of the giver or that of the receiver of the goods, the person at whose request it is gone into bearing the risk: if it is at the request of neither in particular, but of mutual consent, the receiver is bound only dolum et culpam præstare. On one occasion in Glasgow, where a considerable quantity of valuable goods held by a retail jeweller on sale and return were destroyed in an accidental fire, the understanding of merchants seemed to be that the risk lay with the retailer, but on different grounds, some viewing it as a sale, which, when followed by delivery, passed the property to the retailer, with all powers incident to property, and with no power in the wholesale dealer to re-demand the goods, though the retailer had the option of returning them within reasonable time; others holding that the property was understood to remain with the wholesale dealer till sale, or failure to return after demand, or the lapse of a reasonable time, but that there was a duty on the retailer to insure for behoof of whom it might concern, which in this case had been neglected. The truth is, that the nature of the bargain is not always the same. The express terms differ; and the implications arising from the circumstances and understood relations of parties, and the necessities of different branches of trade, create further differences in regard to the real intention of the parties. What at first sight appears to be one form of transaction, will, on inquiry, be found to vary through a series of gradations from sale under resolutive conditions to pure agency. Thus, it is not unusual in certain trades for an avowed agent to have goods put into his hands for sale with a price fixed by his principal, below which he is not to sell, but with an arrangement that, if he can sell for more, he is to have the excess either as the only commission he is to look for, or as an addition to a commission fixed at a low rate. This is merely agency. The creditors of the agent could not, it seems, attach the goods, nor would the agent be liable for their natural deterioration or accidental destruction. But this is sometimes complicated by the agent standing del credere, and even guaranteeing that he will sell not less than a certain amount of the goods; and he is sometimes required to accept the principal's drafts against goods sent him, in anticipation of the sales, in order to give the principal the use of the money before it is received by the agent from the customer. Sometimes the receiver of the goods is both a buyer and seller on his own account, and an agent for the purchase and sale of such goods for other people; and there is a difficulty in ascertaining in which of these capacities he acts on a particular occasion. Sometimes the value of the goods sent is so large in proportion to the credit which the retailer could command from the wholesale dealer on his personal obligation, that it is manifest there is no intention in the wholesale dealer of parting with the property; as where a jeweller is entrusted with a very costly service of gold plate or sets of diamonds worth several thousand pounds. Sometimes a retail dealer applies to a manufacturer or wholesale merchant to send him goods on sale and return. These are invoiced as

II.—TRANSACTIONS WITH BANKERS.

The general rule is, that where a banker fails possessed of his customer's property, distinguishable from his own, it does not pass to his creditors, but may be vindicated by the true owner, subject to such liens as the banker may have over it.¹

In transactions relative to bills between bankers and their customers, it is not always easy to distinguish precisely, on the failure of the banker, what the nature of the contract is to which the transaction is referable, and where the property is.²

[271] 1. Bills discounted in a single transaction are bought by the banker, and are the property of his creditors on his bankruptcy.³

2. But when a bill is sent to a banker, not for discount, but for a special purpose, as for the purpose of negotiation, or to get payment, the banker is a mere agent, and the bill, being distinguishable, is the property of the principal.⁴

The ordinary and more correct way of entering this transaction in the books, is by what is called a short entry; that is to say, stating the amount in an inner column, and carrying it out into the account between the parties only when the bill is paid. Thus, the amount of the bill, while unpaid, does not go into account at all between the parties; and the banker is a mere agent holding the property of the customer, which on the banker's failure makes no part of his estate, unless upon inquiry it shall appear that between the parties they were held as cash, the onus of which is on the banker.⁵

'Bought of so and so—on sale or return within twelve months.' The price is stated, and sometimes there is a special statement as to risk being the buyer's. Sometimes a manufacturer attempts to force his goods on the market by getting a dealer to take them at his request on terms similar or slightly varied—sometimes expressly at the sender's risk till re-sale. It may sometimes bear on the question of risk, and even on that of property, whether the goods are sent rogatu accipientis or rogatu dantis, as Heineccius expresses it (supra, sec. 341). Occasionally the terms are clearly expressive of a suspensive condition. But where, notwithstanding conditions apparently suspending the completion of any sale between them, the manufacturer by the bargain invests the dealer with all the powers usually annexed to property, reserving to himself, in the event of their exercise by the dealer, only a claim against him for the price fixed between them, it will be a question whether the substance and reality of the transaction does not control the mere wording of the invoice or other documents; and whether the transaction, if it does not on the one hand resolve into a mere agency for the manufacturer, can be anything on the other but an interim sale and delivery, with a power of resolution in a certain event. As to what is a reasonable time for return of goods, see Parsons, and Story's note, ubi supra, and cases there. A sale 'on trial or approval' is a totally different transaction (as to which, see Brown, Sale, Nos. 43-7, 625-6; and Benjamin, Sale, pp. 441-2), though sometimes dealers confound names. See also Pothier, Vente, secs. 264-6, 311; Oblig. No. 224; Pardessus, Cours de Droit Commerce, vol. i. 294, 370.]

¹ Walker v Burnell, Douglas 303; Bryson v Wylie, 1 Bos. and Pul. 83; Bolton v Puller, 1 Bos. and Pul. 539.

² [As to bills, see Thomson on Bills, p. 541 et seq., and Grant on Banking, ch. vi. 2d ed.]

³ Carstairs v Bates, 1813, 3 Camp. 301. Kensington & Co., bankers, discounted three bills for Allport, the drawer, and credited him with the amount, debiting him with the discount, so that, deducting the discount, they were placed to his account as cash which he might have drawn out. A balance was at this time due to Allport, when the bankers failed. Lord Ellenborough held the bankers here to be purchasers of the bill, of which the whole property and interest vested in them, they standing all risks from the moment of discount; so that, if burnt or stolen, it would have been lost to them. Verdict for Carstairs, assignee of the banker.

See ex parte Sargeant, below, note 5.

See also Giles v Perkins, below, p. 291, note 1; and Parke v Elleason, p. 291, note 4.

⁴ Bruce v Hurley, 1815, 1 Starkie 24. Bruce & Co., London bankers, held a certain note, with other securities, from Young & Co., bankers at Taunton; and on the day before the note became due, Bruce & Co. sent it down to Young & Co. to get payment. It was not paid; and Young & Co. failing, it was found by their assignees among their papers. In an action of assumpsit by Bruce & Co., as endorsers, against Hurley, the maker of the note, Bruce & Co. produced the letter enclosing the note to Young & Co., and proved that this note had been placed with them as a security, and the custom of sending such notes back to the correspondents to get payment. Young & Co. had overdrawn the amount of their securities in Bruce's hands. Lord Ellenborough was of opinion that there was evidence to show that the note had been sent down by the plaintiffs to Young & Co. for the purpose of procuring payment, and the plaintiffs had a verdict.

See ex parte Aikin, 2 Maddock 192, where bills were by a customer placed with his banker, to be applied in providing for the customer's acceptances, and they were found not to be distributable among the banker's creditors. [See Patten v Royal Bank, 1853, 15 D. 617.]

⁵ In the case of Sargeant, p. 291, note 1, Lord Chancellor Eldon said: 'It is quite clear that short bills, in the possession of bankers, are to be considered as still remaining in the

Even where the bills are sent to the banker indefinitely, and entered not short, but generally in account, it would appear that they are not to be held as discounted, or as the property of the banker, unless where the customer has been allowed credit to their amount, and has drawn upon it;¹ or at least the customer is allowed to draw checks to the [272] amount, the banker has uncontrolled power over the bills, and the customer is credited and debited with interest.²

3. The bills are still more clearly to be held as the customer's, where the agreement with the banker is, that the customer shall be permitted to draw only a certain proportion of the amount. This is a very common arrangement with bankers. The bills are blank endorsed, and the banker receives payment when due. If he fail before they are due, the bills belong to the depositor, under a lien for the advances.³

4. Where the banker has received bills at long dates, and has on the security of them given bills or accepted drafts at shorter dates, for the purpose of discounting, the long-dated bills seem to be with the banker only in pledge; so that the customer may demand them on the banker's failure, provided he relieve the estate of the short-dated drafts.⁴

possession of the parties by their agents, to be specifically returned; and if these bills were written short, the petitioner could have compelled Kensington & Co. so to settle with Burrough as not to break in on his claim.' 1 Rose 153.

¹ Giles v Perkins, 9 East 12. Dickenson & Co., bankers at Birmingham, had an account with Giles. On 12th November 1805 Giles paid in three bills, amounting to £1100. They were endorsed by him, but not due till December and January. Dickenson & Co. failed on 18th November. Independently of these bills, there was a large balance due by them to Giles. The assignees considered the bills as having been entered in the books in common with cash, so that Giles might have drawn for the amount, and they refused to deliver them up to him. Lord Ellenborough was of opinion that Giles was entitled to the bills. On a motion for a new trial, his Lordship said: 'Every man who pays bills not then due into the hands of his banker, places them there, as in the hands of his agent, to obtain payment of them when due. If the banker discount the bill, or advance money upon the credit of it, that alters the case: he then acquires the entire property in it, or has a lien on it pro tanto for his advance. The only difference between the practice stated of London and country bankers in this respect is, that the former, if overdrawn, has a lien on the bill deposited with him, though not endorsed; whereas the country banker, who always takes the bill endorsed, has not only a lien upon it, if his account be overdrawn, but has also his legal remedy upon the bill by the endorsement; but neither of them can have any lien on such bills until their account be overdrawn: and here the balance of the cash account, at the time of the bankruptcy, was in favour of the plaintiff.' Per curiam. Rule refused.

Ex parte Sargeant, in the matter of Burrough, 1810. Sargeant employed Burrough, a banker at Salisbury, as his banker, and had been in the habit of paying bills and cash indiscriminately into his account, and they were entered without distinction. He paid in two bills, not due till after Burrough's bankruptcy, and Burrough remitted them to Kensington & Co., his London agents, in whose hands they remained at Burrough's bankruptcy; the balance on Kensington & Co.'s account being in Burrough's favour. Sargeant petitioned, on Burrough's bankruptcy, to have those two bills delivered up, or their amount from the estate. Lord Chancellor Eldon, after laying down, as above in note 5, p. 290, the doctrine as to short bills, says: 'That these bills were not written short amounts to nothing, unless there be a concurrence, manifested at the time, or to be inferred from the habits of dealing between the parties, that they were to be considered as cash. If they were there with the petitioner's knowledge as cash, and he drawing or entitled to draw upon them as having that credit in cash, he would thereby be precluded from recurring to them specifically; but it is upon them to prove that to be the case, and the petitioner is therefore entitled, unless they have been carried to his credit as cash, with his knowledge or consent.

'Take an inquiry before the commissioners, and declare the petitioner entitled to the proceeds of the bills, unless by his consent, or from the habit of dealing between the parties, they can be considered as cash.' 1 Rose 153.

² Thomson v Giles, 2 Barn. and Cress. 422. [Add. Contr. 6th ed. 423.]

³ See below, p. 294.

⁴ Parke v Elleason. Parke sent to Persent and Bodecker bills blank endorsed for £4833, to be allowed to draw, without renewals, at two or three months. The bankers answered that they had discounted the bills, and that short drafts would meet due honour. Parke accordingly drew to the amount at three months, and the drafts were accepted; but soon after the bankers failed, with Parke's bills in their hands. The assignees under the commission received the contents; but none of Parke's drafts having been paid, an action was raised against the assignees. Lord Kenyon said: 'If the bills had been taken upon a simple proposal to discount them, the transaction would have been merely that of a purchase, and no question could have arisen. But this is nothing like a case of discount, but the bills were placed in their hands to answer a particular purpose.' Referring to the cases of Tooke v Hollingsworth (see above, p. 281, note 1), and Bent v Fuller (see above, p. 282, note 1), as settling the distinction between bills paid into a banker's hand on a running account, and the case of a single transaction, where a deposit is made for a special purpose, Lord Kenyon added that he would make no exceptions or nice distinctions; and that the bills here were deposited to enable Parke to draw; and that those very bills, having an ear-mark on them, remained distinguished from the

[273] 5. Where a bank allows credit on bills deposited, the property is not changed while the credit is not operated on ; but it is sometimes agreed that the banker shall have it in his power to discount all or any of the bills, when the credit is drawn out. And when bankrupts' property at their bankruptcy. The rest of the judges agreed that this was a deposit of bills for a specific purpose, though the word discount was used ; and the condition not having been complied with, the depositor was entitled to have them back. 1 East, Rep. 544.

Bolton v Puller. Forbes and Gregory carried on business in London under the firm of Barton, Forbes, & Gregory. They also were partners of the house of Charles Caldwell & Co., bankers at Liverpool. The Liverpool house had connections with the London company, and there was an open current account between them. Bolton, a merchant in Liverpool, employed the Liverpool house as his bankers, and they procured his bills drawn payable in London, to be paid by the London company. The payments so made were by the London house carried to account with the Liverpool house, who stated them in their account with Bolton. In the Liverpool house account, Bolton was debtor for the bills payable in London, and for cash drawn by him ; and he was creditor for all bills and cash paid in. Bolton accepted bills payable in London for £19,000 ; and, to enable the Liverpool house to provide for them, he delivered certain bills. The London house failed, and then the Liverpool ; and Bolton had £2000 due to him by the latter. None of the acceptances were provided for by the bank, and Bolton retired them. Two of Bolton's bills came into the hands of the assignees of the London house, and the action was trover to recover them. Lord Chief Justice Eyre, after stating the case, said : 'The question is, whether the plaintiff can maintain his action upon this case ? For him it is urged that the house in London is a house of trade, carried on by two of the partners in the banking-house at Liverpool, though it is admitted that the trade carried on in London is the separate estate of those two partners. It is insisted that the bills in their hands remained in the same state, subject to the same rules of law and equity, as would have applied to them in the possession of the house at Liverpool ; and that, having been appropriated (as it is called) or delivered to the house at Liverpool for a special purpose, and not having been ultimately applied to that purpose, and remaining in specie in their possession, Bolton would have been entitled to demand to have them delivered up to him by the banking-house at Liverpool, or by the assignees of that house, supposing them to have come to the hands of those assignees. I take it to be now settled, that bills in the hands of a banker, like goods in the hands of a factor, in the event of a bankruptcy, are to be delivered up, subject only to the lien which the banker may have upon them for the balance of his account. On the other hand, it is clear that if endorsed bills are deposited with a banker, and they are by him negotiated to a third person, though the purpose for which they were deposited should be ever so cruelly disappointed by his becoming bankrupt, the original owner can have no claim to recover them in trover against such third person. The present seems to be a middle case, and, I believe, is a new one. We must endeavour to ascertain to which class it belongs. The true nature of that transaction has been warmly disputed in the course of the argument, but it comes out to be simply this : Bolton paid into his bankers' hands these bills on his general account for a particular purpose. This has been called an appropriation, and legal consequences are deduced from thence, as if appropriation was a technical term, or at least was used in some definite or precise sense ; whereas no term in popular use can be more general, or more uncertain in its import. In truth, when I say these bills were paid in on a general account for a particular purpose, I mean only to say that the object which the parties had in their view was, that the bankers might be enabled to provide for the payment of Mr. Bolton's acceptances in London. So far from being appropriated to any particular purpose, in the strict sense of the word, the bills in specie were not intended to be applied to any other purpose than to be converted into cash, in order to increase Mr. Bolton's credit with his bankers ; and, in the nature of things, they could not be applied in specie to the particular purpose of paying Mr. Bolton's acceptances in London. These bills, at least the bills in question, were remitted to the house in London, on the general account of the banking-houses. We cannot think that this was a misapplication, or that the confidence of Mr. Bolton was abused. It may be asked, assuming that Mr. Bolton considered both houses to be in full credit, Was it not the very thing he meant ? Was not this the probable mode by which the banking-house would be enabled to provide for the payment of Mr. Bolton's acceptances at the house of Forbes & Gregory ? They were to be dealt with as the banking-house thought fit to deal with them,—to be negotiated if they thought fit, to be discounted at Liverpool if they pleased, or remitted to whom they pleased ; and were necessarily to be converted into money, in order to be means effectual to the purpose even of the parties who deposited them.

'If, then, Forbes and Gregory were parties capable of acquiring a property in these bills, as capable as any third party, and did acquire it without reproach, and, in truth, in pursuance of that agreement upon which they were delivered to the banking-house, why are not Forbes and Gregory to be considered as third persons, with whom these bills have been negotiated ? If they were to be so considered, this determines the class to which I said, in a former part of the argument, we were to endeavour to reduce this middle case—between the case of original parties to the transaction, and the case of a third person holding such bills as these in the ordinary course of the negotiation of bills of exchange.' Judgment for the defendants. 1 Bos. and Pul. 539, 1796.

Cases on Boldero's bankruptcy. In consequence of the failure of the great house of Boldero & Co., several questions of this kind arose, particularly on their dealings with the Hull, Wakefield, and Leeds banks ; and it was held that the property was with the depositor, he relieving the estate of the other engagements. See those cases in 1 Rose 232, 243, 254.

Ex parte Buchanan. The Chancellor ordered the provisional assignee to deliver up short bills, which were in the hands of Kensington & Co., bankers, at the time of their bankruptcy, to the petitioners, bankers at Glasgow, upon their giving security to pay all the bills which Kensington had accepted for them. 1 Rose 280, 1812.

Ex parte Clayton. Kensingtons, bankers, at the time of the bills are so discounted, the property is passed. It is not, however, enough to pass [274] the property as by discount, that the bankers charge interest on the sums overdrawn.¹

6. The banker holding bills with blank endorsements, has it in his power to discount them, although deposited with him only as agent, or for a special purpose;² and in that their bankruptcy, had £5000 of the cash of Clayton & Co. of Preston; the bankers had accepted bills to the amount of £219,000, of which £9000 worth so accepted had been paid by Clayton & Co. (or their payees or the endorsees) to the Crown, for duties upon the excise; the officers of the Crown entered Kensingtons' premises by an extent, and had these bills paid in full by Kensingtons' assignees from the general fund.

Kensingtons' house held, at the time of failure, about £20,000 worth of short bills remitted by Clayton.

The petition of Clayton was, that these short bills might be given back upon his paying all the acceptances, because, by paying them and taking them up, Clayton would not be in any degree indebted to Kensingtons' house, and would therefore be entitled to take all their property remaining in specie.

The order was to the following effect:—

The first thing Clayton had to do was to pay the £6000 which Kensingtons' house had paid to the excise, for that is just the same as if the bills had been paid by Clayton at Preston.

Then all the other acceptances by Kensingtons, which Clayton had received cash for by discounting, must be paid by Clayton, so that they may never appear under Kensingtons' commission.

Clayton must prove and take a dividend upon the £5000 which Kensingtons had in their hands at the time of their bankruptcy.

Then Clayton will be entitled to all the short bills, or bills not due, transmitted by Clayton to Kensingtons, and not discounted by them before the bankruptcy, or to the proceeds of them, if any have been received by Kensingtons' assignees since the bankruptcy. 12 Aug. 1813. [See Smith, Merc. Law, 7th ed. 562.]

¹ Ex parte Madison. C. & T. Shaw established a bank at Southampton, and a correspondence with Staples & Co. in London. There was a special agreement that short bills remitted to Staples & Co. should not be discounted unless Staples & Co. were overdrawn; then they might discount. Staples & Co., however, did not discount when overdrawn, but charged interest instead for the sums overdrawn. The petition prayed the delivery of the short bills to the petitioners.

The Court ordered the assignees of Staples & Co. to pay to the petitioners, as assignees of Shaw & Co., the bills to the amount of £2000, and also the sum of £200 admitted by their counsel to have been received. 12 Nov. 1796, cited by Lord Eldon in ex parte Pease, 1 Rose 241.

² See above, Bolton v Puller, in note, p. 292.

Collins v Martin, 1797, 1 Bos. and Pul. 648. Collins had sent bills to Nightingales, his bankers, endorsed in blank in order to be received by them when due, and carried to his account. They were entered short by the Nightingales, and the balance was in favour of Collins. The Nightingales being in want of money, deposited some of the bills with Martin and other bankers, and got money on the pledge. Collins brought an action of trover against Martin, etc., for the bills pledged in their hands. He was nonsuited by Lord

Chief Justice Eyre at Guildhall; and a rule having been obtained to set aside this nonsuit, the cause came on before the Court of Common Pleas, when the opinion of the Court was delivered by his Lordship thus: 'We are all of opinion that the plaintiff was properly nonsuited. I have little to add to what I stated to be the ground of this nonsuit when I made my report. The counsel for the plaintiff admitted that the bankers might have sold these bills, but it was argued that they could not pledge them; and the case of a factor pledging the property of his principal was urged as an authority, for it was said that bankers have been considered as factors. In questions between bankers, or those representing them, and their customers, they have been considered to some purposes as factors, or in the nature of factors; upon the same principle as in other cases between holders of bills of exchange and acceptors, or the first endorser of bills payable to a man's own order, the truth of the transactions between them has been allowed to be entered into to destroy the prima facie consideration of a bill the supposed value received. But no evidence of want of consideration, or other ground to impeach the apparent value received, was ever admitted in a case between such an acceptor and drawer, and a third person holding the bill for value; and the rule is so strict, that it will be presumed that he does hold for value until the contrary appears. The onus probandi lies on the defendant. If it can be proved that the holder gave no value for the bill, then indeed he is in privity with the first holder, and will be affected with everything which would affect that first holder. This all proceeds upon an argumentum ad hominem: it is saying, You have the title, but you shall not be heard in a court of justice to enforce it against good faith and conscience. In strict law, and with respect to third persons, bankers do not at all resemble factors; nor will the rule that factors cannot pledge apply to the case of a banker pledging endorsed bills. That rule is grounded on the strict rule of property: the goods are not the factor's, and therefore he cannot pledge them. He may sell them; because, though they are not his, he is entrusted to sell them for his principal. He manages the sale; but it is his principal who, through him, sells them. For the purpose of rendering bills of exchange negotiable, the right of property in them passes with the bills. Every holder with the bills takes the property, and his title is stamped upon the bills themselves. The property and the possession are inseparable. This was necessary to make them negotiable; and in this respect they differ essentially from goods, of which the property and possession may be in different persons. The property passing with the possession, it is admitted that a banker who receives endorsed bills from his customers, to be got in when due, and carried to his account, may discount or sell them. Why may he not pledge them? Either is a breach of the confidence reposed in him. He may sell, because the property has been entrusted to him; and he may pledge for the same reason: for he who has the property has a disposing power, and the law has not limited it to be used in any particular manner. Perhaps the confidence reposed in bankers may be abused, and it might be wished that they

[275] case the owner of the bills is a mere personal creditor of the banker. Even a restrictive endorsement does not seem to afford any safeguard.¹

7. If the bill has only been pledged by the banker for less than its amount, the owner of the bill will be entitled to redeem it on paying the sum advanced.

8. The banker has a lien for the general balance of his banking account over all bills placed with him;² unless they have been discounted, in which case they are taken out of the account between the parties.

III.—CONSIGNMENTS OF GOODS FOR ADVANCES AND SALE.

As a banker, in respect of bills sent to be negotiated, sometimes gives permission to the owner of the bills to draw for a certain proportion of the amount, so merchants, factors, and commission agents sometimes agree to a similar mode of dealing. They receive goods to be sold, and allow the owners of the goods to draw for a certain proportion, greater or less, according to the promise of the market. In such a case, it is clear, 1. That if the factor should fail, and the principal should be obliged to pay the bills which he had drawn on the factor, he may demand back, as his unalienated property, the goods consigned. 2. That if the principal should fail and the goods remain unsold, the factor has a lien over the goods to the amount of all engagements on the faith of them. But, 3. If both houses fail while the goods are unsold, and the bills are in the circle, the bill-holder, in the first place, has his claim against each for the amount of the bill, to the effect of receiving on the whole full payment; secondly, The factor's estate has a lien over the goods, to the effect of entire relief and indemnification; and thirdly, The estate of the principal is entitled to demand the goods after such indemnification has been given from the proceeds, or on full security given to relieve the factor and his estate of the bills.

An incidental advantage may arise to the bill-holder in such a case deserving of notice. Although the bill-holder has to trust to the personal credit only of those whose names are on the bill, he may, in certain circumstances, have the benefit of the factor's lien. The factor is liable to his demand, not only in his estate, but in his person; and therefore if the factor be a bankrupt undischarged, he is undoubtedly entitled to resist the demand of the principal to have back the goods, till not only his estate is indemnified for the dividend paid from it, but till the last farthing of the debt be paid for which he can be made personally liable. And so the bill-holder, to the amount of what the factor is liable to pay, will have the benefit of the factor's lien.

SUBSECTION II.—OF THE EFFECT OF CHANGES ON THE PROPERTY ENTRUSTED TO THE BANKRUPT.

[276] Where the goods are extant, and remain unchanged, and capable of complete identification, in the bankrupt's possession, the ipsa corpora must of course be delivered up. But there is a difficulty where the goods have suffered change. In the preceding section some very important cases of this sort have been incidentally considered; but some still remain to be discussed.

could be restrained from abusing their trust. But an arbitrary restriction cannot be imposed: any restriction would possibly check the facility of negotiation. As in cases of other property we say, "Caveat emptor;" so in this particular case we may say to the customer who prefers to entrust his bankers with his bills, and with his cash, rather than be at the trouble of doing his own business, Caveat!

¹ The Legislature, under the momentary impression produced by the great failure among London bankers, enlarged the criminal code by an Act 'for more effectually preventing the embezzlement of securities, etc., left or deposited for safe custody or other special purpose in the hands of bankers, merchants, brokers, attorneys, or other agents.' 52 Geo. III. c. 63. The punishment is transportation not exceeding fourteen years, or an arbitrary punishment as for a misdemeanour. The Act extends to Scotland. It contains an exception of the right of bankers, etc., to sell, negotiate, transfer, etc. securities, etc., over which they have a lien, etc., which by law may entitle them to dispose of them.

² See below, Of Liens.

It is impossible to enter upon this inquiry without recollecting the famous controversy of the Proculiani and Sabiniani concerning specification, which, after a course of perplexed and subtle reasoning, turning on imaginary and vain distinctions, was by Tribonian and the other lawyers appointed by Justinian to digest the Roman jurisprudence, decided according to a rule as distant perhaps from plain sense, or any useful purpose, as the opinions which it professed to reconcile. On the Continent, wherever it remained as law that property might be revindicated by the former proprietors, long after having been purchased and delivered, a claim of restitution must often have attached to subjects in situations very different from those in which they first came into the bankrupt's possession; and this controversy continued, or may still continue, to find a place in jurisprudence.¹

But in this country little room is left for these perplexing subtleties. The [277] occasions on which a proprietor is entitled, on the bankruptcy of one who holds his property, to claim against the creditors of the possessor the surrogatum that has come in place of his goods, are of two kinds: 1. Where the bankrupt has acquired the property by some ¹ Neither the system of the Proculiani, nor that of the Sabiniani, nor the middle opinion of Justinian's lawyers, have been universally approved of abroad. The Proculiani maintained (according to the doctrines of the Stoics) the superiority of form and of the manufacture, and that the new species formed by the workman should belong to him that made it. The Sabiniani, on the other hand, contended that the essential part being the materials, the property of them was not to be changed by the mere alteration of their form and appearance. Like most other disputes of the kind, where the palm that belongs to ingenious and subtle reasoning rather than the plain use and application of a doctrine to the business of life is the object of the disputants, no progress was made in resolving the difficulty or settling the controversy on satisfactory grounds. The dispute proceeded, with great names arrayed on either side, when Justinian, or rather the lawyers whom he employed, pretended to settle it by taking what they called the 'media sententia.' But this conciliating doctrine was founded too much in subtlety: for, 1. Wherever the new species could be restored to its pristine form, the owner of the materials was held the proprietor. 2. Wherever this restoration to the original form was impracticable, the manufacturer was held to be the proprietor, more especially where the new subject was composed partly of the manufacturer's own materials. Instit. lib. 2, tit. 1, De rer. divis. sec. 25.

It was not to be expected that a rule founded on this kind of subtlety should be tamely acquiesced in by modern nations, to whom the Roman jurisprudence was rather a fountain than a code of law. And, accordingly, we find the commentators of various countries contesting this point. One commentator, who is quoted by Vinnius, speaks very judiciously on the subject. He considers it as absurd to enter into these distinctions, and holds that in common sense the point on which the attention should be fixed is the comparative value of the rude material and of the manufacture; Connanus, lib. 3, Comm. 6. Grotius takes another view: he holds that there should be a common property established; De jure belli ac pacis, l. 2, c. 8, n. 19. [See Wylie & Lochhead v Mitchell, 17 Feb. 1870. In Lupton v Whyte, 15 Ves. jun. 432, Lord Eldon held that, where a person under an obligation to keep the property of another separate and distinguishable from his own (in this case it was lead from his own mine and another's), fraudulently mixes them up so as to prevent identification, the other shall have the whole mass, or whatever the person mixing them cannot prove to be his. See L. Chedworth v Edwards, 8 Ves. jun. 46; Panton v Panton, cited 15 Ves. jun. 440.] But Vinnius (Instit. Imper. Com. p. 148) differs from both, and holds that the rule established by Justinian is the true one; for, without regard to value, the point is, Where in truth does the property lie? And to determine this point, the essential question is, Whether the original subject be extinguished or not? This, on the authority of Grotius (Manud. ad Juris. Holl. lib. 2, c. 8), he represents as the modern rule of the Dutch states. Pothier seems to approve of Justinian's middle course, with this qualification, that a certain degree of arbitrary judgment should be reserved to determine according to circumstances. Traité du Droit de Propriété, No. 188.

In the practical jurisprudence of the Continent, it was essential to revindication, in many provinces and states, that the thing should remain unaltered. In Marseilles, it was necessary that the goods should be 'trouvées en nature, et existantes entre les mains du premier acheteur ou de ses commissaires, ou du second acheteur, qui n'en a pas payé le prix au premier.' So it was established by a regulation of the Chamber of Commerce and Consuls, 11th August 1730, confirmed by an arret of the Parliament of Aix, 26th August 1730. In Lyons a similar rule was enacted, 14th December 1722, and 19th January 1731. Nay, in Paris the matter was carried much further; for by an 'Acte de Notoriété du Chatelet,' 13th May 1711, the right of vindication was extinguished if the goods were taken out of their original strings and packages. Denizart, vol. iv. pp. 376, 377. But these rules were in other places thought too harsh and unjust, and plainly the principle of them could not be applied to our questions of revindication: they seem to have proceeded on the idea that, by the change, the presumed power of annulling the conditional trust was at an end. In Rochelle, it was sufficient if the property could be traced, though altered. Valin lays down the rule to be, that wherever there is clear evidence of the identity of the thing, or of what remains of it, it must be restored; nay, that even where the form is changed, brown sugar into white, skins into leather, corn into flour, the proprietor of the original material is entitled to it, on reimbursing the creditors for the addition made to its value. Com. sur les Coutumes de Rochelle, tome 3, p. 150. Basnage delivers the same doctrine, with several cases to illustrate it. Basnage, Traité des Hyp. Œuvres, vol. ii. pp. 68, 69.

fraudulent or illegal title; and, 2. Where he has held it on the footing of a legal contract, requiring temporary possession.

I. PROPERTY ACQUIRED BY FRAUD.—In this case, the bankrupt cannot acquire for his creditors an effectual right by any change which he may make upon the subject; so that all the doctrines of the controversy are out of place in such circumstances.¹ The chief decided cases illustrative of this doctrine are those in which the goods fraudulently acquired have been disposed of by the bankrupt, and where the claim of the proprietor has been for the price.

1. It has been decided that, as a sale of the goods does not divest the original proprietor of his right, the proprietor has a preference for the price where it is still unpaid.²

2. Where the price has been paid in money to the bankrupt, perhaps there may be room for a distinction. While property obtained by fraud is extant in the hands of the bankrupt, the creditors who take that property, or who resist the claim for restitution, are striving to gain by the proprietor's loss: they participate in the fraud of their debtor. In the same way, where the price of the goods sold is still due, they also participate in the fraud in claiming that price. But if the price have been paid to the bankrupt, there is no evidence of the general fund having been increased by it: the presumption, indeed, is rather that the bankrupt has applied it to his own secret purposes. To give a preference, therefore, upon [278] the general fund, would be to risk a gross injustice to the other creditors, and to lay upon them that loss which had been occasioned by the imprudence or misfortune of the owner of the goods.

Although a proof of identification may in many cases be made out,—as where the money may be traced by unquestionable marks into a bank account, or to the purchase of goods which remain extant in the warehouse, or into the hands of a creditor,—and although in such cases the other creditors are benefited by the fraud of the debtor, at least to the extent of what they are thus enabled to draw beyond the dividend, which, without such payment, would have been demandable from the common fund; yet it is an undecided point, whether the proprietor suffering by the fraud is entitled to indemnification.

3. Where the bankrupt has acquired, not goods, but money, by deceit,—as where, by forged documents, or on false pretences, he has induced a person to pay him cash; there, equally as if he had delivered goods, the person defrauded is entitled to indemnification in a question with him who has deceived him. But, as in the case just discussed, it is a difficult, and seems to be an undecided question, whether the person defrauded is entitled to a pre-

¹ In the case of Cave (p. 266, note 2), he had malting the grain obtained by what was held to be a fraud. But 'it was found that the specification by malting did not bar the reduction.' Elchies, Bankrupt, No. 9.

See above, the case of Sir Thomas Plumer, p. 286, note 1.

² Christie & Co. v Fairholmes (already taken notice of on the general question of fraud, p. 263, note 1). Here the claim of the sellers was made while the price of the goods remained in the hands of the bankrupt's consignee, and the sellers were preferred to the creditors of the bankrupt arresting. 1748, M. 4896.

Dunlop v Cruickshanks, 1752, M. 4879, p. 263, note 1, the Court found the goods not transferred, and preferred the sellers to the price in the hands of the purchasers from the bankrupt.

In another branch of the same cause a distinction was taken, the Court thinking the fraud to be of such a kind as to entitle the seller to restitution, but at the same time holding the bargain to be legal, and one in which fides habita erat de pretio. They agreed in this, that were the goods extant in Forbes' (the bankrupt's) hands, Dunlop (the seller) would have direct access to them without the aid of diligence; but as, in fact, the goods were not extant, but had been sold to a third party, the question remained whether Dunlop should have the same access to the price yet in the purchaser's hands without the aid of diligence, and on that ground be preferable to the arresters? And on this point the Lords were of different opinions. 'Some thought that the price came into the place of the goods as surrogatum; but the more general opinion seemed to be, that Dunlop could have no preference upon the price as the same never was his, and that were once that doctrine laid down, there was no saying how far it might go after the goods may have gone through many different hands.' But the cause was not decided upon this view: it was merely an opinion, not a judgment; and however much entitled to respect, there seems to be good reason for questioning the grounds on which it rests.

Robertson's Crs. v Udnies & Patullo, 1757, M. 4941. The sellers of goods obtained by fraud, and sold, were found preferable on the price in the hands of the purchaser from the bankrupt against the arresting creditors of the bankrupt. See above, p. 268, note 1.

ference on the common fund? and whether collateral evidence of identity is admissible to show that the common fund has been enlarged by the money received?¹

II. CHANGE ON PROPERTY POSSESSED ON LEGAL CONTRACT.—Where the possession by the bankrupt is temporary, on the footing of a legal contract, any change produced must either be accidental, or fraudulent, or in the natural course of the contract.

1. No fraudulent change can benefit the creditors, or prevent the owner from getting back his property from them, if in any way distinguishable.²

2. No accidental change, not intended by the owner, is sufficient to destroy the right of the proprietor, unless it should amount to a total destruction of the subject, and necessarily reduce the owner of the goods to claim as a creditor for damages. It would appear that a person whose property (corn, wine, or spirits) had been so mingled with the general mass belonging to the bankrupt, or with that belonging to other persons in his custody, as to be inseparable; or whose rude materials have been manufactured into a different species not reducible to their original state,—should be entitled to have them back as converted, or such a share of the common mass as should correspond with the quantity commingled.

3. Where the change takes place in the necessary course of the contract, which places the property with the bankrupt, the only situation in which the property can be supposed to be altered in consequence of the change, is where the evidence of identity totally [279] disappears, and the bankrupt's obligation resolves into a personal one merely as debtor. The occasion on which this change is most commonly produced, is where a factor is entrusted to buy and sell. But this case has already been fully considered, and may stand as an illustration of the whole doctrine.³

CONCLUSION OF BOOK II.

EFFECT OF RADICAL OBJECTIONS, AND OF CONDITIONS AND PERSONAL EXCEPTIONS ON THE DOCTRINES OF THE PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

In the three Parts into which this Second Book has been divided, Estates in Land, Incorporeal Rights, and Moveable Property have been considered as forming the aggregate fund for the payment of debt. And in those several classes of subjects, the particular act of tradition, or completion of the right which the law has regarded as the badge of transference, has been seen to serve as the criterion of real right. It thus ascertains not only what shall be sent. The truth was, it had been discounted by Bertram, Gardner, & Co. for their own use, and lay in the Royal Bank. Mr. M'Knight having entire reliance on the bankers, believed that the bill would be sent, and in this confidence went to London. Some months after he received notice of the bill being due at the Royal Bank, and his bankers stopped payment. He brought his action against the bankers for damages, in expectation of either being found entitled to a direct preference by restitution, or a judgment for a sum of damages which should cover his loss. The Court, however, decided that he was only a personal creditor for the amount of the bill, and the expense of the loan necessary for taking it up. Jan. 1797, n. r.

¹ M'Knight v Bertram, Gardner, & Co.'s Crs., was a case attended with very peculiar hardship, and which seemed to involve the point now alluded to; but when analyzed, it was found to depend upon different principles. M'Knight had a cash account with Bertram, Gardner, & Co., who were bankers, on which a balance of £1200 having arisen against him, they desired it to be paid up, or a bill or other security to be given for it. A bill for this sum was accordingly drawn and attempted to be discounted at the national banks; but, in the alarmed state of the country at the time (March 1795), this could not be done, and the bill was placed in the bankers' hands as a security. In April Mr. M'Knight sent £1200 to the bankers, and desired them to return the bill, if not discounted, with a receipt for the payment. He called afterwards for the bill, and was told it was not at hand, but should

² See above, Sir Thomas Plumer's case, p. 286, note 1.

³ See above, art. 1 of this section.

be held as the divisible property of the debtor, but also regulates what preference shall be given to one creditor over another in the division of the common fund; or, in other words, what creditor shall be preferred as holding real securities; or who shall be ranked as general creditors, to take only a rateable share of the common fund.

As it is on this criterion that the distinction between real right or Jus in re, and Jus ad rem or personal right, depends, that distinction again regulates the two classes of real and personal creditors. Jus in re is that direct right which we have in a thing by which we call it ours, either entirely and unconditionally, or to a certain effect, and which entitles us to defend it or to recover it from any other person into whose possession it may have come. Jus ad rem is that indirect right which we have to a thing in consequence of an engagement—express or implied—by the person holding the real right to transfer or deliver it, and which entitles us only to an action directed personally against him for enforcing his obligation, and compelling him to deliver the thing if in his possession, or to indemnify us for the loss if it is gone. He who holds a right of the former description is a proprietor, or at least a real and preferable creditor on the particular subject; he whose right is of the latter species is a personal creditor, entitled only to demand payment of his debt, or satisfaction for it, as far as possible, out of the general mass of the debtor's funds.¹

[280] It has appeared, however, in the course of this inquiry, how greatly the simplicity of the doctrine has been disturbed by that necessity which, for the purposes of trade, so often requires that the possession of moveables should be separated from the property. It is further disturbed by the effect of objections to the right of the debtor, as not having been derived from the true proprietor; or as having been brought about by fraud; or as in its original constitution not absolute, but limited to the use of the person conveying it. Again, there are doubts, whether among personal obligations there are not some which truly are conditional of the right of property, and to which creditors must submit as burdens. In these circumstances, the difficulty of arriving at any uniform or satisfactory conclusion has been greatly increased by the frequent changes of opinion among our judges formerly, concerning the comparative pretensions of creditors and of purchasers. Sometimes it has been said that, the transaction of a purchaser with the seller being voluntary, the person who buys must take his risk of the seller's title, according to the maxim, 'Qui cum alio contrahit vel est vel debet esse non ignarus conditionis ejus;' while creditors are purchasers or acquirers ex necessitate legis, and must be protected in the right which they have attached.² At other times it has been maintained that purchasers trust only to the property which stands or appears to stand in the seller, and not at all to personal credit; while creditors are, as it were, the representatives of the bankrupt, and take the property and funds of their debtor, 'tantum et tale,' as they stand in him. Out of this phrase of 'tantum et tale' a new host of difficulties arose: for, taking the sound instead of the sense of the phrase, it has sometimes been held, that creditors come precisely into their debtor's place, so as to be responsible for all his engagements relative to the subject in question, on a footing somewhat similar to that of an heir; and to be entitled to claim no benefit from it, without performing all the counter obligations of the transaction by which the property came into the hands of the debtor, or was allowed to continue with him.

¹ The essential distinction of real and personal rights was represented in the form of action under the Roman law. The actio in rem was thus conceived: 'Aio hanc rem ex jure Quiritium meum esse.' The actio in personam was: 'Aio te mihi dare aut facere oportere.' The former was not directed against any person, but against the property itself, in whose hands soever it might be; the possessors being called only for their interest. The latter was directed against a particular person, whether the property was with him or not. Lord Stair denies that any actions in our practice, except the action of pointing the ground, are strictly of the nature of real actions. Spottiswood considers all reductions of infestments and actions of redemption as properly actiones in rem. But although our actions are, in common practice, more in the nature of the 'actio personalis ad restituendam rem aut pretium;' wherever the accurate discrimination of principle becomes necessary, we must recur to the distinction between the actio in rem and the actio in personam.

² See Dirleton and Stewart, whose opinions stand curiously opposed; voce Comprizer.

The only general doctrine which appears to be safe is, that in all competitions the right of the general body of creditors, or of an individual claiming a preference, is to be regulated strictly according to the criterion by which real right is contradistinguished from personal, unless it can be stated, either,

1. That there is a radical defect in the title by which the bankrupt holds, and on which the right of the general creditors must rest ; or,

2. That his right is radically qualified or conditional, not absolute ; or,

3. That the acquisition of the property on the part of the bankrupt was accomplished by fraud, of which creditors cannot, without participating, take advantage.¹

On the general rule, a very ample commentary has been delivered in the preceding chapters ; in this concluding chapter the exceptions are to be considered.

SECTION I.—RADICAL DEFECT OF TITLE IN THE DEBTOR.

Where, in support of a claim as a Creditor dominii against the general body of creditors, for property alleged not to have been effectually transferred to the debtor, any radical defect can be shown in the title by which the property came to the debtor, the claimant will prevail. Thus it is a radical defect, that the person from whom the property was acquired was [281] incapable of consent ; as being a pupil, a lunatic, or an idiot. It is also a radical defect in the title, that the thing has been stolen,² or obtained by violence ; or that the transference has been procured by force and fear.³ In such cases there is no transference from the true owner. He retains his right as proprietor, and may vindicate that right against creditors.⁴

Such radical defect of title is, in general, available not only against creditors, but against purchasers also:—1. In heritable subjects, the records prove no safeguard against such radical defects ; 2. Incorporeal rights, in such circumstances, cannot be effectually transferred, to the disappointment of the true owner ; and, 3. Moveables can neither be effectually sold, nor impledged (much less taken by creditors on bankruptcy), where they are held by such defective or tainted title.⁵ Moveables sold by a thief, for example, may be claimed or vindicated by the owner, wherever he may find them. Even a sale in public market will not save the purchaser, whatever his bona fides may be, against such claim of restitution.⁶ He will be liable, even after he has parted with the goods, si dolo desiit possidere ; or, at all events, in quantum lucratus.⁷ In England, great privileges are given to public market, the buyer in market overt being safe against the unknown owner, unless in the single case of theft, where the thief shall be prosecuted by the owners to conviction.⁸ But

¹ It is properly to the two first exceptions now enumerated that the maxim applies, 'Nemo plus juris alteri transfert quam ipse habet.'

² Stair iv. 40. 21. See also cases below. Hay v Leonard, 1677, M. 10286. The opinion of the Court extended this to cattle in custody for grazing, in Alexander v Black, 17 Jan. 1816, F. C. See below, p. 307, note 3.

³ Cassie v Fleming, 1632, M. 10279 ; Woodhead v Nairn, 1662, M. 10281. See also Dirleton's Report of Stewart v Whitefoord, 1677, M. 16492. 'By the Prætorian Edict, and the custom of this and other nations,' says Lord Stair, 'such deeds and obligations as are by force and fear are made utterly void.' Stair i. 9. 8.

⁴ Deathbed has also been held as a labes realis in a conveyance, so as to affect singular successors purchasing bona fide. Liviston v Burns, 1697, M. 10287.

⁵ The decision Beveridge, 1583, M. 9111, carries this doctrine too far ; the goods having been sold by judicial warrant. [In England, a person who purchases at a sheriff's sale property which the sheriff had no right to sell, he acquires no title against the true owner of the property. Farrant v —, 3 Starkie 130 ; Chapman v Speller, 19 L. J. Q. B. 239 ; Morley v Allenborough, 3 Ex. 500.] See Wright v Butchart, 1662, M. 9112 ; Ramsay v Wilson, 1666, M. 9113, as to jewels impledged. Semple v Givan, 1672, M. 9117 ; Pringles v Gribton, 1710, M. 5970, 9123.

⁶ Bishop of Caithness, 1629, M. 9112 ; Ferguson, 1639, M. 4145. Both cases of restitution of horses stolen and sold in market.

Forsyth v Kilpatrick, 1680, M. 9120, where a horse was sold by one to whom he had been hired ; but it is not said that the sale was at market.

Henderson v Gibson, 1806, M. App. Moveables, No. 1, where cattle stolen and sold in public market were found subject to restitution.

⁷ Scott v Low, 1704, M. 9123 ; Walker v Spence & Carfrae, 1765, M. 12802.

⁸ Lord Coke says : 'The common law did hold it for a point in Scotland no such privilege is given to public market. The exception in favour of the owner in cases of theft and violence is admitted in all cases.

Bills of exchange, however, and bills of lading, acquired for full value, and bona fide, [282] by a third party, are not subject to challenge on account of any original defect in the right of the seller;¹ an exception introduced for the encouragement of trade.²

Fraud is not reckoned among the radical defects which annul the title of the acquirer. It is to be classed among those unjustifiable means of inducing consent, which, however effectual they may be in exposing creditors to the consequences of the fraud, as having adopted it, do not annul the right or affect purchasers; and it has been contended that cases of force and fear stand on the same footing.³

SECTION II.—RIGHTS HELD BY THE DEBTOR UNDER QUALIFICATIONS AND CONDITIONS.

A right, as it stands in the bankrupt's person, may be limited or qualified by certain conditions and stipulations; and, in general, the qualification, if inherent in the constitution of great policy, and behoveful for the commonwealth, that fairs and markets overt should be replenished, and well furnished with all manner of commodities vendible in fairs or markets for the necessary substantiation and use of the people. And to that end the common law did ordain (to encourage men thereunto), that all sales and contracts of anything vendible in fairs and markets overt should not be good only between the parties, but should bind those that right had thereunto.' 1 Inst. 713; 2 Black. 449.

A sale in market overt will not, however, avail the purchaser if the goods have been stolen, and the true owner prosecutes the thief to conviction. Blacks. ub. cit.

In London, the shops in which goods are publicly exposed to sale are market overt for such things only as the shopkeeper professes to deal in. But Wilkinson sent a quantity of lead to the wharf of one Ellit, in the borough of Southwark, there to remain till it should be sold. Ellit used to sell lead from this wharf; yet, not having authority to sell this lead, Lord Ellenborough ruled that a bona fide purchaser of the lead did not acquire the property; and observed that an opposite doctrine 'would give to wharfingers the dominion over all the goods entrusted to them; but that a wharf could not be considered, even in London, as a market overt for the articles brought there.' Ellit had no colour of authority to sell the lead, and no one could derive a good title to it under such a tortious conversion. Wilkinson v King, 2 Camp. 335. [See Smith, L. Ca., voce Market Overt.]

¹ Graham v Gillespie, 1795, M. 1453. See also the case of Lickbarrow, for illustration, above, p. 235; and Collins v Marquis' Crs., p. 183, note 3.

² [See Merc. Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, sec. 15, as to bills lost, stolen, or fraudulently obtained from the true owner. Note that by 'original defect' in the right of the party transferring a bill to a third party for value, the author does not allude, as might be supposed from the preceding paragraphs, to nullities affecting the obligation or contract appearing to be constituted either by the original bill or the endorsement of it, such as exist where the drawer is compelled by force or fear to draw and endorse, or where any subsequent holder is compelled to endorse, or where these acts are done by one incapable of consent. The radical nullity of the obligation apparently created by the signature of the drawer or endorser in such a case can never be transformed into a valid obligation by any number of transmissions to bona fide purchasers. (Willocks v Callender, 1776, M. 1519; Wightman v Graham, 1787, M. 1521.) The radical defect of title meant is where a person, in right of a bill transferable by mere delivery—as being payable to bearer, or blank endorsed—has parted with the possession of the bill either by losing it or by its being stolen, or by having been fraudulently tricked into surrendering the possession of it so as to enable the finder, the thief, or the trickster to appear to hold it by a good title, and to pass it on to others. The questions here are: How far can that true owner follow the bill and revindicate it from the thief, and from third parties? How far will payment by the proper debtor on the bill, to the thief or his successor, be good payment, so as to preclude the loser, as divested of the right to the bill, from claiming payment from the debtor? and, How far will the loser himself, if he has endorsed it in blank, be liable to the thief or his successors upon that endorsement? If the instrument is not so conceived or endorsed as to be transferable by delivery, but is assignable only by endorsement, neither a thief nor a finder can make a valid endorsement. Johnson v Windle, 3 Sc. 608; Whistler v Forster, 32 L. J. C. P. 161; Bayley on Bills, 6th ed. 138. As to cheques payable to order, see 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59, sec. 19. The author correctly states the rights of the onerous and bona fide endorsee of a bill of exchange in such cases. But a bill of lading is erroneously classed in the same category with a bill of exchange in this respect. It stands on quite a different footing. The holder of it acquiring possession by finding it, or stealing it, could transfer no better title to an onerous and bona fide endorsee than he has himself. It is a mere symbol of the goods; and the endorsement and transfer, even for value and without notice, of the found or stolen symbol cannot in this case operate more than the actual sale and delivery of the goods themselves, if they had been stolen or found, by the thief or finder would operate. A fraudulent purchaser of a bill of lading may, however, give to an onerous and bona fide endorsee as valid a right to the goods by the delivery of the bill of lading as he could by re-sale of the goods themselves, if already in his own possession. (See ante, p. 214, note 2 in fin.)] of the right, and apparent on the face of it, is effectual against third parties. A great class of the cases under this head will be found to partake of the obvious difficulty of distinguishing between conditions which truly limit the right of the holder, and those which resolve into mere personal obligations, extraneous to the right. But wherever the right itself is qualified or limited, the condition is effectual; with the exception, 1. Of real rights to lands where the limitation does not appear in the infeftment; 2. Of jura incorporalia ex facie absolute; and, 3. Of rights to moveables, which must be allowed to pass current in trade.

³ Brown on Sale, p. 395 et seq.

I. LAND RIGHTS.—These are either real rights, completed feudally, or they remain still personal.

1. REAL RIGHTS.—The statutes relative to the records have the effect of protecting both creditors and purchasers against such burdens and qualifications of the real right of a proprietor infeft, as are not of the nature of a radical defect in his title. When the proprietor of land sells or conveys it to another, under the burden of the payment of a certain sum to a third person; or under the implied condition that the receiver is to apply the price to particular purposes; or that, after a particular period, or upon the accomplishment of a certain act, the estate is to be restored: Or where land or houses are vested in one individual, intending that he shall hold as trustee for a company; or in all the partners of the company, by name individually, intending the property to be with the company;—the condition of the right in all those cases, although undoubtedly effectual against the disponee himself and his heirs, is unavailing as a real burden on the property, if it do not appear in the record. And so the right vested in an individual in some of these cases will be available to those who purchase or adjudge from him; or where vested in several, each individual, and his singular successor, will take it as common property pro indiviso, the personal condition or qualification not being of force against third parties.

This doctrine, as with purchasers, has long been settled—as already observed in considering the case of conditions in feudal grants;¹ and a great number of illustrations are to be found in the Dictionary, under the title Personal and Real.²

But a distinction has sometimes been admitted in the case of creditors, as being entitled to take their debtor's property only as it stood in the person of the debtor; 'tantum et tale' as he held it.³ The question, however, must always return to this, What was truly [283] the extent of real right in the debtor? And although he may be under a relative personal obligation, the real right legally constituted is that only which his sasine bears, and of which it gives assurance to the public; and, accordingly, it has at last been held that such personal exceptions have no effect against creditors.⁴

¹ See p. 25.

² Workman v Crawford, 1672, M. 10208. A backbond by a creditor binding himself on receiving payment to denude of an heritable subject, held not to affect purchaser.

Anderson v Sir John Dempster, 1702, M. 10532. A declaration of trust, that the subject was conveyed merely to give an election qualification, held ineffectual against a purchaser. Same held in Thomson's case in 1786. See next note. See also Stair ii. 10. 5.

³ Thomson v Douglas, Heron, & Co., 1786, M. 10299; Hailes, p. 1002. Thomson, in consequence of a contract with his man of business, disposed his lands to him, 'heritably and irredeemably, that he might sell the same, and apply the proceeds for the disponent's behoof.' The disponee contrived to omit the declaration qualifying his right, and he used the estate as a fund of credit for himself, borrowing money on heritable security; while other creditors, who had trusted to his personal credit, finding his affairs going into disorder, adjudged. Thomson sought back his estate, in competition with both those sets of creditors; and he was found entitled to this as against the adjudgers, not as against the holders of the heritable securities.

It was said on the bench: 'In the present case, the disposition imported absolute and unlimited property, although, as the counterpart of this grant, there arose a personal obligation on the disponee to render account; and whether this has been justly fulfilled or fraudulently violated, the right of property remains equally unaffected. A bona fide purchaser, therefore, might have effectually acquired such property from the disponee, and an heritable creditor by infeftment is held to be in the same situation. The adjudging creditors, however, stand in a different predicament; for as it has been found by decisions which, for the stability of the law, ought not to be departed from, they must take the right of their debtor tantum et tale, as it was in his person.'

Lord Braxfield, who concurred in this judgment, grounded his opinion in favour of a distinction between purchasers and adjudgers, on the case of Gibb v Livingston. See below, p. 302, note 1.

⁴ Wylie v Duncan, 1803, M. 10269. See the statutes 1469,

There are other questions which may arise, not from conditions in the right of the debtors, but from personal engagements and exceptions, which will demand attention hereafter.¹

2. The rule respecting PERSONAL RIGHTS to land is, that the conditions and qualities inherent in the constitution of the right are effectual against third parties, both purchasers and creditors, while the right is not made real by infestment. If, therefore, a person hold a conveyance to land, qualified by a limitation, as of trust; or a condition, as of pre-emption; and on which no infestment has taken place; his creditors must take the right as he has it. So, a person on receiving an assignation to a comprising, on which no infestment had been taken, having granted a backbond to denude on payment of debt, afterwards assigned the comprising, still uncompleted by infestment; and a competition arose between the assignee to the comprising, and one in the right of the backbond. The Court held that the personal right of the assignee was qualified by the backbond: so that this not being a personal debt, the first intimation of an assignation to which would have carried the right; nor a real right, the first sasine on which would have been preferable; but a mere personal right to heritage, —the person having first right in the competition, or, in other words, the title first in date, is preferable.² But the real right is freed from the condition, which becomes a personal obligation merely, when sasine is taken; nay, even where sasine is taken by a singular successor acquiring the right while it was yet personal.³

[284] II. JURA INCORPORALIA UNCONNECTED WITH LAND.—Rights of this description, debts, shares in a company, and the like, fall under the general rule, Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.⁴ But, in the construction of this rule, it is necessary to distinguish between such conditions as are incorporated with the right (in corpore juris), and such as are extraneous to it.

1. Conditions of the former kind, inherent in the nature of the right, or (in the case of debts) existing as exceptions or counter-claims by the original debtor against his creditor, are effectual both against creditors and purchasers coming in place of the original holder of the right.

2. Conditions of the latter species, collateral obligations, or latent trusts extraneous to the deed (extra corpus juris), and of which the new holder of the right has no notice, have given occasion to great diversity of opinion among our lawyers.⁵ It seems, however, now

c. 27, and 1617, c. 16. Pactum de retrovendendo contained in a backbond was held merely personal, and not effectual against creditors.

Russell v Ross of Kerse's Crs., 1792, M. 10300. See above, p. 47, note 4. Here the decision in Thomson's case was disapproved of and departed from.

¹ Gibb v Livingston, 1766, M. 909, Hailes 100. Here the reduction was on fraud, under the Act 1621, c. 18; and on a hearing in presence, the Court held a creditor adjudger liable to the challenge; and this was relied on by Lord Braxfield in Thomson's case, as fixing a point not to be altered.

² Sir L. Gordon v Skene and Crawford, 1676, M. 7167. The case is reported by Stair, Dirleton, and Gosford. Gosford's report will be found in Morison's Dictionary, p. 7167; but to make it intelligible, the fifth and sixth lines from the foot of p. 7168 must be delete.

³ McCubbins v Ferguson, 1715, M. 10215.

A distinction is made as to apprizings, grounded on the peculiarity of that diligence. See several cases of apprizings, conveyed before sasine, and held as limited in the purchaser's person.

Nay, the doctrine is held to apply to apprizings even after infestment, by a backbond granted previously. Brown v Gairn, 1673, M. 10209; Gordon v Chein, 1676, M. 7167.

In a case taken notice of above (Thomson v Douglas, Heron, & Co., M. 10299), had no infestment been taken, the objection of trust would have been correctly found good against creditors, and also should have been made effectual against purchasers. E. of Southesk v M. of Huntly, 1666, M. 4712, 10203; Kennedy v Cunningham, 1670, M. 10205. See especially Gosford's report of it, Mor. 10206; Sinclair v Sinclair, 1685, M. 5324.

See Sir R. Preston v L. Dundonald's Crs., 1805, M. 6569.

⁴ An heritable bond is liable to the same exceptions between the debtor and the creditor. The distinction between the exceptions competent to the debtor against the original creditor, and those arising from fraud or collateral obligation, are well explained in McDowall v Carmichael, 10 Nov. 1772.

⁵ Lord Stair is of opinion that all the possible injuries to commerce from the admission of those latent exceptions, must yield to the common rule of law. That the assignee utitur jure auctoris in personalibus; that this applies not only to mutual contracts, where the conditions appear in the deed, but also to backbonds and obligations in separate deeds; and that these, provided they make part of the same transaction, and are causes or considerations of each other, will be held mutually to qualify the rights even of assignees. Stair i. 10.

to be settled, 1. That such extraneous, collateral, and latent conditions and obligations [285] have no effect against third parties purchasing or advancing money on the right. This was determined by the House of Lords in a case relative to the effect of a latent trust, under which a person held a share in a company; and this trust was found to be ineffectual against an assignee who lent money in bona fide, relying on the right as absolute and unconditional. The reasoning on which this case was decided in the Court of Session, and on which the reversal proceeded, is stated in the note.¹ The Court of Session have since assented to this,

16. This passage, however, is one of those which seem not to have received the author's last corrections, for it is expressed with great obscurity; and, in particular, it is not very obvious whether he did not mean to speak only of the defences that might be made against a demand by the original debtor, not by a third person. Mr. Brodie, in his edition of Stair, has observed that this passage is not to be found in either of the editions published during Lord Stair's life (p. 120).

Stair's doctrine in this passage is followed by Erskine, iii. 5. 10.

The Court also have, on several occasions, given effect to such separate and latent conditions and qualifications of jura incorporalia. M'Kenzie v Watson & Stewart, 1678, M. 10188; effect given to a backbond of trust. The same in Black v Sutherland, 1705, M. 10189.

The like effect was given against assignees and purchasers, Scott v Montgomery, 1663, M. 10187.

See also Monteith v Douglas, 1710, M. 10192.

But this doctrine has been accompanied with expressions of sincere regret that no means had been taken to establish a record of backbonds.

On the other hand opposed stands, in the first place, the opinion of the minority of the Court in Crawford's case, as reported by Lord Dirleton, p. 183, where it is laid down that singular successors, taking not by representation, but by purchase of the individual right, are entitled to it unqualifiedly if no condition appear; that the analogy of reversions is applicable, the law with regard to which rests not on the statute merely, but on the common law; that obligations only bind the grantor to retrocess, and cannot operate more strongly than if a formal retrocession were made; and that the admission of such latent exceptions would be an irreparable prejudice to the public. Dirleton states the effect of co-respective obligations of one date, but not of one body, as doubtful; while Stewart seems to hold them as personal. Dirleton and Stewart, voce Obligants Co-respective. And among the older authorities there is one to which great weight seems to be due,—namely, the anonymous author of Annotations on Lord Stair (supposed to be Lord Elchies), who argues this point very fully; distinguishes justly between counter-engagements and those exceptions which are competent to the debtor in the obligation, extinguishing the debt; and protests against the decision in the case of Crawford, 'as sanctioning the greatest defect I have observed in our law in personal rights, entirely against the analogy of law, a great handle for fraud, and the greatest obstruction to trade and commerce that I know.' Annot. on Stair, p. 71 et seq. Recollecting the principles upon which assignations were originally admitted as procuratories in rem suam, it will not appear wonderful that persons acquiring by assignation the right to debts and other jura incorporalia should be considered as coming precisely into the place of the cedent, and as liable, of course, to all the personal exceptions pleadable against him. In that way arose the maxim, 'Assignatus utitur jure auctoris,' which has so often been misunderstood, and held to imply a responsibility like that of an heir. But this doctrine, in so far as it has been considered applicable to any other exceptions than those competent to the debtor in defence against the claim, should not be held good in the present day, when the whole aspect of the law relative to assignations is altered; and when, instead of being a mere procurator of the original creditor, the assignee is considered as a proper purchaser, holding by the cessio in jure, as against the defender, the full jus obligationis, transferred by intimation, as property is by delivery.

¹ Sommervails v Redfearn, 1805, M. Ap. Pers. and Real, No. 3. Stewart held a share in the Edinburgh Glass-house Co., apparently in his own right, but really in trust for a company of which he was a partner, but which, by the regulations of the Glass-house Co., could not hold it in the social name. Stewart having borrowed money for his own use, assigned, in security to the creditor, this share in the Glass-house Co., and the assignment was intimated. The question lay between a partner of Mr. Stewart's and the lender. The Court found 'the allegation, that the stock in question stood in Stewart's person, in trust for the company, relevant to exclude the assignment.'

Upon this question there was much difference of opinion among the judges in the Court of Session. While all of them acknowledged the inexpediency of admitting latent claims to affect purchasers, and expressed their regret in particular that there is no record for trusts, it appeared to some that this consideration ought to control the rule of law, and entitle a purchaser to take the benefit of the right, without any responsibility for the counterpart; by others this was held a very secondary consideration, the rule being, that in personal rights personal faith is followed; and that with intrinsic qualities in the constitution of the right, the public, whether creditors or assignees, are bound to lay their account. The main point of the argument turned upon these different views. On the one hand, it was held that tradition is the criterion of real right, and that this applies to heritage, moveables, and jura incorporalia; that nothing qualifies the right so constituted which does not affect the reality; that no obligation can qualify a real right; and that the mistake in supposing that it can, has arisen from a mistake in the history of the law, in which it has been held that jura incorporalia inhxerent ossibus, so as to make an assignee not so much a claimant in his own right as a procurator in rem suam for the cedent; that to follow this notion would be to bestow preferences on personal creditors, and to disturb the whole doctrine of real rights; that the sole principle on which any condition can be allowed to affect the right of an assignee is, that it forms a radical qualification in the constitution of the cedent's right; as conclusively settling the question with purchasers, contrary to the general rule which [286] they regard as having till then regulated both sets of questions; the exception being established on grounds of equity and expediency, which are not now to be shaken. And the result is, that jura incorporalia, though liable even in the hands of a purchaser to those exceptions which the debtor may have to state against the claim, are not qualified by any collateral obligation or latent trust. 2. It has now also been determined (though not in the last resort) that a different rule applies to creditors. It was by some conceived that the rule adopted in the case of heritable subjects was, in principle, applicable to jura incorporalia; that where a bankrupt holds a pure and unqualified conveyance to the real right, or jus in re, of a debt transferable only by written titles, accompanied by intimation, and which in a question with purchasers is not held to be qualified by any collateral obligation, merely personal; such right ought to belong to creditors, as part of the fund of division, leaving the personal obligation to ground a claim to a dividend. But this opinion has been discountenanced, and the maxim Assignatus utitur jure auctoris declared to have been always applicable to such cases; the exception introduced by the House of Lords extending no further than to the case of purchasers and lenders of money in bona fide.¹

III. MOVEABLES.—There is here a distinction which, although not obvious perhaps at first sight, it is of great importance to attend to. Possession is the badge of property in moveables, the sasine by which their transfer is completed, and so is said in law to presume property. But this is not to be taken without qualification. For the possession of moveables is frequently unaccompanied by the ownership; since they are necessarily in the course of dealings entrusted to the custody and possession of persons who have no further concern with them than to keep them safely, or to perform upon them some operation of art, or to dispose of them in the character of factor for the true owner. Passing from hand to hand in transference, without the necessity of any written title to explain under what conditions they may be held, there being in consequence a presumption of ownership in the possessor, and that trust does not appear to be a qualification of this kind. On the other hand, it was held that even if there were no clear principle, the series of authorities and precedents should settle the question: but that the principle is clear, 'assignatus utitur jure auctoris;' that a trustee is not truly proprietor, but holds a limited right, which must pass with its limitations to his assignees and creditors; that trust forms an intrinsic quality in his right; and that, in the purchase of all personal rights, there is so much of personal credit, that the mere appearance of an unqualified right is not to be relied on to rear up a right where none exists.

In the House of Lords this judgment was considered by Lord Redesdale as not settled by previous authorities, but as establishing distinctly, and for the first time, a principle which their Lordships would not be desirous to recognise, viz. that a latent equity, however unjust in its application, should defeat the right of a bona fide assignee. He held all the authorities of text writers, and even all the cases, to be inapplicable, as truly relating to such exceptions or counter-claims as the original debtor may have against his creditor, and not to another title set up by a third party against the assignee, and that the principle of the law was in favour of the assignee, since the right set up in competition against him was only that of a person entitled to compel an assignation, which could be no better than if the assignation had been made but not intimated till after Redfearn's. Lord Chancellor Eldon marked clearly the same line of distinction. The question here, he said, was not between a debtor of Stewart's and his assignee, but between the assignee and one possessing a secret equity. He would ask, then, How the authorities cited for the respondent could possibly apply? A assigns a bond to B, and B to C: C knew that he was taking that of which no part, or of which some part, or the whole, might have been discharged. Utitur jure auctoris. He took what interest B had in the bond, and no more, and this was no hardship; for it was his fault if he did not apply to the known debtor to ascertain how that matter really stood. His Lordship added, that he had looked very anxiously and carefully to see whether there were any cases where latent equities had prevailed against intimated assignations, and he had found none. See 1 Dow's Rep. 50-73, 5 Pat. 707.

See 2 S. 678, for observations from the bench on this decision.

¹ Gordon v Cheyne, 1824, 2 S. 675, N. E. 566. Here Saunders held a share of the stock of the Aberdeen Shipping Co. in his own name, but truly as trustee for the Rev. Mr. Gordon. This was proved by a letter acknowledging the trust, granted at the origin of it. Fourteen years afterwards Saunders became bankrupt, and Gordon's infant child claimed the share under the latent trust. The Court sustained this claim against the trustee for the creditors of Saunders, 'in respect he is trustee for general creditors who are neither purchasers nor special assignees.'

See also Dingwall v M'Combie, 1822, 1 S. 463, N. E. 431, and observations on that case in the above case of Gordon. [Hume v Middlemass, 1836, 15 S. 30; Burns v Laurie's Trs., 1840, 2 D. 1348.]

and yet being so frequently in the hands of others than the owners of them, distinctions have arisen between the rights of purchasers and those of creditors.

1. As possession presumes property in moveables, the general rule is, that the purchaser of moveables at market or otherwise in bona fide, acquires the right to them,¹ although they may have been sold by one who is not the owner.²

¹ 'The reason,' says Lord Stair, 'is because moveables must have a current course of traffic; and the buyer is not to consider how the seller purchased, unless it were by theft or violence, which the law accounts as labes realis, following the subject to all successors, otherwise there would be the greatest encouragement to theft and robbery' (iv. 40. 21). [The authority of Lord Stair is here represented as sanctioning a doctrine to which neither he nor Mr. Erskine give any countenance. The words of Lord Stair are severed from their immediate context, which is, 'Yet in moveables purchasers are not quarrelable for the fraud of their authors, if they did purchase for an onerous equivalent cause. The reason is,' etc.; and the whole section treats solely of right and title acquired by fraud from the true owner, not of purchase a non domino. As to what Stair's doctrine was, there can be no doubt. See Stair i. 7, secs. 1, 4, 11, 13 ult.; i. 11. 8, 2d par.; ii. 1. 42; iii. 2. 7; iv. 30. 8, 9; iv. 21. 5.] Ersk. iii. 5. 10. See also Voet, l. 6, tit. 1, De rei vind. Nos. 8 and 12.

² [The doctrine advanced by the author in this and the two following paragraphs goes to unsettle the principles which regulate the transference of moveable property, and is contrary to the doctrine of the institutional writers, and to the decisions. This has been so well pointed out by Mr. Brown (Sale, Nos. 602-615), that reference to his observations is all that is necessary. The case of a factor selling goods consigned to him has nothing to do with the question: he sells by authority of the owner, who sent the goods to him for the purpose. The author's fundamental mistake is, that he confounds the maxim that the possession of moveables presumes property, with the doctrine of ostensible ownership. The maxim alluded to is merely a rule of evidence—a prima facie presumption regulating the onus probandi in any case where moveables are claimed by a non-possessor from a possessor; but it is nothing more. It does not operate as a presumptio juris et de jure: it does not estop the claimant from proving the verity, but cedes to the verity so soon as his title is established by proof. Ostensible ownership—to whatever extent it may be a doctrine of Scotch law (and there is some ground for thinking that Mr. Bell has pushed a favourite doctrine, in some parts of his work at least, to the extreme of what was warranted)—is quite a different thing from the presumption of property arising from possession. It is, in fact, an estoppel against the true owner proving his title; and proof or admission that the true title resides in another than the possessor, which is all that is needed to overcome the other maxim, is not sufficient or relevant to overcome this estoppel. It does not, like the prima facie presumption spoken of, cede to the verity, but prevails against it. But, as Mr. Bell himself has pointed out, this ostensible ownership is not grounded simply on the fact of the possession and the true title being separated. That bare fact is all that is needed to give room for the operation of the prima facie presumption; but it is not all that is needed for the operation of the estoppel.

VOL. I.

There must be, besides, a separation of the possession from the true title—fraud and collusion on the part of the true owner. There must be such a permission on his part of an enjoyment and disposition of the goods by another, such an allowed exercise of the rights of ownership, as are not necessary in the course of honest contract, and which have proved injurious by raising, and having been intended to raise, a false credit to the possessor, as if he were proprietor of the effects. 'In what is delivered of this doctrine by our institutional writers,' says our author himself (p. 272), 'they seem to place the doctrine entirely upon fraud and collusion on the part of the true owner; and there does not appear to be any ground for questioning that, in proper cases under the doctrine of reputed ownership, this is the true principle.' The principle of all estoppels or personal exceptions which go to bar a party from pleading a certain fact from which he would derive benefit in a question with another—of that, e.g., which in this case bars the true owner from proving, what is the actual truth, that he and not the reputed owner is proprietor—the principle of all estoppels is, that the party estopped has by his words or conduct, amounting to a representation, wilfully caused the other, against whom he now attempts to set up the truth, to believe something different from that truth, and has induced him to act on that belief, so as to alter his own previous position. Estoppel or bar arises where such representation, whether active or passive, has been made wilfully—either fraudulently, or, if not with a morally fraudulent intent, yet at least with the purpose of inducing the other to act upon it—has been intended to bring about the result whereby loss has arisen to the other party, or his position has been altered. (See Pickard v Sears, 6 Ad. and El. 469; West v Jones, 20 Jur. Ch. 363; Swan v North British Australasian Co., per Cockburn, C. J., 32 L. J. Ex. 279; More's Lectures, ii. 265-6.) It is plain that, if a man going to the country deposits his silver plate with some one for safe custody, there is no wilful misrepresentation, active or passive, intended to induce the public to believe that the depositary is owner of it, and to act on that belief so as to alter their position; nor is there any such thing in the case of a party pledging goods for an advance. To say, as the author does, that the owner has himself to blame for choosing an unfaithful depositary, or being obliged to borrow from an unfaithful pledgee, as if it were equivalent to a wilful and intentional holding the depositary or pledgee out as owner for the purpose of inducing the public to transact with them in that belief, is to confound things toto caelo different. Their neglect of what would be prudent conduct in relation to the depositor's own interest—the chance of his losing his property by the depositary's theftuous misappropriation of it—is not a misrepresentation to the public with regard to the ownership, and gives no ground for pleading estoppel against the owner asserting right to his property wherever he finds it. (See opinions in Swan, supra.) The presumption as to the property arising from possession may well throw the onus on him

2 Q

This rule, however, must be taken with the exception already alluded to,¹—namely, in the case of theft or violence. Under this branch of the inquiry, it may be doubted whether the breach of trust, and the obligation faithfully to restore property placed in the possession of another, will bring the case under the analogy of the exception. In one case very nearly approaching to theft, the judges seemed to think the exception would be so extended. But there is danger in admitting any arbitrary rule, and no very clear line of distinction appears to regulate the cases in which the exception should be admitted. Breach of trust has much the character of theft; but, at the same time, it stands distinguishable by this strong circumstance, [287] that the owner has exposed himself to the usurpation by which an innocent third party has suffered. When a person with whom goods have been pledged, or a depositary of jewels carries them to a jeweller, and sells them, or raises money on them as a possessor, if the bona fide purchaser or lender in such cases be entitled to retain the goods against the true owner, there may be a hardship upon the owner; but an equal hardship would arise on the other side, and one against which there is no protection, if the fair purchaser were obliged to part with them to the owner, who has himself to blame for choosing an unfaithful depositary. In cases of this kind, a sale at market in England would save the purchaser. And although in Scotland there is no such regard paid to public market, it is impossible to deny that a sale in open market should naturally induce a stronger bona fides than can accompany a private sale; the presumption of property grounded on possession being strengthened by the consideration, that without a full disposing power the holder would not thus publicly expose the goods. It has accordingly been maintained, that wher-of proving his property against the depositary or purchaser; but that is quite a different thing from saying that he shall not be allowed to prove it at all. The doctrine of the author, which confounds the presumption with the estoppel, and attributes to the former wherever it comes into play all the consequences flowing from the latter in the more limited sphere in which it operates—which would go far to make bars of pig-iron and bales of cotton carry their ownership along with them whithersoever they pass, like current coin—would put an end to most of the transactions of commerce, and many of the arrangements of common life. It will not escape observation that the ‘necessities of trade’—the reason so often assigned for attempting to estop a man from asserting, against a third party purchasing, his property in goods of which he has given another the custody or possession—lie all the other way. It was the same specious fallacy that was long urged to support the now exploded notion, that an endorsed bill of lading carried the property to the endorsee, whatever was the real intention of the endorsement; and it is the same that in certain cases seeks to ascribe to delivery orders and other documents of possession the imaginary effect and operation of which bills of lading have already been divested. See Gurney v Behrend, 23 L. J. Q. B. 265. The questions as to bills of lading, delivery orders, and the possession of moveables, are all at bottom one and the same question, both in regard to legal principle and mercantile convenience. The principle on which the estoppel is founded, which prevents a proprietor from rebutting the presumption of possession, and vindicating his property from a third party, is not mercantile convenience; nor is it that a man has no right to be imprudent in entrusting what belongs to him to others: it is fraud or wilful culpa towards the third party, in inducing him, by active or passive misrepresentations as to how the property stood, to alter his position in relation thereto. This is the true legal principle which must govern and restrain the application of a loose maxim often quoted in questions such as those raised in the text, quoted e.g. by Ashurst, J., to support the old view as to the operation of bills of lading in Lickbarrow v Mason, that wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it. On that principle, certainly, a bill of lading would be equivalent to a bill of exchange, in regard to the rights of an onerous and bona fide acquirer from a fraudulent endorser who held without a lawful right to sell. But we know now that a bill of lading has not that quality, in spite of the maxim. It was quoted also (out of Salkeld’s Reports—Hern v Nichols—p. 289) in Baring v Corrie, 2 B. and Ald. 137. But there both Abbott, C. J., and Holroyd, J., pointedly stated that the rule was by no means universal, or to be received without qualifications, giving as instances wherein it failed those very cases of purchasers choosing to rely on what Mr. Bell characterizes as ‘the title implied in possession;’ and the latter observing in reference to them, that ‘the truth is, that in all cases, excepting where goods are sold in market overt, the rule of caveat emptor applies.’ Bayley, J., explained that the proprietor’s legal title must prevail, ‘unless by improper conduct on his part he has enabled some other person to appear as the proprietor of the goods, and by that means to impose upon a third person, without any fault on the part of that person. That is the true meaning of the rule laid down in Heron v Nichols.’ It is not enabling the depositary, by the mere fact of making the deposit with him, to deceive a third party, that grounds the estoppel against the owner: it is the ‘enabling by improper conduct’ that does so. In short, it is to the test of the principle of estoppel, and not to that of any loose though plausible maxim of this sort, that any question between the true owner and a bona fide purchaser, from one possessing in the owner’s right, must be brought.]

¹ See above, p. 299.

ever the possession under which the sale is made is legitimate possession, it will validate the sale at market. This seems to be admitted in the case of tenants selling their hypothecated corn. Where one buys corn from a tenant at his farm, he must be aware of the possibility of interfering with the hypothec, and so he is held liable for the corn, or its price, to the landlord; but to carry this so far as to give restitution of goods sold in public market, though adjudged once,¹ has been since disapproved of.² In a late case it was pleaded that the custody which the tenant of a grazing farm has of cattle, ought to validate a sale in market. But the Court did not approve of the doctrine.³

A factor having goods consigned to him has power to sell, so as to give an unchallengeable right to a purchaser. But in England, at common law, such a person cannot pledge the goods of his principal for his own debt; and it has been necessary to provide by statute for such power as the necessities of trade require.⁴

2. But although purchasers of moveables, relying on the title implied in possession, are in Scotland freed from challenge by the owner where the goods have not been stolen, it is unquestionable that the creditors of a person possessing moveables in trust, or upon the footing of any of the known contracts requiring temporary possession, are liable to a preferable claim of restitution by the owner. This subject has already been fully discussed; and it is only necessary to observe further, that the question in such cases is, Whether the right vested in the bankrupt be truly an unqualified and absolute, or a limited and conditional right? In the former case, whatever may be the bankrupt's personal duties or obligations, the subject will make a part of the divisible fund: in the latter, the true proprietor's rights will prevail over those of the creditors, and he will be entitled to a preference.

IV. The CONDITIONS which operate as limitations of the original right, are not to be confounded with those personal engagements which the bankrupt may have undertaken, either at entering into the contract whereby the property was acquired by him, or subsequently to such acquisition. Where a person, for example, has bought goods and received delivery, he is bound to pay the price, as a counterpart of the right acquired; or where one has paid for goods of which he has not received delivery, the obligation to transfer the property is incumbent on the seller. But in all such cases, the right to the goods or to [288] the money is real and absolute; the obligation to pay or to deliver is separate and personal. The creditors of the person bound by such engagements are not otherwise responsible for them, than for performance of any of the other obligations which their debtor has incurred; for the restitution of money borrowed, or the payment of a bill of exchange.⁵ All obligations or personal engagements, whether express or implied, are of the same nature in law,

¹ Hay, 1639, M. 6219.

² Ersk. ii. 6. 60. [The corn, though hypothecated to the landlord, is the farmer's own corn—not the landlord's corn in the possession of the tenant. This is an attempt to extend the principle, that a hypothec odious to law should be held defeated by the removal of the crop from the farm—where the landlord may be supposed, as an adverse party, to be looking after his own interest—to the open market, where he is, or was in former times, as likely to be present as the tenant. The conclusion is that a sale, at least if it take place in open market, by a depositary against whom the owner has no adverse interest, and whom he has not employed to keep watch over his goods, merely for the purpose of having a motive for keeping watch over him in turn, ought to defeat the owner's right of property, because he did not employ a more faithful custodier, or himself keep better custody over the custodier, to prevent him from carrying the goods into the public market (what is that, it may be asked, for jewellers' goods, or 1000 tons of pig-iron in bulk?). This is obviously an extravagant analogy pressed to the help of a doctrine only a little less extravagant.]

³ Alexander v Black. The Court expressed an opinion, that if a person who has the possession of cattle for the purpose of grazing, carry them to market, and sell them to a bona fide purchaser, the owner can claim restitution. But the case was decided on special circumstances, 17th Jan. 1816, F. C.

⁴ See 4 Geo. iv. c. 83, and 6 Geo. iv. c. 94; [and 5 and 6 Vict. c. 39.]

⁵ [The creditors of a person who has received the price of specific goods sold, and in his custody, would not, if they took the goods, be liable in the obligation of delivery under the Merc. Law Amendment Act, sec. 1. But this proceeds rather on the principle that they are not entitled to prevent the buyer from getting delivery, than that they are bound by their debtor's obligation to make it. For example, if the bankrupt had maliciously destroyed the goods, instead of leaving them to come into the possession of his creditors, they would not be liable in damages in room of the delivery. The buyer would rank for the price.]

whether the object be the payment of money, the delivery of property, or the performance of any particular act. They give only a personal action to enforce performance, or to recover satisfaction in damages for the breach of engagement.¹ If one have lent money on the promise of the borrower that an heritable security shall be granted, or that goods shall be delivered to him in pledge, and the borrower fail before the pledge be given, or sasine taken on the heritable bond; still the lender is but a personal creditor, entitled to no preference, though the bankrupt, had he continued solvent, must have implemented the engagements he had undertaken, and action would have lain ad factum præstandum. If, again, the money have been given, not in loan, but as the price of goods which the proprietor sells and promises to deliver, and if bankruptcy take place before the contract can be fulfilled, there may be great dishonesty in the neglect; but the buyer is only a personal creditor, entitled to no preference over the rest. In one and all of those cases there is a reliance, greater or less, for a longer or shorter time, upon the personal credit and good faith of the bankrupt, without any qualification constituted over the real right of the bankrupt: the claimant has allowed himself to fall into the class of personal creditors, instead of securing to himself a place as a preferable and real creditor.²

Where a person sells property, and before the purchaser's right is completed sells it a second time, he is guilty of a crime known in Scotland by the name of Stellionate: he fraudulently fails to fulfil his original engagement to complete the transfer. But although the seller be liable to punishment, the right of the second purchaser, if first completed, is effectual. The property was complete in the seller; and it is only a dishonest use of that property with which he is chargeable. If a single creditor adjudging, or the general creditors of the seller, be substituted in the room of such second purchaser, and they be supposed to have completed their diligence before the real right of the first purchaser is completed, they will be precisely in the same situation with the second purchaser, and preferable, of course, to the original purchaser. The cases in the notes settle this doctrine.³

¹ An obligation, as defined in the Roman law, is: 'Juris vinculum quo necessitate astringimur alicujus rei solvendæ secundum nostræ civitatis jura.' Instit. Lib. iii. tit. 14, De oblig. pr. And it is said by the best of all the commentators: 'Solvere verbum generale quod dare et facere complectitur.' Pothier's ed. of Pand. vol. iii. p. 272.

² This consideration ought not to be lost sight of in such questions, under the Bankrupt Law, as that of Bank of Scotland v Stewart & Ross, 7 Feb. 1811, F. C. See below, Book VI.

³ Mitchell v Fergusson, 1781, M. 10296, where the disponee of a house not having been infert, the creditors of the disposer adjudged, and were infert, and were found preferable to a purchaser from the disponee. See the principle of the decision fully explained and illustrated by Lord Braxfield, Hailes 880.

This was a solemn decision; but it was thrown into some doubt by a decision pronounced in Smith v Taylor, Dec. 18, 1795, where a person, though his right was merely personal, borrowed money on heritable bond. Infertment was instantly taken on this bond, but of course no real right could be constituted in the lender till the borrower himself was infert; and the latter having become bankrupt, the trustee on his sequestrated estate made up titles without inferting the debtor, by dropping him out of the feudal progress. Thus the trustee came to hold a real right, while that of the person holding the heritable bond continued only personal. The only chance which the latter had for a preference was upon the general plea that the creditors could take no better right than stood in their debtor. The Lord Ordinary repelled this plea, and sustained the right of the creditors; but the Court (erroneously) altered the judgment.

The erroneous opinion, however, which this judgment tended to sanction did not long prevail. Gordon assigned a bond of 3000 merks to Farquharson. The assignation was not intimated till the 4th of August, which ceremony is the legal completion of the real right of the assignee. In the interim, viz. on the 19th July, Gordon's estate was sequestrated, but the conveyance to the trustee was not granted till after this intimation. The question between the trustee for the creditors and the assignee was, Whether the real right of the assignee was first completed? and if not, Whether the creditors, as representing the bankrupt, could take advantage of the defect of the assignee's right, or were not rather bound to complete it, and of consequence excluded personali exceptione, as the bankrupt himself would have been? It was observed from the bench, upon the above case of Smith and Taylor being quoted as a precedent, that the Court ought entirely to disapprove of the decision, and of the principles on which it proceeded, and in this opinion the whole Court concurred. The notion, it was observed, of the estate of a bankrupt going tantum et tale, as it existed in his person, into the hands of the trustee, is erroneous when it is pleaded to exclude a competition between the trustee and creditors who have obtained a disposition only from the bankrupt, without having as yet completed it by sasine. While the deliverance upon the petition of sequestration is no bar, on the one hand, to such a creditor from going on to complete his right; yet if,

SECTION III.—OF THE EXCEPTION OF FRAUD AS IT AFFECTS CREDITORS.

The effect of fraud, in cases where the interest of creditors is concerned, may [289] occur to be tried in two situations: Either as invalidating the right of the debtor, and so hostile to the interests of the creditors; or as chargeable against persons who on bankruptcy insist on real rights, which have been concealed from creditors so as to mislead them, and give to the debtor a false credit.

1. In the class of cases in which the right of the bankrupt has been acquired by fraud or other unjustifiable means, there is a distinction to be observed between the objection of fraud and that of force or nonage. In the latter cases there is an absolute defect of consent: the possession is not given, but assumed, and may be retaken by virtue of the undivested real right which remains with the proprietor. In fraud it is different: consent has passed, though ill-founded and revocable; and the real right has been transferred, though action may lie, on the personal objection of deceit, for restitution or indemnification. The forms of our actions are so loose, that all the minor distinctions are confounded; but, in principle, the action applicable to the former case is a rei vindicatio; that which is proper to the latter is an actio personalis ad restituendam.

This distinction leads to a similar difference in the effect of fraud against third parties, with that which I had occasion to mark in the case of moveables. The objection of fraud has no effect against purchasers, who, seeing the buyer in possession of the property, give their money for the thing itself, trusting nothing to personal credit, but only to that property which the true proprietor has placed in the hands of another, together with the power of deceiving the public. Against creditors, fraud has been thought entitled to full effect, where it is of that kind which lawyers have distinguished as originating the contract dans causam contractui.¹ In all such cases, creditors, in taking the benefit of the property, are [290] considered as adopting the fraud of the bankrupt, by which he acquired the property.

Examples of the application of this rule are extremely frequent. Thus, in the case of Prince against Pallet, a hypothetical opinion was delivered by the Court, illustrative of the doctrine. The fraud alleged was not thought to be sufficiently established, and therefore the seller lost his cause; but the Court held, that if certain circumstances had been proved, they would have been sufficient 'to annul the contract of vendition, and consequently the decree of forthcoming:' that is to say, the diligence of the creditors would have been of no avail, 'though if, by way of commerce, the goods had been bought from the bankrupt, the parties would have been secure if noways partakers of the fraud.'²

The doctrine delivered hypothetically in this case was confirmed in the determination of the subsequent case of Main against Maxwell.³ In a still later case the same distinction was acknowledged.⁴ In the two subsequent cases of Dunlop, the Court sanctioned the

on the other, he neglect so to do till after the trustee has vested the property in himself by a complete feudal title, the subject must unquestionably be carried to the creditors at large, and the imperfect right of the earlier claimant superseded. Buchan v Farquharson, 1797, M. 2905.

Upon this decision being pronounced, containing so marked a disapprobation of the judgment in the case of Smith and Taylor, the creditors of Smith attempted, on the pretence of new facts having come to their knowledge, to open up the final judgment. This attempt was not successful. The Court thought the grounds for opening the decree insufficient; but all the judges were clearly of opinion, in point of law, that upon the original question the creditors were entitled to have succeeded. Smith's Trs. v Taylor, 5 Dec. 1797, n. r.

¹ See above, p. 262. Lord Stair has said that fraud is good against singular successors, because assignees are but procurators in rem suam, and therefore in the same case with their cedents. And he limits his doctrine, as not extending to moveables, only on account of commerce (see above, p. 305, note 1). Stair, iv. 40. 21. But this doctrine may now be considered as obsolete, though Mr. Erskine has followed the authority of Lord Stair. Ersk. iii. 5. 10. Mr. Erskine has also laid it down, that a sale ubi dolus dedit causam contractui has no effect to transfer. Ersk. iii. 3. 8. But this is not law; and Lord Kilkerran, both in the case of Dunlop, to which Erskine refers, and in the case of Forbes, lays it down clearly, that notwithstanding the fraud, the property would be transferred. Kilk. 222 and 224.

² Prince v Pallet, 1680, M. 4932. See above, p. 265, note 1.

³ Main v Maxwell, 1715, M. 945.

⁴ Christie & Co. v Fairholmes, 1748, M. 4896. Lord distinction. 'Most of us thought,' says Lord Elchies, 'that there was fraud even in concilio on Forbes' part, in the purchase of the spirits; and that had they been extant, though the property was transferred, yet the sale might be reduced, and the property brought back to Dunlop (the original owner), notwithstanding any arrestment of Forbes' creditors. But as the property was transferred to Forbes, so they were bought bona fide by Napier, who could not be affected by Forbes' fraud.'¹ In Kemp's case, the Court unanimously found 'that the sale of the goods in question was brought about by fraud on the part of Kemp, and therefore that the same was void and null; and that the sellers were entitled to restitution of their goods.'²

In the case of Thomson against Douglas, Heron, & Co., where a person fraudulently disappointed a trust, perhaps the judgment might have been justified on the rule that fraud passes against creditors; although, as a qualification of the right, the trust taken by itself was not (in a case of feudal property completed by sasine) sufficient to support the decision.³

2. But as fraud may in one situation be pleaded against creditors, so they may in another be entitled to found upon it as limiting or restricting what otherwise might as a [291] jus in re be the ground of preference. We have formerly considered the effect of that collusive possession of moveables which gives a false credit to a bankrupt, and on that account has been recognised as a ground on which moveables are made answerable for the debts of the ostensible owner. The principles on which the doctrine rests apply equally to conveyances of lands as to those of moveables: the doctrine holds in either case, so far as the other principles of the law admit or require its application. It is not, like the rule of the English statute, restricted to goods and chattels. There was of old more room for the application of this rule to heritable rights than at present; for the record now is the sole criterion and test of property in land.⁴ At the same time, there still is room for questions of this kind: 1. Where there is a competition with a single creditor, the completion of the feudal right is unquestionably, in the general case, the test of the competition; but if it can be proved that, after the conveyance was granted, it was kept latent, in order to accomplish the fraud meditated by the disponent, the person who receives the disposition shall, notwithstanding his having completed his real right, take no advantage from it against the person defrauded by his collusion and by the reputed ownership left in the disponent. And so, 2. Where the general creditors have been deceived into false credit by such concealment, even although the completion of the right has been so contrived as to be beyond the sixty days preceding the bankruptcy, the creditors will, on the principles of the doctrine

Elchies, after stating the case, says most of the Lords were of opinion 'that the property was not transferred, and that the fraud was a vitium reale: the President, that there was a difference betwixt arrestors and purchasers in the way of commerce; that arrestors are liable to the same exceptions with their debtor, and that their changing the bills of lading did not transfer the property. It carried to prefer Christie & Co. Remarked by Kilkerran and me, who approved that it was a fraud in Anderson, but that the property was transferred by sale and delivery; and though that sale might be reduced against Anderson, and even against his creditors, yet they having acquired the property by the new bill of lading, and sold it again, so that nobody knows now who has the property, or if the tobacco is not consumed, that Anderson's fraud could not affect them who were not partakers of it. And Kilkerran observed that their right, by having the tobacco transferred to them by the new bill of lading, would not be the worse for their having had an anterior arrestment. 7 Dec., and on 17 Dec. 1748 refused a bill without answers, and adhered.' Elchies' Notes, Fraud, No. 20. In his report, voce Fraud of Creditors, he reports the case, and says: 'The Court thought Anderson's fraud a vitium reale, and that the property was not transferred; and the President distinguished between the case of arrestors and purchasers in way of commerce.'

¹ Elchies' Notes, No. 26. See also Dunlop v Cruickshank, 1752, M. 4879.

² Sandieman & Co. v Kemp's Crs., 1786, M. 4947. The question was with creditors.

³ See above, p. 301, note 3.

⁴ Under the old law, base infeftments without actual possession were deemed fraudulent, till the Act 1693, c. 13, made the record the rule. And several cases are to be found, while the records were yet imperfect, and before the statute 1696, c. 5, relative to preferences within sixty days of bankruptcy, in which circumstances of 'simulation' for disguising the right were held to have the effect of depriving the real owner of land, and giving to the disponent the right as if still undivested.

See, for example, the case of Duff & Brown v Forbes, 1671, M. 12428.

See the doctrine well explained by Lord Stair, ii. 3. 27, pp. 215, 216.

now explained, be entitled to reduce the conveyance as 'simulate.' This doctrine may be rested on the authority of a case, prior indeed to the Act 1693, c. 13, by which registration was introduced as the criterion of preference; but the decision of which is, in principle, plainly applicable to the present state of the law, as well as to the rules then prevalent.¹

¹ A trader conveyed his house and shop to his brother and sister-in-law, and continued to possess for two years, carrying on his business as formerly. He then failed, and his creditors challenged the conveyance, which had been completed about six months before. The Court: 'In respect that the sasine upon the tenement was not taken for eighteen months after the date of the disposition, and that the common debtor continued in possession of the house, shop, and goods as formerly, and kept an open shop, and the same being all the estate he had till he broke, reduced the disposition as simulate ad hunc effectum, to bring in all the creditors pari passu according to their diligence.' The Court had refused to reduce on the Act 1621, as the creditors had done no diligence, and as the disponee offered to establish the onerous cause of the conveyance. Hamilton's Crs. v Hamilton, 1682, M. 387.

BOOK III.

OF CREDITORS BY PERSONAL OBLIGATION OR CONTRACT.

[293] RECURRING to the distinction between jus in re and jus ad rem, it will be the object of this Book to inquire into the nature and effect of those obligations from which the JUS AD REM arises; the object of personal actions, and the ground of demands by creditors in bankruptcy. And the subject may be considered in this order:—First, The constitution of personal debts originally; and Second, The doctrine of passive titles, or the adoption of the debt by the representative of the original obligant.

PART I.

ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION OF DEBT.

IN this Part an extensive subject presents itself, which, after an introductory Chapter on the general principles of obligation and contract, may be taken in this order:—1. The constitution of debts; 2. Bonds, and unilateral obligations; 3. The various mutual contracts out of which debts may arise; 4. Maritime contracts; 5. The accessory debts of interest, penalties, and damages.

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF OBLIGATION AND CONTRACT.

THE essence of every obligation is, an engagement or undertaking to give or to do something, conferring on him to whom the engagement is undertaken a right of exacting performance.¹ Without following the elaborate divisions of the civilians, obligations may be distinguished into EXPRESS, or CONVENTIONAL; and OBEDIENTIAL, or IMPLIED. The former are in law perfect obligations, which may be judicially enforced; the latter are sometimes as perfect as a conventional obligation; sometimes imperfect, not requiring the interference of a court of justice, but more conveniently left to the jurisdiction and enforcements [294] of conscience alone.

¹ Pand. Just. Pothier in Inst. De Oblig. Pr. vol. i.; Paulus in the 3d law of the Dig. lib. 44, tit. 5, De Oblig. Stair i. 10. 1; Ersk. iii. 1. 1.

SECTION I.

OF CONVENTIONAL OBLIGATIONS AND CONTRACTS.

In order to constitute a full and perfect obligation, there must, on the part of the obligor, be a deliberate consent and engagement to him who is to have the right of exacting performance. Of this deliberate consent Lord Stair distinguishes three acts: desire, or inclination to engage; resolution, or purpose; and engagement, or full obligation. Where the party stops short of the last of these, he has locus pœnitentiæ. 'The act of the will,' says Lord Stair, 'which is efficacious, is that whereby the will confirmeth or stateth a power of exaction in another, and thereby becomes engaged to that other to perform.'¹

It may be proper to consider, 1. The nature of consent necessary in conventional obligations; 2. The legality or illegality of the agreement; 3. The evidence of effectual obligations; 4. The effect of imperfections in point of evidence, and how supplied.

ART. I.—OF THE CONSENT REQUISITE IN CONVENTIONAL OBLIGATIONS.

The state of incapacity of minors, insane and interdicted persons, has already been considered,² and need not now be resumed. Assuming, therefore, that the contracting parties are capable of consent, the point of inquiry at present is, What circumstances are in law sufficient to invalidate the consent which a binding and effectual obligation requires?

It is necessary to an effectual obligation, that the contracting parties shall be agreed on all the essential points of the engagement. There must be no error in the substantial parts of the agreement destroying consent; no constraint such as to overmaster a mind of ordinary vigour; no fraud giving birth to the contract, and misleading the objector as to its true nature and substance.

I. ERROR.—There must be, express or implied, a mutual assent,—a contract on one side to accept; on the other to pay, or deliver, the same thing. And the rule is, that those who err in the substantials of the bargain contract not.³ Such errors vitiate the contract, whether they relate to the nature of the obligation to be undertaken, to the consideration or counterpart, to the subject of the contract, or even to some essential quality of it.

1. Error in substantials may be in the very nature of the contract; as, if a thing meant to be let is taken as sold, there is neither sale nor location. Or if one sends goods to another as sold, and he receives them only in consignment as factor, there is neither sale nor factory: the goods are not transferred, nor could the factor take them as under his general lien.

2. Error in substantials relates chiefly to the subject of the bargain. It occurs commonly in combination with fraud; but even without fraud, error as to the subject of the contract annihilates the consent. So, if one sell plated goods for silver; or an order for porter is mistaken for an order for port wine; or a purchase of St. Petersburg hemp, when the order is for Riga, there is a substantial and fatal error.⁴

¹ Stair i. 10. 2.

² Supra, p. 128.

³ Stair i. 10. 13; Ersk. iii. 1. 16. The text of Stair is a translation of the 16th law of the Pandects, De Reg. Juris: 'Non videntur qui errant consentire.' In the Roman law error is defined, 'Existimatio qua approbetur verum esse quod falsum est; vel falsum quod est verum; vel certum esse quod incertum est, aut contra.'

VOL. I.

⁴ Stair i. 9. 9; Ersk. iii. 1. 16. See also Thornton v Kempster, 1814, 5 Taunt. 786, 1 Marshall 355. Here Kempster, wishing to buy a quantity of St. Petersburg clean hemp, employed Riscow & Paterson as brokers. They, mistaking the order, sent to him a bought note of Riga Rhine hemp, as bought from Thornton & West; and to Thornton & West, having discovered their mistake, they delivered a sale note bearing St. Petersburg clean hemp. Thornton & West

2 R

[295] 3. Error in the person affects the substantial of the contract, if personal identity is of importance, and may be supposed to have entered essentially into the view of the contract. So, in marriage, in donation, in the hire of labour (as of that of an artist), a mistake as to the person will annul consent. So, where personal credit enters into consideration: as, in agreeing to take the security of a particular person, there is no contract if the one party had in contemplation a person different from the surety intended by the other; or if, in a contract of sale, the order is understood to have come from one person, when truly it is from another of the same name: personal credit in those cases being a chief inducement to the consent.¹

4. Error as to the consideration or price will annul consent: as if goods were sold for a bank check which proves to be of no value, the bank credit being exhausted;² or if inadvertently a discharge is given to a debtor on receiving such a check; or if an error has been innocently committed as to the price or rate at which the goods were to be sold.³ But it will not be enough to annul a contract, that the motive which has remotely led to it proves to be a delusion, unless there shall be fraud in the party who profits by the contract.

5. Error as to quality, the thing itself being identically what the parties understood to be the subject of their agreement, may or may not be sufficient to annul the consent.⁴ If it be a quality touching the very object of the contract, and of which the seller must be aware, it will be held essential; and a manifest defect in regard to such quality, provided the defect be not open to observation, and such as would have prevented the bargain, will be fatal to the consent required to a valid contract. Thus, it is implied in mercantile bargains that the article shall be merchantable;⁵ and if it be found not so, there is no sale.⁶

II. CONSTRAINT.—Where one is compelled into a contract, there is no effectual consent, though ostensibly there is the form of it; and the remedy to which the party is entitled is a reduction declaring the contract to be ‘utterly void.’⁷ The constraint necessary thus to annul consent, ‘must, both by the Roman and Scottish law, be a vis aut metus qui cadet in constantem virum, such as would shake a man of firmness and resolution.’⁸ This rule, however, must be taken with some qualifications.

tendered the St. Petersburg hemp, and Kempster refused it, and it was sold at a loss. The question was, Whether there was a binding contract? It was held not, as the defendant was bound to accept one species of hemp, and the plaintiffs were bound to deliver another species. [A sale of a house which turned out to be in part built on another man's land was set aside on the ground of error as to subject; Hamilton v Western Bank, 1861, 23 D. 1033. See also Grieve v Wilson, 6 S. 454, aff. 6 W. and S. 543; Keele v Wheeler, 7 M. and G. 665; Raffles v Wichelhaus, 33 L. J. Ex. 160; Phillips v Bistolfi, 2 B. and C. 511; Bingham v Bingham, 1 Ves. sen. 126.]

¹ See above, p. 263, the cases of Christie & Co., of Dunlop, and of Kemp. In these cases fraud was mingled with the error, which indeed is the common case. Also Mitchell v Lapage, Holt's Rep. 254; [Fellowes v Lord Gwyder, 1 Russ. and My. 83; Boulton v Jones, 27 L. J. Ex. 117; Higsons v Burton, 26 L. J. Ex. 342; Hardman v Booth, 32 L. J. Ex. 105.]

² If it be a forgery, there is added to error the plea of fraud. See Christies v Fairholmes, below, p. 316, note 2.

³ Sword v Sinclairs, 8 Aug. 1771, M. 14241. Here a factor sold tea without observing an error, in writing out the note of prices, of 2s. 8d. instead of 3s. 8d. The factor communicated the mistake as soon as he observed it, and refused implemment. An action by the buyer was dismissed.

⁴ [Scott v Littledale, 27 L. J. Q. B. 201.]

⁵ See below, Of Sale, and the cases there cited. [The doctrine stated in the text is not affected by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, except in relation to specific goods. Taylor v Macfarlane, L. R., 1 Sc. App. p. 245.]

⁶ [When the mistake is that of one party alone, the general rule is, that whatever a man's real intention may be, if he manifests an intention to another party so as to induce the latter to act upon it in making a contract, he will be estopped from denying that the intention so manifested was his real intention. But if the other see that there is a mistake in what the first writes or says, or must be taken to know that from the nature or common sense of the transaction, and fraudulently lies in wait to take advantage of it, he will not be allowed to profit by the error or estop the party from showing it was error. See Lord Wensleydale in Freeman v Cooke, 2 Ex. 654; Doe v Oliver, and cases in notes, Smith's L. C. ii. 671; Cornish v Abington, 28 L. J. Ex. 262; Alexander v Worman, 30 L. J. Ex. 198; Van Toll v South-Eastern Railway Co., 31 L. J. C. P. 241; Sword v Sinclairs, 1771, M. 14241. And see, on Error and Mistake generally, Kerr on Fraud and Mistake; Story on Contracts; Leake on Contracts; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 36-42, and 303-307; Brown on Sale, Nos. 211-224.]

⁷ Stair i. 9. 8.

⁸ Ersk. iii. 1. 16, and iv. 1. 26.

1. Where there is no peculiar weakness of age, or sex, or condition, law will require, in order to annul a contract, such fear and compulsion as may reasonably shake a mind of ordinary constancy and resolution, and will not listen to the pretence of every vain and foolish fear.¹

2. It seems that a distinction is, on the principle of the rule, to be made according [296] to the weakness of the person to be operated upon by the circumstances of intimidation. A young woman of lawful age, but ignorant of the world and of her lawful rights, without any natural protector, or where the persons who ought to shield her from oppression are themselves the oppressors; a person in the weakness of bad health, though of full capacity; an aged parent compelled by the apparent danger of a son; and in many other such cases of peculiar weakness, the state of the person will be taken, in combination with the circumstances of violence or threat, as sufficient to invalidate consent.

3. Imprisonment is one of the most usual instruments of intimidation in modern times. Unlawful imprisonment, as in a lunatic asylum, will be a sufficient ground of reduction ex vi aut metu. Even imprisonment which in itself is lawful, may in some peculiar circumstances perhaps be admitted to the same effect. Whether, if the intimidation produce only a settlement of the debt for which imprisonment is threatened, it would invalidate the transaction in any circumstances, may be doubted. But, at least, whenever this instrument of terror is applied to extort from a debtor something more than the debt for which imprisonment is competent, or from others advantages to which otherwise they would not have consented, there seems to be such a want of lawful consent as to give relief ex vi aut metu.²

4. There is a sort of terror, the operation of which in annulling consent may admit of distinctions. The threat of divulging a crime may frequently operate with the most irresistible force, whether the crime has been actually committed, or is of so shameful a nature that the least imputation of it is a serious evil. An obligation extorted by the threat of a shameful imputation, constructed with so much art that it may be difficult to refute it, would seem to be reducible ex vi aut metu; and yet it might be argued that a mind of ordinary constancy and manliness ought not to be moved by such an imputation.

5. The effect of compulsion as invalidating consent will not be limited to him who is the party to the contract, but a remedy will be given also against those who profit by the unlawful act. And,

6. Where the constraint is not of that violent or overwhelming nature which can be deemed of a character to influence a mind of ordinary constancy (as, for example, the terror of a lawsuit, or the necessity of a judicial oath, so revolting to some persons of weakly [297]

¹ In modern times this is seldom a ground of reduction, though in the case of married women it still may occur; such persons being subject to the domestic tyranny of their husbands, without any means of exposure or of protection. In our older cases there are many strange examples of violence exercised, while the vigilance of public justice was relaxed by rebellion, or the police of Scotland in no state of vigour to restrain the more remote inhabitants. Such are the cases of—

E. of Morton v Lochleven, 1543, M. 16479.

E. of Orkney v Vinfra, 1606, M. 16481.

M'Intosh v Farquharson & Spalding, 1671, M. 16485.

Stewart v Whiteford, 1677, M. 16492.

Grant v Anderson, 1706, M. 16509.

² See Ersk. iv. 1. 26. Heriot v Bird, 1681, M. 16496, where, by threats of imprisonment, one was compelled to grant a disposition of moveables for payment of a debt not in the caption. The Court held it effectual for the debt in the caption, not for the other.

Nisbet v Stewart, 1708, similar to the above, M. 16512.

Willocks v Callander, 1776, M. 1519. A bill was found ineffectual in the hands of an onerous endorsee, having been extorted by violence.

Wightman v Graham, 1787, M. 1521. Here Wightman paid a bill due by his father; and afterwards, on assignation from the bill-holder, took out a caption, and threatened the cedent himself with imprisonment, by the terror of which he extorted from him a bill for the original debt, with interest and costs accumulated. A reduction was raised, and the bill afterwards endorsed, and the endorsee brought an action for payment. The Court, holding that a bill impetrated like the one in question was of no validity, dismissed the action.

Frazer v Black & Knox, 1810. [See also cases in M. pp. 16484, 16505, 16687, 16494, and 16603; Arrat v Wilson, Roberts. App. Ca. 234; Monro v Bruce, ibid. 387; Wright v M'Gregor, 5 S. 794; Dickie v Gatzmer, 8 S. 147.]

scrupulous conscience), an admixture of deception or fraud will be required, and may be sufficient to invalidate the consent.¹

III. FRAUD is a ground of invalidity in obligations, where the direct misrepresentations or manoeuvres of the one party are such that the other party has thereby been induced to enter into an engagement to which he would not otherwise have consented. In such a case there is consent, but it is not such consent as can justly give the right of exaction to the person deceiving or adopting the deceit. And here lies the difference made by lawyers between that nullity which attends error or compulsion, both totally subversive of consent; and that invalidity which is produced by fraud inducing consent upon false grounds. Consent, it is said, may be predicated in the latter case, not in the former. The objection will be good against third parties in the former case; not in the latter, unless such third parties represent the defrauder.

The general rule is, that wherever fraud gives birth to the contract, it will not bind;² and it was well laid down in an English case, that where a purchaser has laboured under a deception, in which the adverse party has permitted him to remain, on a point which he thought material to influence his judgment, the contract is void.³

The general nature and operation of fraud upon transference has already been considered, and the two kinds of fraud as distinguished by lawyers—fraus dans causam contractui, and fraus incidens.⁴ It remains only to mark some of the cases in which fraud, less in

¹ See below, p. 317, notes 1 and 2. Forman v Sheriff, 1791, M. 16515; M'Ilwham v Kerr, 1823, 2 S. 240.

² Christies v Fairholmes, 1748, M. 4896. Tobacco sold on a bill with a forged name as co-acceptor. The vendor claimed the goods in the hands of creditors as not effectually sold, and the Court so held. See above, p. 309.

³ Hill v Gray, 1816, 1 Starkie 434. Here a purchaser of a picture as a Claude, was misled by the vendor's agent into a belief that it had formed part of a particular collection, which he thought sufficient evidence of its genuineness. It was not of that collection, but he was allowed to buy under that misconception. Lord Ellenborough tried the case.

[The case of Hill v Gray, as reported, seems not reconcilable with what is certainly the general rule as to concealment as distinguished from misrepresentation, viz. that it is only where a party is under some special obligation to reveal facts to another that mere silence will be regarded as fraud, entitling the other party to redress. Thus, where a fiduciary relation subsists between the parties, there is a positive duty of disclosure arising out of that relation. In insurance cases, the basis of the contract is that the insured shall disclose all material facts, shall state the elements of the risk he proposes that the insurer shall undertake; and this necessarily creates an obligation of disclosure. It is sometimes said—as, for instance, by Professor More, Lectures, i. 246—that suretyship being a contract of indemnity, like insurance, creates the same duty on the creditor receiving the cautionary obligation to disclose all circumstances known to him essential to the risk, which the cautioner is about to undertake, of the debtor's solvency. That, however, is too broad a proposition. See Wythes v Labouchere, 5 Jur. N.E. 499; Lee v Jones, 34 L. J. C. P. 131; Way v Hearne, 32 L. J. C. P. 34; Owen v Homan, 20 L. J. C. 314; North British Insurance Co. v Lloyd, 24 L. J. Ex. 14. He must not conceal any material matters of the transaction itself between him and the debtor to which the suretyship relates, if he undertakes to describe that transaction at all; but there is no legal obligation on him to disclose to the intended surety matters affecting the credit of the debtor, or to keep him right as to any other circumstances of inducement not intrinsic to the particular transaction. In regard to sale, there is in general no duty of disclosure except as to latent faults known to vendor, and falling within the warrantice of quality: there is no obligation of disclosure with regard to extrinsic facts merely bearing on the contract, or operating as an inducement thereto. (See Story, Sale, sec. 382.) There may be a duty of disclosure created in sales with reference to particular matters by the usage of particular trades (Jones v Bowden, 4 Taunt. 847), or by special circumstances, where the seller expressly or by clear implication undertakes the duty of disclosing all the material facts. The active prevention of fair examination will no doubt avoid the sale, but that is not mere concealment (Mellish v Motteux, Peake, N. P. C. 115). There is no case at law, except Hill v Gray, which makes mere concealment by the seller, in regard to a matter of inducement, extrinsic to the subject sold, a ground for avoiding the sale. Probably the facts are not fully reported, and they may have amounted to something of the nature of misrepresentation, operated by a series of manoeuvres (which is what we understand by the expressions 'studious' and 'industrious' concealment of the equity lawyers) designed to create the belief which influenced the buyer. In Keates v Cadogan, 20 L. J. C. P. 76, the Common Pleas explained Lord Ellenborough's judgment as intimating that there 'had been a positive aggressive deceit.' Either this was the state of the facts, or the judgment was unsound. It certainly ought not to have been made the basis of an indiscriminating proposition as to passive fraud such as the text seems to countenance. A man shall indeed be liable for the slightest word or act which amounts to positive misrepresentation of a material thing; but he must be shown to have been under a positive duty to speak before he can be made answerable for having held his tongue.]

⁴ See above, p. 261 sqq.

degree than would be requisite if it stood alone, combined with other circumstances, also in themselves insufficient, will be held to make out a case subversive of that consent which is essential to contracts.

1. Where one, under the operation of some motive of alarm insufficient of itself to invalidate his contract, has been also deceived by the adverse party in the contract, no advantage can be taken of his engagement. Thus, in a case already alluded to, where a man was induced, by the terror of a lawsuit on account of a trespass by cattle, to grant a bill for an exorbitant and misrepresented amount of damages, he was found entitled to relief.¹ And again, the terror of a prosecution for criminal conversation having induced a weak person to grant a bill to the husband, it was found invalid, the husband having fraudulently connived at the intercourse.²

2. Lesion, or great inequality or inadequacy of price, has already been seen not to be of itself sufficient to reduce contracts or deeds;³ but combined with fraud and weakness of mind, it will afford a sufficient ground of reduction.⁴

3. Intoxication, as a ground of relief from an obligation, is in general to be set forth as a plea of fraud. It cannot, indeed, be said that there is consent where the mind is for the time destroyed by intoxication; and standing alone, it will be a good ground of reduction, [298] that the party was so drunk as not to know what he did; or, according to Erskine, 'in a state of absolute drunkenness, and consequently deprived of the exercise of reason.'⁵ In general, intoxication only 'darkens reason,' and does not of itself invalidate a contract; but the advantage taken of this state of imbecility may infer the existence of fraud, or aid the force of the objection grounded on deceit or extortion.⁶ In England, accordingly, this degree of intoxication is taken as an ingredient of fraud, where the adverse party has led the person into intoxication,⁷ or where he is shown to have taken advantage of his weakness.

ART. II.—OF OBLIGATIONS AND CONTRACTS CONSIDERED AS LEGAL OR ILLEGAL.

The consent which forms the essence of all contracts and obligations must be not only deliberate, but the agreement must be of a description which law will sanction; otherwise no debt can arise out of it, and a court will not lend its aid to enforce it. The contract must be neither illegal nor immoral: it must not be a contract prohibited, or against the policy of the laws of trade, or prejudicial to the community.

The general rule of law is, that no claim or right of action can spring out of an illegal contract; that no court will lend its aid, and no trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to give sanction, to a claim grounded upon an immoral or an illegal act.⁸

¹ Forman v Sheriff, 1791, M. 16515.

² M'Ilwham v Kerr, 1823, 2 S. 240.

³ See above, p. 136.

⁴ In England, inadequacy of price alone will invalidate a contract, if so strong, gross, and manifest, that a man of common sense will start at the bare mention of it; such inadequacy being taken as evidence of fraud, according to Lord Thurlow. 1 Brown, Chan. Ca. 9. Or 'if there is such inadequacy as to show that the person did not understand the bargain he made, or was so oppressed that he was glad to make it, knowing its inadequacy, it will show a command over him which may amount to fraud.' Heathcote v Paignon, 1787, 2 Brown, Chan. Ca. 175.

⁵ Ersk. iii. 1. 16. 'Persons while in a state of absolute drunkenness, and consequently deprived of the exercise of reason, cannot oblige (bind) themselves.' See also iv. 4. 5; Stair ii. 3. L. Halton v Northesk, 1672, M. 13384.

In England, Sir W. Grant says that a deed obtained from a man in such extreme state of intoxication as to deprive him of his reason would be invalid even at law. Cook v Clayworth, 18 Ves. 16. See also Pitt v Smith, 3 Camp. p. 34.

⁶ Erskine says: 'A lesser degree of drunkenness, which only darkens reason, has not the effect of annulling the contract;' ubi sup.

⁷ See Johnson v Medlicot, 3 P. Wms. 130, note (a), where Sir J. Jekyl at the Rolls said: 'The having been in drink is not any reason to relieve a man against any deed or agreement gained from him when in those circumstances, for this were to encourage drunkenness. Secus if, through the management or contrivance of him who gained the deed, and the party from whom such deed has been gained, was drawn into drink.'

⁸ Lord Mansfield says, in Holman v Johnston, Cowp. 343: 'No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act.'

Mr. Justice Ashurst, in Blambford v Preston, 8 Term. Rep.

The acts which may be thus distinguished may be illegal, either on the principles of common law or by the force of statute. It may be convenient to consider these cases under the following heads: 1. Contracts and obligations immoral, or contra bonos mores. 2. Contracts and obligations against public policy. And, 3. The force of contracts thus exceptionable, when pleaded against third parties not participant in the offence.¹

SUBSECTION I.—OF OBLIGATIONS AND CONTRACTS IMMORAL, OR CONTRA BONOS MORES.

These, again, are reducible to several classes:—

1. INCENTIVE TO CRIME.—Agreements or obligations inductive to crime cannot be the foundation of a claim; for the law says, 'You shall not stipulate for iniquity.' Neither will a claim be sustained on a bond for compounding a crime; as, for example, a prosecution for [299] perjury,² or for procuring a pardon.³ And it is not enough that the document of debt has received the unsuspecting appearance of a simple and legal bill or bond. Whenever courts of law, said an eminent judge, see attempts made to conceal such wicked deeds, they will brush away the cobweb varnish, and show the transactions in their true light.⁴

A distinction is admitted between bonds given as the price of prostitution, and bonds granted subsequent to such a connection, as a provision due in honour and justice for an injury accomplished. On a bond of the former description no claim can lie;⁵ on one of the latter description the claim is admissible.⁶ But the favour indulged to bonds of the latter description is withheld where the grantee is a prostitute,⁷ or where she knew the granter to be married at the time of their connection.⁸ And a distinction, again, has been taken between

93, says: 'It is a clear rule of law, that no right of action can spring out of an illegal contract.'

Lord Kenyon, in same case, says: 'One who comes into a court of justice to enforce a contract, must come on legal grounds; and if he have not a legal title, he cannot succeed, whatever the private wishes of the court may be.' [As to obligations partly legal and partly illegal, see ex parte Mather, 3 Ves. jun. 373; Hamilton v Main, 2 S. 313.]

¹ [In addition to the grounds of illegality noticed in the text, reference may here be made to the so-called 'ultra vires doctrine' established by modern decisions in relation to contracts entered into by incorporated companies for purposes not sanctioned by their charters or acts of incorporation. In order to bring the contract within the exception, it must appear by the express provisions of the statute, or by reasonable inference from its enactments, that the deed was ultra vires, that the Legislature meant that such a deed should not be made—per Lord Wensleydale in S. Yorkshire Ry. Co. v Great Northern Ry. Co., 9 Exch. 85; or, as elsewhere stated, that the contract appears to be necessarily unconnected with the purpose of the company's incorporation—per Chief Justice Erle in Mayor of Norwich v Norfolk Ry. Co., 4 El. and Bl. 447; Att.-Gen. v Great Northern Ry. Co., 1 Drew and Sm. 154. See also the opinions of the law Lords in Hawkes v E. Counties Ry. Co., 5 H. L. Ca. 331. See Hodges on Railways, 4th ed. p. 63 et seq.]

² Collins v Blantern, 2 Wils. 341, 347.

³ Stewart v Earl of Galloway, 1752, M. 9465. A bond of £200 to one about the king's person to obtain pardon for murder held bad.

Grant v Davidson, 1786, M. 9571. An agreement to pay a sum to the poor for quashing an action for penalties, held by Lord Hailes illegal. Court altered, on ground of usage as well as policy. See 2 Hailes 1001.

⁴ Lord Chief Justice Wilmot in Collins v Blantern, above, note 2.

⁵ It is doubtful whether, even to the children of such a connection, the bond would be good. See Lord Eldon in Hamilton v Waring, 1 Bligh 269.

[On the same principle, action is denied on a lease of premises let in the knowledge that they were to be used as a brothel. Smith v White, 1 L. R. Eq. 626, and cases there referred to. See also Pearce v Brooks, 1 L. R. Ex. 213, an action for the price of a brougham supplied to a prostitute.]

⁶ Walker v Perkins, 3 Bur. 1568. A promise, in consideration of future illicit connection, denied action.

March. of Annandale v Harris, 2 Peere Williams 432.

Gibson v Dickie, 3 Maule and Selw. 463.

See D. of Hamilton v Scott Waring, 21 May 1816, 19 Fac. Coll. 128. This part of the case given up in the House of Lords, 2 Bligh 197.

[Nye v Moseley, 6 Barn. & Cr. 133; Friend v Harrison, 2 Car. and P. 584; Johnstone v Mackenzie's Exrs., 14 S. 106.]

⁷ Whaley v Norton, 1 Vernon 483; Matthew's case, 2 Vernon 187.

⁸ Durham v Blackwood, 1622, M. 9469. Here the Court of Session denied effect to a bond, even to the unlawful issue of the connection. But the distinction is correctly taken in a subsequent case—Sir W. Hamilton v Mary de Gares, 1765, M. 9471—where action was denied on a bond to an adulteress, but sustained on a bond to the child of the connection.

See the case of Priest v Parrot, in England, 2 Vesey 160, where a girl came to live as a companion to Parrot's wife, and Parrot seduced her, and gave her afterwards a bond. Action denied.

the person with whom the connection was formed, and the children of such connection; the claim of the latter being admitted in cases where the former was rejected.¹

2. INDECENT OR MISCHIEVOUS CONSIDERATION.—An obligation or stipulation is void which is prejudicial to the feelings or interests of a third party, or offensive to decency or morality, or which has a tendency to mischievous and pernicious consequences: as a contract of sale of obscene and indecent publications;² or an obligation to induce an immoral action, as a violation of chastity, or personal injury to another; or a contract which gives a subject of this country an interest in the life of an enemy;³ or which resolves into an inquiry concerning personal defects or blemishes.⁴ The cases in the English books which illustrate this rule are chiefly cases of wagers, which on another ground would be dismissed in Scotland.⁵

3. GAMING.—Gaming was prohibited by statute as a most pernicious vice as early as James VI.'s time—1621, c. 14. By this Act, the winnings above 100 merks to go to [300] the poor. 9 Anne, c. 14; 18 Geo. II. c. 34. By an ordonnance of Louis XIII. of France in 1611, winnings were limited to a small sum, the excess being given to the poor. This probably suggested the remedy provided in our Act of 1621. In England there are three principal statutes; one in the time of Henry VIII., another in the dissolute reign of Charles II., and a third in Queen Anne's time.⁶ By the last of these Acts, which has received effect in Scotland,⁷ 'all bonds or other securities given for money won at play, or money lent at the time to play with,' are declared utterly 'void;' and 'all mortgages or encumbrances of lands made on the same consideration, are ordered to be made over to the use of the mortgagor.' This objection was held to affect any one holding a bond or bill as trustee for the winner;⁸ but not onerous and bona fide endorsees, without notice of the objection.⁹ The Act of 1621 is not, however, in desuetude, as might be supposed from one case,¹⁰ but only effectual to the poor, not to the winner.¹¹

4. WAGERS.—By the law of Scotland, a rule has been followed on the subject of wagers which is opposite to that of the English law, but which English judges of the highest name have regretted that it is almost too late to adopt in England.¹² The view which has been

¹ See the cases in the preceding note.

² Fores v Johnes, 4 Espin. 97, where an order for all prints was held not to oblige the orderer to take obscene ones; and an action is not maintainable for the value of such prints.

See also Du Bost v Beresford, 1810, 2 Camp. 511, where, in an action for the value of a picture which the defendant had cut in pieces, held that, being libellous, law cannot consider it valuable as a picture.

[Poplet v Stockdale, Ry. and M. 337.]

³ Gilbert v Sykes, relative to a wager on the life of Bona parte. 16 East 150.

⁴ Da Costa v Jones, a wager as to the sex of the Chevalier D'Eon. Cowp. 729.

⁵ See below, Of Wagers.

⁶ 33 Henry VIII. c. 9; 16 Charles II. c. 7; 9 Anne, c. 14.

[By 8 and 9 Vict. c. 109, sec. 17, it is enacted that 'all agreements by way of gaming or wagering' shall be null and void. See Foulds v Thomson, 1857, 19 D. 803.]

⁷ Neilson v Bruce, 1740, M. 9507; Sir R. Pringle v Biggar, 1740, M. 9509.

⁸ Sir R. Pringle v Biggar, supra.

⁹ Neilson v Bruce, supra.

[By 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 41, bills, notes, and mortgages in the hands of purchasers for value shall not be void, but only held as for an illegal consideration; and if on such instruments the grantor or maker shall pay to the holder the money so secured, he shall be entitled to recover it as money paid to the original payee, as on an illegal consideration. See Edwards v Dick, 4 Barn. and Ald. 212; Ferrier v Graham's Trs., 6 S. 818, 5 Mur. 92.]

¹⁰ Straiton v Laird of Craigmillar, 1688, M. 9506.

¹¹ Maxwell v Blair, 1774, M. 9522. The Act 1621 held not in desuetude, but available to the poor; and notice given to the kirk-treasurer to appear for the interest of the poor.

¹² This regret has been expressed by Lord Mansfield, who says: 'Whether it would have been better policy to have treated all wagers originally as gaming contracts, and so have held them void, is now too late to discuss' (Cowp. 729). Mr. Justice Ashurst has said: 'In my opinion, the Courts have gone far enough in encouraging impertinent wagers. Perhaps it would have been better for the public if the Courts had originally determined that no action to enforce the payment of wagers should be permitted' (2 Term. Rep. 615). And Mr. Justice Buller has said: 'Such a wager is not permitted by the laws of other countries: it is not allowed by the civil law, nor by the law of Scotland; and a determination on that point which came from the Court of Session in Scotland was affirmed here in the House of Lords on an appeal' (Ib. 616). And again, in alluding to Lord Mansfield's opinion, above quoted, he says: 'With great deference to that very high and respectable authority, I doubt whether it be too late to consider that question or not; for in Bruce v Ross, Dom. Proc. 14 April 1788, a decree in Scotland was affirmed on the ground that all idle wagers were void. In the taken in Scotland is, that the laws of the country and its judicatures were instituted to determine adverse rights, and not the idle or impertinent doubts and inquiries of persons not interested in the matter. In a case determined in 1799, the Court, proceeding not on the statute against gaming, but on the common law, held 'that courts were instituted to enforce the rights of parties arising from serious transactions, and can pay no regard to sponsiones ludicræ.'¹

This doctrine may now be held as the settled law of Scotland; for not only was it applied in the Court of Session to rule a case decided some years before the case above mentioned, but the judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords.²

[301] If a sum has been paid to receive a larger sum on a certain event, there seems to be no doubt that a claim will lie, at least for the sum so paid, as a debt.³

5. LIQUOR ACTS.—By 24 Geo. II. c. 40, in order to prevent the pernicious effects of dram-drinking, no action is maintainable for money, etc. for spirituous liquors, unless bona fide contracted at one time to the amount of 20s. or upwards. And the claim is not even valid as an item in an account where the liquor at once delivered, and mentioned in the item, is not to the amount of 20s. On this statute, action has been refused on a bill granted for the amount of an account for spirits furnished.⁴

SUBSECTION II.—CONTRACTS AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY.

The private interests and stipulations of individuals must yield, and their natural rights and powers suffer restraint, wherever they are inconsistent with the public interest. This great consideration furnishes the ground of several important restraints on the freedom of contracting obligations; and they may be considered as connected, 1st, With internal policy; and 2^d, With the policy of foreign relations.⁵

printed cases, which is all we have to go upon, it is stated that the rule and principle of the civil law relative to the sponsiones ludicræ were early adopted as common law in that kingdom, and have been constantly adhered to; and the great and laudable pains which on all occasions have been taken to preserve an uniformity between the laws of that country and of this, make that case of considerable authority here' (3 Term. Rep. 697).

[To the principle under consideration may probably be referred the restrictions on the making of contracts for the sale and transfer of public stocks and securities contained in the now repealed Acts, 7 Geo. II. c. 8, and 10 Geo. II. c. 8, commonly called 'Sir John Barnard's Acts.' These statutes are repealed by 23 and 24 Vict. c. 28.]

¹ Wordsworth v Pettigrew, 1799, M. 9524; [Harvey v Miller, 7 D. 398; O'Connell v Russell, 1864, 3 Macph. 89.]

² The consequence of not having followed the same course in England is, that it has been necessary to enter into many distinctions in determining what wagers deserve support, and what are to be rejected. See Jones v Randolph, Cowper 37; Foster v Thackeray, 1 Term. Rep. 57, note (o), and many others.

Bruce v Ross, 1787, M. 9523, 2 Hailes 1016. There were two grounds of judgment commingled in this decision: 1. That a wager is not actionable; and, 2. That a wager relative to the election of a member of Parliament is against public policy. In the House of Lords the decision was affirmed on the former ground, 14 April 1788, 3 Pat. 107.

See, for the grounds of that judgment, above, p. 319, note 12, Mr. Justice Buller's opinion in Atherfold v Beard, 2 Term.

Rep. 616, and in Good v Elliot, 3 Term. Rep. 697. [See also 19 Geo. II. c. 37, 14 Geo. III. c. 48, as to 'gaming policies' of insurance.]

³ [See, as to wager policies, Arnould on Marine Insurance, by Maclachlan, pp. 109–117.]

⁴ Russell v Russell, 6 July 1808, F. C.

[This statute, commonly called the Tippling Act, has been amended by 25 and 26 Vict. c. 38, which leaves the old Act in force, except in cases where the liquors are sold to be consumed elsewhere than at the place of sale, and delivered at the residence of the purchaser in quantities not less at one time than a reputed quart. By 30 and 31 Vict. c. 142, sec. 4, no action lies to recover any money alleged to be due in respect of the sale of any ale, porter, beer, cider, or perry consumed on the premises where sold or supplied, or in respect of any money or goods lent or supplied, or of any security given for obtaining said articles. See, on the Tippling Acts, Hughes v Dove, 1 Q. B. 294 (overruling Jackson v Attril, Peake 181); Spencer v Smith, 3 Camp. 9; Burnyeat v Hutchinson, 5 B. and Ald. 241; Proctor v Nicholson, 7 Carr. and P. 67 (Query—whether overruled by Hughes v Dove?); Owens v Porter, 4 C. and P. 367; Crookshank v Rose, 5 C. and P. 19; Philpot v Jones, 2 Ad. and E. 41; Gaitakill v Greathead, 1 Dowl. and Ry. 359; Dawson v Remnant, 6 Esp. 24; Gilpin v Rendell, 1 Selwyn N. P. 10th ed. 55; Alexander v Boyd, 2 S. 652; Johnstone v Law, 5 D. 1372; Maitland v Rattray, 11 D. 71. Spirits mixed with water are within the Act. Scott v Gilmore, 3 Taunt. 226.]

⁵ [On the unwarrantable latitude assumed in many cases by the Courts in declaring contracts illegal at common law,

I.—CONTRACTS INCONSISTENT WITH INTERNAL POLICY.

This class of restraints frequently combines the consideration of immorality, already taken notice of, with those of general policy, as in bribery in elections; sometimes no other consideration operates but the general policy of the law in securing the freedom of the subject from undue restraint.

1. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.—The law is jealous of all contracts which restrain the freedom or taint the purity of the domestic relations.

RESTRAINTS ON MARRIAGE.—All contracts imposing restraints on marriage, though clear of direct fraud, are to be looked on with great jealousy, and generally it may be laid down that they are void.¹ A bond not to marry is bad, as encouraging irregularity, and as devoid of proper interest to the obligee. But where the bond has relation to the party, distinctions have been contended for. 1. If there be a subsisting engagement to marry the obligee, in relation to which the obligation is granted, it has been greatly doubted whether the sum in the bond being the price of reciprocally abstaining from engagement, a woman holding such a bond, and in reliance on it, avoiding other engagements and suffering injury, has not a good ground of action for the sum. But, taking the matter on broad grounds, this has been held a dangerous and illegal sort of traffic; all that is beneficial in the subsisting engagement being demandable on the obligation to marry. 2. Where, on the other hand, there is no subsisting obligation to marry, or only an implied contract, such obligations to pay forfeits are bad, as savouring of improper restraint. It is held, that where there is a proper impediment, the parties should continue free; where there is none, they should marry: [302] and law ought not to sanction what may encourage illicit connection or improper advantages taken in delicate circumstances.²

MARRIAGE BROUAGE CONTRACTS are agreements or bonds promising a reward to one who, by reason of the influence he may have over one of the parties, shall procure a marriage between them; and are void on account of their pernicious tendency to unhappy marriages, the infamous profit derived, disobedience to parents encouraged, the destruction of the peace of families, and the ruin and unhappiness of the parties themselves.³ The first case which occurred 'moved laughter.'⁴ The next seems to have suggested more serious reflections on the dangerous tendency of such agreements;⁵ and at last, in a case where the point came on the ground that they contravene, or are supposed by the Courts to contravene, public policy, see the observations of the judges in Richardson v Mellish, 2 Bingh. 242; and of Lord Campbell, in Hilton v Eckersley, 24 L. J. Q. B. 353. Burroughs, J., said that argument upon public policy was 'a very unruly horse; and when once you get astride it, you never know where it will carry you. It may lead you from the sound law.']

¹ [As to conditions in wills against the marriage of the testator's widow, see Newton v Newton, 31 L. J. Ch. 690. As a general rule, a legacy or annuity given to the testator's wife dum vidua manserit is good. Observe, however, that where a legacy is given on an illegal condition, the legatee takes the gift free from the condition.]

² See these views illustrated in two English cases under Lord Hardwicke and Lord Mansfield: Woodhouse v Shepley, 2 Atk. 540; Lowe v Peers, 4 Burr. 2225. See Gibson v Dickie, 3 Maule and Selwyn 463.

[On a kindred question, the validity of the class of agreements in which an annuity or pecuniary consideration is stipulated between husband and wife as a condition of voluntary separation, the authorities on the law of England are inconclusive. On the one hand, it was ruled that a husband cannot legally sell his consent to a separation (Jones v Waite, 5 Bingh. N. C. 341). On the other, the Courts of law and equity have enforced contracts of separation where the terms were fair, and the circumstances such as to render separation inevitable. In the case of Wilson v Wilson, a decree of Vice-Chancellor Shadwell, restraining the husband from taking proceedings contrary to the agreement, was affirmed in the House of Lords, 1 H. L. Ca. 538; but the judgment in this case was not accepted as settling the principle, and in Hunt v Hunt an appeal was taken to the same tribunal against an injunction pronounced by Lord Westbury as Chancellor, restraining proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights. After a hearing had taken place before seven law Lords, with the assistance of the judges, one of the parties died, and no judgment was delivered; 1 Sm. L. Ca., 6th ed. 343.]

³ Comyn's Dig. vol. ii. p. 631, and the cases there cited.

⁴ Campbell v Barns and Stewart, 1678, M. 9505.

⁵ E. of Buchan v Cochran, 1698, M. 4546, where the bond was first sued on in England, and the plaintiff nonsuited, as the bond was contra bonos mores. The action here was for the expenses of Sir John Cochran in England while negotiating the marriage. The case does not appear to have come to a decision.

fairly to trial, the Court held the engagement undertaken to be contra bonos mores, and the contract to afford no ground of action.¹

2. RESTRAINTS ON NATURAL LIBERTY may to a certain extent be effectually imposed. Thus, although it is unlawful to bind oneself to perpetual banishment or perpetual service,² an engagement or mutual contract of service, and wages for a long term of years, or even for life, seems effectual.³ Again, it not unfrequently happens that an engagement is undertaken, by which one, in entering to the service of another, restrains himself from that particular line of trade within a certain district, for the purpose of avoiding rivalry and disadvantage to his master. On this subject several distinctions have been admitted; and, 1. A general restraint extending to the whole country is void, whether with or without a consideration given for it, on the ground not only of injury to the one party by loss of livelihood and the subsistence of his family, without a corresponding advantage to the other, but of injury to the public, by depriving it of a useful member. 2. Particular restraints are effectual, on the principle that a man may by his own consent give over his trade, and part with it to another in a particular place.⁴ And so agreements have been sustained restraining the grantor from particular trades within the same parish,⁵ or within half a mile,⁶ or within ten miles,⁷ or within the same city.⁸

[303] 3. INVASION OF FREEDOM OF ELECTION.—This has not been left to the common law. The Act of 49 Geo. III. c. 118 proceeds on a preamble, that giving or promising money to procure a seat in Parliament is not bribery, if the money is not given or promised to a voter or returning officer, but that such gift or promise is contrary to the ancient usage, right, and freedom of election, and laws and constitutions of the realm; and therefore, if any person give, directly or indirectly, any sum, etc., on an engagement, etc., to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person to serve in Parliament for any county, etc., the consequences shall be: 1. Forfeiture of £1000 by the person so offending: 2. If returned,

¹ Thomson v Mackaile, 1770, M. 9519, 1 Hailes 339, where, by a series of manœuvres, a young woman was led into a marriage, and action was brought by the manœvrer, who held a bond for a sum to be paid if the marriage should be accomplished. The Court held this an obligation which could not be enforced.

² Wedderburn v Monorgan, 1612, M. 9453; Caprington v Geddie, 24 March 1632, M. 9454.

³ Ersk. i. 7. 62. See the case of Reid v Scott, 1687, M. 9505, where a very odd contract of apprenticeship to a mountebank was sustained. [Allan v Skene, 1728, M. 9454.]

⁴ See a very elaborate argument of Parker, Chief Justice, in Mitchell v Reynolds, 1 Peere Williams 181. [Smith's L. C. i. 356, 6th ed., and notes.]

⁵ Mitchell v Reynolds, preceding note.

⁶ Chesman v Nainby, 2 Strange 739, 2 L. Raymond 1456, 1 Br. Par. Ca. 234.

⁷ Davis v Mason, 5 Term. Rep. 118, where one so agreed on being taken as assistant to a country surgeon. [Homer v Ashford, 3 Bing. 322; Homer v Graves, 7 Bing. 735.]

⁸ Stalker v Carmichael, 1735, M. 9455, where two persons entered into partnership as booksellers in Glasgow for three years, and with a stipulation that, 'after the expiration of three years, either of them refusing to enter into a new contract upon the former terms, should be debarred from any concern in bookselling within the city of Glasgow.' 'The Court found this debarring clause in the contract a lawful paction, and not contrary to the liberty of the subject.' [Hitchcock v Coker, 6 Add. and El. 438, where the Court sustained an agreement to endure for the lifetimes of the parties. Idem in Watson v Neuffert, 1863, 1 Macph. 1110, the restriction being limited to a particular trade in a particular place. See also Macintyre v MacRuill, 1866, 4 Macph. 571. In England it is held to be settled by the case of Hitchcock v Coker, supra, that the Court cannot inquire into the extent or adequacy of the consideration for such agreements. Per Lord Wensleydale in Leighton v Wales, 3 M. and W. 551; per Alderson, B., in Pilkington v Scott, 15 M. and W. 657.

It is to be regretted that the English courts of equity have given a latitude to the doctrine of partial restraint which virtually abrogates the rule against general restraints, and it is to be hoped that their decisions will not be followed in this country. As examples, we cite Whittaker v Howe, 3 Beav. 383, where the agreement was by attorneys and solicitors not to practise in Great Britain for the space of twenty years without the consent of the gentleman to whom they had sold the business; and Lord Langdale, 'having regard to the nature of the profession, to the limitation of time, and to the decision that the distance of 100 miles does not describe an unreasonable boundary,' upheld the agreement. In a recent case, an agreement by a manufacturer not to carry on trade within 200 miles of Birmingham was held binding (Harms v Parsons, 32 L. J. Ch. 247). Where the condition is limited by distance from a specified place, the better opinion seems to be that the distance is to be measured in a straight line, and not by road or rail. Leigh v Hind, 9 B. and C. 774—per Parke, B.—Smith, L. Ca. 6th ed. 371. See the cases collected in Smith, L. C. loc. cit., and Benjamin on Sale, pp. 390-7; Parson's Contr. ii. 747 et seq.; Leake, Contr. p. 387.]

incapacity to serve in that Parliament: 3. Forfeiture to the Crown of the gift, etc., by the receiver, besides a penalty of £500.

No action is maintainable at common law on bonds of this description;¹ and this principle, combined with the rule against sustaining wagers, was fatal to an action on a wager respecting the result of an election.²

II.—CONTRACTS AGAINST PUBLIC POLICY AND THE REVENUE LAWS.

The public interest requires, both in peace and in war, the imposition of customs and other taxes to furnish the necessary revenues for the use of Government. In war, the hands of Government must be strengthened to the utmost, that with the greatest possible efficacy the operations of this great engine of justice amongst nations may be directed to the accomplishment of the policy at which the wisdom of Government aims. Individual rights or contracts, where they interfere with public interest, must suffer limitation; and in peace, nothing must be done by individuals to diminish the public revenue; in war, nothing to cripple the resources of the country, or to aid the operations of the enemy.

Out of these considerations arise two classes of restraints upon contracts: one relating to the policy to be pursued during war; the other relating to contraband goods, or the commercial restraints for protecting the revenue.³

I. OF WAR POLICY.⁴—The great principle which regulates this department of law is, that war is the operation of the great governing power of the state, aiming at the attainment of national good, or the avoidance of national evil; and by the infliction of such inconvenience and distress on the enemy as may induce them to grant the terms of peace for which it is thought expedient to insist. It implies that individuals (who are necessarily without the information which directs the policy of the state) shall not be permitted to interfere. And the rule is, that there is not a war for arms, and a peace for commerce. It is a necessary consequence of this, that no contract entered into against the war policy can receive effect in a court of law. Whatever individual suffering may arise, the result of the general policy is a benefit to the whole community; and the result of that comprehensive view which Government is enabled to take of the national relations and policy, is not to be disturbed by the officious interference, and narrow or selfish views, of private men, not having before them the materials of a wise deliberation.

1. NEUTRALS.—The operation of this great principle is to a certain extent impeded [304] by the rights of Neutrals. By their interposition, trade between the belligerents continues open. For although the subjects of the belligerent powers cannot carry on direct intercourse, there is nothing in their hostility against each other to affect neutrals.

Neutrals may carry on with belligerents a trade which is beneficial to the one belligerent

¹ Glen v Dundas, 1822, 1 S. 256. This action was for arrears on a bond of annuity, given as a bribe to secure the vote of a brother of the obligee. The Court, being satisfied that the bond was granted for an illegal purpose, refused action.

² Bruce v Ross, 1787, M. 9523. See above, p. 320, note 2. [So also, an agreement to withdraw an election petition, in consideration of a sum of money, was held void. Coppock v Bower, 4 M. and W. 361. But agreements to buy off opposition to proceedings in Parliament which affect patrimonial interests merely are valid, the consideration not being held to be illegal. Scottish N.-E. Railway Co. v Stewart, 3 Macq. 382; Hare v London and N.-W. Railway Co., 2 Johns. and H. 80, 30 L. J. Ch. 817. So held where the landowner was a Peer of Parliament, it not being proved that the money was promised as a consideration for his vote being given or withheld. Simpson v Id. Howden, 9 Clark and Fin. 61. See the American cases on Contracts which tend to corrupt legislation and appointments to public office, in Parson's Contr. ii. 754-5, and the English cases in Leake on Contracts, p. 381.]

³ [An obligation to make payment of an annuity without deduction of income-tax is void under 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 103, and 16 and 17 Vict. c. 34, sec. 5. Blair v Allen, 1858, 21 D. 15.]

⁴ On this subject it may be sufficient to state the great outlines of the doctrine. The authorities to be referred to are, in the first place, the series of determinations by Lord Stowell, preserved by Dr. Robinson in his Reports of Cases in Admiralty from 1797 to 1808, in six volumes; by Dr. Edwards in his Reports from 1808 to 1811; by Dr. Dodson from 1811 to 1817. Reference may also be made to Horne on Captures, Baring on the Orders in Council, and Dr. Phillimore on Licences.

state, and hurtful to its antagonist. Or even they may carry on trade indirectly between the belligerents themselves; although the effect may be, that in mitigating the present evils of war, they protract its duration. This right of neutrals, however, is subject to certain operations of the war policy of the belligerents which may entirely interrupt their commerce. For, 1. The ships of neutrals are liable to search, in order to prevent any contravention of the necessary regulations of the war policy; 2. They are also subject to prohibition against trading in certain articles called contraband of war; and, 3. Their trade with the belligerent may be entirely cut off and prevented by blockade.

2. LICENCES.—As Government is entrusted with the ruling power and sole direction of the war policy of the country, it has necessarily a right to relax the great rule of prohibition of trade, even with the enemy.

Licences are granted by a high act of sovereignty, proceeding on all the considerations of commercial and political expediency by which such an exception from the ordinary consequences of war must be controlled. They are granted either to a merchant of this country to trade directly with the enemy, or to an enemy to import goods into this country.

Two circumstances are required to give due effect to a licence; 1. The fair intention of the granter must be pursued; and, 2. The licence must be used with perfect bona fides.

Great doubts have been entertained as to the rules according to which licences are to be construed; and there appears to have been a change in the spirit of construction arising from the extraordinary and unprecedented events of the late war. It may be sufficient, in the general view of the subject, to say, that the eminent judge who has in these extraordinary times presided in the British Court of Admiralty, seems to have entertained these views:—In former wars, the general prohibition of intercourse between belligerents being attended with little inconvenience, the greater part of the countries of Europe remaining neutral, and affording various indirect channels of communication, licences were granted only in very special cases, where there appeared to be a necessity for direct communication with the enemy. And they were construed with the greatest strictness, as matter of special indulgence; not, however, so as to exclude a rational exposition and liberal interpretation of the granter's intention. But there arose in later times a very extraordinary course of public events, which had great influence on the character of licences. The power or the influence which Bonaparte acquired over all those continental states which in former wars had remained in neutrality, enabled him to impose on neutrals a total interdiction of trade with the enemy, as a part of the policy by which he hoped to injure the commercial power of Britain. In this interruption to foreign commerce, the alternative seemed to be, either that Britain should relax the old principle, and permit to her subjects unlimited intercourse with the ports of the enemy, or that a greater extension should be given to licences. To the former the consent of both parties is always required; and if at any time given, there is danger of going beyond what might be safe in policy. Licences, therefore, came to be extended, as the best expedient to be adopted by this country to support its trade, in defiance of all the obstacles which the enemy might interpose. They were granted, therefore, with great liberality to all merchants of good character, were expressed in very general terms, and received an enlarged and liberal interpretation.

[305] These are the general principles which regulate this important department of national policy; and on these principles the following rules may be laid down:—

1. The subjects of the belligerent powers cannot trade with one another; their vessels or goods are lawful prize; and no action lies for enforcing their reciprocal obligations. The limitations of this rule are, 1. That the obligation is good if hostilities have not commenced at the time of the contract, or if their commencement was not known at that time to the parties; and, 2. That if war should thus intervene, no demand can be effectual during the subsistence of hostilities; the obligation, however, reviving on the termination.

2. The subjects of the belligerent states may trade with each other under licence.

The limits of the trade prescribed in the licence must with bona fides be fairly observed; for if they be exceeded, the contract is exposed to the hazard of being annulled, and the cargo or goods to confiscation.

3. Neutrals, who trade with both belligerents, must observe a strict and rigid neutrality; and with that observance, the trade is permitted under certain exceptions:—

(1.) Contraband of war is the first exception, including all the implements of war. These vary according to the mode of conducting the war, and the progress of invention in such implements; but, generally speaking, they include arms, ammunition, timber for the navy, naval stores, and provisions, going direct to the enemy—whatever, in short, is directly instrumental in carrying on the war.

But, on the other hand, there are relaxations in the description of contraband of war. For example, first, the raw material, in its natural state, is not a commodity falling under this prohibition; nor, secondly, are commodities intended, not for ships of war, but for domestic use, or for trading ships; nor, thirdly, the natural produce of one of the belligerent countries.¹

(2.) Blockade imposes another obstruction on the trade of neutrals. This is either directed, for some particular purpose of the war, against a particular port, proclaimed by competent authority; or against part of the coast; or even against whole coasts. The last use of blockade was an extension of power reserved for the extraordinary manoeuvres of the last war, in which, at one time, the whole ports on the Continent of Europe were declared by this country to be under blockade. In such a case, neither neutrals nor any other vessels can trade with the blockaded ports, without danger of capture.²

(3.) In its colonial and coasting trade, during peace, every country gives a monopoly to its own subjects.³ During war, this exclusive trade is thrown open to neutrals, with a view to protect it, or to allow it to proceed without interruption from the enemy. But neutrals so interfering are held to depart from the strict duties of the neutral character, in stepping in to aid the depressed party, and enable it to carry on safely a trade which the war would have effectually destroyed. For the duty of a neutral is, 'non interponere se bello; non, hoste imminente, hostem eripere.' Such interference on the part of neutrals being against the war policy of nations, it is not to be permitted under the right of neutrality, unless where there has been the same permission to neutrals during peace.⁴

The right assumed by Great Britain of visiting neutral ships, the object of so warm a contest in Europe, had for its object to furnish evidence on the points now enumerated. Neutrals contend that free ships make free goods, and object to the right of search. And on this question Great Britain has long been at variance with the continental states; the power assumed by her being one which her naval superiority gives her the means of enforcing, with an advantage which they cannot enjoy.⁵

In insisting on the right of visitation and search, our cruisers call, 1. For the [306] passport; 2. For the manifest; 3. For proofs of the property; 4. For the charter-party; 5. For the bills of lading and invoices; and, 6. For the log-book.

These are proofs by which to ascertain whether the voyage be honestly neutral and impartial, or intended to assist the belligerent in the conduct of the war; and according to the result, taking this criterion, questions of this kind will be adjudged in a court of international law, and vessels or goods condemned or otherwise.

¹ This, of course, however, must always be a question considerably influenced by the particular circumstances and existing policy at the time.

² [By the Treaty of Paris (April 1856), blockades to be effective must be maintained by a force actually sufficient to prevent access to the coast of the enemy, and the right of granting letters of marque to privateers is renounced by the contracting powers.]

³ See above, Of the Navigation Laws, p. 147. [The British Navigation Laws are repealed by 17 Vict. c. 5.]

⁴ Emanuel, 1 Rob. 296; Immanuel, 2 Rob. 197.

⁵ [By the Treaty of Paris (April 1856) it is agreed by the contracting powers: 1. That the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war. 2. That neutral goods subject to the same exception, although under the enemy's flag, are not liable to capture.]

ALIEN ENEMY'S DEBT.—Connected with this subject is the inhibition or prohibition of the payment and recovery, during the subsistence of war, of debts due to alien enemies, that the arm of the enemy may not be strengthened by money paid to its subjects. Unless a debt arise under a licence (as to which no war exists), the aid of a court will not be given for recovery of it. Although originating during peace, and however trifling the amount, the principle is general, that the enemy is not to be benefited even to the smallest extent. Execution is on this ground suspended until the conclusion of the war. The person employed to recover a debt of this kind may perhaps take steps, however, to secure it until the issue of the war. In England, on bankruptcy, dividends have been set apart for debts in this situation;¹ and there seems to be no doubt that in Scotland such a debt might be claimed in bankruptcy, to the effect of having a dividend set apart as for a contingent debt.

II. CONTRABAND OF TRADE, OR SMUGGLING CONTRACTS, form the next class of contracts falling under the principle of public policy, as controlling the private rights of individuals.

This doctrine is grounded on the commercial policy of the nation during peace, as the other is grounded on its war policy. It is the right of a nation to regulate, for the public interest, the conduct of its trade; and, in particular, to encourage certain lines of industry by means of prohibitions or bounties, and to impose high duties on the importation or exportation of particular commodities.

The contempt and breach of those laws is called SMUGGLING; the goods as to which the evasion is attempted, CONTRABAND: and the great rule is, that no action is maintainable on the contract, or for the price of the goods purchased, in contempt of those laws. In the one case, 'Potior est conditio possidentis;' in the other, if an action is brought for money, 'Potior est conditio defendentis.' In other words, courts in such circumstances allow the parties to remain just as they were.²

Contracts may be distinguished as, 1. For smuggling; and, 2. For goods smuggled.

1. In cases of the former description, the party bringing the action is participant in the smuggling contract; and no action lies. This comprehends: 1. Natives settled abroad, who are not entitled to the aid of a British court of justice to assist in their breach of the laws of their country.³ 2. In cases also where foreigners have a direct accession, action has been denied to them, on the ground that they ought to know the law of the country with whose regulations they presume to interfere.⁴ 3. In certain cases the rule has been enforced [307] generally both against natives and foreigners, there being direct participation.⁵ In the proof of accession to the smuggling transaction, several cases may be distinguished. Where the goods have been sold abroad, it has been held that the packing of the goods in a particular way, so as to facilitate the running of them, is one indication of accession;⁶ that the managing and preparing of the papers of the ship, so as to evade detection, is also a proof of accession; that corresponding with the parties concerned, detailing the plan of operations, and concerting the accomplishment, is sufficient to establish accession; that actually sending

¹ Ex parte Boussmaker, 13 Ves. 71. See 1 Montagu's Bankrupt Law, 163. [As to the opinions of American jurists on the duty of the state to give notice, see 1 Kent, Com. 55.]

² [See 6 Geo. iv. c. 108; 2 Will. iv. c. 16; 3 and 4 Will. iv. c. 53; 4 and 5 Will. iv. c. 13; 8 and 9 Vict. c. 87; 13 and 14 Vict. c. 95.]

³ Cantley v Robertson, 1790, M. 9550, 2 Hailes 1077; Young & Co. v Imlach, 1790, M. 9553; [and cases cited in 1 Bell's Ill. p. 67.]

⁴ Nisbet v Robertson, 1791, M. 9554, Bell's Ca. 349. Here an heritable bond was granted for the price of smuggled goods by a person in this country to his correspondent in Holland, who was accessory to the smuggling. The bond was assigned to a third party, who took infetment; and in an action at the instance of the trustee for the creditors of the granter, it was set aside as pactum illicitum.

See also the English case of Waymell v Reid, 5 Term. Rep. 599, where a foreigner at Lisle sold a quantity of lace which he knew was to be smuggled and packed in a particular way to facilitate its clandestine importation. Clugas v Penaluna, 4 Term. Rep. 466; similar as to brandy packed in ankers for smuggling. [Pellecat v Angell, 2 C. M. and R. 311; and see, for further cases of the same nature in America, Story on Sale, secs. 505-9.]

⁵ Cullen & Co. v Philp, 1793, M. 9554; Reid & Parkinson v M'Donald, same date, M. 9555.

⁶ [Isaacson v Wiseman, 1806, Hume 714.]

the goods to this country is also sufficient, for a person doing so ought to be acquainted with our importation laws.

2. In contracts for the purchase of smuggled goods, where the vendor has no accession to the breach of the revenue laws, action is not denied. 1. If the sale is abroad by a foreign merchant, although he may suspect or even know that the goods are to be smuggled, but has not been actually concerned in the smuggling, an action will lie. And even to a native settled abroad action will not be denied, if he has dealt as a vendor merely. In both cases, the law of the country where the contract was made is to be administered.¹ 2. Where the goods have come into this country, the criterion of decision to sustain or to dismiss the action, is knowledge of the contraband nature of the goods.² The decisions have varied; but it would seem, 1. That where the goods are prohibited, no bona fides can justify the contract; 2. That where the goods are not prohibited, but may lawfully be sold, provided the duties have been paid, action is denied where the party knows the duties to be unpaid;³ 3. That after the goods are in the circulation of this country, the bona fide purchaser has action for their delivery although smuggled.⁴

Although at first the Court seems to have held action or diligence competent on bills for the price of contraband goods, they afterwards refused to sustain them; the bills being in the hands of the original parties, or of their trustees.⁵

III.—CONTRACTS USURIOUS.⁶

The doctrine of the interest of money, considered as the hire of the use, or as the [308] damage for non-fulfilment of the obligation to pay, will be explained afterwards. It has seemed expedient to the Legislature to restrain the rate of interest within certain limits. To take a higher rate of interest than is thus limited, is usury; and the offence of so taking usury is punished by certain penalties, while even the stipulation of it has the effect of annulling a security of which it forms a part.

There are many statutes in both countries on the subject of usury. Those of Scotland worthy of notice are, the Act of 1597, c. 247, and that of 1621, c. 28. By the former, the

¹ Holman v Johnson, Cowper 341. Holman, residing at Dunkirk, sold tea to Johnson's order, knowing it was to be imported into England. But he had no concern in the smuggling scheme himself, and merely sold the tea to Johnson as he would to any other person in the course of his trade. Action was brought in King's Bench for the price, and it was sustained. Lord Mansfield said: 'There can be no doubt, that any action tried here must be tried by the law of England; but the law of England says, that in a variety of instances with regard to contracts legally made abroad, the laws of the country where the cause of action rose should govern.' 'The gist of the whole turns upon this, that the conclusive delivery was at Dunkirk. If the defendant had bespoke the tea at Dunkirk, to be sent to England at a certain price, and the plaintiff had undertaken to send it into England, or had any concern in the running it into England, he would have been an offender against the laws of this country. But upon the facts of the case, from the first to the last, he clearly has offended against no law of England.'

The same doctrine has been held in Scotland. The opinion of the Court in Cullen & Co. v Philp is thus expressed: 'When a merchant settled abroad, whether a foreigner or native of this country, simply sells goods to a smuggler tanquam quilibet, and makes delivery on the spot, he can maintain action for them in our Courts, though he suspected, or even knew, that they were meant to be smuggled into Britain; but if he is accessory to the smuggling, and thereby to an infringement of the law of the land (which he is bound to know as far as concerns his trade), he cannot demand the aid of the British Courts for the recovery of his debt.'

See also Hodgson v Temple, 1813, 5 Taunt. 181.

² Scougal v Gilchrist, 1736, M. 9536, Elch. Pact. Ill. 7; Cockburn v Grants, 1741, M. 9539.

³ M'Lure & M'Cree v Paterson, 1775, 5 Brown's Sup. 532. The Court at first was inclined to sustain action, as there is no criterion of the payment of duties, but afterwards altered, and action was denied. Duncan v Thomson, 1776, M. App. Pact. Ill. No. 1, 5 Brown's Sup. 632, Hailes 683; M'Lure & M'Cree v Paterson, 1779, M. 9546. See opinions of judges, Hailes 829.

⁴ M'Lean v Sword, 5 Dec. 1788, M. 9549.

⁵ See cases in note 3, above.

⁶ [The laws against usury have been entirely repealed by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 90. Sec. 3 provides, that 'where interest is now payable upon any contract, express or implied, for payment of the legal or current rate of interest, or where upon any debt or sum of money interest is now payable by any rule of law, the same rate of interest shall be recoverable as if this Act had not been passed.'] usurious contract is annulled, the sum lent forfeited, and the debtor to have restitution of exorbitant profits. By the latter, it is declared lawful to take a bond at the term of payment for principal and interest; but usury to take interest before the term of payment. These statutes have not been abrogated, but are superseded by an Act of Queen Anne, which is now the law of the empire; the law of England and of Scotland in this respect being the same. In this Act there are two distinct provisions: one directed against the persons guilty of usury, and imposing penalties; the other pointed against the usurious obligation or contract.¹

It is of some consequence to observe the distinction between these two parts of the Act, and their effects:—

To ground an action for penalties, the offence to be proved must be the taking of usury. The stipulation is of no avail in sustaining such an action, further than as it may be a circumstance in the evidence; nor is it any defence against the penalties, that there is no stipulation of usury. But in its effect in the avoidance of the security under the annulling branch of the Act, the stipulation is as effectual as the taking; while the taking, if relied on, must be a part of the bargain. Under the words 'whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken,' it is held, that to the effect of annulling the security, either there must be an agreement to take the higher rate previous to or at making the security; or that, at the time of the agreement, the higher rate shall be taken. If the usury be stipulated, the bond will be void, although the creditor should do diligence, or claim in bankruptcy, only for the principal and legal interest. If the bond be unexceptionable in its terms, but by a collateral stipulation at the time of the contract usury is bargained for, the bond is null.² If the bond or security be given partly for a usurious debt, the whole will be tainted.³ If the usury be [309] taken by a subsequent act, without being agreed to be taken at the time, it is not truly reserved on the security, and makes no part of it to taint and injure it. By such after act there may be the crime of usury personally, and to the effect of grounding a prosecution for penalties, but not to annul the contract or security.⁴

The general Limitation Act of 31 Elizabeth, c. 5, applies in Scotland, so as to restrain all prosecution for the penalties within the space of twelve months. But the Act of Limitation has no application to the annulling clause. The contract, once illegal, is so beyond remedy; and this character depends in no degree on the action for declaring it, or the time at which such action is brought. But the personal act of criminality in usury consists in the taking of usurious interest, and the penalty must be demanded within the limited time.⁵

It is essential that the higher interest be taken with usurious intent, in order to ground an action for penalties. This does not by the words appear necessary for the annulling of the instrument; but, to a certain extent, the same principle rules decisions even respecting nullity: for where it can be shown that there has, in the conception of the bond or other instrument, or in the calculation of the loan, been a mistake, so as to relieve from the imputation of usurious intent, the bond will be sustained.⁶

It is usury, to the effect of annulling the instrument or contract, if the creditor either stipulates or takes interest before it becomes due, although the rate is no higher than the law allows.⁷ The custom of trade allows this to be done in discounting a bill; and without

¹ 12 Anne, c. 16. In the first section there is a general description of usury. 'No person upon any contract made after 29th September 1714, shall take, directly or indirectly, for loan of any moneys, wares, merchandise, or other commodities whatsoever, above the value of £5 for forbearance of £100 for a year; and so after that rate, for a greater or lesser sum, or for a longer or shorter time.'

² See Comyn on Usury, 166, and cases there cited.

Strachan v Graham, 1823, 2 S. 391, 3 Murr. 434.

³ Harrison v Hannel, 1814, 1 Marsh. 349.

⁴ Ferral v Shaen, 1 Saunders 295.

⁵ It may be doubted whether the law had full effect given to it in the case of Meal v Thoms, 27 Nov. 1810, 16 Fac. Coll. 50; although there the doctrine was clearly held, that the elapse of the period of limitation did not bar the reduction. The deed should have been annulled.

⁶ See Comyn on Usury, 16, and cases there quoted. Glasfuir v Laing, 1807, 1 Camp. 149.

⁷ 1621, c. 28. 'No person who lends or gives out money, and receives annual therefor, shall retain the time of the

this no merchant could get his bills converted into cash. But it has been held, that the rule must be strictly confined to transactions within the usage of trade.¹ Although, therefore, a discount of a bill would not probably be held as usurious, merely because it exceeded a little the ordinary discountable date of the time, any great and uncommon length of credit and discount would not be sustained. If carried to a great extent, the interest would annihilate the principal.²

In discount within the ordinary limits, it is usury if a higher interest than five [310] per cent. is taken, unless in so far as the additional sum can be justified as not for forbearance of money, but as a fair compensation for trouble, or an usual allowance for a banker's interference, the keeping up an establishment for such transactions wherever the money is to be paid, and the expense of remittance.³ Country bankers are held entitled to commission on bills sent to them from London to be discounted, unless there is collusion.⁴ And a charge of ten shillings commission by a bill-broker in the country on a bill payable in London, has been held not usurious.⁵ Not bankers only, but also merchants, may charge commission; but the onus probandi of corresponding and trouble is laid on merchants, though not on bankers.⁶

It is usury to take the full discount of a bill, and to give in part payment as cash another bill which has some time to run.⁷ But in such a transaction, complicated with a remittance, the delivery of bills for cash is not held usurious, as the surplus of interest may be ascribed to the expense of remittance.⁸

Whether the commission is a fair remuneration for trouble, expense, etc., or a mere colour to obtain the accommodation and secure a higher interest, is for a jury to determine upon the view of the whole transaction. At one time it was the opinion in England, that a commission should not exceed one-fourth per cent.; but certainly there is no rule of law to that effect: no such rule is judicially entertained; but the jury is left to decide.⁹ And in the English books we find examples of juries finding verdicts against the direction of [311] a judge forming his opinion on the nature of the transaction.¹⁰

It is not usury, in discounting a bill, to substitute goods for money at a fair though high price, provided it is not so extravagant that it appears to be for the purpose of reserving exorbitant interest under cover of it.¹¹ But if, instead of goods of ascertained value, goods or articles be given at an arbitrary and exorbitant valuation, it will be usury.¹² The onus probandi is held to lie upon the lender, who gives goods in discount, that the goods were reasonably worth the price fixed upon them.¹³ But evidence that the borrower accepted the goods in hope of a distinct profit on them, has been thought to turn the presumption.¹⁴ lending, exact, crave, or receive from their debtors the annual of their lent sums, until the term of payment appointed by their bonds be first come.' Johnston v the Laird of Haining, 1 Dec. 1680, M. 16414. If the lender deduct and retain from the sum in the bond or bill legal interest to the term of payment from the time the money is advanced, the sum really forborne is not the whole sum mentioned in the bond or bill.

¹ Marsh v Martindale, 3 Bos. and Pull. 154.

² See case in preceding note.

³ See Winch v Fenn, before Mr. Justice Buller at Westminster, 2 Term. Rep. 52, note; Auriol v Thomas, ibid.; Sir B. Hammet v Sir J. Yea, 1 Pull. and Bos. 144. Below, note 7.

This was also the doctrine of the House of Lords in Walker v Allan, 2 March 1802, 4 Pat. 303.

Harris v Boston, 2 Campb. 349.

Contrast with this the case of Masterman v Cowrie, 3 Camp. 488.

See also Pitcairn's Crs. v Foggo, 1768, M. 16433, 1 Hailes 259.

Playfair v Hotchkis, 1797, M. 16438.

VOL. I.

⁴ Ex parte Jones, 1810, 1 Rose's Cases 29.

⁵ Ex parte Hanson, 1815, 1 Madox 112.

⁶ See Marsh v Martindale, note 1.

⁷ Parr v Elleason, where the chief question was, Whether this was a taint which affected an innocent third party afterwards becoming endorsee of the bill? 1 East 92. See Matthews v Griffiths, cited 1 Bos. and Pull. 153.

⁸ Sir B. Hammet v Sir J. Yea, 1 Bos. and Pull. 144.

⁹ Carstairs v Stein, 1815, 4 Maule and Selw. 192.

¹⁰ See, for example, Brooke v Middleton, 1 Camp. 448; Harris v Boston, 2 Camp. 348.

¹¹ Rich v Topping, 1 Espin. 176.

¹² Pratt v Willey, 1 Espin. 40, where a diamond was so given at an exorbitant valuation.

¹³ Davies v Hardacre, where a landscape in imitation of Poussin was given in the discount at a value of £150. 2 Camp. 375.

¹⁴ Coombe v Miles, 2 Camp. 553.

It is held as a cover for usury, that one has lent his acceptance on an agreement to have a commission for doing so. Under the direction of Lord Ellenborough, a verdict was given on the principle, that such commission is to be allowed only in discounting bills,¹ and that it was here a mere cover for usury. The same has been held where one took a commission of three and a half per cent. at discounting a bill, for being allowed to guarantee the solvency of an acceptor in undoubted credit.²

It is a usurious contract, if a trader stipulate to give to one who shall advance to him money from time to time, a commission beyond the legal interest upon all goods purchased with those moneys, although it may be covered by the pretence of a compensation for trouble in making the purchases.³

Where the creditor or lender runs any part of the risk of the employment of the money, such as bottomry, partnership, or joint adventure, it is not held usury. The Court, however, [312] still exercises its discretion to discover whether the contingency be a mere shift to evade the Act, or a lawful contract, and fair and reasonable risk. The above rule holds, 1. Where the principal sum and interest are both put in hazard; 2. Where the principal sum is so hazarded; but, 3. Where the interest alone is hazarded, the contract is usurious if exorbitant interest be stipulated.⁴ Where the interest only is hazarded, the party being sure of his principal whatever may happen, it will be held a mere device to cover usury.

To establish usury as an objection to a bond or contract, it is necessary that there should be either a loan, with a taking of more than the legal interest for the forbearance of repayment; or some device contrived for the purpose of concealing or evading the appearance of a loan and forbearance, where in truth it was such. But under this description the practice of acceptors paying by anticipation, or receiving a premium, does not fall.⁵

But it is to be observed particularly, that although the statute annuls the bond or other assurance, it does not necessarily forfeit the debt. The benefit of the security and of the evidence it affords is gone; but the party may use any other competent evidence to prove the debt. So, 1. If the debt has been paid, repetition cannot be demanded on proving usury.⁶ 2. If the debt has existed before, independently of the usurious bond, the creditor may rest his claim on the evidence of that debt, and will recover.⁷ 3. It has been questioned whether a debt originating in a usurious contract can be placed subsequently on the footing of a legal contract, by cancelling the original documents and granting new ones? Such a case having occurred in bankruptcy in England, a feigned issue was directed to try the question. It came first before Mr. Justice Chambre, who held the subsequent contract void;⁸ but the Court of Common Pleas reversed that judgment.⁹

IV.—EFFECT OF ILLEGALITY OF DEBT AGAINST THIRD PARTIES.

It is an important question, How far bills, which have originated in transactions prohibited by law, and so are null in the hands of the parties themselves, will be effectual in the hands of third parties, acquiring them in bona fide, and without notice of the illegality? In England, the nullity declared in the statutes is held a nullity to all intents and purposes, to the effect of reaching bona fide holders of the bills, as well as the original parties themselves. [313] Very serious doubts have been entertained on this subject, and an inclination strongly expressed to follow the same spirit of construction which has been adopted in Scotland.¹⁰ But notwithstanding these doubts, it has been judicially held that the statutes are

¹ Kent v Lowen, 1 Camp. 177.

² Lee v Cass, 1809, 1 Taunt. 511.

³ See Barnes v Headley, 1 Camp. 157.

⁴ Comyn on Usury, and the cases cited by him, p. 34 et seq.

⁵ Barclay v Walmsley, 4 East 57.

⁶ Nisbet & Buchan v Cullen, 1 Feb. 1811, F. C.

⁷ Gray v Fowler, 1 Hy. Blackst. 462; Phillips v Cockayne, 3 Camp. 119.

⁸ Barnes v Headley, 1 Camp. 157.

⁹ Same parties, 2 Taunt. 184.

¹⁰ In Jones v Davidson, 1816, Holt. Rep. 257, 258, Gibbs, too clear to be denied; that the doctrine as against third parties rests on cases which cannot now be questioned;¹ and that the innocent party can only resort to the party from whom he received the bill or other document, as for a debt on the original contract or consideration between them. The hardships arising from this state of the law, and the doubts and regret expressed by the judges, have led to an alteration in respect to usurious debts, not probably because these were more entitled to favour, but because they more frequently, and with less possibility of detection, get into the daily course of trade.² In Scotland, we have been accustomed to a different line of determinations from that adopted in Eng- [314] land. Thus, a bill for a gaming debt has been held effectual to a bona fide endorsee,³ although it would not be available against persons holding as trustees for the party concerned in the offence, or holding it without value.⁴ The statute (which I have no doubt is to be held applicable to both countries) settles the matter as to all objections of usury. As to other nullities, should the question occur again, it will deserve serious reconsideration whether the English determinations are not more strictly correct than ours, and how it is possible to hold bills, etc. to be null as to some effects, and valid as to others.

However this difference of decision between the two countries may be reconciled, at least the consideration given for the bill may be proved as sufficient to ground a claim on the part of a stranger. Nay, in England, a distinction has been taken between the case of money lost at play, and money borrowed to play with: in the former case, the debt or contract as well as the security being held null; in the latter, the security being null by the force of the statute, but the contract effectual in so far as money has been lent.⁵

Chief Justice, says: 'The construction upon the 12th of Anne, which avoids all usurious contracts, has been fixed and settled by many cases; but I must say I could never understand the equity of the rule which has so long obtained under this statute, that an innocent endorsee shall be prevented from recovering upon a bill of exchange which has been contaminated in its creation with usury by means to which he is not privy, and of which, when he receives the bill, he can know nothing. I own I have serious doubts upon this construction; and if the case renders it necessary, I will reserve the point, Whether a bill of exchange can be void, except for usury committed by the parties who originally create the instrument? If the parties who create the instrument and agree to put their names upon it commit usury, it is reasonable that they should answer for the consequences. But I do not understand why the security should be avoided in the hands of one who takes it for a valid consideration in the common course of business, and without anything to awaken his suspicion. He cannot tell, upon looking at the outside of the bill, whether usury has been committed or not: he receives it upon the credit of the names which he sees upon the instrument, and has no other means of judging of it. Can law, and the interests of commerce, avoid a security thus taken? These are my reasons for doubting the old rule which has obtained, and I should wish upon a fit occasion to have it discussed again.'

¹ Bowyer v Bampton, 2 Strange 1155.

Lowe v Waller, Douglas 716. Here the question was raised of the effect of usury against a bona fide holder of a bill. Lord Mansfield said: 'We have considered this case very attentively, and I own, with a great leaning and wish on my part that the law should turn out to be in favour of the plaintiff. But the words of the Act are too strong. Besides, we cannot get over the case on the statute against gaming, which stands on the same ground. This is one of those instances in which private must give way to public convenience. It is less mischievous that the law should be as it is with respect to bills and notes than other securities, because they are generally payable in a short time, so that the endorsee has an early opportunity of recurring to the endorser if he cannot recover upon the bill.'

Lowes v Mazzaredo, 1816, 1 Starkie 385. Here the payee of a bill of exchange endorsed it for a usurious consideration; and in the course of trade Lowes discounted the bill on an endorsement from him who had so acquired it, but without notice of the objection. Lord Ellenborough was of opinion against the bill-holder, as not entitled to recover, being obliged to claim through an endorsement vitiated by usury. But on former cases being pressed on him, he put the case into a course for trial. 'But the Court were of opinion that the case of Parr v Elleason, 1 East 92, was distinguishable from this, and might be supported upon other grounds, and that the endorsement was utterly voided by the statute of usury, and could not be dismissed for one purpose and retained for another; and that after the case of Lowe v Waller had been acted upon so long, its foundation could not now be inquired into.'

² 58 Geo. III. c. 93.

³ Neilson v Bruce, 1740, M. 9507, where the Court 'repelled the reason of suspension founded on the Gaming Act, in respect the bill in question was purchased by the charger for onerous causes; and that there is no evidence offered of his being in the knowledge that the bill was granted for a game debt.'

⁴ So held in the above case of Sir R. Pringle v Biggar, 7 Nov. 1840, M. 9509, supra, p. 319.

⁵ Robinson v Bland, 2 Burr. 1080.

V.—DEBT PARTLY ILLEGAL.

If the debt for which an obligation has been granted be partly illegal, the legal part of it may be proved in bankruptcy. 'The equity is, that where the consideration consists of two parts, one bad, the other good, the bill should stand as to what is good.'¹

SUBSECTION III.—OF OBLIGATIONS ONEROUS OR GRATUITOUS; PURE, FUTURE, OR CONTINGENT.

There are characters distinguishing obligations which it is often of importance to mark as attended with particular effects.

1. GRATUITOUS OBLIGATIONS.—Obligations are called gratuitous in Scotland, which are granted spontaneously, and without an adequate consideration.

In England, a voluntary and gratuitous bond, though effectual against the debtor himself, is not to be set up against creditors.² In Scotland there is no such distinction. The case must either be brought within the statute 1621, c. 18, by which gratuitous grants or bonds to confidants or relations are challengeable by prior creditors, on account of the granter's insolvency at the time of granting, or the bond must be collusive and fraudulent at common law. Every person who is solvent may effectually give away his property, or bind himself to pay a sum gratuitously. Gratuitous bonds and other obligations may therefore be ranked in competition with the claims of other creditors, without any preference to the latter, in respect of the consideration on which the obligation has proceeded.³

[315] 2. DEBTS, PURE, FUTURE, AND CONTINGENT.—Debts are either presently due; or due at a future day certain; or due provisionally, in a certain event. The first are called pure; the second, future; the last, contingent debts.

There is a remarkable difference between the jurisprudence of England and that of Scotland respecting future and contingent debts. Previous to certain statutes, no debt could by the law of England be either the ground of an action or the subject of a demand under a commission of bankruptcy, unless it had actually become a debt at the date of the proceedings. In bankruptcy, the commission is regarded as a statute execution; which, as it cannot proceed upon, so it cannot include, any claim which has not already become a proper debt. On the other hand, the creditor had process against the bankrupt, notwithstanding the certificate or discharge, when his debt did not accrue till after the bankruptcy; for the privilege of creditors to prove, and of bankrupts to be discharged, was held to be co-extensive and commensurate.⁴ 1. This law excluded from an English commission all contingent debts; 2. It also excluded all future debts; and, 3. Claims for damages were excluded, where both the right to damages, and the amount, were questions for a jury; and the claim was of course uncertain and contingent. In these points, except the last, there are remarkable changes, to be immediately explained.

By the Scottish law, for the purposes of security to the creditor, proceedings are competent on debts not only future, but contingent; and on the bankruptcy of the debtor, whatever be the form according to which his funds are to be distributed (whether a ranking

¹ Ex parte Mather, 3 Ves. jun. 373.

² Pillans v Van Miérp, 3 Burr. 1663.

But see, in House of Lords, Rann v Hughes, 7 Term. Rep. 350.

Lord Redesdale, though he would not order such a bond to be expunged, would not allow it to be set up against creditors, admitting it to come in if there should be a surplus. Assignees of Gardner v Skinner, 2 Schoale and Lefroy's Irish Chan. Rep. 228. ['A contract, not under the seal of the obligor, is incapable of being enforced by legal proceedings, unless it be supported by a consideration; the rule of the civil law, Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio, being a maxim of the law of England and Ireland. A consideration is presumed when the contract is under seal, and the want of consideration cannot be alleged by the obligor against this presumption.' Report of Mercantile Law Commission, 1855.]

³ [But an authority to a servant or agent to sell goods and sign obligations to deliver will not make the principal liable for obligations granted without consideration, even in a question with an onerous assignee. Colvin v Dixon, 1867, 5 Macph. 603.]

⁴ Cullen, p. 83. See also 49 Geo. III. c. 121, sec. 17.

and sale, with multipointing, as applicable to ordinary bankruptcies; or a sequestration in the case of a merchant; or a voluntary trust), every claim is admissible against the estate, to the effect of drawing a dividend, or having it laid aside, which forms, or may form, against the bankrupt himself, during his life, a proper debt, whether due presently, or at a certain future day, or depending on a contingency which may emerge during the bankrupt's life. As the creditors in all these various descriptions of debt are entitled to claim upon the divisible funds, either for payment and satisfaction, or at least for security, they are all equally restrained by the bankrupt's discharge.

It may be useful to explain shortly the grounds of this distinction between the laws of the two countries.

In Rome, a creditor might attach the funds of his debtor not only for a pure, but also for a future or contingent debt.¹ It was also established in the civil law, that in the distribution of the attached fund a future creditor was entitled to a share proportioned to his debt, after the proper discount; and a contingent creditor, to security for payment, when his obligation should be purified.² This law was followed in Holland, as Voet informs us; and in France, where an enlightened system of jurisprudence was established on the foundation of the Roman code, the rule was similar.³ The future creditor was allowed a share proportioned to his debt, after the proper discount; the contingent creditor was [316] entitled to security for payment of the share accruing to him, should the condition be purified.⁴

In Scotland, the same general principles have always been recognised. Creditors may arrest or adjudge, in security of debts, though only future, or even contingent.⁵ But doubts have been entertained concerning the effect of such diligence, when standing in competition with creditors entitled to parata executio. It has, for example, been supposed that a creditor in a future or contingent debt, arresting a fund of the debtor, is to be postponed in a multipointing to arresting creditors on bills, the terms of payment of which are past. This is consistent with the notions of our older lawyers;⁶ and although Erskine corrects this doctrine in part, he still expresses himself so as to give countenance to it in some very material points.⁷ His authority, and the analogy of English law, may mislead a careless observer as to the true doctrine of Scottish jurisprudence. But while Mr. Erskine has not sufficiently discriminated the case of insolvency, the English law proceeds on a peculiarity quite unknown in Scotland.

There is no express law or decision in Scotland which condemns future or contingent creditors to exclusion, in competition with creditors having parata executio; and therefore the question is left open to decision on general principles. It may be admitted, that where insolvency is not presupposed, neither a future nor a contingent creditor can insist instantly to be paid, to the effect of preventing a creditor in a debt which is due from recovering payment out of his debtor's funds; and so far, undoubtedly, the rule of preference of a creditor having parata executio is well founded. But where the debtor is insolvent, another principle comes to operate. A debtor who fails, or who by his own fault lessens the security of his creditor, is no longer entitled to the benefit of any stipulated term of forbearance, or of the condition suspensive of the claim; and if so, neither can his creditors, who come

¹ Voet, lib. 2, tit. 4, sec. 20.

² Voet, lib. 3, tit. 1, sec. 28.

³ The principle is well explained by Pothier. Of future debts he says: 'Le terme accordé par le créancier au débiteur, est censé avoir pour fondement la confiance en sa solvabilité; lors donc que ce fondement vient à manquer, l'effet du terme cesse. De là il suit, que lorsque le débiteur a fait faillite, et que le prix de ses biens est distribué entre les créanciers, le créancier peut toucher, quoique le terme de sa dette ne soit pas expiré.' Traité des Oblig. vol. i. p. 99, Nos. 234-5. Of contingent debts he speaks thus: 'Quoique le créancier conditionnel n'ait encore aucun droit avant l'accomplissement de la condition, néanmoins il est reçu à faire tous les actes conservatoires du droit qu'il espère avoir un jour.' Ib. No. 222.

⁴ Pothier, after the above passage relative to future debts, says: 'C'est encore une différence entre le terme et la condition: car le créancier conditionnel, en ce cas, n'a pas droit de toucher, mais seulement d'obliger les autres créanciers qui toucheront, à s'obliger de rapporter à son profit, si, par la suite, la condition existe.' Pothier, ut supra.

⁵ Dirleton & Stewart; voce Debitum in diem.

⁶ Stair iii. 46; Charteris v Nicholson, 1670, M. 811.

⁷ Ersk. iii. 6. 18.

into his place, be entitled to claim the benefit of such suspension, so as to defeat the right of the future or contingent claimants. The competition on the attached fund is of the nature of a general distribution, from which, if any one is excluded, he is for ever deprived of his debt. If Mr. Erskine's opinion be supposed applicable only to the case where there is no insolvency, it is unobjectionable; if to the case of insolvency, it seems to be unsound. But an arrestment, or other diligence in security, presupposes insolvency, since that alone can justify it; and it may be loosed or removed on proof of solvency. And if the law means anything in providing a remedy for the security of future and contingent creditors in such cases, it must protect that remedy against the right of other creditors.

The law of England has not acknowledged these principles. There are not in England, at common law (as in Scotland, and in other countries where the Roman jurisprudence has been followed), any remedies for intermediate security during the dependence of an action, or prior to the term of payment. The writ of execution follows the judgment, and therefore must abide the emergence of 'a cause of action,' which may found the judgment. This peculiarity has been fatal to the claims of future and contingent creditors in England at [317] common law. When the statute execution of a commission of bankruptcy was introduced, it was intended to come in place of the ordinary execution; and therefore could not, without an express declaration, be held to include creditors who at common law were entitled to no judicial interference in their favour.¹ It sometimes happens that a general admiration of the great system of English law operates so strongly as to prevent one from distinguishing in particular cases whether the rule proceeds from a peculiarity in the system, or is a point of the mercantile law, fixed by the decisions of juries of merchants, with the assistance of enlightened judges. Perhaps something of this kind has happened in the case we are now discussing. But no one can read the preamble of the statute 7 Geo. I. c. 31, and observe how inconsistent the peculiarity of the English common law with respect to future debts was found to be with the best interests of commerce, and the plainest principles of mercantile jurisprudence, without learning to trust less to such analogies, and to have greater reliance on the principles of the law of Scotland.

Many of the great judges of England—Lord Hardwicke, Lord Mansfield, Lord Kenyon, Lord Chief Justice Eyre—seem to have regretted the peculiarity of the English law which excludes from the commission contingent debts. Lord Hardwicke in particular expressed a wish 'that such debts were provided for by Act of Parliament, and a hope that some gentleman who heard him would consider how to rectify this by a future statute;' and in this wish Lord Eldon concurred.² The evils were great: To the bankrupt, insomuch that a debtor in an annuity bond, for example, was excluded from all the benefit of a discharge; and instances have occurred of men being confined for years in prison on such debts, after all their funds had been given up, and all their other debts discharged. To a contingent creditor also the hardship of this state of the law was very great; for he had no right to demand that any share of the effects of his debtor should either be paid over to him, or set apart for his security, although the condition on which his debt depended might be purified in the course of a few hours. These evils were in part removed, as to debts payable in futuro, by 7 Geo. I. c. 1; as to annuities, by Sir Samuel Romilly's law, 49 Geo. III. c. 121, sec. 17; and the remedy is now completed, and all the distressing cases which fill the English books on bankruptcy, in relation to the consequences of the old doctrine, removed by the late statute consolidating and uniting all the provisions made for cases of this description, and improving the system of English legislation with regard to them.³

In Scotland, the principle of justice is happily unopposed by any legal or formal impediment. The creditor in a debt depending on a contingency which may emerge in the debtor's

¹ See Caldwell v Clutterbuck, 2 Strange 867; Taylor v Mills, Cowp. 525.

² 1 Atk. 115; 9 Ves. jun. 110.

³ 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, secs. 51, 56. [See 12 and 13 Vict. c. 106, sec. 177.]

life, is as truly a creditor as the holder of a bond not yet due. Where the debt is certain in its amount, he is a creditor for a security to that extent. Where it is uncertain, he is a creditor for a security to the extent of the probable debt; and in either case, he is in law, as well as in justice, entitled to be ranked to the effect of having a contingent dividend set apart.

ART. III.—OF THE VARIOUS WAYS IN WHICH OBLIGATIONS AND CONTRACTS ARE CONSTITUTED.

In most codes of jurisprudence, with a view to the sure establishing of that consent which is of the essence of all contracts and obligations, there have been appointed certain requisites and solemnities, as at once evincing the deliberate act of consent and the authenticity of the contract. These commonly vary with the importance or insignificance of [318] the transaction, or with the plain or elusory nature of the agreement. It has appeared fit that some contracts, called Consensual, may be proved by witnesses swearing to the words that were used, and are to be held as perfect from the moment that those words are deliberately used to bind the parties. In others, called Real Contracts, there is required to their completion some overt act, without which the contract is not held to be concluded; but the agreement, and the real act which perfects the contract, may be proved by witnesses. In others, again, more exposed to misapprehension, as being of no recognised character, or having no defined object and extent, it is held that without some special ceremony, calling on the witnesses for particular attention, and clearly expressing the agreement, or without writing delivered to testify both the fact and the words, the contract or obligation is not binding.

1. The Consensual contracts of the law of Scotland comprehend a class of well-known and very common agreements; the parts of which, and the obligations arising from them, are so simple and so well defined, that the witnesses being once satisfied of the nature of the contract and of its subject, there can be no mistake of importance enough to forbid the proof of such agreements by parole evidence. Such are Sale, Location, Society, and Mandate.¹ The binding words being proved, either by writing or by witnesses, to have passed between the parties conclusively, the contract is complete. It forms the titulus transferendi dominii,² if the transference of property be the object; or confers the power and raises the reciprocal obligations involved in the contract.

2. REAL contracts require an act of delivery, or payment, or performance on one part, to bind the bargain. The evidence may be parole, but its object is twofold,—the agreement, and the act of real intervention. 1. This class of contracts comprehends the nominate contracts of loan, commodate, pledge,³ and deposit; and the innominate contracts of do ut des, do ut facias, facio ut des, facio ut facias, to which lawyers have been unable to assign any appropriate name. In the nominate contracts, unless evidence be given of the delivery of the thing lent, or pledged, or deposited; or in the innominate, unless it be proved that the thing to be given or done has been actually given or done; the special contract has no existence. There may be an obligation incurred to lend, or to pledge, or to do or to give something, which, if lawfully proved, it will be competent to enforce. But wherever the point is the constitution of the particular contract, as loan or pledge, the delivery of the thing, the real act which is the badge of the contract, is indispensable.

3. Obligations and contracts which fall under neither of these classes were, in the civil law, constituted by stipulation; consisting of a solemn question and distinct answer, in words appropriate, accompanied by ceremonies fit to excite attention and impress the transaction on the memory. With us, writing delivered is requisite for matters so elusory. So, a promise to pay money, or a cautionary obligation, must be established by written evidence, and accompanied by delivery of the document.

¹ With regard to Sale and Location, there is an exception to this rule where the subject is land or other heritage. The importance of this species of property in the law of Scotland, and the permanent nature of the rights relative to it, have led to the rule that written evidence alone shall be received in proof of such contracts concerning heritage.

² The passing of the property, or modus transferendi dominii, depends on tradition, of which above, p. 181 sqq.

³ [On the question whether actual or corporal possession is necessary to the constitution of the contract of pledge, see note to vol. ii. ch. 2, sec. 2.]

4. The written evidence which is necessary in the description of cases now stated, is useful, and easily applicable to all sorts of contracts, and now forms the usual evidence of all contracts and obligations. But it is, further, in many cases made absolutely requisite for the purposes of revenue that contracts shall be in writing, bearing a stamp; although in point of evidence writing might not otherwise be necessary. In all questions concerning the evidence necessary for particular obligations and contracts, the stamp laws in this way form an important point to be attended to.

[319] COMMENTARY ON THE STAMP ACTS.—The rules of the Stamp Acts interfere with the ordinary rules of law relative to the application of written and parole evidence; and on some occasions so imperative is the requisition, that the want of a stamp is fatal, and cannot afterwards be supplied. But although intended only for the purposes of revenue, they often add an unforeseen auxiliary to the checks against fraud, by circumscribing the means of forgery, and exposing unskilful attempts to detection, by incongruities in the paper or stamp, as relatively to the assumed tenor and date of the deed.

The Stamp Acts, which reach back about a century and a half, have till lately been in a state of great and distressing confusion, from the variety of statutes to be referred to. But the Acts were consolidated by the 44 Geo. III. c. 98, and the 48 Geo. III. c. 149, and afterwards by 55 Geo. III. c. 184, by the schedules annexed to which all the details are distinctly settled as from August 1815.¹ Without entering into details, the following points are important:—

1. The general rule is, that agreements, whether relative to real or personal property, require a stamp, where the matter of the agreement shall be of the value of £20 or upwards.² But, 1. If the agreement be of a nature not to admit of pecuniary calculation, it may be proved by unstamped letters.³ 2. An agreement for the hire of a servant or labourer is exempted;⁴ but an agreement for an assignment of an apprentice from one master to another must be stamped.⁵ 3. A memorandum, letter, or agreement for or relating to the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, requires no stamp; as, for example, the correspondence of merchants relative to sales and bargains of goods. But the sale of goods must form the primary object of the instrument, in order to entitle it to exemption.⁶ It was once held, that an agreement for the future manufacture of goods, not the simple sale of existing goods, was not within the exemption; but this is not now held to be the construction of the

¹ [See also 1 and 2 Geo. IV. c. 55; 3 Geo. IV. c. 117; 6 Geo. IV. c. 41; 9 Geo. IV. c. 13, 23, 27, 49; 3 Will. IV. c. 23, 97; 4 and 5 Will. IV. c. 97; 5 and 6 Will. IV. c. 64; 13 and 14 Vict. c. 97; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59; 17 and 18 Vict. c. 83.]

² 55 Geo. III. c. 55, Schedule title Agreement. [See 13 and 14 Vict. c. 97, as to the duty chargeable on agreements.]

³ Orford v Cole, at Lancaster, 1818, 2 Starkie 351. This was a promise of marriage, to prove which letters were produced. Want of stamp held no objection by Mr. Justice Bayley. Add. 6th ed. 865.

⁴ [17 and 18 Vict. c. 83, sec. 21. And see the provisions of 7 and 8 Vict. c. 112, and 13 and 14 Vict. c. 93, exempting certain maritime agreements.]

⁵ Rex v The Inhabitants of St. Paul's Bedford, 6 Term. Rep. 452. [Ivison v Edinburgh Silk Co., 8 D. 236.]

⁶ Smith v Cator, 1819, 2 Barn. and Ald. 788. Laing & Co. having oats ordered from Cator, Hunt, & Co., of Russia, sent invoices and promised bills of lading to Smith, together with bills for acceptance, engaging by the letter in which they were transmitted to provide funds should the oats remain unsold when the bills should fall due. The bills were accepted, and the bill of lading endorsed to Smith, who now brought his action for the oats, grounded on the letter. Lord Chief Justice Abbot received the letter in evidence, reserving leave to move a nonsuit. The Court of King's Bench held this not to be a case exempted, the primary object here appearing to be the obtaining of money upon a pledge of goods expected to arrive in England, and intended to be placed in the hands of Smith upon arrival. The Court held the sale to be made by Smith, if they had been placed with him, to be a secondary or collateral object. [In Southgate v Bohn, 16 M. and W. 34, where a sale was held to be the primary object, the document was exempted from stamp duty. See also Dimmack v Dixon, 1856, 18 D. 428.]

Act.¹ 4. Where an agreement is contained in a series of letters, it is by the Act sufficient to have the agreement stamp affixed to any one of the series.

2. Bonds for repayment of a definite sum of money, or for security of a definite sum, or for payment of any annuity, or any sum of money at stated periods, bear a stamp duty after certain rates ad valorem.² But, 1. A bond for a rent reserved or payable on a lease is excepted in the Act. 2. A bond for a yearly sum on farming tolls, payable by quarterly instalments, has been held to fall under the first branch, as a definite sum payable at [320] future periods.³ 3. A bond to secure the performance of certain conditions by a penalty, is not within the rule of ad valorem stamp.⁴ 4. A bond for an annuity for a certain number of years, for the relinquishment of a business and the use of premises, is not a conveyance of the property subject to ad valorem stamp as such.⁵

3. Bills of exchange and promissory notes are liable to a rateable stamp duty, so absolute, that besides the penalty for breach of the Act, it is expressly declared not to be in the power of the commissioners of stamps to supply the defect.⁶ And, 1. Not only every instrument which is drawn in the form of a bill, note, or order, falls under the statute; but whatever is substantially an order for payment of a certain sum of money out of a fund, which may or may not be available, requires a stamp as a bill, before it can be given in evidence.⁷ But where the order is not for a definite sum, the Act does not apply.⁸ In that case, or where the money is payable to representatives after death, the instrument truly is an agreement, and the stamp proper to agreements is required and sufficient.⁹ It might be

¹ Wilks v Atkinson, 1815, 1 Marsh. 412, 6 Taunt. 11. This was an agreement to furnish a quantity of linseed oil, for the manufacturing of which the plaintiff had the seed, but it was not then crushed. The Court held it clearly within the exemption.

But an agreement between merchants that one shall take a share in the outfit of a ship and in the adventure, is not an agreement for the sale of goods within the exception. Leigh v Banner, 1 Esp. 403. Nor is an agreement for the making and putting up of machines in the party's house exempted. Buxton, etc. v Beddal, 3 East 808. [M'Gregor v Turnbull, 10 D. 1520; Brown v Michie, 11 D. 1131; Gray v Sutherland, 12 D. 438; Melrose v Hastie, 12 D. 665; Fisken v Glasgow Gas Co., 12 D. 757; Davidson v Swanson, 16 D. 991. By 19 and 20 Vict. c. 81, the stamp duty on proxies for voting at meetings of joint-stock companies, or of heritors of a parish, is 6d.]

² 48 Geo. III. c. 149, Schedule, Branch 1 and 2.

[By 13 and 14 Vict. c. 97, the duties are as follows, for a bond given for any certain sum of money:—

	s.	d.
Not exceeding £50,	1	3
Exceeding £50 and not exceeding 100,	2	6
„ 100 „ 150,	3	9
„ 150 „ 200,	5	0
„ 200 „ 250,	6	3
„ 250 „ 300,	7	6

And where the sum shall exceed £300, then for every £100, and also for every fractional part of £100, 2s. 6d.]

³ Attree v Anscomb, 1813, 2 Maule and Sel. 88.

⁴ Hughes v King, 1815, 1 Starkie 119. The stipulation was not to convert a public-house into a wine vault, under a penalty of £500. A twenty shilling stamp held sufficient by Lord Ellenborough.

⁵ Lyburn v Warrington, 1816, 1 Starkie 162. Deed of mutual covenants, the one to relinquish the trade of butcher with house and fixtures for ten years, the other to pay down £1000, and £1000 a year for ten years.

⁶ An unstamped bill is a nullity, and imposes no obligation to present it. Wilson v Vysan, 2 Taunt. 288. [See 55 Geo. III. c. 184, secs. 11–29; 9 Geo. IV. c. 23; 9 Geo. IV. c. 49, sec. 15; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59, sec. 3; Ettles v Robertson, 7 W. and S. 176, reversing 11 S. 397.]

⁷ Firbank v Bell, 1817, 1 Barn. and Ald. 36. Here, to prove a payment in pursuance of directions previous to bankruptcy, the defendant gave in evidence a letter desiring him, 'when the mahogany per the Roquet is sold, to pay over £1500, in such bills as you receive at the sale, to Peace, Harrison, & Watson.' P., H., & W. also wrote to the defendant, sending a copy of the order; and he acknowledged the letter, and promised to attend to the order. One of the letters was stamped with an agreement stamp. The objection was to the production of the bankrupt's order, not being stamped as a bill-draft or order. Baron Wood admitted the evidence. On a rule nisi for a new trial, Lord Ellenborough said: 'It was the object of the Legislature, in forming this provision, to treat as promissory notes and bills of exchange, and to subject to a stamp duty, such instruments as, being payable on a contingency or out of a particular fund, could not in strictness fall under the denomination. This order appears to me to come as well within the spirit as the letter of the Act of Parliament, and therefore ought to have been stamped with the appropriate stamp.' A new trial.

Butts v Swan, 1820, 2 Brod. and Bing. 78. Case almost precisely the same, only the correspondence was not confined to a single letter, but consisted of several.

⁸ Jones v Simson, 1823, 2 Barn. and Cress. 318. The order was, on a consignment of woollen goods, 'to pay to N. the proceeds of a shipment, etc., value about £2000.' The undertaking was 'to pay over the full amount of the net proceeds.' The question was sent for trial from Chancery, Whether the two instruments, or either of them, required such a stamp as the Stamp Act imposes on bills? The Court of King's Bench were unanimous in the negative.

⁹ Barlow v Broadhurst, 4 Moore 471. Note for a sum pay-a distressing question, Whether there would be power under the statutes to the commissioners to stamp an order of this kind? But it would rather appear that they can have no such power, if the letter is to be held as strictly under the rule of the Act, whatever it may be as a mercantile document. 2. The addition of interest, from the date of the bill to the term of payment, does not raise the sum for which the bill is held to be drawn, so as to require a higher duty than the Act appoints for the sum mentioned in the bill.¹ 3. The duty rising with the time, a note at two months after sight is different from one at two months after date; and as exceeding sixty days, it is not good on a stamp appropriate to that instrument.² 4. The duties are meant to affect only British bills and notes: therefore bills drawn abroad are not liable; and bills in Ireland are under the Irish stamp law. But they must truly be [321] foreign bills in order to be exempted; and bills drawn in Britain, though dated abroad, are under the Act.³ It is, however, sufficient if drawn abroad (as in Ireland), though sent to Britain in skeleton to be filled up and used.⁴ But although a British stamp is not necessary on foreign bills, they are not receivable in evidence if not stamped according to the foreign law.⁵

4. Policies of insurance require certain pro rata stamps, as fully laid down in the Act. And, 1. The slip that precedes a policy cannot be received in evidence unless stamped; but it is not stated in the Act what stamp is necessary.⁶ 2. The policy may, on certain conditions, be altered before notice of the risk being determined.⁷ 3. The alteration may able to representatives three months after his death, under deduction of sums due, held an agreement.

¹ Pruessing v Ing, 1821, 4 Barn. and Ald. 204. A note at three months for £30, with lawful interest from the date, was written on a stamp applicable to a £30 note. Objection, it is a note for £30, 7s. 6d. Holroyd, J., directed a verdict for plaintiff, with liberty to move a nonsuit. The Court of King's Bench refused the rule affirming the direction.

² Sturdy v Henderson, 1821, 4 Barn. and Ald. 592. Note, 7th July 1818, for £400, at two months after sight, on a 6s. stamp. Objection, that it is a note exceeding two months after date, and requiring a stamp of 8s. 6d. Abbot, Ch. J., directed a nonsuit. Court confirmed it, 'as the two months after sight do not begin to run from the day of the date, but from the day of the note being presented for sight.' [See also Upstone v Marshall, 2 Barn. and Cress. 10; Williams v Jarrett, 5 Barn. and Ad. 32.]

³ Jordain v Lashbrook, 7 Term. Rep. 601. Evidence that a bill, dated Hamburg, was drawn in London, was held good to require a stamp.

Abraham v Dubois, 1815, 4 Camp. 269. Bill dated at Paris. Proof offered of drawer being in London two days after, held competent by Lord Ellenborough to infer the bill to be really drawn in England; but the proof insufficient.

Robertson & Co. v Routledge, 1 S. 600. Bill dated Hamburg, and bearing to be drawn by Elliot, Page, & Co., merchants there. Objection, that it was drawn in London on unstamped paper, and proof offered. Bill in hands of endorsee. Lord Ordinary held it good as bearing the name of a Hamburg house as drawers, dated Hamburg, and in hands of onerous endorsee. Court passed bill of suspension.

⁴ Snaith v Mingay, 1813, 1 Maule and Selwyn 87. A copperplate impression with Irish stamp was signed at Waterford, blank in everything but the subscription of the drawer, and sent to be used in London, where it was filled up with the sum appropriate to the stamp. Endorsed for accommodation; dishonoured by acceptors; and the defendants, the endorsers, defended themselves on want of English stamp.

Verdict subject to opinion of Court, who were clear that the bill was Irish, and that the moment it was filled up it became the bill of the party in Ireland.

So, where a bill of exchange was drawn in Jamaica upon a stamp of that island, with a blank for the payee's name, and transmitted to England, where a bona fide holder filled in his own name as payee, it was considered that no English stamp was necessary. Crutchley v Mann, 1 Marsh. 29.

⁵ Clegg v Levy, 1812, 3 Camp. 166. [According to modern practice, the courts of this country do not consider it incumbent on them to enforce foreign stamp laws. James v Catherwood, 3 D. and R. 190; Wynne v Jackson, 2 Russ. 352. See Parsons on Contracts ii. 753-4, and cases. The rule is otherwise as to the revenue laws of British colonies or possessions; Alves v Hodgson, 7 T. R. 241.

The duties now payable on inland and foreign bills are fixed by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 83, and 23 and 24 Vict. c. 111. As to bank drafts, see M'Lellan v Turner's Exrs., 1864, 2 Macph. 845. The exemption from stamp duty of drafts on bankers residing within fifteen miles of the place of issue is repealed by 21 and 22 Vict. c. 20. Such drafts are now chargeable with a duty of one penny.]

⁶ Marsden v Reid, 3 East 512. The ship was stated to be American to the first underwriter. Reid's name stood first on the policy. To prove that he was not truly the first, the slip was offered in evidence. Lord Ellenborough, and afterwards the Court, refused to receive it for want of a stamp.

See 1 Marshall on Insurance, 347. [The stamp duties are now regulated by 7 and 8 Vict. c. 21.]

⁷ Kensington v Inglis, 8 East 273. Policy dated February 1800; altered, to extend the time, on 11th June 1800; loss of ship, 18th July. Held good without a new stamp.

Ridsdale v Sheddin, 1814, 4 Camp. 107. Policy dated June 1810; altered by memorandum, 29th November 1810; ship lost some time subsequent to 31st October, on a voyage from Quebec. Held this a memorandum only to modify a subsisting contract, and good.

See also Ramstrom v Bell, 5 M. and S. 267.

be of the marks of the goods,¹ or for the correction of a mistake in declaring a wrong ship, under a policy on goods by ship or ships.² But there must be no alteration of the subject, or of the right of property. It is not, however, an alteration of the subject in an insurance on goods, that the cargo is changed in the course of a trading voyage.³ 4. If a policy has been originally effected on unstamped paper, it cannot afterwards be stamped; and even if a stamp should be adhibited to it by the commissioners of stamps, evidence will be received that it had no such stamp when effected, in which case it is null.⁴

5. Conveyances and transmissions of property bear an ad valorem duty.⁵ But a trust-deed for the payment of debts, with a resulting trust for the truster, does not require such a stamp.⁶

6. A single stamp is sufficient, if the interest of the parties, however numerous, [322] relate to one subject-matter. So, in a composition with creditors, it may be said that each creditor compromises his separate debt; but being one transaction, one stamp is sufficient. So in a subscription to a common fund; so also in a reference by the underwriters in a policy.⁷ The same rule (as, indeed, is sanctioned by daily practice) will apply to a trust-conveyance by creditors to do common diligence for saving expense. If several persons bind themselves respectively in a penalty by one bond, conditioning the performance by each and every of them of the same matters, such bond requires only one stamp.⁸ But where there are several transactions, distinct as to the several parties, it is not a single deed, and the stamp will maintain the action only as to the person to whose name it is affixed.⁹

7. The extent of alteration admissible in one species of instrument has been stated. It may further be observed, 1. That to correct a mere mistake, and in furtherance of the original intention, it is permitted to make an alteration.¹⁰ What shall be deemed an alteration of this kind may be a difficult question in various cases, which will more properly be discussed under each head. 2. If the original intention be altered, and a new instrument be substituted different from the first, a new stamp will be necessary; so a bill of exchange cannot be altered after it is perfected in date, sum, time of payment, and drawer.¹¹

8. The consequences of not having a stamp, or having an improper one, are: 1. That no action can proceed, nor instrument be received in evidence, till the defect be supplied, if suppliable;¹² and it is pars judicis to refuse sanction to any evasion of the Act.¹³ 2. That if the instrument be lost, it cannot be supplied by proving the tenor, this being one of the

¹ Hubbard v Jackson, 4 Taunt. 169.

² Robertson v Touray, 3 Camp. 158.

Sawtell v Loudon, 1814, 5 Taunt. 359. The words 'on ship' struck out, and 'on goods, as interest may appear,' inserted, the assured having no interest in the ship. Held new stamp not necessary.

³ Hill v Paten, 8 East 373. The insurance on ship and outfit not allowed to be changed to ship and goods. But in insurance on goods, though they are not all co-existing, but successive and dissimilar, yet the adventure is the same, and the subject-matter retains its original denomination of goods.

See also French v Patton, 9 East 351.

⁴ See Roderick v Hovil, 3 Campb. 103.

⁵ [The stamp duties on conveyances are regulated by 13 and 14 Vict. c. 93. See the Schedule. Wilkie v Flowerdew, 1850, 12 D. 818.]

⁶ Coates v Perry, 1821, 3 Brod. and Bing. 48.

⁷ See Goodson v Forbes, 1815, 6 Taunt. 171, in Common Pleas, as to a reference by underwriters.

Davis v Williams, 13 East 232, in King's Bench, as to a subscription for constructing a dock. [Johnstone & Co. v Attwell, 1801, M. App. Writ, No. 5.]

⁸ Bowen v Ashley, 1 N. R. 274; Goodson v Forbes, 1 Marsh. 531.

⁹ Perry v Bouchier, 1814, 4 Camp. 80. A release to the master and three others, the crew of a ship which ran down another, having only one stamp, was admitted by Lord Ellenborough as good to admit the master first mentioned. See cases cited.

¹⁰ Sanderson v Symmonds, 1819, 1 Brod. and Bing. 426; and Robinson v Pouray, 1 Maule and Selw. 215.

¹¹ Bayley 159 et seq.; Thomson on Bills of Exchange. The general rule of the revenue law is, that there can be no alteration of a stamped instrument after it has been used for one purpose. Per Le Blanc, J., Batlie v Taylor, 15 East 416.

¹² [As to the admissibility of unstamped instruments in evidence of matters collateral to the purpose of the writing, see Ross v Matheson, 6 Bell's App. Ca. 374; Mackintosh v Pitcairn, 14 D. 188.]

¹³ [By 31 and 32 Vict. c. 100, secs. 41, 42, where a document is objected to on the ground that it is insufficiently stamped, the party tendering it may pay into Court the sum which the judge may determine to be payable thereon; and the deed is then to be sent to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to be impressed with a stamp denoting the duty paid.]

risks which the party runs by breach of the law.¹ 3. That the want of the stamp only destroys the instrument, leaving the party to resort to other evidence; and so, where a party admits on the record the fact which the instrument might have been necessary to prove, it is sufficient.² So also, of course, a reference to oath is competent with us.

SUBSECTION I.—OBLIGATIONS AND CONTRACTS CONSTITUTED BY WRITING.

The peculiar advantage of written evidence is, that, provided the writing be authentic, it presents the very words which, at the time of the contract, the parties themselves have selected to express their obligation, and is subject to no ambiguity which they themselves have not left in their agreement. The chief points, therefore, in the law of written evidence of contracts are: 1. The authenticity of the writing as truly that of the obligor. 2. The solemnity and deliberation with which it has been prepared and recognised as a contract [323] meant to bind. And, 3. The final act which makes it binding against the one party, and available as a jus quæsitum to the other.

In England, all contracts are by specialty or by parole. The former require a seal; the latter are either agreements merely verbal, or such as are evidenced by a note or memorandum in writing signed by the party, but not under seal. Agreements by parole were of old generally entered into without writing; but in the reign of Charles II. a statute called the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries was passed, whereby certain agreements required a memorandum in writing signed by the party, or by his authorized agent: such as a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another; a sale of lands or hereditaments, or of an interest in them; an agreement to be performed at the distance of more than a year, etc.; and contracts for sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, to the value of upwards of £10, require either delivery, or earnest, or a written memorandum.³

The written evidence admitted judicially in Scotland to serve the purposes already enumerated are either SOLEMN or PRIVILEGED: the one being used in conveyances, deeds, settlements, and more solemn contracts; the other being those writings of daily mercantile intercourse on which men rely in their ordinary dealings.⁴

I.—SOLEMN WRITINGS.

The law relative to solemn writings is established by certain statutes, on which it would be out of place here to deliver a commentary. A very general statement of the import of the rules will suffice.

Solemn deeds are of two kinds. 1. Such as are written by another hand than that of the granter, and for proof of the authenticity of which the law trusts to the attestation of witnesses. And, 2. Holograph deeds written wholly, or in the principal and binding parts, by the granter, in which the proof of authenticity is by comparison of handwriting.

1. ATTESTED DEEDS.—The proof here, at once of deliberation and of authenticity, depends on the subscription of the parties and witnesses, on the disclosure of all the information that can be necessary to check fraud relative to the preparation of the deed; and on ¹ Rippiner v Wright, 1819, 2 Barn. and Ald. 478. Defender proposed to give parole evidence of an agreement, which had been written on unstamped paper, to pay a certain value for a crop. The plaintiff had taken an opportunity of snatching it from the hands of the defender's attorney and destroying it. The Court held the evidence to be properly rejected. See also Rex v Inhabitants of Castle-Morton, 3 Barn. and Ald. 588.

It will be presumed that the instrument was stamped till the contrary appear. Crisp v Anderson, 1815, 1 Starkie 35.

² So laid down by Lord Eldon in Huddleston v Bristoe, 11 Ves. 596. See also Thyme v Protheroe, 1814, 2 Maule and Selw. 553.

³ See 1 Comyn on Cont. 47; 1 Selwyn's Nisi Prius, 43 et seq. The English action of Assumpsit is confined to agreements by parole, the action of Covenant or Debt being the proper remedy for non-performance of contracts by specialty.

⁴ [See, as to minutes of meetings, and the obligations incurred by attending, Johnston v Scott, 1860, 22 D. 393, and cases there cited.]

the disclosure also of the names and designation or description by which the witnesses who have seen it subscribed may be found.¹

The rules are : 1. That the party shall with his own hand subscribe the writing ; or if he cannot, that two notaries shall subscribe for him, his warrant for their doing so being given not merely by word of mouth, but also by the marked symbol of touching the pen. 2. That this subscription shall be attested by the subscription of two witnesses where the party signs ; of four, where notaries subscribe for him. This is in token of their having been present at the ceremony, and having seen the subscription, or of their having heard the party acknowledge the subscription to be his ; or, where notaries sign, of their having seen and heard the warrant given, and seen the notaries subscribe. 3. That the witnesses shall be named and designed in the deed. 4. That the writer shall also be named and designed. And, 5. That where there are more pages than one, the number shall be mentioned in the deed.² Where these requisites are complied with, the deed is held to be at once the [324] genuine act of the party, and to have been framed and sanctioned with due deliberation and solemnity ; and if challenged, the onus probandi lies on the objector to prove the want of due solemnity, or the falsehood of the attestations or subscriptions.

2. HOLOGRAPH WRITINGS.—The uniformity of handwriting, so difficult to be imitated throughout a whole deed, has been supposed to furnish a safe substitute for the proofs afforded in attested writings by the attestations of witnesses ; and this both in respect of authenticity and of solemnity. By usage (sanctioned by 1669, c. 9), holograph deeds are as effectual to bind the granter as deeds authenticated according to the strict rules of the statute, with this only difference, that by the statute now quoted holograph missives and bonds without witnesses subsist only for twenty years instead of forty, which is the period of negative prescription of regularly attested deeds.

It is important to observe with respect to holograph deeds, 1. That although to the proof of the authenticity it is not essential that they should be attested by witnesses, yet wherever the date forms an essential point it cannot otherwise be established than by following the same rules of attestation which are appointed for proving the authenticity of deeds not holograph.³ Such proof, for example, is required in deathbed.⁴ 2. That, to give to holograph deeds the benefit of that presumption of authenticity which we have seen to belong to deeds regularly attested, the rule of the Act 1593, c. 175, which requires the name and description of the writer to be mentioned in the deed, must be duly complied with, by stating the deed to be written by the hand of the granter, the falsehood of which, if untrue, may be proved comparatione literarum, or otherwise.⁵

¹ In England a seal is necessary, and so it was by our early law, but not now. The seal is not in English law a proof of authenticity, for it is not only by his own seal that a man attests a deed. It is a mark of solemn deliberation, like the touching of the notary's pen in our notarial subscription.

² This is the general result of the statutes 1540, c. 117 ; 1579, c. 80 ; 1593, c. 175 ; 1672, c. 21 ; 1681, c. 5 ; and 1696, c. 15.

See M'Kenzie's Observations on these several statutes ; St. iv. 42. 1 ; Ersk. iii. 2. 5 et seq. ; Bankt. i. 11. 24 ; and a very full commentary on the Acts in the late Mr. Robert Bell's Lectures on the Testing of Deeds. See also Tait's Law of Evidence, p. 56 et seq. (of which I understand a new edition is nearly ready for the press).

[Since 19 and 20 Vict. c. 89, it is no longer competent to challenge the validity of a deed on the ground that the pages are not distinguished by numbers. On the subject of the authentication of deeds, which does not fall within the scope of Professor Bell's treatise, the reader is referred to Dickson on Evidence, secs. 636 sqq.]

Much discussion, very important in this department of law, took place both in the Court of Session and Jury Court, and in the House of Lords, in the Fife cause. See 1 Mur. 88, 3 Mur. 497 ; 30 Nov. 1819, 20 Fac. Coll. 38, 1 S. App. 498, 1 W. and S. 166.

³ Ersk. iii. 2. 22.

⁴ See above, p. 84.

⁵ E. of Rothes v Lealy, 1635, M. 12605, where a writing, bearing to be holograph of the granter, was held authentic to throw the onus probandi on the objector.

Donaldson v Walker, 1711, M. 11512. Here the granter said, 'As witness my hand.' It was held so far a compliance with the Act as not to infer a nullity under the Act ; but it was not held sufficient to confer the benefit of the presumption, or to throw the onus probandi on the challenger. [See Robertson v Ogilvie's Trs., 7 D. 236, as to presumption arising from the writer's statement that the deed is holograph ; Waddell v Hope, 7 D. 605, 1017, as to presumption of sanity at the date of the deed.]

II.—PRIVILEGED WRITINGS.

In testamentary deeds, to prevent the inconvenient and overwhelming effect of the presence of many witnesses in the last hours of life, there is an exception to the rule requiring four witnesses in notarial subscription. Two are declared sufficient, while a clergyman is empowered to act instead of a notary.¹ The ordinary rules of holograph or attested deeds are also dispensed with in mercantile writings, both in respect of authenticity and of date.

WRITINGS IN RE MERCATORIA are effectual, though not written by the obligant, provided they are subscribed by him.² And so, although in ordinary cases an obligation will not bind the granter, even should he acknowledge his subscription, if the requisites of the statute have not been complied with,³—it is otherwise with mercantile obligations: unless the authenticity of the subscription be challenged, the writing will bind the party. This [325] exemption of mercantile writings is a privilege conceded to the necessary rapidity of the operations of trade, and to the confidential methods of transacting business, which, amidst numerous dealings between traders, are necessary or unavoidable; fortified by the additional circumstance, that they often regulate transactions between subjects of different states, among whom the peculiarities of municipal law cannot be admitted.

The writings which are held to be comprehended under this privilege, are bills, notes, and checks on bankers; orders for goods; mandates and procurations; guarantees; offers and acceptances to sell, or to buy wares and merchandise, or to transport them from place to place; and, in general, all the variety of engagements, or mandates, or acknowledgments, which the infinite occasions of trade may require. In the productions of the modern French lawyers who comment on the Code de Commerce, will be found much acute and much absurd discussion relative to the mercantile character of particular acts and transactions. It is not necessary to enter into such inquiries: the matter may be left on the broad ground, that this privilege is peculiar to what are properly mercantile dealings,⁴ adding only in illustration the discussion which took place in a case relative to this distinction.⁵

¹ Ersk. iii. 2. 23. Tait's Evid. p. 96 et seq.

² Ramsay & Hay v Pyronon, 1632, M. 16964. [Gilkison v Thomson, 9 S. 520.]

See also below, note 5.

³ M'Farlane v Grieve, 1790, M. 8459, Hailes 1080.

Park v M'Kenzie, 1764, M. 8449, 5 Br. Sup. 539.

Muir v Wallace, 1770, Hailes 340, M. 8457.

⁴ Gordon v M'Intosh, 1710, M. 16974, as to a letter acknowledging payment of a bond.

Strachan v Farquharson, 1728, M. 16978, where a letter not holograph was found not binding, though in a very favourable case for the obligee, this not being a mercantile transaction; and the rule of this case, though doubted at one time, is now fixed.

⁵ Paterson v Wright, 31 Jan. 1810, 13 Fac. Coll. 545. The question arose on a letter of guarantee thus expressed: 'Sir, I hereby bind myself to see you paid for whatever purchases of cotton yarn Messrs. J. Simpson & Co. have made or may make from you for twelve months to come from this date.' This letter was subscribed by Wright, but was not holograph. A distinction was taken between furnishings already made prior to the date of the obligation, and those made subsequently. Lord Newton, before whom the case came, found: 1. That the letter founded on by the pursuer is not a letter in re mercatoria, in so far as regards the furnishings made to Simpson & Co. prior to the date of it, but is a proper cautionary obligation for payment of a debt already due; 2. That the letter is a sufficient guarantee for the subsequent articles of the account, which were all furnished within twelve months of the date thereof. This distinction might perhaps hold respecting two separate writings, but here the missive was one and the same, and the Court reversed the judgment. Lord Meadowbank said: 'The law of Scotland bends to the lex mercatoria for the facility of commerce, and on this principle there is strong reason to doubt the judgment. A letter of guarantee is as often given on account of a transaction finished as on account of future furnishings, because a person will often furnish no more unless he is guaranteed for payment of what he has already advanced. This is done every day by bills, and by ordinary letters in rebus mercatoriis, and it would be detrimental to commerce to require regular writings in transactions of frequent occurrence. By a bill which is neither holograph nor tested, a cautionary obligation might undoubtedly have been undertaken; and there is no very good reason why it should not by a missive-letter. But this case is still stronger: of two obligations (one of them confessedly valid), both are contained in the same sentence. The second never would have been acted upon without the first. It extended credit to the future transactions. There is therefore a rei interventus. The guarantee of the first was relied upon when credit was given for the future.' Lord Glenlee held it a writing in re mercatoria. Lord President Hope (then Lord Justice-Clerk) admitted the distinction on which the judgment was grounded, but held that in this case,

The privileges granted to these writings are : 1. That although not holograph, witnesses are not necessary to prove the authenticity; 2. That witnesses are not required, as in holograph deeds, to prove the date; 3. That even subscription by initials, or by a mere mark, provided it be proved or admitted to be genuine, and to be the accustomed mode of the person transacting business, is sufficient.¹

Contracts in mercantile dealings are not so frequently formed by solemn deeds as by letters of correspondence. One merchant gives an order to another at a distance by letter, which that other agrees to perform, or he makes an offer which the other accepts. And even between parties in the same place, mercantile contracts are most commonly formed in this way. The consensus in idem placitum, by the exchange of the letters, makes [326] the contract.

It is dangerous to rely on a long correspondence from which to collect the terms of a contract. The engagement should be so distinct and specific, that the party may be enabled at once to put his finger on it and say, 'Here is my agreement.' And in courts of law nothing short of this can be relied on as the ground of an action.

*Offer and Acceptance.*²—An offer is a resolution or engagement, provisional on acceptance, and as such proposed to the adverse party. By acceptance it becomes a contract; and this acceptance may be either in words, or by writing, or by doing what is required as the counterpart of the offer. Thus one offers so much for a cargo of corn, and it is sent; or to guarantee a loan, and the money is advanced; or one offers to become cautioner for a composition, and the creditors accede.³

An offer is necessarily under the condition of acceptance, and this must take place debito tempore. There may either be a time implied, or a time limited expressly. 1. Where an offer is made simply, the general rule at common law is, that it may be accepted at any time till withdrawn, and that an action to enforce performance will be a sufficient acceptance. The necessary rapidity of mercantile transactions, however, has introduced an exception in the case of commodities offered to sale, or of an offer to purchase commodities in the ordinary course of trade. For every dealer must know, that commodities offered are lying in wait for a market, that the price is subject to fluctuation, and that opportunities for disposing of such goods may open and be lost by delay; or that the person who makes an offer for goods may lose by delay some other opportunity of procuring them. Unreasonable delay in the answer being therefore inconsistent with the spirit of trade, it is an implied condition of a mercantile offer to sell or to purchase, that it ought to be instantly accepted, or at least without any undue delay. And therefore the person to whom the offer is made has no reason to complain of disappointment, and no ground of action for implement, should the offer be withdrawn after such delay. As another exception to the rule, it is held that acceptance must take place while yet there is no alteration of circumstances detrimental to the offerer.⁴ 2. Where there is an express appointment of time for acceptance, it must be correctly observed. Thus, an offer which bears that an answer is expected in course of post, the two obligations were so blended that they could not be separated.

¹ The effect of the difference of requiring evidence to these points, instead of holding the document prima facie as authentic, is important in bills and notes. They cannot produce summary execution. See below. [The privilege of transmissibility by endorsement seems to be confined to bills and notes, and bills of lading. As to delivery orders and receipts for goods, see MacEwan v Smith, 6 Bell 340; Commercial Bank v Kennard, 1859, 21 D. 864; Scottish Central Ry. Co. v Ferguson, 1863, 1 Macph. 750.]

² [On offer and acceptance, see the English and American decisions collected in Leake on Contracts, pp. 12-23, 602; Benjamin on Sale, pp. 28-35, 45-56; Duer on Insurance, vol. i. p. 116 et seq.; Parsons' Elements of Mercantile Law, 19-21; Do. Maritime Law, vol. ii. 22, note 4; Do. Contracts, vol. i. 476-485, vol. ii. 12-15; Story on Sale, Nos. 126-136; Addison on Contracts, pp. 15, 16.]

³ M'Intyre v Tweedie, 1823, 2 S. 361. [Wilson v Walker, 18 D. 673.]

⁴ Allan v Colzier, 1664, M. 9428, where one offering to guarantee a debt, and requiring an answer whether this offer was to be accepted, and no answer having been made till after the death of the debtor whose obligation was to be guaranteed, the offerer was held entitled to resile. [As to the effect of delay resulting from the fault of the offerer, see Higgins v Dunlop, 6 Bell 195, affirming 9 D. 1407.]

is no longer binding than till the arrival of that post.¹ A letter by the first mail packet from abroad is in time, although private ships may have sailed previously.²

It is the act of acceptance that binds the bargain, and in the common case it is not [327] necessary that the acceptance shall have reached the person who makes the offer.³ An offer to sell goods is a consent provisionally to a bargain, if it shall be accepted within a certain time fixed by the offer or by the law. Until the expiration of that time, the consent to the sale is held to subsist on the part of the offerer, provided he continues alive and capable of consent at the time of acceptance. From the moment of acceptance there is between the parties 'in idem placitum concursus et conventio,'⁴ which constitutes the contract of sale. To this, however, an exception may be made by the offerer, limiting it so that the arrival of the acceptance only shall bind the bargain. Thus, a merchant in Leith offers 500 quarters of wheat to a merchant in London at a certain price, 'receiving your answer at Leith in course.' He by this form of answer stipulates absolute freedom if it should in any way happen, though by no fault or neglect of the other party, that the acceptance does not arrive by that post.

The acceptance must precisely meet the offer; and so, if it be provisional only, or if it include a counter offer, the bargain is not complete till the offerer assent to the qualification.⁵

If a mutual agreement is proposed, and provisionally assented to, and signed by several (as in agreements with creditors in bankruptcy), it is an implied condition that all shall be bound before any is bound.

An offer is revoked by death or incapacity before acceptance; but if it should happen that, while yet it is not too late to accept, the person to whom the offer was addressed should in consequence of, and relying on it, have lost an opportunity of supplying himself, or have proceeded bona fide to form arrangements which cannot be recalled, or in any other way should have suffered loss, this may be a bar to revocation of the offer; and in case of death, insanity, or bankruptcy, it may ground a claim against the representative or estates of the offerer for damages.⁶

If a merchant has sent, not an offer to purchase, but an order for goods, it is so far of the nature of an offer, that it may be rejected; but the person to whom it is addressed binds the bargain, by proceeding with all due diligence to execute the order. Nor is it necessary for him to accept it, in order to bind the bargain. It is an equitable part of this rule; however, that if he do not mean to execute the order, he must instantly communicate his refusal; and should he neglect to do so, he will be held to have engaged himself to the performance of it.⁷

Mercantile obligations are in another respect privileged. A minor cannot bind himself

¹ Farries v Stein, 1799, M. 8482. Farries on 7th November wrote to Stein, expressing his desire to have an addition to a quantity of spirits he had purchased, and asking the lowest price. To this Stein agreed by letter, 10th November, and noted the prices, in which he says: 'Expecting your answer in course, I am,' etc. On the 17th November Farries assented; but on 19th Stein rejoined, 'that not having had your answer in course to my letter of the 10th, I have since disposed of the spirits, and cannot now accept of your offer.' The Court of Session found Stein liable in damages. Reversed 24 March 1800, 4 Pat. 131. Lord Eldon, Ch., said the condition on which the offer was made not having been complied with, Stein was entitled to consider it as at an end; that it would place the offerer on very unequal terms were it to be left to the person to whom an offer is made to accept it after a rise perhaps had taken place in the price of the commodity; that it was incumbent, in this case, upon Farries to use due diligence in answering Stein's letter, which he had not done; and that an apology, attempted on the ground of the former course of dealings, had no place in the question, which depended entirely on the latter making the offer and the answer to it.

See the distinction in Jaffray v Boag, 2 Dec. 1824, 3 S. 375.

² Watson v O'Reilly & Co., 1826, 4 S. 475.

³ [Thomson v James, 18 D. 1. An offer sent through the post was accepted by a letter posted on the same day on which a letter retracting the offer was posted. Held that the contract was complete.]

⁴ Dig. de Pactis, lib. 2, tit. 14, l. 1, sec. 2; et De Pollicit. lib. 50, tit. 12, l. 3.

⁵ [Johnston v Clark, 18 D. 70; Jack v Roberts, 1865, 3 Macph. 554.]

⁶ Pothier grounds this doctrine on the maxim, Nemo ex alterius facto prægravari debet. Tr. du Cont. de Vent., No. 32, vol. i. p. 472.

⁷ [Van Oppen v Arbuckle, 18 D. 113.]

effectually in ordinary contracts, without the consent of his curators; or if he have no curators, still his acts and deeds are challengeable on minority and lesion;¹ but when a minor acts as a trader, and holds himself out to the world as such, his dealings are on the same footing with a major.²

DOCTRINE OF LOCUS PŒNITENTIÆ, REI INTERVENTUS, AND HOMOLOGATION.

I. The doctrine of locus pœnitentiæ is a corollary from the law which appoints particular evidence or solemnities for the constitution of obligations. Till the final purpose to undertake an engagement be declared, and the pledge of faith conclusively given, there is no binding obligation; there is locus pœnitentiæ.

The plea of locus pœnitentiæ is grounded not merely on the want of evidence of a [328] bargain, but on the want of that perfect and full consent which stands contradistinguished from imperfect resolution or intention. The want of evidence may be supplied by a reference to oath; the want of the badge of full and perfect consent never can be so supplied. Such evidence may supply the loss of the document, after it has been completed as an irrevocable engagement; but it will not destroy the privilege of resiling, where the irrevocable obligation has not been legally declared.³

This principle rules all the cases, and the points of the doctrine may be thus stated:—

1. Faith is not irrevocably pledged, and so there is locus pœnitentiæ, while an offer remains unaccepted, or while a mutual agreement has not been acceded to by all the proposed parties.

2. Where a writing is de solennitate necessary to bind the party, there is no engagement till the writing be completed.⁴ Cases falling under this rule are, conveyances of land,⁵ leases of land,⁶ constitutions of servitude,⁷ assignations of written obligations.

3. Where writing, though not by law required, is stipulated by the parties, there is locus pœnitentiæ till it be completed.⁸ But here it must be carefully distinguished whether an agreement preceding a more solemn deed is meant to suspend or to bind the bargain;⁹ whether the parties meant, agreed, and understood that they were to stand free till regularly bound in writing; or, on the other hand, meant to engage and pledge their faith to each other, so that the time necessary for completing the solemn writing should not give locus pœnitentiæ.¹⁰

4. Where the agreement is reduced to writing, but the writing is defective and informal, there is locus pœnitentiæ, and a reference to oath will not bar it.¹¹

II. The privilege of resiling from an incomplete bargain may be barred by two personal exceptions, REI INTERVENTUS and HOMOLOGATION. The doctrine of homologation has already been considered:¹² that of rei interventus is proper to this place.

¹ Ersk. i. 7. 34.

² Galbraith v Lesly, 1676, M. 9027; Craig v Grant, 1732, M. 9035.

³ Muir v Wallace, 1770, M. 8457, Hailes 340; M'Kenzie v Park, 1764, 5 Br. Sup. 539; Grieve v M'Farlan, 1790, M. 8459, Hailes 1080.

⁴ Lord Stair places this on the same footing with the Roman stipulatio. Stair i. 10. 9.

Maitland v Neilson, 1779, M. 8459, Hailes 840. In this case Lord Braxfield says: 'The writing by which this bargain is constituted is informal. The subscription is not denied; but that is not enough in this case. It is enough where writing is only necessary in modum probationis, but not so where writing is necessary to the constitution of the obligation.'

⁵ Oliphant v Monorgan, 1628, M. 8400; Sir P. Walker v Sir D. Milne, 1823, 2 S. 379, N. E. 338.

⁶ Buchanan v Edgar, 1773, M. 8478; M'Farlan v Grieve, 1790, M. 8459.

⁷ Kincaid v Stirling, 1750, M. 8404.

⁸ Campbell v Douglas, 1676, M. 8470; Cathcart v Holland, 1681, M. 8471.

See Instit. lib. 3, tit. 24, De Emp. Vend., and Cod. lib. 4, tit. 21, l. 17; Pothier, Traité des Oblig. vol. i. p. 9, No. 11. See Stair i. 10. 3.

⁹ An obligation to grant a lease is as effectual as a lease. Ersk. ii. 6. 21. Dirleton and Stewart, voce Locus Pœnit. 198.

¹⁰ Rutherford v Feuars of Bowden, 1748, M. 8443; Muirhead v Chalmers, 1759, M. 8444; Fulton v Johnson, 1761, M. 8446.

¹¹ Grieve v M'Farlan, 1790, M. 8459, Hailes 1080; Barron v Rose, 1794, M. 8463. See also Park v M'Kenzie, 5 Br. Sup. 539.

¹² See above, p. 139.

Rei interventus is a doctrine qualifying the power to resile, and barring the exercise of it. It is grounded on the fact of the person, otherwise imperfectly bound, having permitted another to proceed on his obligation or agreement as if it were complete, and to perform on [329] the faith of it acts unequivocally referable to, or resulting from, the agreement, and which, by the refusal to execute the agreement, would prove detrimental to the person so misled or encouraged to proceed. The propositions into which this doctrine is resolvable are these:—

1. Rei interventus includes such acts, unequivocally referring to the agreement and resulting from it, as are either done as a part of the agreement, or which at least would not otherwise have been done than on the faith of it.¹ Difficulty sometimes arises in the case of leases, whether the act done is truly referable to the imperfect engagement. Mere possession, for example, may be ascribed to a lease for one year, which is good without writing, and does not necessarily infer an intention to confirm the entire agreement. There must be something done to characterize the possession as under the contract: a grassum paid, for example, or money expended to a great amount, in improvements or in building.²

2. The knowledge of the party who is imperfectly bound, that the other is proceeding on the faith of the agreement, is a necessary ingredient in the plea of rei interventus; and this either actual knowledge, or knowledge to be implied from circumstances necessarily leading to the probability of loss, without any means taken to prevent it.

3. There must be an inconvenience or alteration of circumstances to the party who has been led to rely on the agreement, though the change is not required to be irreparable. It is sufficient that it be considerable, and that the disappointment would be attended with loss. On this ground, the doctrine delivered by Lord Kilkerran, though it describes correctly enough the effect of rei interventus in the most common and clearest set of cases, is not correct, in so far as it professes to furnish a criterion for the application of the doctrine, and to exclude all cases in which the parties can be replaced in their former condition;³ and accordingly the Court has not regarded this as law.⁴

COMMENTARY ON CERTAIN PRESCRIPTIONS PRESUMING FALSEHOOD.—As an appendix to this matter of evidence in these several cases, certain short prescriptions demand notice. Of the shorter prescriptions, two classes may be distinguished: one raising the presumption of falsehood in the constitution of the debt; the other combining with this a presumption of payment. The former, as modifying some of the doctrines above discussed, may be fitly considered here. Of the other class, one example will immediately call for attention, the Triennial;⁵ another, in treating of Bills of Exchange.

VICENNIAL PRESCRIPTION OF HOLOGRAPH OBLIGATIONS.—By 1669, c. 9, ‘holograph mis-

¹ It is not enough, however, in all cases, though sometimes it may be admissible, to allege negatively that something has been omitted which might have been done. Hill's Crs. v Dunbar, 14 June 1810. See 16 Fac. Coll. 170, note. [As to joint obligations, see Craig v Paton, 1865, 4 Macph. 192.]

² Grieve v Pringle, 1797, 12 Fac. Coll. 82; M'Rorie v M'Whirter, 18 Dec. 1810, 16 Fac. Coll. 86. [See cases in Hume, pp. 774, 784–6, 801–5, 815, 835, 845–9, 861; Russel v Freen, 13 S. 752; Carruthers v Thomson, 14 S. 464. The principle was similarly applied in the case of a feu-contract, where the feuar had entered into possession and made alterations on the subject. Colquhoun v Wilson's Trs., 1860, 22 D. 1035.]

³ ‘The rule,’ says Lord Kilkerran, ‘by which it is to be judged whether res be non integra, so as to exclude the locus poenitentiae, was laid down to be this, that wherever anything has happened on the faith of this verbal agreement which cannot be recalled, and parties put in the same place as before, then res is understood not to be integra, and there is no longer locus poenitentiae.’ Kilk. 340. [See observations in Johnstone v Grant, 6 D. 881, 884.]

⁴ Dunmore Coal Co. v Youngs, 1 Feb. 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 169. Here one was taken on a meditatio fugæ warrant, and liberated on his father becoming bound to pay a large balance. The obligation was not holograph, and the defence was that the obligation was improvable. The answer was, rei interventus by liberation. The reply was, that the person liberated has not fled, but is in Court, which is all that could have been required under the meditatio fugæ warrant. The Court disapproved of Lord Kilkerran's doctrine, and held the locus poenitentiae to be barred. [The payment of the price or consideration of the contract constitutes rei interventus. Church of England Assurance Co. v Wink, 1857, 19 D. 1079; and see United Mutual Ins. Co. v Murray, 1860, 22 D. 1185.]

⁵ See p. 348.

sive letters, and holograph bonds and subscriptions in compt-books without witnesses, not being pursued for within twenty years, shall prescribe in all time thereafter, except the pursuer offers to prove by the defender's oath the verity of the said holograph bonds [330] and letters, and subscriptions in the compt-books.' The object of this law is to avoid the danger of false deeds being founded on as holograph after the means of detection are gone or weakened.

1. The terminus a quo, from which the twenty years are to be reckoned, is the date of the writing, not the time of payment, as in the prescriptions implying payment; for the question is the genuineness of the writing.¹

2. The point to be proved by oath of party, when the time has run, is the authenticity of the whole deed. To prove the subscription merely, would leave it in the condition of a deed signed without witnesses.²

3. By the Act it is expressly declared, that this prescription 'shall not run against minors during the years of their minority.'³

QUINQUENNIAL PRESCRIPTION OF BARGAINS.—By the same Act 1669, c. 9, it is enacted, 'that all bargains concerning moveables or sums of money proveable by witnesses, shall only be proveable by writ or oath of party, if the same be not pursued for within five years of the making of the bargain.' And the same declaration as to minority is applied by the Act to this case. The presumption here, then, as in the former case, is falsehood in the alleged bargain,—that no bargain ever existed; and the proof is writing or oath of party.⁴

SUBSECTION II.—OF VERBAL AGREEMENT AND BOOK DEBTS.

VERBAL CONTRACT.—The principles above explained relative to offers and acceptance in writing apply equally to debts of this description. The claim rests on parole proof, aided by invoices, memorandums, etc.; but once established, the obligation is equally valid as if established by the most solemn writing.

DEBT ON OPEN ACCOUNT, OR BOOK DEBT.—The most common form of debt is by account. Retail dealers furnish the goods in which they deal on the general credit and verbal order of their customers, or of those authorized to act for them; a running account being kept in their books in the name of the customer. By this sort of traffic most of the commodities necessary in the ordinary intercourse of life are circulated. Current accounts are sometimes also kept in wholesale dealings, where the parties carry on a course of furnishing. The evidence of furnishings so made, either in the wholesale or retail trade, is generally parole; accounts are sometimes checked by pass-books, or by check-notes, as in cash accounts with bankers. In wholesale dealing, proofs are supplied by invoices, bills of lading, shipping receipts, and notes transmitted at the time.

The prima facie proof of a book debt or debt on account, is a distinct specification, from the books, of the several articles; and if that is made the subject of a claim in bankruptcy, the specification is accompanied by an affidavit to the verity of the debt. Where such evidence stands uncontradicted by other circumstances, and unquestioned by the bankrupt, or where it accords with the bankrupt's books, the state of his stock, etc., this is held as sufficient evidence to authorize the trustee on a sequestrated estate to admit the

¹ [Home v Donaldson, 17 Jan. 1773, M. 10992.]

² On this point Erskine's doctrine (Ersk. iii. 7. 26) is refuted by the very cases to which he refers.

³ [See Napier on Prescription, p. 866; More's Notes to Stair, p. 271. On the question whether the statute applies to the use of holograph writings as evidence of a contract, where the writing is not of an obligatory character, see Bank of Scotland, 1747, 5 Br. Sup. 748.]

⁴ [The statute comprehends contracts of sale, hiring, loan, deposit, and pledge of moveables. White v Spence, 1683, M. 11065; Ewart v Murray, 1730, M. 11069; Noble v Armstrong, 11 June 1813, F. C.; Hunter v Thomson, 1843, 5 D. 1285. It does not apply to consignments of goods, not being on sale. M'Kinlay v M'Kinlay & Co., 1851, 14 D. 162. When the statute is pleaded, the creditor must prove both the constitution and the subsistence of the debt. Campbell v Grierson, 1848, 10 D. 361; Kennard & Sons v Wright, 1865, 3 Macph. 946.]

proof. Where further evidence is required, a dividend must be set apart to be paid to the claimant, provided he shall fully establish his claim.

Where the debt is suspicious or contested, recourse must be had to other evidence. 1. The evidence of the clerks and porters of the seller or furnisher is admissible to prove delivery of the several articles. But it may not always be possible to prove the delivery of each several article. And it will remain for determination by a jury or by arbiters, whether a proof of being a customer, and receiving articles about the time stated in the account, [331] and of the general description there set down, will not be sufficient. 2. The letters that have passed between the parties, the invoices, carriers' notes, bills of lading, rendered accounts, etc., may be resorted to in aid of the claim. 3. The books of a regular merchant have been held to afford a sempilena probatio to the effect of the claim being supported by the evidence of a single witness, confirmed by the oath of the merchant in supplement.¹ In bankruptcy, the bankrupt himself will not, as such, be incompetent as a witness in support of the claim. He is not liable to the objection of interest; for any interest which he may have lies against the claimant, not for him.

COMMENTARY ON THE SHORT PRESCRIPTION OF BOOK DEBTS.

Book debts, or debts by account, are subject to a limitation or prescription of three years. This prescription infers a double presumption: First, Of falsehood in the constitution of the debt; and Secondly, Of payment and extinction. It is established by an early statute, 1579, c. 83; but it is a regulation not unsuitable to the practice of the present day, and attended with many salutary effects. The words of the statute are, that 'all actions of debt for house-mails, men's ordinaries, servants' fees, merchant counts, and others the like debts, that are not founded upon written obligation, be pursued within three years, otherwise the creditor shall have nae action, except he either prove be writ or be aith of his partie.' And there is no exception in the case of minority, as in the other prescriptions already considered.

I. The debts to which this statute applies are merchants' accounts, under which are comprehended the accounts of artificers, or tradesmen, for their work or wages;² accounts of law agents;³ accounts of surgeons, apothecaries,⁴ and the like; servants' wages; house rents;⁵ the expense of boarding, or 'men's ordinaries,' as it is called in the Act. And the enumeration in the Act concludes with 'others the like debts that are not founded on written obligation.' These are debts, in short, which depend not on a single contract or bargain, but are apt to run into credit; and which, as they are commonly contracted without writing, are discharged either at the time or afterwards, without any written acquittance being thought necessary. And as, by the law of Scotland, the payment of money cannot be proved by parole evidence, while the furnishing of the articles may be so proved, this Act was intended by a presumption to protect persons dealing with retail merchants, and those in a similar situation, from a second demand.

II. The term of three years, if the debt be payable termly (as servants' wages), runs on each term's debt severally.

Where the debt is by account of successive articles, the term does not run on the

¹ This was decided so early as 5th June 1672, Wood v Kello, 'in respect of the great prejudice that merchants might sustain if they were restricted to a full probation, especially if the parties were dead; and therefore the Court decerned the probation by one witness being sempilena; and the count-book with the merchant's oath in supplement was sufficient to make it a full probation.' M. 12728. [Ivory v Gourlay, 4 Dow 392.]

² Bayne, 21 Dec. 1692, M. 11092. [The Act applies to a

surveyor's or engineer's account; Stevenson v Kyle, 12 D. 673. Secus, if under a written agreement; Blackadder v Milne, 13 D. 820. Held not to apply to charges of professional witnesses for attendance before a parliamentary committee. Barr v Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., 2 Macph. 1250.]

³ Somervell v Muirhead, 1675, M. 11087. [Deans v Steele, 16 D. 317; Richardson v Merry, 1863, 1 Macph. 940.]

⁴ Ersk. iii. 7. 17.

⁵ Cuming's Trs. v Simpson, 1825, 3 S. 545.

several articles as separate debts, but on the whole account considered as one debt;¹ and it begins to run, not while the account is current, but only when it is closed. The close of the account is therefore an important point. And, 1. If the account be continuous, or without any interval of three years, the date of the last furnishing, act done, or article not being [332] a mere accessory article of interest, is the close of the account. 2. An interruption or interval of three years closes the account of what precedes it. 3. The death of the debtor closes an account.² This point occasioned some doubt; as, for example, Whether the funeral expenses of the debtor should form an article in continuation of the account?³ Whether furnishings to the family immediately following upon the death should be held a continuation of the account?⁴ Whether the account continued with the heir, being eadem persona cum defuncto, was not strictly to be held as the same account?⁵ But it is now quite settled that the debtor's death closes the account, and that furnishings to the widow or heir commence a new account.⁶

III. There are two points of fact to be established by a creditor against whom the triennial prescription has run,—namely, the constitution of the debt, and its subsistence; and two kinds of evidence by which they may be established,—writing, or the oath of the debtor.

1. It will be a good answer to the plea of prescription on both points, if the creditor produce a written constitution of the debt. This comes under the exception in the Act, of proof by writ. So, if a bond or bill is granted for the balance, or an acknowledgment by missive, the triennial prescription is excluded; and the matter will then depend on the rule of law applicable to such evidence: as, for example, a holograph writing will be available for twenty years from its date; a more formal one, for forty years; a bill, for six.

2. But if the writing go only to the origin or first constitution of the debt, as a written order for articles to be furnished; this, although, when completed by a carrier's receipt for the goods, it will be good evidence of the constitution of the debt, will not satisfy the law on the other point, viz. that the debt is resting owing. That will still remain to be established by the creditor. It has indeed been often contended, that where a written order is given, the debt is of a description to which the triennial prescription does not apply, as being a debt founded on a written obligation. But this plea the Court has uniformly disregarded, on the principle that the Legislature meant to apply the triennial prescription to all debts in which there is not such a regular written constitution of the obligation as naturally requires a written discharge.⁷

3. As to the subsistence of the debt, it is necessary to distinguish, respecting proofs in writing, whether they are dated subsequently to the expiration of the three years, or within that time. If the writing is dated after the expiration of the three years, provided it plainly evinces the then subsistence of the debt, it will be a sufficient answer to the plea of triennial prescription, as counteracting the statutory presumption of payment. If the writing is dated within the three years, it is not held enough that it shows the debt to have been in existence during the three years, since the presumption of payment still remains: it would seem to be

¹ A v B, 1675, M. 11086.

Ross v Master of Salton, 1680, M. 11089. It is different with servants' wages. Each year's wages prescribe separately. [Observe that this prescription applies to a single transaction. Gobbi v Lazzaroni, 1859, 21 D. 801.]

² Leslie v Mollison, 15 Nov. 1808, 15 Fac. Coll. 3. See below, p. 351, note 4.

Wilson v Rutherford, 1826, 4 S. 427.

³ Lady Ormiston v Hamilton of Bangour, 1709, M. 4981, 4983.

⁴ Wilson v Tours, 1680, M. 11089, 11090.

⁵ Graham v The Laird of Stonebyres, 1670, M. 11086.

Erskine says that an account is deemed current, though part of it was furnished to the deceased and the remainder to the heir, when the question is with the heir, because the heir is eadem persona cum defuncto; and the same doctrine, he says, may perhaps extend to executors. Ersk. iii. 7. 17.

⁶ Kennedy v M'Dougal, 1741, M. 11104.

⁷ Contrast the case of Watson v Ld. Prestonhall, 1711, M. 11095, with the following cases:—Ross v Shaw, 1784, M. 11115; Douglas v Grierson, 1794, M. 11116; Sadler v M'Lean, 1794, M. 11119, and Bell Fol. Ca. 104.

requisite that the writing should be intended to constitute the debt as on a new footing, to [333] serve as a voucher to the creditor for his debt. Where such voucher or acknowledgment is given, the debt, as if originally constituted in writing, will require not merely the triennial prescription, but a written acquittance, or the long prescription, or at least the prescription applicable to the document, to discharge it.

It has not been required that the acknowledgment of the debt shall be formally authenticated: a mere jotting, holograph of the debtor, if manifestly admitting the debt to be due, has been sustained as sufficient.¹ But to this the distinction already observed applies: if it be beyond the three years, it will be good; if within the three years, it still leaves the doubtful point unsatisfied. Erskine says that a book of accounts regularly kept by the debtor will be sufficient, if he there charge himself with the debt. If this doctrine is to be adopted in its full extent, the regularity of the books forms a chief part of the proof; for although a book of accounts showing, after the three years, the subsistence of the debt may be a good answer to the plea of prescription, it is not easy to see how, without relying on the regularity of the books, such entries within the three years can answer the legal presumption of payment. The supposition of the law is, that the furnisher of goods compels payment against the expiration of the three years; and the clearest proof of the debt being due at some time during that period, is no answer to the legal presumption. It seems to be otherwise, however, in England.

4. The proof of a prescribed debt by oath of party depends for its effect on the judicial transaction by which the issue of the cause is referred to this test. The points referred in the triennial prescription are those specified above: constitution and subsistence. If both are admitted on oath, or if without oath they are judicially admitted, this is a good answer to the plea of prescription.² On such reference the debtor is bound to answer; but he is not entitled to give a mere general answer: he must answer to particular questions. His oath will not be proof against him, unless he admits that payment was not made. If he swear that payment was made, and his answers to the special questions do not contradict that general affirmation, the demand of the creditor must be rejected.

It is a point of much nicety, What shall be held intrinsically an answer to the reference? On this subject the general rule is, that a direct answer to the question, Whether the presumption of the law be true? is an intrinsic quality, while all collateral matter is extrinsic. But the presumption of the law is here twofold: 1. That no debt ever existed; and, 2. That if a debt existed, it was paid. In a reference to oath, then, under this presumption, the pursuer puts to the defender these two questions; and a denial of the constitution of the debt and of its subsistence will be intrinsic. These, as Dirleton says, are 'inherent in the act and matter in question.'³

A distinction has been stated by Mr. Erskine between the case of a debt demanded before or after the three years. Where the debt is demanded after the three years, and there is no proof by writing, so that recourse must be had to the oath of the defender, that oath embraces the two points of constitution and subsistence. Mr. Erskine erroneously conceives that in a demand during the three years, where there is no proof by writing or parole testimony in support of the claim, it is enough to refer to the oath of the debtor the constitution of the debt; and that upon establishing this, the onus probandi of payment lies on the defender, and so makes an extrinsic quality of his oath. But in this case, no less

¹ Donaldson v Murray, 1766, M. 11110. This was an action for the price of malt, and the writing relied on to answer the triennial prescription was: '1st November 1755. G. Murray to Mrs. Kedslie. To four bolls of malt at different times, this day included, at 13s. 4d. per boll.' This note was admitted to be holograph, but not signed. It was held a good answer to the plea. [Fiske v Walpole, 1860, 22 D. 1488; prescription elided by the debtor's letter, saying 'he would be glad to forward £15 yearly in liquidation of his debt.' Idem in Fife v Innes, 1860, 23 D. 30, the admission being, 'The number of gallons is correct; but I am charged about 1s. 6d. per gallon more than the agreed price.']

² Bryson v Ayton, 1825, 4 S. 180.

³ Dirleton, Doubts, voce Qualified Oath, 214.

than in the other, the whole debt is referred for want of other evidence; and so, in the [334] same way as after the three years, the constitution and subsistence of the debt are both the subject of the judicial transaction of reference.¹

If the import of the oath is only that the defender has, on account of something collateral, a defence against the debt as compensation, the quality is not intrinsic, unless it was pars contractus originally that there should be such set-off.²

The debtor's bankruptcy does not make it incompetent for the claimant to refer the debt to his oath: for although at one time it was held that the bankrupt was not competent to prove against his creditors on a reference by a claimant,³ this doctrine is now confined to those cases in which the debtor's evidence is objectionable on account of relationship or interest.⁴

IV. Where the original debtor has died, a distinction may be admitted, according as the prescription has begun to run before the opening of the succession, or otherwise. Where the whole term of prescription runs during the heir's time (as where the account was closed only by the ancestor's death), the oath of the heir negative of payment will establish resting owing.⁵ But if the account was closed, and any part of the term has run during the ancestor's life, the heir's oath that he did not pay the debt will not make out the pursuer's case.⁶

V. Minority is not pleadable in bar of the triennial prescription. It is a plea not available against any of the prescriptions, unless by force of statute; and it is not made an exception in the statute of triennial prescription, as in the Act 1669, c. 9, relative to the other prescriptions already taken notice of.⁷

CHAPTER II.

OF UNILATERAL OBLIGATIONS.

UNILATERAL obligations and bonds are either simple in their object and form, as obligations to perform an act, or to grant or to deliver a deed, or not to do a particular act; or they are more complex, as bonds of annuity, and bonds of cautionry or suretyship. There is also a peculiar form of obligation, of the first importance in a commercial country, namely, by promissory note or bill of exchange. These shall be considered in their order.

¹ Ersk. iii. 7. 18; Ersk. iv. 2. 11 and 13. See also the case of Douglas v Grierson, 1794, M. 11116; Bell, Fol. Ca. 97.

² Contrast these cases, Rankin v Adair, 1799, M. 13245; Brown v Dow, 1707, M. 13224, where the oath resolved into compensation, or payment to a third party; with the following, where it was at the first agreed that there should be a compensation: Maitland v Baillie, 1707, M. 13212; Forbes v Craig's Crs., 1711, M. 12464.

³ Morton v Gilchrist, 1680, M. 12463; Nairn v Drummond, 1725, M. 12468.

⁴ Blair v Balfour, 1745, M. 12473; Grant v Grant of Carron's Crs., 1788, M. 12476.

⁵ Leslie v Molison, 15 Nov. 1808, 15 Fac. Coll. 3. This was an action for a law agent's account for defending an action brought against Molison's father, whom he represented, and in which, on his father's death, Molison appeared as a party, the account continuing with him. The defence was, belief of payment by the father, and triennial prescription. On reference, the defender said he believed his father to have paid all accounts due by him, but that he did not know. The Court held the law not to presume payment during the currency of an account, but only after its close; and this presumption they held in this case to be regulated by establishing that no payment had taken place since the death of Molison's father. [Auld v Aikman, 4 D. 1487.]

⁶ See Wilson v Rutherford, 7 Feb. 1826, 4 S. 427. [Macdowal v Loudon, 12 D. 170.]

⁷ [See Mackay v Ure, 10 D. 89, 11 D. 982; Ellis v White, 11 D. 1347.]

SECTION I.

BONDS AND OBLIGATIONS.

[335] An obligation may be constituted either by a regular and formal bond, or by a less formal writing, engaging to pay money or to do some act. But without dwelling on any anomalous form of engagement, the two classes of Money bonds and Bonds ad facta præstanda may here be considered.

I. MONEY BONDS.—Bonds for money are simple in form; the essential part being an engagement, absolutely or conditionally, at a day certain or in a specified event, to pay a definite sum of money.

1. The demand under the bond is for the principal sum in the bond, with interest, if the term of payment be past, at the rate of five per cent., or whatever may be fixed in the bond under that rate. If there is a bankruptcy, and a necessity of claiming before the term of payment, the demand is for the principal sum, with an abatement of interest to the day of payment. The claim will lie for the whole amount of the bond if granted by several persons bound jointly and severally, or severally, or in solidum, or as co-obligants and full debtors.¹ But if the granters are bound singly, or only jointly, each will be liable for his share only.²

2. The EVIDENCE necessary to support the claim is the bond itself, either holograph, or formally subscribed and attested according to the statutes.³

3. The PRESCRIPTION pleadable against bonds is the long negative prescription of forty years uninterrupted by minorities;⁴ or if the bond be holograph and not attested by witnesses, the prescription of twenty years from the date which the bond bears.⁵ The principle of the long prescription is different from that of the short prescriptions. It is not a presumption of payment, but a presumption of abandonment not to be overcome, but available to the debtor as equivalent to a discharge. But the term of prescription may be interrupted, either by minorities, or by the methods appointed for that purpose: as a citation in an action specially libelling on the debt, and renewed every seven years;⁶ or a charge of horning; or diligence by arrestment, poinding, adjudication, or inhibition; or an acknowledgment of the debt, or a partial payment of it.⁷

Money bonds in England are conceived differently from ours. The Scottish bond is a simple obligation to pay the sum borrowed, etc., with interest. The English bond is an obligation to pay double the sum of the debt, with a condition that, if against a certain day the sum of the debt be paid, the bond is to be void. Under an English bond the creditor cannot claim the penal sum to the effect of drawing a dividend amounting to the debt. The intention of conceiving the English bond in such terms was merely to cover interest and costs; and a claim on such a bond in Scotland, just as it would be in England, is merely for the debt, with interest and expenses.

II. BONDS AD FACTA PRÆSTANDA.—Bonds or obligations ad facta præstanda may be taken alternatively. The obligation may be enforced by the personal diligence of imprisonment, or the claim of the creditor may be converted into money, either in terms of the bond or by a judgment for damages. Wherever the act has become imprestable, as our [336] law terms it, i.e. incapable of performance, the maxim applies, 'in loco facti imprestabilis substit damnum et interesse.' A claim of damages is substituted in room of performance.

Upon such bonds or agreements, a claim in bankruptcy can properly be made only

¹ Cleghorn v Yorkston, 1707, M. 14625.

² Ersk. iii. 3. 74.

³ See above, p. 340.

⁴ 1469, c. 29; 1474, c. 55.

⁵ 1669, c. 9; Ersk. iii. 7. 26. Home v Donaldson, 1773, M. 10992. See above, p. 346.

⁶ 1669, c. 16.

⁷ Ersk. iii. 7. 38 et seq.

where the demand is capable of being instantly and certainly ascertained, so that the creditor can swear to the amount. Thus, if the agreement has been to deliver goods at a particular time, the damage is the amount of the loss suffered by the person to whom the engagement was undertaken; and that may be ascertained and sworn to. So, where the bond is to present a debtor, for the purpose of personal diligence by caption being executed against him, the damage is the amount of the debt, which may at once be claimed on affidavit. But in many cases the claim of damages, even under a covenant, arises out of so many considerations, that its amount cannot thus be ascertained, but must be fixed either by a court of law with the aid of a jury, or by arbitration.

In bonds and covenants of this description, however, there sometimes is the reservation of a sum or penalty (expressed alternatively with the act to be performed or abstained from), to be paid failing the performance of the act. In these cases distinctions have been admitted. The sum expressed is not always to be allowed to rank.

1. Where the spirit of the obligation is, that the engagement to perform or abstain from a particular act is at all events to be enforced, and the sum is added in order to compel implement, the creditor is entitled to the protection of an interdict, or the remedy of personal execution, to compel performance or prevent encroachment.

2. If the thing to be prevented or enforced has been done, or has become imprestable, the penalty is in equity restricted to the damage, which, as it forms the true debt, must be proved.¹

3. Where the agreement is cast in another form, an alternative being stipulated, not in the nature of a penalty, but permissively, or as estimated damage, the sum appears not to be subject to modification in either case; while in the former, the party on whom the obligation to performance or payment is incumbent, may make his election to pay instead of performing.² It will, however, be observed that no such election can be given to a bankrupt, who would thus fraudulently confer on his creditors a right, by the very conception of the contract, more valuable than the dividend which would be drawn on the alternative obligation for money. Nor can the creditors make such election, without paying in full out of the estate the whole amount of the alternative obligation.

SECTION II.

OF BONDS OF ANNUITY AND OTHER CONTINGENT DEBTS.

A bond of annuity has sometimes been considered as an obligation for a sum of money payable by instalments. But this is incorrect. It is a contract in which the obligor engages to make to the obligee a certain yearly payment, in consideration of a sum or price [337] deemed adequate at the time; or intending to settle on the annuitant for family purposes, or from favour, as a permanent aliment.

Annuities are of two descriptions: 1st, For a fixed duration of time, or term of years certain, called an ANNUITY CERTAIN; or, 2dly, For an uncertain duration of time, generally depending on the issue of human life, and hence called ANNUITY ON LIVES.

¹ [Borthwick v The Lord Advocate, 1862, 1 Macph. 94. Bond for the faithful discharge of duties of an office; penalty, £250. Held a good ground for summary diligence, the penalty being subject to modification in a suspension.]

² Such questions have occurred chiefly in regard to leases, and the difficulty has been to distinguish between these two several sorts of agreements; for it has been attempted to avoid the difficulties of ascertaining damage by stipulating an alternative rent, without the least intention of giving permission to the tenant to commit waste on the farm. A principle of equity has also had great influence in such cases, viz. that a tenant might perhaps reserve his option to the last years of the lease, when the injury by following a bad course of cultivation could not be repaid by the increased rent. See the cases of Graham of Balgowan v Straiton, in H. L. 1789, 3 Pat. 119; Sir A. M. M'Kenzie v Craigie, 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 304. Hon. J. S. W. M'Kenzie v Gilchrist, 13 Dec. 1811, ibid. 419; Frazer v Ewart, 25 Feb. 1813, 17 Fac. Coll. 223.

1. With regard to annuities certain, the commencement and termination being fixed and ascertained, the claim for the annuity, in case of bankruptcy, is not very different from the claim for another debt, of which the term of payment is not yet come. In order to ascertain the extent or value of the debt at any given time, it is necessary only to make allowance for the legal interest during the currency of the annuity; and the term of years and rate of interest (five per cent.) being given, the value of the annuity can easily be found by having recourse to tables calculated for the purpose.¹ In cases of bankruptcy, the value so found as at the period of the bankruptcy measures the claim of the creditor.

2. Where the annuity is of uncertain duration, it is not so easy a matter to ascertain the extent of the claim. Here, either the termination or the commencement of the annuity, or perhaps both, are uncertain, and depend upon particular events or contingencies. The most ordinary circumstances which regulate the duration of annuities, are those involved in the duration and termination of human life. An annuity may, according to the terms of the contract, exist during the life either of the granter, or of the grantee, or of any third party; or during the joint continuance of any number of lives; or during the longest of any number of lives. And it may either commence from the date of the grant, or from a more distant period; or it may depend upon the contingency of survivorship, and only commence after the extinction of one or more given life or lives; or it may depend upon a certain order of survivorship, where different lives are concerned; or upon a variety of other combinations, in which a number of lives may exist together, or in succession one after another. In all these cases, and in every case where the payment of a sum or sums of money depends upon contingent events, which may either happen or not happen; or where a sum of money is payable upon a certain event, of which, though the event itself is certain, the time is uncertain; it is impossible to state the precise amount of the claim as at the period of bankruptcy;—and it is difficult to say what the contingent creditor, in competition with other creditors, whose claims are of a definite nature, ought to draw out of the common fund. Indeed, the difficulty respecting this matter had appeared so great, that in England it probably in some measure gave rise to the rule by which contingent debts were altogether excluded from any participation in the bankrupt estate; and accordingly, although in that country annuities for a term certain might at all times, like other future debts, be proved in bankruptcy;² and although, in the case of annuities for lives, a sort of equitable relief was given, by permitting the penalty to be taken as the debt, wherever by being in arrear the penalty was forfeited; and by allowing a value to be set on the annuity, in order to redeem the forfeiture;³ yet annuitants were, as contingent creditors, strictly speaking, excluded from all claim in bankruptcy, until Sir Samuel Romilly's Act of 49 Geo. III. c. 121, which by sec. 17 provided that the creditors in such annuities shall be allowed to prove under a commission of bankruptcy, as creditors for the value of such annuity, to be ascertained by the commissioners; and by the new Bankrupt Act of England this provision is continued, and a method laid down for valuing the annuity.⁴ In Scotland, annuity [338] creditors never had this difficulty to struggle with; contingent creditors being entitled at common law to claim as well as future creditors.⁵ A creditor in an annuity is held entitled to adjudge heritable property sufficient to answer the annuity; and it has also been found, that if he can discover a fund of lying money sufficient to cover his annuity, he is entitled to arrest it.⁶ And, on the same principle, he is also entitled to claim, as a creditor

¹ Price's Observations, 6th ed. vol. ii. table 2, p. 268. [See 36 Geo. III. c. 52; 16 and 17 Vict. c. 51; Ferguson v Smith, 15 S. 25.]

² Pattison v Banks, Cowp. 540.

³ Cullen's Bankrupt Law, 92; Eden on Bankrupt Law, 114.

⁴ 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, sec. 54. [See 12 and 13 Vict. c. 106. By the Scottish Bankruptcy Act this principle is also given effect to. The trustee or sheriff is to value the annuity, 'regard being had to the original price given for the annuity, deducting therefrom such diminution in the value of the annuity as shall have been caused by the lapse of time since the grant thereof to the date of the sequestration.' 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 54.]

⁵ See above, p. 332.

⁶ For an explanation of the principle on which this pro-in bankruptcy, to have a rateable share of the bankrupt's funds assigned to him, corresponding to the annuity.

The rule of law, according to which the annuitant is entitled to bring his action, to do diligence, or to rank upon the bankrupt estate of his debtor, is this:—He is entitled to claim a capital sum corresponding to the annuity, that is, such a capital as would produce an annual interest equal to the annuity; and to have that sum secured by his diligence, or to have in bankruptcy a dividend corresponding to this capital laid out, and the interest accruing thereon paid to him for the time during which the annuity is payable, in terms of his ground of debt.¹ At the termination of this period the capital is again paid, or in bankruptcy the dividend becomes the property of the creditors at large, and forms a fund of division among them. In this way the annuitant is correctly secured in the annual sums to which he is entitled; or in bankruptcy is put precisely upon an equal footing with other creditors, drawing a share of the fund exactly in proportion to his debt, and suffering a proportional loss. Thus, suppose a man is creditor for an annuity of £50 during his life, he may bring an action for securing the capital of £1000, or whatever will cover the interest, and thereupon adjudge or arrest. Or if the debtor is bankrupt, and the estate pays 10s. per pound, and the reserved fund bears interest at five per cent., then he is entitled to have £1000 ranked as a capital corresponding to the annuity; for that is the sum which, if lent out at five per cent., would produce an interest equal to the given annuity. The dividend corresponding to this sum is £500, and the interest drawn by the annuitant during his life will be £25 per annum; so that he will just draw one-half of his debt, in the same way that the other creditors draw one-half of their debts. If the reserved fund bears interest at four per cent., the capital to be ranked as corresponding to the given annuity will be £1250. It seems to follow, as a corollary from the principles upon which this mode of ranking is founded, that the annuitant or his representatives should, upon the division of the capital of the reserved dividend, be entitled to a share thereof, in proportion to the amount of the arrears of his annuity remaining unpaid at the time of such division, in computation with the debts then remaining due to the other creditors.

The same legal rules hold with regard to the diligence competent on the ranking of every other contingent debt.² Suppose, for instance, a creditor, A, holds an obligation for a provision of £1000, payable at the death of B, the bankrupt,—here A is entitled to raise an action for that sum, for the purpose of doing diligence in security: or he is entitled to have the principal sum ranked in case of bankruptcy, and a dividend set apart corresponding thereto; the dividend to be reserved until the death of B, when it becomes payable to A or his heirs; the interest in the meantime being reserved for the debtor, or in bankruptcy thrown into the common fund of division among the creditors. Or, again, suppose £1000 is payable to A upon the death of B, in the event of A being then in life,—here A is in like manner entitled to be secured, or in bankruptcy ranked for the principal sum, and the dividend becomes payable to him at the death of B, in the event of his survivorship; the interest in the meantime being reserved to the debtor, or thrown into the common fund: and in this case, if the provision should lapse by the predecease of the contingent creditor, [339] not only the interest, but the capital, of the reserved dividend becomes available to the debtor or the other creditors.

Such are the legal rules to be followed in actions and diligence for security of annuities, and which are still very frequently adopted with regard to the claims of life-annuitants, and other contingent creditors in bankruptcy. Indeed, until of late years, these rules were almost universally followed in cases of bankruptcy, particularly in processes of ranking and sale of heritable estates. But since the doctrine of the valuation of annuities and ceeds, see the case of M'Donald and Elder v M'Leod, 15 Jan. 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 116.

¹ [See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 54.]

² See 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 48.

reversions, elucidated by Dr. Price and other writers on that subject, has come to be understood and acted upon in this country, practice has introduced another and more convenient mode of ranking annuities and contingent debts. By the former practice, the final division of the bankrupt estate was necessarily delayed till the termination of the annuity, or the emergence of the given contingency; or else, to avoid the delay thereby occasioned, the trustee was obliged to sell the reversion of the reserved dividend, perhaps at a great loss to the estate. To get free from these inconveniences, the method now adopted is, instead of ranking the creditor for a capital corresponding to the annuity, or for the contingent capital, as has been explained, to put a value upon the annuity, or contingent debt, as at the period of division, taking into account the interest of money and the chances of life, or other circumstances, involved in the nature of the question: the creditor is ranked for this value in full of his claim, and is entitled to draw the dividend corresponding to it. In this way the affairs of the bankruptcy may be instantly brought to a close. On this principle, the Legislature has introduced into the Bankrupt Statute a clause,¹ authorizing the trustee, on behalf of the creditors at large, with consent of a majority of the commissioners, to compound and transact, either by submission or private compromise, all doubtful claims, etc., 'and all contingent debts and annuities due to or by the estate, the value of which it may be expedient to settle in that manner, in order that a final distribution may sooner take place.'² It is to be observed here, that there is no power given to the trustee and commissioners (as in England under Sir Samuel Romilly's Act) absolutely to put a value on the annuities and contingent claims without the consent of the contingent creditors; neither is there any right vested in the creditor, according to which he can insist on his being ranked for the value of the annuity, and draw the whole dividend. The legal rules of ranking are left as before, and the valuation of the claim is a mere matter of arrangement between the contingent creditor on the one hand, and the trustee for the creditors at large on the other. If they cannot agree upon the value, or if either of them decline to enter into a compromise upon the subject, the legal rules must take effect.

The expediency of this mode of ranking, however, is so obvious, as to make it desirable that some tables were generally adopted as furnishing a practical rule, according to which annuities and contingent claims might be valued in all cases where no particular circumstances occur to render a deviation from the ordinary standard necessary.³ In the deliberations which many years ago took place in the committees for improving the bankrupt law, that matter was much discussed; and it was proposed that a settled rule should be adopted for valuing all annuities, according to the tables annexed to the Act of the 36 Geo. III. c. 52.⁴ But this was afterwards abandoned, and the value left to be fixed without the aid of any special provision. And it must be acknowledged to be very difficult to find any general [340] rule which can uniformly be followed, according to which the value of a life annuity

¹ Stat. 54 Geo. III. c. 137, sec. 55.

² [In valuing an annuity, it is laid down that regard is to be had to the price paid for it, 'deducting therefrom such diminution of value as shall have been caused by the lapse of time.' In England, before the 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, Lord Eldon (Whitehead, 2 Rose 353) laid down the rule that, in the absence of special circumstances, the basis of the original sum paid should be taken, qualified by the time of the engagement. And it was held that the state of health was a material circumstance to be considered (Thistlewood, 1 Rose 290), though the state of the money market was not so held (Webb, 2 Glen and Jam. 29). But the rule adopted in the above section having been introduced in the English Act of 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, sec. 54, the state of health was, under that Act, held not now to enter into the valuation (Fisher, 2 Glen and Jam. 102). Bell, Obs. on Recent Statutes, p. 149.]

³ It might be of advantage to adopt some universal standard of this kind, without regard to particular circumstances, as a mode of valuing the claims of contingent creditors, in so far as they are entitled to a vote in the affairs of the bankruptcy.

⁴ The proposed clause ran thus: 'That in the case of life annuities payable by the bankrupt, or charged upon his estate, the trustee shall, instead of the procedure directed for ascertaining the value of contingent claims, be bound, in fixing the sum for which the holders of such annuities shall be ranked or allowed to vote, to adopt the rules of valuation laid down in the tables of the value of annuities on single or joint lives, annexed to an Act passed in the 36th year of his present Majesty, c. 52, entitled, "An Act for repealing certain duties on legacies and shares of personal estate, and granting other duties in certain cases."' is to be settled. It is a question depending on very nice and difficult data, and with regard to which the methods commonly adopted are almost as various as the persons by whom it is to be ascertained.¹

But if the parties cannot come to an agreement upon the subject, they must [341] resort to the legal mode of ranking. That mode has already been explained; but it has been held by many persons, whose opinions are not to be treated lightly, that the above is not the only legal mode of ranking an annuity. It has been said, that as the sum for which each creditor is entitled to be ranked on the bankrupt estate of his debtor, is the sum which that debtor, if solvent, would be obliged to pay for a discharge; so an annuity creditor, whose debtor is bankrupt, is not to be regarded as spontaneously going to market to sell his

¹ The difficulties which I found in this matter, on the occasion just alluded to, and the doubts which so often occur in practice respecting questions of this sort, made me desirous to have the aid of one of those profound and able accountants to whom such matters are generally referred in the Court of Session. The opinion which I received was, that if the value of an annuity were referred to him, he would ascertain it according to the rate corresponding to the given age as appearing on the tables calculated by Dr. Price (Price's Observations, vol. ii. 6th ed. Table 19, for Single Lives, and Table 20, etc. for Joint Lives, at five per cent.) of the value of life annuities, deduced from the bills of mortality at Northampton, and assuming interest at five per cent., without regard to any other circumstance whatever, either as to the state of health or to the price originally paid. And this opinion proceeded on these grounds: 1. As to the rate of interest; because five per cent. is the legal rate which regulates the claims of all the other creditors. 2. As to the chances of life; because the Northampton table is the rule by which all the life insurance societies regulate transactions of this nature, and is generally adopted also in questions between private individuals. And, 3. As to extraneous circumstances; if the given life is in good health, then the result must be considered as the fair value of the annuity. If the person is in bad health, the value of the annuity is no doubt less; but there is no rule by which the difference can be calculated. On the English case of Thistlewood, 1 Rose's Cases 290, he observed 'that the value put by Mr. Morgan upon the annuity which formed the subject of the case alluded to, had been calculated according to the table above mentioned; but it was a great mistake in the parties in that case to call it the market price, if by that term they meant the price which such annuity would have brought in the market if exposed to sale. In all probability, it would not have brought near so much, because nobody who sinks his capital to be drawn back upon a contingency would be content with merely a return of five per cent., independent of the chances of life, which are equally for and against him. It was incorrect to call it the market price. It should rather be called the standard value, or the fair or equitable value—the value as it should be settled between two parties who are in pari casu, and are to settle upon fair and equitable terms; and upon that principle I think the decision was right.

'A life annuity, considered as a subject of sale, is susceptible of two different market prices, according as it is the purchaser or seller of the annuity that goes to market. If a man possessed of an annuity on his own life, or any other life, wishes to sell it, he must be content to accept of a great deal less than the full value; and the quantum of price at different periods depends upon the state of the money market. In general, a man who lays out his money on the purchase of annuities demands, in the first place, as much as will insure the capital sum to be paid at the expiration of the given life; and, in the next place, an annual sum higher than the legal rate, sometimes eight, ten, or twelve per cent.: at present the market rate is considered seven, or even somewhat less. It is the difference between the legal rate of interest and the higher rate demanded that creates the difference between the market price and the fair value of the annuity. On the other hand, if a man wishes to purchase an annuity on his own life, and goes to the market, the money dealer will demand from him a great deal more than the fair value. The tables according to which the insurance societies in London regulate the annuities granted by them are calculated at three per cent. interest; that is to say, the purchaser of the annuity gets his money returned, making allowance for the chances of life, with interest only at three per cent., while the person who is forced by circumstances to sell his annuity must be content to accept of such a price as will make a return to the money-dealer of seven per cent., exclusive of casualties. Upon these principles, a person at the age of thirty-four selling an annuity to which he had right, would get about ten years' purchase, supposing the purchaser to be content with between seven and eight per cent. for his money; and a person purchasing an annuity on his life would, according to the three per cent. table, have to pay about sixteen years' purchase. These are the two market prices; and it will be observed they depend upon the circumstances and necessities of the party going to market. But in the case of bankruptcy, where the conversion of the annuity into a capital sum is a matter of arrangement forced upon both parties by circumstances not within their control, it would not be fair to take either of these values as the criterion. The fair value ought to be estimated according to the five per cent. table, the legal rate of interest which regulates all transactions in money not arising ex pacto; and according to this table, it will be found that an annuity on a life of thirty-four is worth 12.623 years' purchase, so that an annuity of £800 is worth a trifle more than £10,000. This is the rule which, I believe, is for the most part adopted in ranking annuities, as being the most convenient for all parties. There may be cases, however, where the annuitant would prefer to have a diminished annuity during his life, and in that case I apprehend he is entitled to have a capital corresponding to the annuity ranked; and if so, the trustee may either delay the final division until the death of the annuitant, or sell and divide the reversion immediately.'

annuity, which he has no desire to do ; but rather as one who is called on to sell the annuity to the debtor, and who may seem to be dealt with differently from the other creditors, if he is forced to rank for a sum less than that at which he could be forced to part with his annuity, if the debtor had stipulated a power to redeem it. But in this opinion there seem to be two misconceptions.

(1.) It seems not only to be contradicted by the clause already referred to in the Bankrupt Act, but to be contrary to the annuitant's right at law, which entitles him to claim only for the interest of the equivalent capital during his life ; while the trustee is not entitled to force him, instead of this, to accept of a dividend corresponding to any supposed value of the annuity. If any changes on the common law upon this point were to be made, it would seem most expedient, as well as just, that it should be left to the trustee to put a value upon the contingent claim, and with a power to the creditor to object, and to have the value ascertained, as in a question of damages. Were any attempt made to fix a standard value, without having regard to the price paid, or other circumstances, it might give rise to great frauds, and be the means of creating undue preferences. The raising of money by the sale of annuities is now becoming more common ; and if there were no power reserved to the trustee and commissioners to inquire into the circumstances attending the creation of annuities of this description, but if, on the contrary, they were bound to value them according to a fixed standard, the bankrupt might, by giving an annuity equal in value to two or three times the amount of the money received for it, create an undue advantage in favour of the person who advanced the money upon such a transaction, to the prejudice of his other creditors. Thus, suppose that a person should a year or two before his failure raise £10,000 upon the sale of an annuity on his own life, and instead of an annuity of £1000, the fair equivalent at the time, should give an annuity of £2000 ; would it be fair or proper to rank this creditor a year or two afterwards for £20,000 (or say £19,000, making allowance for the difference of the age), as the standard value at the time of bankruptcy, without making any inquiry into the state of the health of the granter at the time of sale, or other circumstances which might have induced him to grant him so large an annuity in proportion to the price paid ? In this way an annuity creditor might receive a great deal more than 20s. a pound of the money advanced by him. It is no doubt true that every person who advances money for the purchase of an annuity runs a risk of loss, and it is this which takes it out of the case of an usurious contract ; but still the advantage stipulated may be so disproportionate to the risk, as to render it unadvisable to remove any checks that might be imposed upon this sort of contract, by allowing the circumstances of each case to be considered.

(2.) As to the right of the annuity creditor to have the value of the annuity ascertained at such a sum as would be required to purchase him an equal annuity in the market, there seems to be room for a distinction of cases where the annuity is on the life of the granter, [342] or on that of the grantee, or another. In all cases where the annuity is upon the life of the grantee, and is properly alimentary, there is a peculiar hardship in forcing the annuitant to accept of an equivalent ; and it seems to be highly equitable to consider him as entitled to be ranked for such a sum as would purchase the annuity in the market. But where the annuity is upon the life of the granter, or any other life than that of the grantee, and the transaction may be regarded rather as an investment of money than as alimentary provision, it would seem that the conversion should be according to the medium standard, which (supposing that there are no particular circumstances in the case, and that the sale of the annuity was made bona fide) is the value of an annuity calculated according to the ordinary chance of life, assuming interest at five per cent. This is neither the market price for purchasers nor for sellers of annuities, but lies somewhere between them. If an annuity were purchased for the annuitant from any of the offices in London, it would be calculated by the three per cent. table, and consequently cost a great deal more than the standard value. If it would not be equitable, on the one hand, to value the annuity at the price which it would sell for if offered for sale, which would be less than the standard value; neither, on the other hand, would it be equitable, in a competition with creditors, to value it at the price that would be required to purchase an equal annuity from any of the offices who make it part of their business to grant annuities, and which would require more than the standard value. The creditors are all in the same unfortunate situation, and each should suffer a proportional defalcation of his debt. The debt due to the annuitant is a certain number of annual payments equal to the number of years between the age of the annuitant and the ultimate period of human life, each payment depending upon the annuitant surviving the terms at which that payment would become due; and the present value of the whole annuity is the aggregate amount of these payments severally multiplied by the chances of arriving at the respective terms, and discounting compound interest at five per cent. It is according to this rule that the tables of the values of annuities have been calculated, and so these five per cent. tables seem justly to form the general standard or criterion for valuing annuities of the description last mentioned in cases of bankruptcy.¹

In England the same difficulties have been felt, and much discussion and inquiry has taken place, with a view to settle some certain rule on the subject.² In the last decision quoted below, Lord Chancellor Eldon made very extensive inquiries concerning the [343] principles and methods of valuing such annuities. And he came to this conclusion: 'Upon the best consideration which I have been able to give to this question, which is of considerable importance, the conclusion at which I have arrived is, that as there are not any peculiar circumstances in this case to affect the price, as it is altered by the effluxion of time, and only by the effluxion of time, I ought to presume that the parties acted fairly at the time when the contract was made, and that the value of the annuity is the original sum given, with the variation occasioned by the lapse of time since the grant.' And this rule has been adopted by the Legislature in the new Bankrupt Act for England; the provision of the 54th section being, 'That any annuity creditor of any bankrupt, by whatever assurance the same be secured, and whether there were or not any arrears of such annuity due at the bankruptcy, shall be entitled to prove for the value of such annuity; which value the commissioners shall ascertain, regard being had to the original price given for the said annuity, deducting therefrom such diminution in the value thereof as shall have been caused by the lapse of time since the grant thereof to the date of the commission.'

REDEEMABLE BOND OF ANNUITY.—Redeemable annuities have of late years become of unusual importance. The great demand for money, and the low rate of interest allowed by

¹ The gentleman to whom I formerly alluded put this case by way of illustrating the point:—Suppose that a person possessed of an office for life, in want of money, goes to the Royal Exchange Insurance Office to raise a sum of money upon an annuity of £1000 on his own life. Suppose him to be thirty years of age, they will probably give him no more than ten years' purchase, that is, £10,000, which, taking the chances of life upon an average, would make them a return of seven per cent. After two years the seller of the annuity fails, and his life interest and all his property is brought to sale, and the office claims as creditor for the annuity. Now, let it be supposed that the creditors were entitled to rank for the maximum price, that is, such as it would require to purchase him an annuity from another office, and the trustee goes to the Westminster Office, and inquires what would they sell such an annuity for? They would look their three per cent. table, and tell him they could not give it for less than sixteen years' purchase. Would it be equitable in this case to rank the creditor for £16,000, that is, £6000 more than had been paid for the annuity two years before? If the life was insurable at the time of sale, it is evident that by the lapse of two years it must be of less value than before, instead of greater, for the values of life interests are constantly diminishing by the lapse of years. It may be said, indeed, that even taking the value according to what may be considered as the standard, viz. the five per cent. table, the sum to be ranked as the debt will amount in the case supposed to considerably more than the original price of the annuity. This is true; it will amount to near £13,000, that is, about thirteen years' purchase. Still, however, this is no objection to the adopting of that standard as the value, because, upon the principles before stated, in making the valuation you are not to look to the price that was paid, unless there were some mala fides in the transaction; neither are you to look to the price that would be required to purchase the annuity, nor to the price at which it would sell, but to the convertible value: that is, you are to convert it into a principal sum by assuming the ordinary chances of life, and the legal rate of interest, as the basis of the calculation.

² Ex parte Thistlewood, 19 Ves. 236, 1 Rose 298; ex parte Whitaker, 1 Rose 301; ex parte Whitehead, 1 Merivale 10, 127.

law, compared with the profits to be made in the mercantile employment of capital, led to loans on redeemable annuity.

This transaction is a complicated one: ostensibly a purchase of a redeemable annuity on a certain life, with security for payment of it; really a contract by which the lender or his heir is secured in a high interest, and in a return of the capital on the expiration of the life. The bond contains—1. An acknowledgment of the receipt of the money as the price of an annuity. 2. An obligation to pay to the person advancing such purchase-money a certain annuity during the life selected, and the not-redemption by the grantor. 3. In security of this annuity, caution is given; or more commonly, lands are conveyed, with procuratory and precept for infefting the lender, under a declaration, on the one hand, that the right shall be redeemable at the option of the borrower only, and, on the other, that the conveyance and obligation shall become void and ineffectual on the termination of the selected life. 4. The annuity is made large enough to cover both the high interest required by the lender, and a premium of insurance of the selected life, by which the lender may, if he please, secure himself and his heirs absolutely, on the death, in payment of the sum advanced. This is a most oppressive sort of security; but there do not appear to be grounds in law for refusing effect to it. The objection naturally occurring against such a transaction lies on the statute of usury; and the words of the statute of Queen Anne¹ are very broad and comprehensive, extending to all persons who shall take or accept, 'by corrupt bargain, loan, exchange, chevizance, etc., or by any deceitful way or means, or by any cover, engine, or deceitful contrivance, for the forbearance or giving day of payment for one whole year, of money, etc. above the sum of £5, for the forbearance of £100 for a year,' etc. But there are no words directly applying to a contract of this special nature. It is an annuity during the selected life, redeemable by the borrower; and the danger of the death without redemption, relieves from the legal imputation of usury.² This is a risk, indeed, against which provision may be made by insurance; but that insurance being an act of the creditor alone, and not stipulated to be done by the debtor, it is collateral to the contract, as the insurance of bottomry would be. The policy is exclusively the creditor's; and where he chooses to sell that policy, the debtor is not, in redeeming the annuity, entitled to credit for the price [344] received for it.³

In all these annuity transactions, unless the parties look a great deal further, and provide more cautiously than is commonly done, the creditor may in bankruptcy be very much disappointed. He can rank on his security only for the annuity proportioned to the life; and supposing that life to be the borrower's, and the rate to have been calculated so as to cover the price at whatever time the insolvency may happen, the debtor may fall into disease, which may make his life not worth two years' purchase, and yet he may outlive his bankruptcy many years, whereby the creditor must suffer the loss of his annuity and advance of his premium for a considerable time. It may be questioned in such cases, What deduction is in equity to be made in admitting the claim for the term that has passed since the original purchase? it being unreasonable to allow, after the elapse of years, the full original value of the annuity as settled between the parties.⁴

¹ 12 Anne, stat. 2, c. 16. See above, p. 327.

² In Glen v Pearson, 6 March 1817, such a transaction, though exceedingly harsh and oppressive, held not to be usurious, 19 Fac. Coll. 317. [The usury laws being now repealed, the considerations referred to in the text are no longer of importance. Redeemable annuities, secured by life policies, are an ordinary mode of raising money for behoof of heirs of entail. The interest and premiums are secured on the rents, and the capital is secured by the assignation of policies of assurance on the life of the debtor.]

³ Lyon v M'Klew, 1821, 1 S. 47. A redeemable bond of annuity of £321 was granted for £2200, no mention being made of insurance in the deed of annuity. The creditor insured the grantor's life, and afterwards sold the policy to the insurance office. In redeeming the annuity, the debtor insisted on deduction or allowance of the price so obtained. But he was found not entitled to it.

⁴ See the case of Le Compt, 1 Atk. 251, where in the year 1720 the claimant had for £300 bought an annuity of £30; and in making claim in 1738 for the value of the annuity against a bankrupt, the whole £300 was claimed. Lord Hardwicke referred it to the commissioners to settle the

As to the claim to be made on the insolvency of the granter of a redeemable annuity, the question is, Whether the redemption money is to be taken as the measure of the value of the annuity? It seems to be clear that the redemption money ought not to be taken as the criterion. It may be either more or less than the convertible or standard value. If it is less than the value, the annuity creditor seems to be entitled to claim for the full value of his debt, while the trustee for the creditors at large is not entitled to take the benefit of a condition in the constitution of the debt, unless he implement that condition by making full payment of the redemption money. He must either therefore rank the annuity creditor in such a manner as to allow him to draw a rateable annual dividend, or rank him for the full value of his debt, or pay him the full amount of the redemption money. On the other hand, if the redemption money is greater than the standard value, the trustee seems to be entitled to deny to the annuity creditor a right to rank for more than the full value of his debt. The clause of redemption was optional to the borrower, and therefore can never operate in favour of the lender, unless the borrower, or those coming in his right, choose to act upon it.¹

When the annuity is irredeemable, the creditor is not, on bankruptcy, bound to take the original purchase-money. He may exercise the option of remaining a creditor for his annuity, with such security as he may hold over the debtor's land.²

SECTION III.

OF JOINT AND SEVERAL OBLIGATIONS.

Where more than one are joined in the obligation, it is important to mark the [345] terms of the engagement and the particular species of the contract, as materially affecting the nature of the obligation to the creditor, and the reciprocal responsibilities of the co-obligants to each other.

I. EXPRESS TERMS OF THE BOND.—The bond is differently expressed where the intention is to bind each party for the whole, and where it is designed to make the obligation only pro rata. The general rule is, that an obligation in solidum is not to be presumed;³ and that in order to produce that effect, the bond must bear an engagement beyond the rateable proportion of the debt.

1. Where co-obligants are bound 'jointly and severally,' they are each liable for the whole, and may either be called upon to pay jointly, or any one may be singled out for the demand, leaving him to find his own relief.⁴

2. Where the co-obligants are bound each severally, 'as co-principal and full debtor,' each is bound for the whole, although in such cases it has sometimes been argued that the omission of the words conjunctly and severally imports a restriction of the obligation.⁵

3. The term 'jointly or conjunctly' may in strict propriety of language import an obligation undertaken, not separately, but each to perform his part—the converse of an

value of the life, holding it unreasonable that the claimant should claim the full purchase-money after enjoying the annuity for eighteen years.

¹ In a late publication on the subject of annuities, reversions, etc., will be found rules for solving all varieties of questions relative to annuities, contingent and reversionary interests: 'The Doctrine of Life Annuities and Assurances analytically investigated and practically explained, by Francis Baily,' 2 vols. 8vo.

² Hamilton v Roger, 1823, 2 S. 325.

³ [This is the general rule of the civil law, of the English and French law, and of our law (Dig. De Duob. Reis Constipulandis; Stair i. 17. 20; Fergusson v Link, 1 Br. Sup. 623; Robertson v Forbes, M. 14674; 1 Shepherd's Touchstone, 375; Poth. Oblig. No. 265).]

⁴ Ersk. iii. 3. 74. [See Erskine v Cormack, 4 D. 1478.]

⁵ Cloverhill v Ladylands, 1631, M. 14623. Here the parties were not bound conjunctly and severally, but as full debtors, to pay the sum to the creditor.

Dunbar v E. of Dundee, 1665, M. 3584; Cleghorn v Yorston, 1707, M. 14624.

obligation by each severally; but the construction put on it in law has been different: it is held to be an obligation in which each is bound for the whole.¹

4. Where parties are bound simply, the obligation is held to be only pro rata; each being liable for his own share, not in solidum for the whole.² But where the bond bears the money to be for the use of one of the parties, the rest are held to be cautioners, and liable for the whole.³

5. Where each is bound 'for his own share,' it is by force of the express words an obligation pro rata only. So, where each subscribes a specific sum, as underwriters in a policy of insurance, or co-obligants with a public officer, trustee, etc.

II. IMPLIED OBLIGATION.—To the general rule, and even to the effect of particular expressions, there are exceptions arising from the special nature of the transaction, or connection of the parties, or from usage. And,

1. Where the subject of the obligation is indivisible, the parties are bound in solidum.⁴ [346] But where the principal obligation becomes imprestable, and resolves into pecuniary damages, the expression of the obligation will give the rule.⁵

¹ M'Millan v Sloan, 1751, Elch. voce Sol. and Pro rata, No. 1, notes, 431. This was an engagement for a bargain of sheep, M'Millan engaging to become bound 'conjunctly.' The decision proceeded partly on the nature of the bargain, as pro indiviso, but also 'unanimously we found him liable in solidum, which is the common acceptation among the commons of the word conjunctly.' See also M'Kellar v Campbell, 7 June 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 272. Commercial Bank of Scotland v Sprott, 3 D. 939.

[The cases of M'Millan and M'Kellar referred to do not support the construction contended for. M'Millan's case was obviously one of guarantee or cautionry, and that determined the meaning in this special case; the nature of guarantee being repugnant to the idea that the cautioner should be liable for a share, and the principal debtor for a share. M'Kellar's case was that of a bill accepted by three persons 'conjunctly;' and the Court repelled the attempt to restrict the liability of each acceptor to his own pro rata share as contrary to the nature of a bill. The legal construction of 'conjunctly,' as meaning a pro rata liability, is fixed by Campbell v Farquhar, 1724, M. 14626. So the equivalent terms 'each along with the other' (Alexander v Scott, 28 Nov. 1827, F. C.). The word has no technical signification importing joint or pro rata liability as distinguished from several liability, or liability in solidum; but just means 'as co-obligants,' leaving the nature of the co-obligation to be determined aliunde. Where two parties bind themselves as 'full debtors,' that is of course held to override the ordinary presumption for pro rata liability. See Cloverhill and Cleghorn's cases. But it seems that if several cautioners have bound themselves in one bond as cautioners and co-principals, the use of the word 'co-principals' has no effect in making each liable for the whole debt to the creditor, but simply operates to exclude the obligants from pleading that their obligation is only accessory to that of the principal, and renounces discussion (Grant v Strachan, 1721, M. 14633). Explanatory terms in other clauses of the deed have been admitted to supply the omission of the technical words 'severally' or 'conjunctly and severally' in the clause of obligation, and co-obligants shall be taken as liable each in solidum if such be the fair import of the words of the deed taken in all its parts. See, e.g., Boyd v Peter & Hamilton, 1649, 1 Br. Sup.

403; Wallace v Corsan, 1671, 1 Br. Sup. 635, where a clause of pro rata relief implied that towards the creditor the obligation of each was in solidum. The addition of qualifying words may destroy the effect of the usual technical phrases implying solidarity of obligation, and may let in, as in a case of ambiguity, the legal presumption for pro rata liability to rule the construction of the deed. See Farquhar, 1638, M. 2282, where the phrases 'conjunctly and severally,' 'ilk ane for his own part,' which are directly contradictory of each other, were held to import an obligation pro rata only.]

² Ersk. iii. 3. 74. It is otherwise in England, on the ground that, by uniting, the parties show their intention to bind for the whole.

³ Grant v Strachan, 1721, M. 14633.

⁴ Grant v Sutherland, 1672, M. 14631. Here the action was grounded on a contract of carriage of goods, which, though not absolutely indivisible, is so by the usage of trade.

⁵ Urie v Cheyne, 1630, M. 14626.

[The mere circumstance of an indivisible factum, owed in solidum by each of several co-debtors, resolving, on failure to perform, into a claim for pecuniary damages, does not alter the obligation of each from an obligation in solidum into an obligation pro rata; for that would be to allow the debtor's own failure to operate to his own benefit, and to the prejudice of the creditor. The creditor has right to call on any to do the whole, on penalty of paying the whole damage resulting from his failure to do it. See Darlington v Gray, 1836, 15 S. 197: Obligation by two that a third should restore hired furniture, or, on failure to return it, that damage was to be held assessed at £60. The Court held the leading obligation, as factum præstandum, indivisible and imprestable by parts, and that each, being bound for that fact in solidum, was liable for the £60 in solidum as the assessed damages coming in place of his obligation. In Grant v Strachan, 1721, M. 14633, on a bond of indemnity by two persons to a cautioner for a debtor, a question arose—there being no words expressing the nature of their liability—as to whether each was bound for the half or the whole money. The Court held each bound for the whole sum; for, although payment of money is ex sua natura divisible, yet there was added to it an obligation to deliver up the cautioner's bond held by the creditor, or a discharge thereof

2. Where the obligants are partners, or joint adventurers, or even joint purchasers, the obligation is held to be in solidum.¹

3. Where, in an obligation ex mandato, the parties have a joint interest in the employment which forms the object of the contract,² unless where there is an express limitation of responsibility, the parties are bound in solidum.³

4. By the usage of trade, bills and promissory notes are held to infer a joint and several obligation.⁴

III. EFFECT AMONG THE CO-OBLIGANTS OF JOINT OR SEVERAL OBLIGATIONS.⁵—The reci-

by the creditor—that, the delivery of either of these deeds being an indivisible factum præstandum, and each bound to do it, each must be held bound to pay the debt too. The old cases are not always satisfactory. Where a factum resolves into payment, the precise nature of the obligation must be considered as to whether the factum and the payment stand to each other as leading obligation and penalty, or whether they are both from the first the subjects of a proper alternative obligation. In Darlington v Gray the £60 was of the nature of penalty; it was not meant that the debtor should have choice of returning or paying: the return of the furniture was the leading, payment the secondary and subsidiary obligation. And therefore the Court correctly held the assessed damage as coming in vicem of the furniture due by each in solidum. But if the obligations had been alternative from the first, each would have fallen to be treated, on the election being determined, as if it had been an independent and solitary obligation, and the joint or several liability of the obligants fixed according to its own nature, irrespective of the nature of the other alternative. If the election, whether made by debtor or creditor, resulted in making the obligation an obligation to pay money in the divisible obligation, the debtors would have been liable each pro parte sua, in that, if in an obligation to perform the indivisible prestation, each would have been liable for it in solidum. The penal obligation is not a properly alternative obligation with the leading one, but an accessory obligation—a surrogatum—which is forced on the creditor; and the debtor's obligation, which was in solidum as to the leading prestation, should not become less as to the surrogate. In a proper alternative contract, the creditor bargains from the first with the chance before him of either a divisible or an indivisible prestation ultimately becoming due by election. See, on the nature of proper alternative obligations, Poth. Tr. des Obligations, No. 245 et seq. According to this principle, Urie v Cheyne, M. 14626—where two persons were bound for return of a powder mill, or on failure to pay 500 merks, and where, on failure to return it, the Court held each liable only for one-half the sum, on the ground that the primary obligation had resolved into one for pecuniary payment—was wrongly decided. If the debtors had had the option from the first of paying, or the creditor of demanding money in place of the mill, this would have been right, as in that case the money obligation could not have been regarded as accessory to, and partaking of, the nature of the other obligation.]

¹ Mushet v Harvey, 1710, M. 14636; Ersk. iii. 3. 74.

[Pothier tells us (Obligations, No. 266) that the same doctrine as the Court held in this case was laid down by the Parliament of Toulouse, and had become a general maxim in French law, viz. that two merchants who buy together a lot of goods, although there is no partnership between them, are considered as being in partnership as regards the solidarity of their obligations for that purchase, though solidarity is not expressed. So Pardessus, Cours de Droit Commercial, sec. 182, says that the nature of commercial undertakings leads to a presumption for solidarity in the absence of express stipulation. Those who together contract a commercial obligation, but without employing expressions which, according to the rules of common law, would be construed as a promise of solidarity, are presumed to have made 'une association en participation.' But we must distinguish collective from successive engagements of this kind. The several subscriptions of underwriters on one policy are successive, and not collectively adhibited. See Stair i. 12. 13 and 14, on the joint and several liability of co-mandatories; and i. 13. 10, on that of co-depositaries of goods. Where liability arises from delinquency—the debt due being the reparation owed for an injury which is the joint act of two or more persons—they are all considered by the law liable in solidum, and have no presumption of pro rata liability in their favour, being undeserving of the favourable construction which law puts on the debtor's part of a contract obligation, and which is the foundation on which the presumption for pro rata liability in the interpretation of contracts rests. One delinquent cannot plead that he was not so bad as the rest. If participant in the injury at all, he is liable for the whole. It is all unum negotium; and what the judge looks to is mainly the convenience of the injured party, that he may recover his damages as speedily and certainly, and with as little trouble and expense, as may be; Smith v O'Reilly, Hume 605; Western Bank v Douglas, 1860, 22 D. 448.]

² Anderson v Sinclair, 1726, M. 14706; Chalmers v Ogilvy, 1730, M. 14706; French v E. of Galloway, 1730, M. 14706.

Walker v Brown, 1803, M. App. No. 1, Sol. and Pro rata, where a meeting of distillers employed an agent.

Wilson v Sir W. Honeyman, 10 July 1813, 17 Fac. Coll. 437. One of the parties in a division of commonty held liable in solidum for the expense of a survey.

Wilson v Mags. of Dunfermline, 1822, 1 S. 417, N. E. 389.

Ellis v Connel, 1822, 1 S. 528, N. E. 486.

³ Murdoch v Hunter, 15 Feb. 1815, 18 Fac. Coll. 216. Here the obligation was to pay expenses according to the amount of the respective debts. Held liable only pro rata, not in solidum.

⁴ M'Morland v Maxwell, 1675, M. 14673. A bill drawn abroad, without the words jointly and severally, settled to be joint and several on a report of mercantile usage. Confirmed, Rutherford v Donaldson, 1707, M. 14674.

M'Kellar v Campbell, 7 June 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 272.

⁵ [On the subject of the solidarity of obligations, see Pothier, Obligations, Nos. 261–282. For the English doctrines in regard to joint and several obligations, see Leake, procal obligations of co-obligants raise questions of relief between the co-obligants. Relief is the indemnification that a co-obligant paying more than his share is entitled to demand from those who are bound along with him. The rules are these:—

1. Where each is bound only pro rata, and pays his own share and no more, he has no claim of relief against the other obligants. But if he should pay more than his own share, he is entitled to an assignation from the creditor, under which he may recover what he has paid beyond his own share.

2. A person bound jointly may insist on all the co-obligants being called; and if any be insolvent, the solvent obligants divide the responsibility.

3. If the co-obligants be bound jointly and severally, any one may be taken for the whole debt. But if truly a cautioner, such person is entitled to an assignation to recover the whole from the principal, and their proportions from the co-obligants.¹

SECTION IV.

OF CAUTIONARY OBLIGATIONS.

Cautionary obligations are granted by way of security for the fulfilment or performance of primary or principal engagements. They are classed as accessory obligations. They correspond with Suretyship in English jurisprudence; and the principles which regulate [347] these obligations are nearly the same in both countries. By a cautionary obligation one becomes bound that the principal debtor shall pay to the creditor the debt which, by the principal obligation, he engages to pay; or that he shall deliver or perform what, by that principal obligation, he has undertaken.²

SUBSECTION I.—OF CAUTIONARY ENGAGEMENTS, OR SURETYSHIP IN GENERAL.

A cautionary obligation may either be constituted along with the principal obligation, and in the same bond or contract; or separately; or subsequently; and the essence of the engagement being that the principal debtor shall perform his undertaking, two consequences arise: 1. The cautioner is entitled to insist that the creditor shall do his best to compel performance on the part of the principal debtor; and, 2. When the cautioner is forced to answer for the principal, he shall have his remedy against the principal debtor. The former is called the RIGHT of DISCUSSION;³ the latter, the RIGHT of RELIEF.⁴ 3. Another right

Contracts, pp. 216–221, and Parsons' Contr. vol. i. 11–38, vol. iii. 79–86.]

¹ Ledingham v M'Kenzie, 5 June 1824, 3 S. 113, N. E. 74.

² See below, Of Constitution of Guarantee, p. 387.

³ [The right of discussion is abolished by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60: 'Where any person shall, after the passing of this Act, become bound as cautioner for any principal debtor, it shall not be necessary for the creditor to whom such cautionary obligation shall be granted, before calling on the cautioner for payment of the debt to which such cautionary obligation refers, to discuss or do diligence against the principal debtor, as now required by law; but it shall be competent to such creditor to proceed against the principal debtor and the said cautioner, or against either of them, and to use all action or diligence against both or either of them, which is competent according to the law of Scotland: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall prevent any cautioner from stipulating in the instrument of caution that the creditor shall be bound, before proceeding against him, to discuss and do diligence against the principal debtor' (sec. 8). Ewart v Latta, 1865, 4 Macq. 983, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 36. This section, of course, does not alter the essentially conditional nature of a proper cautionary obligation, which is only exigible on the failure of the principal debtor to pay at maturity of his obligation. It does not render a cautionary obligation a debt in the first instance, irrespective of anything having occurred to state the principal debtor as in morâ or default. If, for example, in a debt payable on demand, the cautioner could be proceeded against in the first instance without any demand on the principal first made and not obtempered, the person bound with the principal would not be a cautioner at all, but a correus. See Wilson v Tait, H. L., 1 Rob. 137; Poth. Oblig. sec. 270. Correi have not the right of discussion, but that does not make them cautioners. It is not peculiar to cautionry. See Poth. Oblig. Nos. 407–14; Nov. iv. sec. 1; Poth. Oblig. sec. 446.]

⁴ [On the cautioner's right of relief ex mandato or negotio gesto against the principal debtor, see Pothier, Oblig. Nos.

arises to cautioners where more than one is bound as surety, and the words of the bond do not exclude it, called the RIGHT OF DIVISION;¹ by which each is entitled to refuse to answer for more than his own share, the other cautioners being solvent.

In relation to these peculiarities of the doctrine of cautionary obligations, it may briefly be stated, 1. That cautioners, bound as such, are entitled to the benefit of discussion; 2. That if there be more than one, they have also the benefit of division; 3. That they have a right of relief against him for whom they engage, and against each other, so far as they have paid more than their share;² and, 4. That where they are bound as full debtors, or conjunctly and severally, they renounce thereby, in favour of the creditor, the benefit of discussion and division; but retain, as against the principal debtor, and against each other, their right of total or of pro rata relief.

There is a species of cautionary obligation the nature and effect of which is not always sufficiently attended to. In accomplishing loans on heritable or other security, the lender frequently desires to have a collateral personal obligation for the regular payment of the interest; and not unfrequently the agent of the borrower, in reliance on the rents and produce of the estate being sufficient to secure himself against risk, undertakes 'to pay regularly, every half-yearly term, a certain sum of interest during the not-payment of the principal sum.' This looks like an obligation for the interest only; but if the subject of the security fail, it seems to result in an obligation for the principal sum, or an annuity redeemable by payment of that sum, and must be ruled by the same principles which regulate annuities.³

Questions on cautionary obligations may arise in several situations which require to be distinguished: as, 1. Where the principal debtor has failed; 2. Where the surety or cautioner has failed; 3. Where both have failed; and, 4. Where the principal debtor and one or more of the cautioners have failed, the others being solvent.

I. WHERE THE PRINCIPAL DEBTOR HAS FAILED, THE CAUTIONERS BEING SOLVENT.—1. If the creditor have already been admitted to rank on the funds of the bankrupt, the [348] cautioner is not also to be admitted. Not only would that be to sanction a double ranking of the same debt on the same estate, but it is manifest that whatever is drawn by the principal creditor from the principal debtor's estate must accrue to the benefit of the cautioner: for, had the cautioner paid the whole debt, and himself claimed upon the principal debtor's estate, he would just have drawn the same dividend which the principal creditor has drawn, and consequently would have suffered precisely the same loss which now falls on him.⁴

2. Where the surety pays the debt for the principal debtor, he becomes the creditor of the principal debtor, and is entitled to be ranked for the debt, either in his own name in consequence of an assignation, or in the original creditor's name.⁵

3. If the principal creditor have not proved his debt, the cautioner is entitled to prove as a contingent creditor, to the effect of having a dividend set apart for him, in case the creditor should, without entering a claim on the debtor's estate, call on the cautioner to pay the debt.

429–444; and on the jus cedendarum actionum, which is not peculiar to cautionry, see Poth. Oblig. secs. 280, 281, 519–523.]

¹ [See Poth. Oblig. Nos. 415–426.]

² [As to a cautioner's right of relief against his co-cautioners, see Poth. Obl. sec. 445; Stair i. 8. 8, 9.]

³ See above, p. 353. A case of this kind occurred in the ranking of Fairholm's creditors. On the removal of an arrestment which had been used by the trustee for Fairholm's creditors, an obligation was granted for payment of the interest of a sum of money until the principal should be paid. The fund for payment of the principal failed, and Fairholm's trustee claimed on the collateral obligants for the arrears of interest, and for the principal, as equivalent to that part of the obligation which was not implemented. The Court of Session gave judgment to this effect. The case was afterwards appealed, and remitted on a specialty, and compromised.

⁴ It will be recollected, however, that the subject under discussion is only the claim of indemnification against the general fund. The cautioner may have security for his indemnification: 1. By heritable security; 2. By pledge, or other security on moveables; 3. By retention or compensation. In all of these cases he will be entitled to a total relief, so far as his security reaches.

⁵ See Norman Lealy v Gray, 1665, M. 2111; Wood v Gordon, 1695, M. 3355; Erskine v Manderson, 1780, M. 1386.

4. It is a consequence of the benefit of discussion, that if the creditor hold a security for the debt over the estate or effects of the principal debtor, directly or indirectly, by heritable bond, pledge, retention, or compensation, the cautioner has a jus quæsitum, or right to insist that the creditor shall apply the full benefit of that security towards extinction of his debt, and claim from him as cautioner only the balance; or that he shall at least, when he demands payment from the cautioner, assign the benefit of his security.¹ The creditor will not, however, be bound thus to apply his security exclusively; or perhaps at all; or to assign it, where the security is indefinite, and not appropriated to this particular engagement, and where the creditor has other debts due to him by the principal debtor, to which the security may be held to apply.

5. If there be more than one cautioner, bound jointly and severally, the creditor may demand the debt from any of them, on assigning his remedy against the principal and the other cautioners; or, after drawing from the principal debtor what he can, he may claim the balance from any of the cautioners so bound; or where the cautioners are not so bound, those who are solvent lose the benefit of division by the insolvency of the others.

6. Sometimes it happens that one of the cautioners has a security on the estate of the principal debtor for his own safety. And it may be questioned what shall be the effect of it on the one hand, as against the creditors of the principal debtor; and on the other, as against the favoured cautioner?

As to the creditors of the principal debtor, no exception can be taken by them against the operation of the security to the full extent. That security would undoubtedly be available to the favoured cautioner, if called upon to pay the whole debt.² Nor could he

¹ [This right, however, only accrues to a cautioner or co-obligant who makes payment in full; and payment of a dividend by a trustee in bankruptcy is not held to be full payment. Ewart v Latta, 1865, 4 Macq. 983, 3 Macph. (H. L.) 36.]

² [The general body of the principal debtor's creditors have clearly no right to take exception to the security, if given by him to the cautioner anterior to the time when his insolvency commenced. Nor will the particular creditor to whom the cautionary obligation is granted have any interest if the cautioner pays him in full. But if the cautioner as well as the principal debtor fails, and the cautioner's estate can pay only a dividend on the debt, a balance remaining still owing to the creditor, questions of difficulty may arise between that creditor and the trustee for the general creditors of the cautioner, as to the security held by the cautioner. Is the creditor entitled to take the security in payment of the balance still due to him, or to receive a preference therefor on the proceeds of the security over the cautioner's general creditors? Or shall he simply rank pari passu with the cautioner's general creditors on the cautioner's estate; and the trustee for the cautioner's creditors draw from the security, for the general behoof, relief of the dividends (including this particular creditor) payable to the former,—an arrangement which in theory suggests an infinite series of dividends (susceptible of algebraic summation) to ascertain the entire dividend due to him? A creditor is entitled in equity to the full benefit of all securities the principal debtor has given to his surety, as well as to the benefit of those given directly to the creditor himself by the principal debtor; and the rule extends not only to the case of proper sureties, but to that of any one standing in the relation of a surety, as, e.g., an endorser of a bill—holding security from the acceptor—in a question with the unpaid holder. See Maure v Harrison, 1 Equity Cases

Abridg. 93; observations of Sir William Grant, M. R., in Wright v Morley, 11 Vesey 12; Pitman on Principal and Surety, p. 88; in re Cramer, 7 Upper Canada Law Journal 48. Nicolson v Kinloch, 1687, Harc. 59; M. Sup. 51. Suppose A draws on B, who accepts, and C holds the bill endorsed by A, and A holds a security against all debts due or to become due to him by or on account of B. A and B fail. C ranks on both estates, which together cannot pay C 20s. per pound. Does C rank as an unsecured creditor on A's estate, and A's trustee draw back out of the security for division among A's whole creditors, C included, what he pays C? And if there is a surplus of the security after this claim by A's trustee is satisfied, does C take it in preference to B's other creditors? Or is C entitled to a preference on the security over both A's creditors and B's? And if so, must C, in ranking on A's estate, value and deduct it 'as a security over a part of A's estate,' in the sense of the 65th and 66th sections of the Bankrupt Statute? It rather seems that C would be entitled to a preference to the extent of the security over A's and B's general creditors, ranking pari passu with them for the balance, at least if the security was held specially against this particular transaction. But what if it were a general security to A against all his transactions with B, and there were other endorsees in C's position, and perhaps a balance due by B to A for goods sold and not drawn for, or the bills for which were not endorsed away by A, but held by him? In this last case, would A and C and the other endorsees all rank pari passu on the security? Or would A's estate have a preference for the bills not endorsed away? Is the purpose of securing A's indemnity not paramount, so far as regards the bills still held by A, over any equity that C and the others, who took the other bills without special security, may have as against A's or B's general creditors?]

claim any right of relief against the co-cautioners while he held the funds or security of the principal. They would be entitled to defend themselves on the ground that, holding funds of the debtor sufficient to extinguish the debt, he cannot claim from them more than the balance.¹

As to the cautioner who alone has stipulated for security, it is more difficult to [349] determine whether he shall to his own prejudice be obliged to communicate the benefit of that security. A near relation, or confidential friend, may not think himself entitled to require security, while a stranger may be well justified in refusing to engage without it. And there seems to be no equity in obliging the latter to communicate the benefit of his precaution to one who would not himself have stipulated for it. At least, where such a difference has been openly made between cautioners, and with the knowledge of each other, it is probable that the Court would not communicate the security. But where, the cautioners being originally equal, one gets an advantage over the rest on the demand being likely to arise, or where the security to one is secret, the principle which rules the case is, that the co-cautioners are bound to act, or held to have acted, for the general benefit; so that what is given for the relief of one is to be communicated for the benefit of all.²

But an exception has been admitted to the rule now laid down, where the cautioners are bound, not in one and the same obligation, but each separately for his own particular part; and this either in separate bonds, or even in the same bond, each for a specific sum. In such cases, if one of the cautioners have stipulated a security, it has been held to be peculiar to himself.³ This question was not decided without some difference of opinion on

¹ Fisher's Crs. v Campbell's Crs., 1778, M. 2134. Campbell, with several others, were cautioners for a cash account of £600 in Fisher's name. Campbell got from Fisher an heritable security in relief of his engagement, and was infest. Fisher failed; and the other cautioners having paid their shares into Campbell's hands, he paid the debt to the bank. Adjudications having been led of Fisher's estate, a competition arose in the ranking and sale between the cautioners who held no security and the adjudging creditors, Campbell being quite indifferent. The Court 'found that, after Campbell himself is secured, there remains a residuary security to his co-cautioners on his infestment.'

² Campbell v Campbell, 1775, M. 2132. Here, on a demand against a debtor and his cautioners, the former induced a friend to pay up the debt, and gave him heritable security in relief. One of the cautioners indemnified the stranger, and got an assignment to his security. The security not being sufficient to cover his whole advances, he claimed relief against a co-cautioner, who pleaded that they were tanquam socii, and that he was not bound to pay without a communication of the benefit of the security. The Court did not sanction the notion of a societas, but considered the cautioner who paid up the debt as a negotiorum gestor, and held him bound to communicate the security, so far as related to the debt on which he and the defender were jointly bound.

Milligan v Glen, 1802, M. App. Cautioner, No. 2. Milligan and Glen were co-cautioners in a cash account to a bank to the extent of £300 for Muncie. Glen some years afterwards got a disposition of land in security of a sum which he had advanced, and also in relief of his obligation under the bank credit, and out of the price of this land he paid £150 as his share of the bond to the bank. Milligan being forced to pay the balance, brought an action against Glen for one-half in relief. The Court held him liable, on the ground that the payment from the debtor's funds was available to both the cautioners.

Nicol v Doig and Baxter, 16 June 1807, 1 Bell III. 199. Doig obtained from Baxter a conveyance to heritable property, in security of a cautionary obligation which he and Nicol had undertaken to the Bank of Scotland for a cash-credit to Baxter. Lord Newton held 'that Nicol and Doig, being jointly and severally bound as cautioners for Baxter in the said cautionary obligation, Doig was not entitled to apply the whole proceeds thereof for his own relief, but is obliged to communicate one-half of the same to Nicol, for relief pro tanto of his share of the said cautionary obligation.' To this judgment the Court adhered, by refusing a petition without answers.

³ Lawrie v Stewart, 1823, 2 S. 368, N. E. 327. Here three cautioners were bound in the same bond for a composition to be paid to the creditors of Menzies, but each for a specific sum—Lawrie binding for £500, Stewart for £300, and so on. Lawrie paid his £500; but coming to learn that Stewart and others had, by arrangements with Menzies, got securities against loss, he raised an action to compel a communication of the security. Some of the Court held this a joint cautionary obligation and commune negotium; but Lord Alloway, as Ordinary, and the majority of the Court, held the defenders not to be correi, but each bound to the amount of his own individual subscription as if by separate bonds. [See on this case in particular, and the general point discussed in the text, Brodie, Stair, App. 942-4, and notes. See also Craythorne v Swinburne, 14 Vesey 161—per Lord Eldon; Deering v Winchelsea, 2 Bos. and P. 270—per Eyre, C. J.; Collins v Prosser, 1 B. and C. 682; Pitman, p. 149. The question as to the soundness of the judgment in Lawrie v Stewart goes back to what the true principle of the contribution among co-sureties is: whether it is implied contract—in which case it was right, for there was no room for that implication; or the substantial justice of compelling all parties bound in a common burden to relieve the person who by his own loss effects their liberation. Stair i. 8. 9; Pothier, Oblig. No. 445. Put it on the

the bench; and it well deserves reconsideration, for there are many important cases that would fall under the rule which may admit of question. In the case of a composition contract (which was the nature of the contract in the case below), or in that of a cautionary obligation for a bank agent (in which this sort of engagement is very often undertaken), [350] it seems more equitable, and more according to common understanding, to follow the general rule,—to hold the responsibility to be joint, each cautioner being considered as negotiorum gestor for the whole, and as bound, when possessed of funds of the debtor, to apply them in extinction of the principal debtor's obligations in the first place.¹

7. Where any one of several cautioners takes for his own security a collateral obligation, not over the funds of the principal debtor, but from a third person, it seems very doubtful whether he is bound to communicate the benefit of it to the rest. It has sometimes been contended that cautioners are in society; but this, like all attempts at analogy in matter of law, has on examination been found not to be correct. It has also been said, that on principles of equity they ought to be held as negotiorum gestores for each other; but this also seems not to be satisfactory. And if the true ground of the right to communication of the benefit be, that the funds of the principal debtor primarily liable are in the hands or under the power of the cautioner, and are to be first applied, that will afford no ground, in the case now under discussion, for demanding a communication of the collateral security. There has not occurred any case in which the benefit of the security stipulated and obtained by one cautioner has been communicated to others, where it was not a security over the funds of the principal debtor. It may further be questioned, whether in one case the benefit even of a collateral personal security would not be available to the other cautioners? namely, where he who has so secured himself collaterally has failed to pay his share, and the other cautioners have been obliged to discharge it. Would they not in such case be entitled to recourse against the collateral obligant?

II. WHERE THE CAUTIONERS OR SURETIES HAVE FAILED, THE PRINCIPAL DEBTOR BEING SOLVENT.—1. In the case of a cash-credit or standing guarantee, the natural course is to require new securities, or to withdraw the credit. But a hold may still be kept of the cautioner though insolvent, either if such change of security be not required, or if no new cautioner be procured to supply the place of the former.

2. A cautioner, bound as such, is liable only after discussion of the principal; but in case of the cautioner's bankruptcy, a contingent claim may be entered on his estate, either before discussion of the principal, or before the condition or term of payment of the obligation have arrived, to the effect of having a dividend set apart. Out of this dividend the creditor will be entitled to have payment of whatever is deficient in the payment by the principal debtor, on proceeding to discuss him; but the effect of a payment from the principal will be, not to limit the ranking on the estate of the cautioner, provided the claim has been made against the cautioner before such payment, but merely to prevent the creditor from drawing on the whole more than his debt.

III. WHERE BOTH THE CAUTIONERS AND THE PRINCIPAL HAVE FAILED.—1. If the debtor fail, and also all the cautioners, whether bound as such or not, the creditor is entitled to claim on the estate of each cautioner, as well as on that of the principal debtor, for the full amount of the debt. The effect will be to entitle the creditor to draw, on the whole, payment of his debt, and no more. The bankruptcy of the principal is sufficient discussion. If he is not yet made bankrupt, it will be still competent for the creditor, even where the cautioner is bound as such, to rank on the cautioner's estate as a contingent creditor, in order to have set apart for him, till the principal debtor be discussed, a dividend, out of which he will be entitled to draw what may be deficient in the payment by the latter ground, and it leads to a different conclusion from that which was given effect to in Lawrie's case. But the obligation of equal contribution may of course be qualified or waived by express contract among the co-sureties. Swain v Wall, 1 Ch. Reports 249; Coope v Twynam, Turner and Russel 426.]

¹ [Coventry v Hutchison, 8 S. 924.]

principal. Care should be taken to claim on all the estates before the debt is diminished by payment.

2. Where all the cautioners are bankrupt, and the dividends to be drawn from all their estates taken together will exceed the claim of the creditor, it would appear that [351] questions of relief among the bankrupt estates of the cautioners will be settled in the following manner:—First, If one cautioner's estate is able to pay 15s. in the pound, and another only 5s., the debt will be extinguished by the payment of these dividends, and there will be no relief between the two estates; each being bankrupt, and having already paid the dividend corresponding to the whole of the debt which is properly due out of that estate. Secondly, If one estate pay a dividend of 15s., and the other a dividend of 10s., the former will, of course, be relieved of the cautionary debt to the extent of 5s., and so they are equal. Thirdly, But if the former precede the other in paying the dividend, justice is not done unless it shall be allowed to the creditors or trustee on that estate to come into the creditor's place, to the effect of drawing back 5s. from the co-cautioner's estate. And yet if the cautioner, while solvent, had paid the debt, he would not in his own person have been entitled to rank for more than one-half, according to a determination in the House of Lords in a case to be afterwards quoted.¹

3. Where the cautioners are taken bound in different proportions, the responsibility of their estates will be different in different circumstances. Suppose a debt of £10,000 with three cautioners; one bound to the extent of £5000, another of £3000, another of £2000. Their estates will all be liable in these proportions for the debt; or each will be liable in the above proportions, should the principal debtor fail while the whole debt is due. But if there shall have been paid off as much as to reduce the balance to the smallest of the sums for which the cautioners are bound, the estates of all the cautioners seem to be liable in an equal responsibility for that balance; or, in other words, a claim on each seems to be competent to the extent of such balance.

4. Where the cautioners have each granted bond for the same debt, they are all liable to the creditor equally; and they are also bound in mutual relief to each other, whether they are aware of each other's obligation or not. The cautioners have this relief on the principle of the beneficium cedendarum actionum without actual assignment. So, on a bankruptcy of them all, the creditors may claim as if they were jointly and severally bound in the same bond; and any one of them paying the debt will be entitled to the same claim on the estates of the others, as if one bond were signed by the whole.

5. Frequently additional security is subsequently taken by bond of corroboration or otherwise, saving to the creditor all the effects of the former caution. This happens where a cautioner fails or dies; where the credit of the principal himself has received a shock; where a demand is made which cannot be answered; where the principal debtor is charged to pay, and suspends on caution; and so forth. The relief, as between the new and the old cautioners, seems to be regulated on these principles:—

First, If the subsequent engagement have been undertaken at the desire of the principal debtor, not at the desire of the cautioners, or to relieve them from an impending demand;²

¹ Sir R. Maxwell's Crs. v Heron's Trs., M. 2136. Reversed, 3 Pat. 359.

² Arnold v Gordon, 1671, M. 14641, where the principal in a bond, with four cautioners, suspended on caution; and the cautioner in the suspension having paid and got assignation to the debt, charged the original cautioners. He was held to have right so to do, deducting his own fifth part.

Kerr v Gordon, 1685, M. 14641. Riddel, bound with Kerr as cautioner, afterwards corroborated the debt with a new cautioner, Gordon. Kerr paid the debt, and claimed half against Gordon, and was found entitled to it.

VOL. I.

Murray of Broughton v Heirs and Crs. of Orchardton, 1722, M. 14651, aff. 1 Robertson 465. Here the question was much discussed. Sir A. M'Culloch and his son, with Maxwell as cautioner, were bound for 2000 merks. Five years afterwards, the son, and new cautioners, Lord Kenmuir and Murray, gave a bond of corroboration; and Murray paid the debt, and on an assignation claimed total relief against the original cautioners. He was found to have relief only as co-cautioner; and this was affirmed in the House of Lords.

This was confirmed in a subsequent case, Lockhart v L. Semple, 1738, Elch. Cautioner, No. 9. See also next note.

then the new cautioner has only a rateable relief, as if he were a party to the original bond.

[352] Secondly, If the new cautioner have interposed at the request of the former cautioners;¹ or if the first cautioners have suspended on caution; or even if the former cautioners have been apprised of the application to the new cautioner, and have approved of it, as tending to relieve them from present demand; then the new cautioner is entitled to a total relief, and, on paying the debt, may claim the whole from the insolvent estates of the former obligants.²

Thirdly, In distinguishing the cases to which these rules are to be applied, the legal presumption is, that the new cautioner has interposed for the debtor alone, since the debtor is liable in the first instance, the cautioners being liable only after he is discussed;³ and particular indications are required to establish a right to a total relief against the other cautioners.⁴ Among such indications, it seems sufficient that a demand has actually been

¹ [So in England, Turner v Davies, 2 Esp. 478.]

² Wallace v Fleming, 1685, M. 14642, where a cautioner in a second suspension, at the instance both of the principal, etc., and of the cautioner in the first suspension, was held entitled to total relief against the first cautioner.

Pollock v Sir R. Pollock, 1745, M. 2125; Elch. Cautioner, No. 16. 'It is, no doubt, in general true,' says Lord Kilkerran, 'that the equity on which the relief among cautioners is founded (for as nullum negotium gestum est between them there is none in strict law) obtains no less where they are bound in different deeds, and at different times, than where they are bound in the same deed. And so it has been often found, that where the principal granted bond of corroboration with a new cautioner, there was a mutual relief between the cautioner in the original bond and the cautioner in the bond of corroboration; particularly 15 Dec. 1722, Murray of Broughton v The Crs. of Orchardton. From the analogy in which decision, which was affirmed by the House of Peers, though there was only an appearance ex parte for reversing the decree, and from the general presumption that the interposition of a new cautioner is on account of the principal debtor, some able judges were for sustaining the defence in this case; and it may be admitted that the general presumption lies that way. But the circumstances of the case, upon which the decision of all questions of this kind depends, appeared to the Court to be sufficient to elude such presumption here. For, as the principal debtor was dead; the circumstances of his children encumbered; as there was direct access to diligence against the cautioner; and, last of all, as it was become necessary to compel him to pay, as his cautionary obligation was near expiring, and the bond actually registered for that end; it was thought the intention of the bond of corroboration could be supposed to be no other than to save the cautioner from diligence.

'But in every case wherein it appeared from circumstances that the interposition of the new cautioner was on account, or at the desire, of the cautioner in the original bond, the new cautioner has been found entitled to a total relief from the cautioner on whose account he interposed.' Kilk. Rep. p. 117.

³ Loch and L. Strathallan v L. Nairn, 1701, M. 14644; see also Kilkerran's dictum in the preceding case.

⁴ The doctrine was fully discussed in Smeiton v Millar, 1792, M. 2138. Here Millar held a bank credit with the British Linen Co. for £800, on a bond by him and three other persons jointly and severally bound. Walker, one of the

cautioners, died; and the bank having required a new cautioner in his room, Millar granted a bond of corroboration along with Smeiton as cautioner. On Millar's bankruptcy and death, Smeiton, the new cautioner, sought total relief against the old cautioners. They pleaded that he had interposed, not for them, but for Millar, the principal debtor; and the Court held his engagement to be as cautioner, entitling him to a rateable relief, but no more. Lord Justice-Clerk M'Queen said: 'This is a general and important question. The decisions have not differed: they all tend to one general rule—and this rule is founded in common sense—That where a new surety engages on account of the principal debtor, and for the purpose of saving him from diligence, there is nothing that ought to difference his case from that of the cautioners in the original obligation: they are all cautioners for the principal debtor. There is another case, where the principal and cautioners are distressed, and a person interposes to relieve them. It is clear that this person interposes for them all, and that with regard to him they are all principal debtors; and consequently, when he pays the debt, he has a claim for a total relief against the whole. The analogy of the law in other matters confirms me in the opinion which I have formed. Thus, it often happens that where a security is given over a particular subject, the creditor demands a further security, and other lands are added to those over which the creditor's security formerly extended. There can be no question here as long as these subjects remain the property of the debtor. But I shall suppose them to be sold to different purchasers, and that the creditor comes to demand his payment from the purchaser of the last property. "Why attack me?" says the purchaser. "Make your demand rather from that subject over which you were first secured, or at least divide the demand." The creditor answers, "I will not divide my payment;" and so the purchaser of the last subject must pay. But then he is entitled to a conveyance, and he comes against the estate over which the debt originally extended, and he ranks on it pro rata according to the respective values of the two. There are many cases to the same purpose, as for example the case of catholic creditors and secondary creditors. The doctrine applies to all of these cases. The secondary creditor has no right to a total relief, but to a proportional one; and these considerations strengthen in my mind the principle which I think ought to regulate this case. Cautioners are often hurt by lenient creditors, who, by accepting of new cautioners, made against cautioners,¹ and that the creditor has forborne to urge payment on [353] receiving new cautioners; or that the debtor is abroad, which opens immediate access to the cautioners, and that the creditor has made his demand; or that the debtor is dead, which still more distinctly brings forward the responsibility of the cautioners; or that the first cautionary obligation is near expiring, and the bond recorded for diligence.² But it is not sufficient to change the presumption, and ground an inference of the corroborating cautioner having engaged merely in support of the cautioners, that he has granted bond by himself, without taking any letter or obligation of relief from the principal debtor.³

IV. WHERE THE PRINCIPAL DEBTOR, AND ONE OR MORE OF THE CAUTIONERS, HAVE [354] FAILED, THE OTHERS BEING SOLVENT.—1. Where the principal debtor has failed, and there are two cautioners, one of whom is solvent, the other insolvent, the creditor, after discussing the principal, may either go against the solvent cautioner, and make him pay the remainder of the debt; or he may, if he think fit, claim to be ranked for the full amount of the debt upon the estate of the insolvent cautioner, and, after drawing a proportional dividend for it, take the balance of the debt (after imputing such dividend) from the solvent cautioner. But he can so claim for the whole debt only before receiving payment of any part.

If the creditor go first against the solvent cautioner, and compel him to pay the whole debt, such solvent cautioner is entitled to be ranked upon the estate of the insolvent cautioner for one-half only of what he pays: for as, where there are two cautioners, each stands indebted as principal for one-half of the debt, and as cautioner for the other, when a solvent cautioner pays the whole debt he necessarily extinguishes that moiety of it in which he stands indebted as principal; and of course he can claim and prove against the co-cautioner's estate only the other moiety, which he has thus paid in the character of surety for his co-cautioner.⁴

enable the debtor to enlarge his debt. In this case no favour whatever was done to the other cautioners by the interposition of Smeiton, the additional cautioner; and they must be entitled to relief against him, just in the same way as if his cautionary obligation had been contained in the same bond with theirs.' Dreghorn: 'Ex facie the cautioners are principals in the original bond. But Smeiton's obligation is in the same terms, and he must therefore have known that they were cautioners.' Swinton: 'Put the case, that in place of joining in a bond of corroboration, Smeiton had paid the debt, would he not have been entitled to recourse upon the cautioners in the original bond? If so, the bond of corroboration is not in the same situation with the original bond. It appears to me to place Smeiton in the same situation as if he had paid the debt. The former cautioners ought to be held as all principals to Smeiton.' Lord Henderland said that the matter appeared to him in the same light. Lord President Campbell: 'If Lord Swinton were right in the view which he has taken of these bonds, the case would come to the same point with that of M'Dowall of Canonmills, where there were two sets of cautioners, and the question came to be, whether the new bond superseded the old one? Your Lordships ultimately thought that it did, and that the original cautioners were free. But this is a different case: it is one of those questions where the general rule of law is, that all cautioners have a claim pro rata, whether they be bound in one or more deeds, seeing they are all bound for behoof of and at the request of the principal debtor alone. This is the general rule, and yet it may appear from circumstances that the new obligation has been entered into on account of the cautioners as well as on account of the principal; and then there is an exception from the general rule, and the new cautioners have a relief from those for whose benefit they became bound. Here there are two sets of cautioners: the second was bound not for the cautioners, but for the principal; and therefore, in deciding betwixt them, they must be entitled to relief pro rata.'

¹ Clarkson v Edgar, 1703, M. 14645. Fountainhall misses the point. Dalrymple states that the charge was given 'against the principal and cautioners.'

² M'Kenzie v M'Kenzie, 1752, M. 14661. Charge against two co-obligants. M'Kenzie became cautioner in a bond of corroboration, paid the debt, and on assignation charged both. One of the co-obligants then produced a bond of relief from the other, in proof of his being only a cautioner. The Court gave total relief. [Walker v Inglis, 5 S. 677; aff. 4 W. and S. 40.]

³ See the case of Sir Robert Pollock as reported by Kilkerran, M. 2125; Elchies' notes, p. 89.

⁴ Lennox v Campbell, 18 May 1815, 18 Fac. Coll. 359. Two cautioners signed a bond of credit to the Bank of Scotland with Lee for £400. One of them died, and Campbell signed a bond of corroboration, binding himself jointly and severally with the obligants in the prior bond. He took no letter of relief from Lee. The same thing took place on the death of the other original cautioner, and Still became cautioner. Lee died with a balance due the bank. The representatives of the deceased cautioners paid up the debt, and claimed relief pro rata against Campbell and Still. They attempted a distinction, on the ground that in the former cases the new cautioner was bound along with the principal debtor, while here he had executed a bond alone. But the Court refused to sanction this distinction.

⁵ Sir R. Maxwell's Crs. v the Trs. of Patrick Heron, M. 2136; revd. 11 June 1794, 3 Pat. 359. The Court of Session held

When, on the other hand, the creditor goes first against the estate of the insolvent cautioner, he is entitled to be ranked upon it for the full amount of the debt, and to draw a proportional dividend, in regard that both cautioners are bound to him in solidum.

But although the creditor is thus entitled to be ranked upon the estate of the insolvent cautioner for the full debt, yet the estate of the insolvent cautioner is entitled to no further relief against the solvent cautioner, than in so far as the estate may pay more than the insolvent cautioner's moiety of the debt. It has been contended that as, in the event of the creditor proceeding in this manner, the estate of the insolvent cautioner is made to pay a dividend not only upon that moiety of the joint debt which is his own proper debt, but upon that moiety of it for which he is only a cautioner, his estate ought to have relief of half of the dividend that may be drawn by the creditor, whatever it may be. But this has been overruled; and it has been held, that unless the dividend drawn by the creditor from the estate of the insolvent cautioner exceed that moiety of the debt which he must have paid had he continued solvent, the estate is entitled to no relief, and that it is only for the excess above such moiety that any relief is competent.¹

The doctrine thus established does, in its consequences, seem inequitable and arbitrary; since, according as the creditor may think fit to proceed, very different results to the parties arise. If the creditor choose to take full payment from the solvent cautioner, it will be ultimately for the advantage of the estate of the insolvent cautioner. If, on the other hand, [355] he think fit to go in the first place against the estate of the insolvent cautioner, it will be ultimately for the advantage of the solvent cautioner.²

2. Where the principal debtor has failed, and there are three or more cautioners, some of whom have failed, and the others remain solvent, the creditor will in like manner be entitled to go either against the solvent or the insolvent cautioners, after discussing the principal; and a difference will, upon similar principles, take place according to the way in which he exercises this option.

If the creditor go first against one of the solvent cautioners, that cautioner, if he pay the debt, will be entitled to demand against the co-cautioners relief of all that he has paid beyond his own proportion. The intricacy of the cases which may arise in such circumstances requires some discrimination. 1. If the cautioners are all solvent, the rule is simple: In claiming relief from any one of the co-cautioners, he who has paid is entitled to demand that co-cautioner's own proportion, and one-half of the proportions falling on the rest; and thus the payment and the risk is equally divided, and each is left to seek his relief against the the co-cautioner, on paying the debt, entitled to be ranked for the whole, to the effect of drawing one-half. But the House of Lords reversed this judgment, and ordained the cautioner who had paid the debt to be ranked on the estate of the other cautioner 'for half of the sums due on those debts in which they were jointly bound along with the principal debtor, each of them having been indebted as principal for a moiety thereof, and as security for the other moiety.'

¹ Cranston v M'Dowall, 1798, M. 2552. Dr. M'Farlane and James M'Dowall were cautioners for A. M'Dowall to Heriot's Hospital and to the Royal Bank. A. M'Dowall failed, with a balance of £700 due to the hospital and £240 to the bank. Dr. M'Farlane failed; and although James M'Dowall, the other cautioner, was solvent, the hospital and the bank ranked on the estate of Dr. M'Farlane for the whole debts, and drew less than one-half. The trustee for M'Farlane's creditors brought an action of relief against the heir of James M'Dowall, the co-cautioner, on this and other accounts. On this question the Court assoilzied M'Dowall's heir from the claim for any part of the dividends received out of M'Farlane's estate upon debts for which M'Farlane was jointly bound, in respect those dividends do not exceed the proportion of those debts for which M'Farlane was liable.

² In this respect the law of England coincides with the law of this country. In ex parte Elton, 3 Ves. jun. 240, Lord Chancellor Rösslyn expresses himself thus: 'Suppose in the case of A and B, partners, the former remains solvent, the latter becomes a bankrupt, and there is a joint debt of £1000; the creditor making his claim first against the separate estate (of the bankrupt partner), paying a dividend of 10s. in the pound, receives £500. Can the assignees claim against the solvent partner what they have paid? His answer would be, they could only claim the same right the bankrupt could; and as against the bankrupt, he is entitled to retain: he has paid his moiety of the partnership debt. If the case is turned the other way, and the creditor first sues the solvent partner, he recovers all the debt against him; and he has a right to come in as a separate creditor of the bankrupt, to the amount only of a moiety of that debt: for a moiety only of the debt of the partnership he could have recovered against him if he had been solvent. That makes a very great difference to the separate creditors.'

rest for that share which has been advanced on his account.¹ 2. If some of the cautioners are solvent, the solvent cautioners are bound each to repay his own share, and also his proportion of the share that should have been paid by the insolvents; and thus each suffers the loss equally, and has a right to claim on the insolvent estates of the cautioners who have failed for the amount of what he has advanced for them.² 3. The difficulty is, to find a rule for ranking him who pays on the estates of the insolvent co-cautioners: for although it be generally true, that in a question between two cautioners (although there may be more), the cautioner who has paid the debt is entitled to relief of one-half, that proceeds on the supposition that relief is open against the estates of those on whose account any higher demand is made than the co-cautioner's own proportion; which would be excluded, if, in the case supposed, the cautioner who has paid should demand relief of one-half from each insolvent estate. But perhaps the benefit of having a clear practical rule, seconded by the consideration that cautioners unable to indemnify the person who advances their proportion ought to be barred from competing with him as creditors in relief, may recommend to adoption the same rule as in the simple case already under consideration (p. 371),—namely, that the cautioner who pays the debt should be ranked for one-half on the estate of each insolvent cautioner, to the effect of drawing his full relief for all beyond his own proportion.

To have a practical illustration of this rule: Suppose there are three cautioners, A, B, and C; and, 1st, let it be supposed that A pays the debt of £1000, and that B and C are insolvent. Here A is entitled to rank upon each of the estates of B and C for £500; and if each of the estates pays 13s. 4d. per pound, the dividend from each will be £333, 6s. 8d., which will be just equal to the remainder of the debt that ought to fall upon A, the solvent cautioner. In this case, therefore, A will be entitled to draw the full dividends. But supposing each of the estates to pay 15s. per pound, the dividends would be £375, and [356] they must therefore be restricted to £333, 6s. 8d.; so that in this case also each will ultimately bear an equal share of the loss. If, however, it should be supposed that the estate of B pays 10s. per pound, and the estate of C 15s., then the dividends would be, from B £250, and from C £375. Here A would be entitled to draw the whole dividends from both estates; because, although the dividend from C's estate exceeds £333, 6s. 8d., the third of the debt, yet it does not exceed the loss ultimately falling upon A: for, after imputing the £250 received from B's estate, one-half of the difference, £375, is just equal to the dividend from C's estate.

But if the creditor should go first against the insolvent cautioners, he will be entitled to rank upon the estate of each for the whole debt, to the effect of drawing full payment; and if he should draw from the estate of any of the bankrupts more than the share payable by such bankrupt, the trustee for the creditors at large on that estate will be entitled to relief against the solvent cautioners for the surplus.

In the practical application of this rule, the creditor would be entitled to rank for the full sum of £1000 upon each; and if each of the estates paid 10s. per pound, or more, he would draw £500 from each; and each of the estates would have a claim of relief against the solvent cautioner for the difference between £500 and £333, 6s. 8d., their respective shares of the debt.

3. Where an annuity bond is granted by several persons jointly and severally, and they are all bankrupt, the grantee may claim on the estate of each for the entire annuity, to the effect of drawing the full annuity on the whole; or if the parties agree, he may be ranked on the estate of each for the converted value of the annuity, to the effect of drawing that value upon the whole.

4. Where one of the co-obligants is bankrupt, and the rest solvent, if the parties should agree to convert the annuity, the true method seems to be the following: 1. If the bankrupt is the primary or proper debtor, the rest only cautioners, the annuitant should be ranked on the bankrupt estate for what is the ascertained value; relieving the co-obligants, as cautioners of the future annuities, to the extent of such annuity as the dividend may purchase,—or pay the dividend to the co-obligants, on their securing him in payment of the whole annuity. 2. Where they all are principals, the proper course seems to be, to rank the annuitant on the bankrupt estate for the whole ascertained value, to the effect of his drawing the share payable by the bankrupt, and so relieving the co-obligants, as before, to the extent of that part of the bankrupt's share of the annuity to which the dividend may correspond. 3. Where the bankrupt is a mere cautioner, the annuitant will, of course, be entitled to demand new caution, and will even be entitled to rank on the bankrupt estate as a contingent creditor, before the principal has failed.¹

¹ See Kames' Principles of Equity, B. i. p. 1, sec. 3; Elucidations, art. 29.

² [Finlayson v Smith, 1827, 6 S. 264.]

EXTINCTION OR DISCHARGE OF CAUTIONARY OBLIGATIONS.

Claims on cautionary obligations may be barred or discharged, not only by extinction or satisfaction of the principal debtor's obligation, but also by the statutory limitation, by implied discharge, by neglect, and want of due diligence in recovering against the principal.

I. COMMENTARY ON THE ACT LIMITING CAUTIONARY OBLIGATIONS.—In 1695 an Act was passed for limiting the endurance of cautionary obligations to the term of seven years from the date of the bond. This law was made in order to prevent the 'great hurt and prejudice that hath befallen many persons and families, and oftentimes to their utter ruin and undoing, by men's facility to engage as cautioners for others, who, afterwards failing, have left a growing burden on the cautioners, without relief.' 1695, c. 5. But this law, with those [357] wise and humane purposes, was ill concerted for the attainment of its object. The enacting words are: 'That no man, binding and engaging for hereafter, for and with another, conjunctly and severally, in any bond or contract for sums of money, shall be bound for the said sums for longer than seven years after the date of the bond; but that from and after the said seven years the said cautioner shall be eo ipso free of his caution.' Had the Act stopped here, it would have been well; but it proceeds in these words: 'And that whoever is bound for another, either as express cautioner, or as principal or co-principal, shall be understood to be a cautioner, and have the benefit of this Act, providing that he have either clause of relief in the bond, or a bond of relief apart, intimate personally to the creditor at his receiving of the bond, without prejudice always to the true principal's being bound in the whole contents of the bond or contract: as also of the said cautioner's being still bound conform to the terms of the bond, within the said seven years, as before the making of this Act.' A clause is added, providing, 'That what legal diligence by inhibition, horning, arrestment, adjudication, or any other way, shall be done within the seven years by creditors against their cautioners for what fell due in that time, shall stand good, and have its course and effect after the expiring of the seven years, as if this Act had not been made.'² The Act being thus confined to cases in which the cautioner engages professedly

¹ [By the Bankrupt Act, 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 54, it is enacted, that no creditor in respect of an annuity granted by the bankrupt shall be entitled to vote or draw a dividend until such annuity shall be valued, and directions are given for that purpose; and (sec. 55) 'that where any person is bound as cautioner for payment of such annuity, it shall not be lawful for the creditor therein to sue or charge after the date of the sequestration such cautioner, and such cautioner shall only be liable for the value fixed as aforesaid, and the arrears of annuity; and on such cautioner making payment of such value and arrears to the creditor, and the lawful interest thereon, he shall be discharged of all liability for such annuity, and he may thereupon enter a claim in the sequestration for the sum so paid, and vote and draw dividends thereon: Provided that if such cautioner shall not pay the sum so fixed, and arrears as aforesaid, before any payment of the annuity subsequent to the fixing thereof becomes due, he shall be bound to make payment of the said annuity, and all subsequent annuities, until he shall make payment of the sum so fixed, arrears and annuity and interest as aforesaid, deducting always such dividends as the creditor shall have received before full payment as aforesaid.']

² This Act appears to have been carefully considered in a committee of Parliament; and probably the objections stated

as such, or as a co-obligant, having a bond of relief from the principal, intimated at the time to the creditor, it has been in many cases entirely defeated by the obvious device of taking all the obligants bound as principals, and by the creditor keeping himself ignorant of the relief stipulated among them.

In order to give to a cautioner the benefit of this Act, and free him from a demand by the creditor after seven years, these points are necessary:—

1. The statute by its words applies only to bonds for sums of money; and this has been held, rather too strictly perhaps, to apply only to loans of money, to be repaid within the seven years. Cautioners ad facta præstanda have not the benefit of it;¹ nor judicial cautioners, as in suspensions or loosing arrestments;² nor cautioners in marriage contracts;³ nor for the discharge of an office.⁴ Neither has a cautioner in a bond of relief the benefit of this Act.⁵ Cautioners for payment of a composition on bankruptcy are not comprehended under the Act.⁶

2. Either the cautioner must appear in the bond expressly as cautioner (the law, however, not being held to extend to the case of a bill wherein one signs as cautioner).⁷ Or,

3. If he there appear as co-obligant, it is necessary that, at the time of settling [358] the transaction, there shall have been intimated to the creditor the principal debtor's obligation to relieve his co-obligant;⁸ and this notice must be notarial or judicial,⁹ mere private knowledge not being sufficient.¹⁰ But, 1. The law does not extend to the case of co-obligants stipulating by a clause of relief their mutual remedies.¹¹ 2. It does not comprehend the case of the granter of a simple bond of corroboration for a debt already constituted.¹² 3. An engagement by letter or otherwise, to pay or see paid a sum already lent, is not within the Act.¹³ And, 4. A letter of guarantee in a mercantile transaction is not within the Act.¹⁴

The obligation of the cautioner will be extended beyond the seven years in the following cases:—1. Where the bond shall have been renewed, or a corroboration granted by the by moneyed men likely to suffer by the weakening of their securities had led to the temporizing and qualifying expressions which have deprived the Act of half the salutary effects intended in the original proposal.

¹ Robertson v M'Kinlay, 1736, M. 11010; Elchies, Cautioner, No. 6. And observe the distinction where the character of a bond ad factum præstandum is lost in the money obligation. Sir R. Monro v Bain, 1741, M. 11017. See Elchies' Notes on No. 10.

² Hope v Foulis, 1715, M. 11009; M'Kinlay v Ewing, 1781, M. 2154, 2 Hailes 881. The Court found 'that the Act 1695 does not apply to cautionary obligations in judicial proceedings in suspension.'

³ Balvaird v Watson, 1709, M. 11005; Stewart v Campbell, 1726, M. 11010. The obligation in chief was to have ready a sum, and to lay it out for the wife's liferent, and the heirs of the marriage in fee. It was found that the cautioner being bound ad factum præstandum, and not to pay a certain sum of money, his case did not fall under the Act.

⁴ Fleet v Strang, 1709, M. 11005.

⁵ Bruce v Stein, 1793, M. 11033.

⁶ Cuthbertson v Lyon, 1823, 2 S. 330, N. E. 291. See also Anderson v Wood, 1821, 1 S. 28, N. E. 31. ['No person who has not produced an oath as a creditor before the date of the deliverance (in a sequestration) approving of the composition, shall be entitled to make any demand against the cautioner after the space of two years from the date of such deliverance, reserving to such creditor his claim for the composition against the bankrupt and his estate.' 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 144.]

⁷ [Sharp v Harvey, 1808, M. App. Bill of Exchange, No. 22.]

⁸ Ross v Craigie, 1729, M. 11014; Douglas, Heron, & Co. v Riddock, 1792, M. 11032. See below, p. 376, note 1.

⁹ Bell v Herdman, 1727, M. 11039.

¹⁰ It was, however, sustained as enough that the creditor was both writer and witness in the bond of relief. M'Rankin v Shaw, 1714, M. 11035. 'The Lords found private knowledge not relevant; but found that the charger's writing the bond of relief, and signing as witness to it, of the date of the bond charged on, was a sufficient intimation.' [Drysdale v Johnston, 1 D. 409. See, as to cash-credit bonds, Macartney v Mackenzie, 5 W. and S. 504; Alexander v Badenach, 6 D. 322. In the last-mentioned case an opinion was expressed that the statute does not apply to a cash-credit bond in which the parties are bound as co-obligants.]

¹¹ Park's Crs. v Maxwell, 1785, M. 11031.

¹² Rutherford v Scott, 1715, M. 11012. This doctrine was held in a very strong case: the Court considering it, first, as a necessary inference from the statute; and, second, as settled by practice and the legal understanding of the country. Lady Henrietta Gordon v Tyrie, 1748, M. 11025. See Elchies, Cautioner, Notes, No. 10. [Monteith v Pattison, 4 D. 161; Tait v Wilson, 1 Rob. 137.]

¹³ Caves v Spence, 1742, Kames' Rem. Dec. p. 54; Kilk. 420. [Howison v Howison, M. 11030.]

¹⁴ Bertram, Gardner, & Co. v Sprott, 3 March 1795, Baron Hume's Sess. Papers. [Alexander v Badenach, supra.]

cautioner; or negotiations for answering the demand of the creditor carried on with the cautioner, so as to bar him personali exceptione from pleading on the Act:¹ and the doctrine of Erskine (B. iii. tit. 7. sec. 24) is not law, that nothing but diligence ought to prolong the obligation; and that even a declaration by the cautioner that he stands bound for the debt, will not prevent the obligation from expiring with the seven years. 2. It will also extend beyond the seven years, where the creditor shall have raised diligence against the cautioner within the seven years.² The doctrine of Erskine is also in this point objectionable, in so far as he says that diligence raised within the term shall have no effect but to secure the special subjects affected by the diligence; for though this may appear to be the import of the words used in the Act, the Court deliberately adjudged the construction not to be thus limited. And, 3. The obligation will be continued where the creditor shall have obtained decree against the cautioner;³ mere citation in an action not being sufficient as in ordinary prescription.⁴

[359] This difference, however, will be observed between the septennial limitation and ordinary prescriptions, that the diligence or action raised within the seven years does not operate like an interruption or stop to the course of prescription. The effect of the limitation is perfect in stopping responsibility on the part of the cautioner, except for what becomes due before the expiration of the seven years.⁵ So he is chargeable with such interest only as arises within the seven years.⁶

II. EFFECT OF THE DISCHARGE OF THE PRINCIPAL DEBTOR OR CO-SURETY.—A cautioner is presumed to engage for the principal debtor, partly in reliance on his solvency or the efficacy of his funds in rendering the engagement safe, and partly in reliance on the co-operation and relief to be afforded by co-cautioners. The creditor therefore cannot discharge the principal debtor, or give up any funds of which he may be possessed, affording the means of satisfying the debt, or grant an acquittance to any co-obligant bound to relieve the cautioner, without virtually discharging, to the extent of such discharge or renunciation, the obligation of the cautioner.

1. The discharge of the principal debtor, granted by the creditor without the cautioner's consent, is a discharge to the cautioner.

2. A discharge of a cautioner, in the same way, without the co-cautioner's consent, is an acquittance to the co-cautioner for the share which the discharged cautioner should have borne. Thus, if there be two solvent cautioners, and one of them is discharged, the creditors can, on the debtor's bankruptcy, charge the other with only one-half of the debt. If there should be many co-cautioners, and some of them insolvent, the discharged cautioner would have borne both his own share, and also his proportion of the share falling on the

¹ Douglas, Heron, & Co. v Riddock, 1793, M. 11032; House of Lords, 4 Pat. 133. Kirkpatrick, with Currie and Riddock as his cautioners, granted bond to Douglas, Heron, & Co., payable 29th October 1778. Riddock died in 1777. Decree in absence was taken in 1779. In a correspondence with the curators of his heir the company threatened diligence, and the curator solicited delay. This began before and continued after the elapse of the seven years. Afterwards the company proceeded to diligence, and the statute was pleaded. But the correspondence was held a bar personali exceptione.

In the House of Lords the judgment was affirmed, and it was held unnecessary to consider certain other pleas, 'in respect of the transaction which is proved by the correspondence between the company and the factor of Riddock and his curators, and which is established to have been approved of by him, whereby he is barred from insisting on the benefit of the Act 1695.'

² Irving and Copland, 1752, M. 11043.

³ Douglas, Heron, & Co. v Riddock. This formed one of the points in the case (supra, note 1); the decree in absence in 1779 being held as diligence. But on this point the House of Lords gave no judgment.

⁴ In the Folio Dictionary, vol. iv. p. 102, there is a decision shortly noted inconsistent with this: Clark v Stewart, 1779, M. 11043. But I doubt the correctness of that note; and there is no report of any such case in the Faculty Collection or elsewhere.

⁵ The editor of Erskine (edition 1812) seems to have misapprehended the principle of this doctrine, where, objecting to Erskine's text, he says: 'The effect of doing diligence within the seven years seems to be that of interrupting the prescription, and of saving to the creditor the bond.' P. 620, note. [But see Ivory's note, and Irving v Copland, supra.]

⁶ Rowand v Lang, 1738, M. 11041; Reid v Maxwell, 1780, M. 11043, Hailes 850; Irving and Copland, supra.

insolvent cautioners; and so the creditor must, in charging any other solvent cautioner, give allowance for these. If the claim is made against an insolvent cautioner, there is a difficulty on the principles explained above, and perhaps no deduction would be given but of the discharged cautioner's own proportion.¹

3. The renunciation of any security held by the creditor over the debtor's estate is also a discharge of a cautioner to that extent.

4. The discharge of the debtor from prison has been held an entire acquittance to the cautioner, it being impossible to estimate the effect that personal diligence may produce. But the creditor may depart from inchoated personal diligence without discharging the cautioner.²

5. If the creditor, without consent of the cautioner, accept of a composition from the principal debtor in discharge of the debt, so as to alter the cautioner's security or increase his risk, this will be an acquittance to the cautioner.³ At the same time, where the cautioner is himself insolvent, or when he has been called on and neglects to answer for [360] the debtor by paying the debt, and taking the principal debtor in his own hand, it is not to be expected that the creditor shall abstain from taking what he can get from the principal's estate, and a composition may be the most advantageous arrangement for paying off the debt. In such a case, the creditor may safely take the composition, after having given due notice to the cautioner, provided he reserve his recourse against the cautioner in so doing.⁴

6. To concur in accepting a composition under the Sequestration Act, without the consent of the cautioner, or at least without giving him an opportunity of dissenting where such concurrence has the effect of carrying through the composition, and rendering the discharge imperative on all the creditors, is a discharge to the cautioner. In one case a different doctrine would seem to be adopted.⁵ But when carefully examined, that case is an

¹ [By 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, sec. 9, it is enacted, that 'where two or more parties shall become bound as cautioners for any debtor, any discharge granted by the creditor in such debt or obligation to any one of such cautioners, without the consent of the other cautioners, shall be deemed and taken to be a discharge granted to all the cautioners; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to extend to the case of a cautioner consenting to the discharge of a co-cautioner who may have become bankrupt.' It would seem that, notwithstanding the generality of the words of the statute, they are only intended to apply to a gratuitous discharge or for an inadequate consideration. Therefore where, after action raised, a pursuer received from one of several co-cautioners his proportion of the sum secured, and discharged him both from the debt and the action, he was held entitled to obtain decree against the other cautioners, conjunctly and severally, for the balance. Church of England Insurance Co. v Wink, 1857, 19 D. 1079.]

² Ersk. iii. 3. 66. M'Millan v Hamilton, 1729, M. 3390. The creditor had apprehended the debtor on a caption, and kept him some days in the messenger's custody, but without incarceration. He afterwards set him at liberty. It was admitted that a creditor can pass from no consummated diligence or security, but contended that he may begin, without being obliged to complete, his diligence. The cautioner was held not to be liberated.

See ex parte Glendinning, Buck's Cases in Bankruptcy, 517; ex parte Gifford, 6 Ves. 809.

³ This is part of the doctrine already laid down, and the same authorities may be referred to. This doctrine was first applied in English cases by Lord Thurlow, after great consideration; as in the case ex parte Smith, 3 Brown 1. See also, decided by Lord Thurlow, ex parte Smith and others,

VOL. I.

Cook's B. L. p. 170; ex parte Gifford, 6 Ves. 805, by Lord Eldon. [Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 571.]

See Fleming v Wilson, 1823, 2 S. 336, N. E. 296. [British Linen Co. v Thomson, 1853, 15 D. 314.]

⁴ Smith v Ogilvy, 1821, 1 S. 169, N. E. 159; aff. 1 W. and S. 315. Innes and Smith were co-obligants for £1000 to Ogilvy. Smith was a cautioner, and the creditors were aware of this. Innes became bankrupt, and Smith, when called on, was unable to answer the demand. Innes proposed a private composition, and Smith was aware of this, and of Ogilvy's being requested to accede to it. They did accede at last, 'reserving recourse against Mr. Smith, cautioner.' Smith pleaded on this as a virtual discharge to him; but the Court held him bound, in respect the discharge was qualified, and under condition that the same shall not be effectual to Mr. Innes, in case the cautioners shall be liberated thereby. [As to the effect of an extrajudicial settlement in liberating cautioners, see Falconer v North of Scotland Banking Co., 1863, 1 Macph. 704.]

⁵ Whitelaw and Kirk v Steins, 20 May 1814, 17 Fac. Coll. 610. Certain persons having guaranteed a purchase by Small from Steins, both Small and they failed, and were sequestrated. Steins ranked on Small's estate, and also on that of Whitelaw and Kirk, the cautioners, for £1374. The cautioners offered a composition, which their creditors accepted, and Steins among others. They accordingly paid the first instalment, reserving their relief against Small. Small having also proposed a composition, Steins and their other creditors accepted it, and without Steins' concurrence it could not have passed. Then the cautioners pleaded an acquittance, in consequence of the creditors having accepted the composition. The Court, however, held them bound.

That case does not deny the general doctrine above laid authority only for this qualification of the general doctrine, that where the creditor makes a demand on the cautioner, and the cautioner either refuses or is unable to pay the debt and take his own relief, the creditor may follow such prudent measures as, in the circumstances of his debtor's affairs, may be advisable, without being held thereby to discharge the cautioner.

7. It follows, of course, that to take a composition which, without the creditor's concurrence, has under the Sequestration Act been voted and confirmed, is not a discharge to the cautioner.¹

8. Where several persons are bound for an annuity, it may be inferred perhaps, on the general principle, that the creditor will not be entitled to enter into a compromise for valuing the claim against the principal debtor without the consent of the cautioner.²

III. NEGLIGENCE AND IMPLIED DISCHARGE.—It is important to consider the creditor's [361] duty to the cautioners, and how far the neglect of measures proper or necessary for the common interest will furnish to cautioners a defence against liability. On the one hand, the creditor holds the direct power of compelling payment from the principal; and the neglect of obvious means of safety may be said to be a voluntary incurring of risk, which it is not equitable to lay on the cautioners. But, on the other hand, the cautioners are bound to look to the condition of the debtor for whom they interpose; and even without paying up the debt, which is always in their power, the law provides them with remedies, by inhibition, adjudication, or arrestment in security, to protect themselves against the insolvency of the debtor. Unless, therefore, there is something in the peculiar nature of the debt implying a particular course of diligence, as in the case of bills; or something confidential in the nature of the transaction, as in the case of cautionary obligations for the fidelity of a bank agent; or something of fraud, or collusion, or gross negligence approaching to dole, the creditor is not held chargeable to such a degree with the protection of the cautioners as to be under any special necessity of doing diligence,³ though, as already said, he cannot discharge his diligence when completed without freeing the cautioners.

1. It will not then be a sufficient answer to his claim on the cautioners, in the ordinary case, that by due diligence he might have recovered from the principal.

2. If, however, there is a particular privilege annexed to the debt, by which the creditor may have a preference over the debtor's funds, it would seem that it can no more be neglected with safety to the claim of recourse against cautioners, than a security which ought to have been available to the cautioners may be renounced or neglected. In loans, for example, by means of Exchequer bills, under particular statutes, or on bonds to the Excise or Customs, the person binding as co-obligant or surety has it in his power, on paying up the debt, to down, and which in England has received effect so often in cases of this description. Much of the weight of the decision appears to rest on the circumstance that, by the demand made against the cautioners, they had the opportunity of paying up the debt, and taking their remedy, which, if a cautioner does not or cannot do, he may be held as leaving the creditor to do what he can for his own benefit. The doctrine delivered by Lord Meadowbank does not appear to be guarded with all the care that the occasion required. The question was not, What were the motives which actuated the creditor in assenting to the discharge? but, Whether had he not by such assent cut off the relief of the cautioners? In the case then in question there was no alternative, at least none which the cautioner had it in his power to adopt; for, being a bankrupt, he could not pay the debt. Although, therefore, the judgment seems unimpeachable, the reasons of it, as delivered by that eminent judge, cannot be assented to without more consideration than seems to have been bestowed on them.

¹ [By 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 56, it is enacted, that 'where a creditor has an obligant bound to him along with the bankrupt for the whole or part of the debt, such obligant shall not be freed from his liability for such debt in respect of any vote given or dividend drawn by the creditor, or of his assenting to the discharge of the bankrupt, or to any composition; but such obligant may require and obtain, at his own expense, from such creditor an assignation to the debt, on payment of the amount thereof, and in virtue thereof enter a claim on the said estate, and vote and draw dividends, if otherwise entitled lawfully so to do.']

² [After the date of the sequestration, the creditor is not entitled to sue the cautioner, except for the ascertained value of the annuity and arrears previously due. 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 55.]

³ See Ersk. iii. 3. 66. [Morrison v Balfour, 1849, 11 D. 653; Smith v Campbell, 1829, 7 S. 789.]

secure a preference by writ of extent. If he neglect this till it be too late, and then come against other persons bound to him as cautioners or guarantees, they would seem to be entitled to defend themselves on the ground of virtual discharge.¹

3. It is not required that the creditor shall, in an ordinary money bond, or in a bargain on a certain term of credit, instantly enforce payment of the debt on the expiration of the term.² But where the creditor has by positive contract given time, the case is different from that of mere inactivity; it being by such contract put out of the power of the surety to have recourse against the principal in the same way in which he might otherwise have proceeded.³

4. It is a question of some difficulty, what shall be the effect of the creditor's neglect to take proper means of completing the security stipulated. An heritable bond, for example, if good, will be available to the cautioners, but may be rendered ineffectual by an error in completing the sasine on the titles. It seems to require a very special stipulation to prevent such a neglect from discharging the cautioners.⁴

¹ Morrison v Balfour, 1822, 1 S. 525, N. E. 484, was a case in which this defence seems to have been repelled on the ground that the sub-cautioners had absolutely bound themselves to pay up the whole sums at the four stated terms in the bond, 'and give you your name from the obligation.' By this obligation they may be held to have undertaken the active superintendence of the principal debtor, and the onus of preserving the privileged diligence for themselves.

² Fleming v Wilson, 1823, 2 S. 336, N. E. 296; Frazer v M'Turk, 1822, 1 S. 524, N. E. 488.

³ Samuell v Howarth, 1817, 3 Merivale 272. Where one selling goods on the suretyship of another, at the usual credit, either takes a bill which he renews, or on the expiration of the credit takes a bill at a renewed credit, the surety will be discharged. [See also Forsyth v Wishart, 1859, 21 D. 449; Warne & Co. v Lillie, 1867, 5 Macph. 283; Caledonian Bank v Kennedy's Trs., June 1870; Add. on Cont. 6th ed. 567; Sm. Merc. Law, 7th ed. 472.]

⁴ Fleming v Thomson, 1825, 4 S. 221, N. E. 224. Here the heritable security was rendered ineffectual by an error in completing it, and the Court appears to have held the cautioners liable only in virtue of the special terms of the contract. It is not therefore to be received as a decision weakening the doctrine of the text; and it was reversed in the House of Lords, 23d May 1826, 2 Wils. and Sh. 277.

[The Court of Session held that if the cautioner relied on the heritable security for his relief, it was his own affair to see that it was made perfect, and not the creditor's duty actually to look after the cautioner's security. This principle in the general case was quite sound, but the House of Lords went upon a specialty which the Court of Session overlooked; and although Professor More questions the judgment in the House of Lords (Lectures, i. 248), there is no doubt of its being right in reference to that specialty. Pothier, Oblig. sec. 521, has stated at once the general principle applicable to the ordinary relation between creditor and cautioner, and the exceptional principle which the House of Lords gave effect to, and has illustrated them by the distinction between the duty of the creditor to a cautioner and the duty of the mandator to a mandator pecuniæ credendæ in regard to the preservation of securities got from the debtor. A has lent a sum to B by order of C, and, by undertaking the mandate, has contracted a formal obligation towards C, his principal,—'de lui céder et de lui conserver l'action qu'il acquerroit par le prêt qu'il feroit en exécution du mandat. On ne peut pas dire de même à l'égard d'un fidéjusseur que le créancier ait contracté envers lui l'obligation de lui conserver et de lui céder ses actions: le cautionnement est un contrat unilatéral par lequel il n'y a que la caution qui s'oblige. Si le créancier est obligé de céder ses actions au fidéjusseur, ce n'est que la seule équité qui l'y oblige, parce qu'il n'a aucun intérêt de les refuser: mais il doit être obligé de les céder qu'autant qu'il les a, et telles qu'il les a: et on ne doit pas lui imputer, s'il ne les a pas conservés et s'il s'est mis hors d'état de les pouvoir céder.' And he ultimately comes to the conclusion that the exceptio cedendarum actionum can only be pleaded by a cautioner against a creditor when it has been by a positive act on the creditor's part that he has rendered himself unable to cede his actions against the debtor, by having discharged the debtor's person or property, or when there are circumstances indicating collusion between creditor and debtor. But a simple negligence on the creditor's part, if accompanied with no mala fides, cannot release the cautioner—(1) Because the creditor, being bound to cede his actions not by a contract with the cautioner, but solely by equity, is not under any precise obligation to conserve these actions for the cautioner, as a mandator is bound to do for his principal, and it is enough that he has kept good faith in the matter, and done nothing positive contrary to the interests of the cautioner; and (2) because the cautioner, who might have protected himself, has no right to complain of the creditor's negligence in not protecting him. In Fleming v Thomson, however, there was an express contract between the cautioner and the creditor, that if the cautioner paid the debt, the creditor would convey to him the security given by the debtor; and the cautioner was entitled in virtue of this formal contract to withhold performance of his obligation to pay, unless the creditor were prepared to implement his special counter-obligation to convey the security. It cannot therefore be laid down that the creditor is liable for any omission or negligence (if there is no mala fides) by which the benefit of securities held, or which might have been held by him, are not forthcoming to the cautioner, his obligation to assign being in the common case not an obligation by contract, but a duty of pure benevolence. The distinction has not been sufficiently kept in view in some of the subsequent cases.]

SUBSECTION II.—OF CAUTIONARY OBLIGATIONS FOR THE FAITHFUL PERFORMANCE OF AN OFFICE; AS BANK AGENT, MESSENGER, NOTARY, ETC.

[362] Cautionary engagements are frequently undertaken prospectively, for the faithful performance of an office; or for payment of such sums as, in the course of the intromission with or administration of a particular estate, or the exercise of the duties of a place of trust, may become due.

I.—CAUTIONER FOR A BANK AGENT.

The national banks, and also some private bankers, have branches established in provincial towns, the business of which is carried on by agents or factors. This is a trust of great delicacy, and in the administration of which the temptation to take undue advantages is often too great to be resisted. The great classes of transactions in which there is hazard, are: the taking of money on deposit, the lending of money on bills, and the making of advances on bank credits or cash accounts.

1. The agent commonly is entrusted with the power of taking money in deposit for the bank, which is perhaps the most dangerous power of all to the bank, and which is the least under check.

2. He is also entrusted with the power of discounting bills and lending money on notes; he himself, however, being responsible to the bank for the bills so discounted, or the notes so taken. In this respect he resembles a factor with a del credere commission; the bills so discounted belonging to the bank, while the agent is indebted for the balance, including the dishonoured bills.

3. The power of granting cash-credits is generally reserved to be exercised by the directors of the bank themselves, the advances being afterwards made by the agent without any personal responsibility or risk.

The checks interposed on the agent's fidelity consist: 1. Of regular weekly statements transmitted to the head office, showing the discounts and advances, and accompanied by the bills themselves; 2. Of check officers, as tellers and accountants, named by the bank, by whom regular balances ought to be made of their books, and reports transmitted; and, 3. Of occasional and unlooked-for visitations and examinations of the vouchers, and of the state of cash in the strong-box. The cautioners who engage for the balance that may arise in these perilous transactions naturally trust to those checks in a great measure, as at once a protection to the bank and to them. And the delicacy of interfering with bank transactions seems to subject the cautioners still more to a dependence on the vigilance which the bank itself ought to exert in keeping their agents to a strict and rigid accounting. On this ground, some very distressing questions have lately arisen on the sudden failure of bank agents, where demands have been made on their cautioners for enormous sums, as the result of a scrutiny into the agent's accounts for many years back. How this question is to be determined in the various cases which such situations present, or what degree of neglect on the part of the bank will bar their claim against the cautioners, is not yet correctly settled, although several cases have lately been determined on the subject.

There is a very obvious difference between the guarantee of a debt to be paid at once, and an engagement of this prospective nature, in which the cautioner is neither entitled, by [363] paying up the sum engaged for, to discharge his obligation, and take the debtor in his own hand; nor at liberty to take precautions, or interpose, for his own security, checks that may have the effect of impeding the operations of the bank, or impeaching the credit of their agent. The bank, in taking security from their agent, is not understood so much to contemplate their protection against those irregularities which they have it in their power to check, as those frauds which elude detection, and those perils against which the del credere guarantee is directed. The cautioners, on their part, trust to the bank protecting themselves by vigilance, and by the observance of the ordinary regular precautions. It seems to result from these considerations, that the bank, though protected as by a del credere guarantee against the insolvency of customers, and also against the frauds and peculations and irregularities of the agent, when not encouraged or connived at, will not be entitled to relief of sums allowed to accumulate by long-continued irregularities, and the neglect of the ordinary and regular course of accounting.¹ Where, for example, the weekly or regular accountings, or bill lists of an agent, are neglected to be transmitted, or permitted to be sent full of obvious errors; where his accounts are not checked; where he is permitted to go on with a series of transactions, augmenting continually a balance which ought to have been kept down; the bank will scarcely be allowed to take recourse against the cautioners.² But this must have its limits; for cases may easily be imagined where the agent has so exercised his lawful powers as to incur, in unfavourable times, a responsibility which cannot at once be rectified, which it is the interest of all parties gradually to reduce, and which the bank cannot suddenly check, or take public notice of, without doing incalculable mischief. And certainly it cannot be said that cautioners are entitled to require a bank, on the occurrence of every difficulty or embarrassment in the conduct of the agency, to correspond with them; or at once to wind up the responsibilities and dealings of the agent, and stop the operations of such delicate machinery.³

Bonds given on those occasions are made to indemnify the bank against past as well as against future loss. It is therefore important to observe, that wherever the bank, in requiring caution, have concealed the real state of affairs, it will afford a fair ground of exception against their availing themselves of the bond to cover their past loss. If, for example, a bank have begun to doubt the regularity of their agent's transactions, and, on occasion of the death of cautioners, require additional security for his continuing in office, holding him out as a trustworthy person, without explaining to the cautioners that there already stands a great balance against him, which secretly they intend the cautioner [364] to undertake, the cautioner seems to have a good exception to their action, in so far as grounded on the balance due at the requisition.⁴

¹ In the House of Lords, in Smith v Bank of Scotland, Lord Redesdale mentioned a case before him in Ireland, where a banking company had trusted their clerk too far, and had not called him to account in the ordinary regular manner. He became indebted to them in a large sum, which he was unable to pay, and they called on his sureties. They contended that the bank had not acted fairly by them, in not calling on the clerk to account in the ordinary manner, which, if they had done, the deficit would have been much smaller, and perhaps the misconduct would never have occurred. Lord Redesdale remarked that the principal ought to call on the agent to account in the ordinary regular course of business, and that it certainly was not acting altogether fairly by the surety to be negligent in this respect. On this opinion the case appears to have been settled. 1 Dow 296.

² Yet this plea was rejected in an early case. It would probably not be held a precedent now to be followed. British Linen Co. v Nisbet, 1773, 5 Brown's Sup. 409. [Leith Bank v Bell, 5 W. and S. 703, affirming 8 S. 721; British Guarantee Co. v Western Bank, 15 D. 834.]

³ Thomson v Bank of Scotland, 1822, 1 S. 275. In 1808 a bond of caution was granted for the faithful administration of a bank agent, limited to £10,000. In 1811 additional security by heritable bond was taken, when the responsibility of the agent was at £40,000; and also a note for that sum, reserving other sureties. The agency closed in 1812, and the cautioners were charged to pay their £10,000. The chief defence was rested on the bank having permitted the agent grossly to misconduct the business, to give extravagant accommodations, and in particular large discounts to a house connected with the agent in trade. The Court of Session held the cautioners liable. But the judgment was reversed in the House of Lords. 2 Sh. App. Ca. 316.

⁴ No case has been determined of this precise nature. But in the House of Lords, in the case of Smith v the Bank of Scotland, a case was mentioned at the bar and on the bench which illustrates it.

Sir Samuel Romilly mentioned at the bar Fishmongers' Co. v Maltby. Maltby was a clerk of the company, with several sureties. Some of them died, and he was required to renew the suretyship. The company coming to be dissatisfied with his conduct, directed an inquiry into the state of his accounts, and found that he was indebted to them in a very considerable sum, which had been increasing from year to year, and at last became greater than was likely to be paid. Before settling accounts with him, they required new sureties, and a bond was executed accordingly. Immediately afterwards Maltby was removed. The case was before the Lord Chancellor on a motion; and the light in which it appeared to him was this: 'That if he knew himself to be cheated by an agent, and, concealing that fact, applied for surety in such a manner and under such circumstances as held him out to

A stipulation is generally contained in such bonds, by which a stated account, made out from the books of the bank, and signed by the accountant (or other officer), shall be sufficient to constitute and ascertain a balance, to the effect of authorizing a charge and other diligence. This fixes the amount of the claim for which the bank is entitled to do diligence against the cautioners,¹ or to rank on the estates of the several co-obligants, principal and cautioners.

But such a stipulation in the bond does not preclude the cautioners from requiring to see the particulars of the account as appearing in the books.² They will be entitled to this inquiry even in the way of suspension, if any good ground can be shown for refusing summary execution on the bond; and when a claim comes to be entered in bankruptcy, the bank may in the same way be called on to exhibit a copy of the account.

It is also sometimes stipulated that no suspension shall be competent of a charge on such an account, unless upon consignment of the balance. This, however, is not a legitimate or effectual stipulation.³

The bond generally provides that the co-obligants shall be chargeable with interest on the balance appearing on the stated account, from the time that the demand is made. Where no such provision is made, interest seems to be due from the date of the balance being ascertained, and a demand made for payment; for from that time the sum exists as a debt due by the principal, which the cautioners may discharge.⁴

II.—CAUTIONER FOR A MESSENGER.

The cautioners for a messenger are taken bound 'for the damage, interest, and expenses which the lieges shall sustain through the negligence, fraudulent or informal execution of the [365] messenger.'⁵ This is a very great responsibility, considering the infinite delicacy and importance of the acts which a messenger has to perform; that it protects both the employer and the person against whom the diligence may be erroneously executed; and that it extends to all acts of usurpation and injury to which the messenger is admitted by means of the diligence.⁶ (See below, p. 385, note 2.)

The claim against a messenger or his cautioners is to be constituted by a decree of the proper court, ascertaining the damage, and decerning for the amount. It is held, 1. That the cautioners are liable only for what the messenger does, or neglects to do, in his proper office of messenger; not in the office of agent, in which occasionally a messenger is employed in combination with his ministerial duties.⁷ 2. That the messenger, as such, has no discre-others as one whom he considered as a trustworthy person, and any one, acting under the impression that the agent was so considered by his employer, had become bound for him, it appeared to him that he could not conscientiously hold that security. He was accordingly of opinion that the Fishmongers' Co. could not hold their security.' On this opinion the case was settled. And Lord Eldon said, in Smith's case, that 'he had since reconsidered the matter, and still retained his former opinion, and would act upon it judicially if occasion offered.' 1 Dow 294.

[See, on the subject of concealment, Railton v Matthews, 3 Bell's App. 56, reversing 6 D. 536; Royal Bank v Ranken, 6 D. 1418; Hamilton v Watson, 4 Bell 67, affirming 5 D. 280; Swan v Bank of Scotland, 9 D. 1062.]

¹ Fisher v Stewart, 1824, 2 S. 695, N. E. 583, 3 S. 426, 7 S. 97. The objection stated was, that there was no authority in the registration clause to register the account, so as to be a ground of charge. The cautioner's bill of suspension was refused.

² Bank of Scotland v Frazer's Cautioners, Winter Session

1818. Lord Alloway authorized an inquiry into the accounts of a bank agent, where the balance, as ascertained in the stated account, was given as the result of a scrutiny for many years back. The case was settled on the result of the investigation. [As to the cautioner's right to withdraw, see Taylor & Wright v Adie, 1818, Hume 114.]

³ Forrester v Walker and Hunt, 27 June 1815, F. C. The case was very deliberately considered, and in the report of it in the Faculty Collection the opinions of the judges are fully given. 18 Fac. Coll. 467.

⁴ See below, p. 384, General Rules of Responsibility.

⁵ This is the form of the bond used in the Lyon Office, in compliance with the Act 1587, c. 46.

⁶ Kennedy v M'Kinnon, 1821, 1 S. 210, N. E. 190. The messenger in arresting a ship removed the pump, took possession of the ship abandoned by the crew, and in attempting to navigate her, run her on shore and lost her. The cautioners were held liable.

⁷ Welsh v M'Veagh, 1781, M. 8893, Hailes 876, where the messenger, instead of pointing the debtor's effects, re-tionary power. 3. That it is not enough to characterize his employment as that of agent, that he is addressed as 'writer.'¹ 4. That the cautioners are liable not merely to the employer of the messenger, but to those against whom he has committed any fault.² 5. That, in estimating the damage arising from neglect, the creditor is not bound to show his loss; the law presuming that the damage arising from the non-execution of diligence is the amount of the debt.³ 6. That where the diligence to be executed is personal, which operates indirectly, this presumption is absolute, and not to be overcome by proving the desperate circumstances of the debtor, and the hopelessness of recovering the debt;⁴ nay, even where the diligence is direct (as poinding), the Court does not admit any evidence to show speculatively that this diligence would probably not have produced payment;⁵ although clear evidence of the impossibility of deriving payment from such diligence must undoubtedly be received as a sufficient defence; as, for example, where an arrestment is blundered, and it turns out that on a balance of accounts there are no funds in the hands of the arrestee.

III.—CAUTIONER FOR A NOTARY.

Notaries, before they are admitted to the exercise of their office, find surety for [366] the faithful exercise of their function;⁶ and questions on the negligence or irregularity of their proceedings must be determined on the same principles which regulate the case of a messenger.

1. It is no defence against the cautioner's responsibility, that the act has proceeded from want of skill, and that the legitimate provision against that is the examination before admission.

2. It is not necessary to make out a case of fraud or dole; the cautioner will be liable also for error or neglect.

3. It has been held that the cautioner for a notary is not responsible for errors or neglects in the exercise of the office of town-clerk, which is separate from that of a notary. And, ceived them from him and sold them by public auction, and applied the proceeds to his own purposes. His cautioners were held not liable for the money allowed to come into his hands, as his malversation was in the character of agent.

In Hamilton v Frazer, 14 Feb. 1817, 19 Fac. Coll. 291, the action not being against the cautioners, there was no occasion to discriminate correctly between the character of agent and messenger; but the defender was found liable for the misconduct of another messenger to whom he sent the diligence to be executed. As argued by the pursuer, this must have been on the ground of an agent's responsibility. But the expression used by the Court leaves it doubtful whether he was not held liable as messenger.

¹ Wilson & Co. v Snody, 31 Jan. 1817, 19 Fac. Coll. 268. Here the messenger was held as acting in that official capacity, and not with the discretionary power of an agent, although the letter sending the diligence was addressed 'Mr. N. Snody, writer.'

² Grant v Forbes, 1758, M. 2081; aff. 7 March 1759. This case was confirmed in Kennedy v M'Kinnon, supra, p. 382, note 6. [See Stewart v Lowrie, 1813, Hume 100.]

³ Chatto v Marshall, 17 Jan. 1811, F. C. [Glen v Black, 1841, 4 D. 36.]

⁴ The same rule is followed here as in the escape of a prisoner, where, without inquiring into probabilities, the magistrates are subjected for the whole debt. Dean v Magistrates of Ayr, 1803, M. 11765; Affleck v Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, 17 June 1803, n. r.

⁵ Chatto v Marshall, 17 Jan. 1811, 16 Fac. Coll. 121. In this case, the claim against the cautioner was for the messenger's neglect to execute a poinding. It was stated: 1. That a writ of extent had been issued, which must have defeated the poinding; and, 2. That the debtor could have been made bankrupt, so as to defeat the poinding, by means of the pari passu preference. But as it was not shown to be absolutely impossible that the poinding could have been effectual, the Court adhered to the general rule, and the creditor recovered what he never would in any other way have realized. See Lord President Blair's opinion, when the case was first decided.

⁶ The words are: 'The said A (the notary), and B as cautioner for him, hereby enact, and bind and oblige them jointly and severally, and their heirs, executors, and successors, for the said A, his honest and faithful administration of his office, conform to law, under the pain of deprivation and such other punishment, etc., and such fine to be paid by him and his said cautioner as the said Lords shall think fit, and to satisfy and pay to every person prejudged by his maladministration such damages as the said Lords shall modify.'

4. It rather appears, that when a writer sends a sasine, etc., to a notary to be executed, already written out, but erroneous, the notary will not be liable, nor his cautioners responsible for the errors into which he is thus betrayed.¹

IV.—GENERAL RULES OF RESPONSIBILITY BY CAUTIONERS FOR DUTIES OF OFFICE.

Without particularizing other offices, for the administration of which this precaution of suretyship may be necessary, it may be sufficient to observe,—

1. That it will depend much on the expression of the bond, whether it is to be extended to prior as well as to future intromissions.

2. That where the sureties are bound generally for the intromissions or faithful administration of the principal, and subjoin a limitation of their responsibility to a certain sum, should the balance due on his intromissions happen to exceed the sum limited in the cautionary obligation, the engagement of the cautioners is held to be a security for that balance, after applying in extinction of the debt whatever the estate of the principal may afford in the way of dividend. The cautioners are not therefore entitled to require that such dividend from the principal's estate should be rateably applied in extinction of their engagement: the creditor is entitled to apply it in payment pro tanto, leaving the engagement of the cautioners as his last resource. As, for example, if caution has been given to the extent of £500 for the intromissions of a trustee, and he fails with a balance of £1000 against him; the creditor, after receiving a dividend from his estate of 10s. in the pound, would still be entitled to demand from the cautioners the £500 which they had guaranteed.² This, it will be observed, is different from the case of advances made beyond a sum limited in a cash-[367] credit. There an engagement is tacitly undertaken to give no enlargement of the credit but on the footing of a common creditor; and so the cautioners will be entitled to an equality with the creditor. But in stipulating responsibility for a bank agent, the presumption is, that the surety is to answer for a deficiency which cannot in the nature of things be limited.

3. That if no special stipulation is made as to the evidence by which the balance is to be struck and ascertained, it must be constituted by an action on the account between the officer and his principal, or those to whom he is accountable; or by a claim in bankruptcy, accompanied by the account and vouchers.

4. That the demand against the officer's estate for the balance is a mere personal debt, on which no preference can be claimed, unless in so far as the funds entrusted to him can be identified as part of the trust-estate; in which case they may be vindicated from the fund divisible among his other creditors.

5. That cautioners having once engaged for an officer's fidelity, cannot suddenly withdraw from that responsibility, to the effect of throwing the affairs entrusted to the officer into confusion. For example, the cautioners for a bank agent cannot, on a sudden, stop the whole operations of the bank, by withdrawing. But they may withdraw, by giving notice of their resolution so to do, after a reasonable time allowed for a new arrangement.

¹ Stevenson v Tweddale, 16 May 1818, Hume 111.

² Maxton v M'Intosh's Crs., 1777, M. App. Cautioner, No. 1, 5 Brown's Sup. 408. The Perth Bank employed Ferguson as their agent at Edinburgh, on a cautionary bond being granted by four friends, 'that he should faithfully account for and pay what balance shall be due by him to the creditors; or failing thereof, that the cautioners should rateably, according to the sums for which they were respectively bound, pay the said balance.' Ferguson failed, indebted to the bank in £5000, and the bank received a dividend of £1200. They then brought an action against the cautioners for £1000 each.

They pleaded their right to have a communication of the dividend. The Court held the cautioners bound that Ferguson should account indefinitely, and that a taxation of this to £1000 each no doubt freed them from paying ultra, but did not entitle them to any share of Ferguson's effects till the bank was totally paid.

Borthwick (East Lothian Bank) v Balfour & Gibson, 29 Jan. 1819, 19 Fac. Coll. 641. In this case the same question was raised as in Maxton's case. Lord Pitmilley decided it on the very same principles, and the Court adhered. Affirmed, 1 Sh. App. Ca. 131.

6. That, notwithstanding the death of the cautioner, the engagement still subsists against his representative as cautioner, unless he shall by a similar notice terminate his obligation.¹ And,

7. It has been held (but the question is full of doubt) that the bankruptcy of the cautioner annihilates the bond, so that it cannot revive, but requires to be renewed.²

SUBSECTION III.—OF CAUTIONARY OBLIGATION FOR A CASH-CREDIT WITH A BANK.

The use of credits with bankers, or merchants having a great command of capital, has in all trading countries been productive of great advantages, by enabling dealers without imprudence to extend their trade further than they otherwise could do. The operations on such credits are carried on in various ways; by the discounting of bills, or by drafts or checks on the banker, as if he held money of the dealer.

The trade of Scotland has been fostered by a peculiar sort of cash account or bank credit, which, from the time of their first institution, the Scottish banks have been accustomed to open with their customers, and which have produced great benefit in all branches of trade and manufactures. A cash-credit of this description is an undertaking on the part of a bank to advance to an individual, or to a partnership, such sums of money as may from time to time be required, not exceeding on the whole a certain definite amount, to be repaid, and a continual circulation kept up by the replacing in the bank of small profits [368] and sums as they come in. The security upon which the advances are made is a bond with sureties, generally two in number, for the repayment on demand of the sums actually advanced, with interest upon each issue from the day on which it is made; interest at a lower rate being allowed by the banker for the sums paid into the bank. And the credit is continued as long as the bank finds its advantage in doing so, and while the person having the credit proceeds with a circulating capital to a certain proportion beyond the amount of the credit. The security on which such credits are given may be either that of heritable property or personal suretyship. In the application of heritable securities to this purpose, there was formerly danger, both at common law and under the provision of the bankrupt law, against the granting of securities for debts to be afterwards contracted. And although those dangers have now been removed,³ bankers decline heritable security, and rather wish to have the personal credit pledged to them of such sureties or cautioners as will immediately answer a demand when made.

The form of the bond is that of a joint and several obligation by the principal and his sureties, as co-obligants; the principal being no otherwise distinguished in the bond than as the person in whose name the account is to be kept, and who, by his draft and orders, is to operate on the credit to the extent of the obligation. In this way the parties evade the septennial limitation of the Act 1695, c. 5.⁴ The nature of the operations or transactions by which the principal is to take advantage of the credit, and which the banker is entitled to comprehend within the cover of the bond, is usually defined by an enumeration in the bond of all sorts of cash transactions which can occur in daily practice.⁵ The credit is limited

¹ See University of Glasgow v Sir W. Miller, 1790, M. 2106, Bell's Cases 140, Hailes 1091.

² Hibbert v Mann, 1818, so determined by Lord Alloway in the Outer House, where the cautioners of a messenger had failed and been discharged, and had again become rich, his bond remaining all the time in the Lyon Office, and appearing, on occasion of a subsequent malversation by the messenger, to be the sole cautionary obligation for his fidelity.

³ Of this hereafter, in Book IV. [See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 7.]

⁴ See above, p. 374 et seq.

VOL. I.

⁵ The parties bind themselves, jointly and severally, as co-obligants and full debtors to the bank, 'for the sum of £ , or such sum as the said A shall value for, or be due to the bank, by orders or drafts on the cashier, or by receipts to him, or by letters addressed to him, or by accepted, endorsed, or discounted bills, promissory notes, letters of credit, guarantees, or in any other manner of way.' 'And it is hereby declared, that an account made out from the books of the bank, and subscribed by the accountant, shall be held fully to liquidate and ascertain the balance due, and for which a charge may proceed,' etc.

to a precise amount; the balance at any time due, to be ascertained by a signed or certified account from the cashier.¹

Correctly proceeding under the bond, the banker ought to enter regularly as articles in the cash account, every bill or note discounted which it is his intention to cover by the security. But it appears to be more convenient for all parties, on the one hand, that the cash-credit shall not be held as operated upon, and perhaps exhausted, by every bill transaction, however high in credit the parties whose names are on the bills may stand; and, on the other hand, to give the banker a right of throwing into one general account at the ultimate settlement of the balance, all the responsibilities of the holder of the credit. When the question was first raised, it was greatly doubted whether bills could be introduced under such a bond of credit, to be covered by the responsibility of the cautioners, if not originally entered in the account, though perhaps discounted for other persons than the holder of the account. And it appeared to be a practice of reprehensible looseness in bankers, to introduce subsequently into the account opened under the bond of credit, all the bills and responsibilities of the holder of the credit, however unconnected in their origin with the credit of the cautioners. There could be no doubt that a bond expressed as above (or even more generally expressed) was, strictly speaking, capable of comprehending such transactions; but it was thought that where the banker, at the time of making the discount or entering into the transaction, did not place it to the debit of the cash account, or where it was not truly a cash transaction for the benefit of the holder of the account, it ought to be held that the transaction was not on the credit of the names in the bond, and that the discount [369] of a bill should be held as a purchase merely of the obligations which that document carries with it,—a separate transaction made on the faith and credit of the bill alone. It was said to be the proper way of entering a bill discounted for the person who holds the credit, when intended to be under the bond, to make it at the time an article in the account, exhausting pro tanto the credit; or at least to enter it short in the account, leaving its fate as affecting the balance to be determined by the event. But other views have prevailed. The terms of the bond were found to have been carefully devised to avoid this construction, and with a view to give to bankers the privilege of bringing under the security bond the whole of their customer's responsibilities. Accordingly, the Court held that the cautioners were liable for the specified amount of the credit, comprehending in the balance, bills, notes, and engagements which were not at the time specifically brought into the account, or directly taken on the security of the bond.²

The general rules of the creditor's obligation to sureties apply to such a case. The bank will not be held bound to do diligence against the holder of the credit. But, on the other hand, they will not be entitled to renounce any security which they hold. They will not be bound to discuss the parties to bills, but will not be entitled to include under the account bills which they have failed duly to negotiate.³ They will be fully entitled to renew

¹ See, as to the effect of this, above, p. 382.

² Liddell v Sir W. Forbes & Co., July 1820. A credit of £1000 was given to Sibbald & Co., on a bond by W. Sibbald and J. Liddell in the terms above (p. 385). The credit being nearly exhausted, a bill for £5000 at twelve months by W. Sibbald was lodged and accepted to Sibbald & Co. as 'to your credit when paid.' On Sibbald & Co.'s failure the cash account showed a small balance in their favour; but two bills discounted and then current, but not entered in the account, having been dishonoured, were brought into the account, turning the balance in favour of the bank, and a demand was made on the cautioners. Liddell pleaded: 1. The bills not being discounted under the credit, or entered in the cash account at the time, cannot affect the balance; 2. If liable, he is in relief entitled to the collateral security of the £5000 bill. Lord Alloway repelled both pleas, holding: 1. That the bond covered these bills, and that their eventual dishonour altered the balance as it stood at the bankruptcy; and, 2. That the bill of £5000 was merely a source of additional credit beyond the cash account, and not intended as any additional security for that cash account; and that the whole balance was below the sum in the bond. The responsibility was accordingly divided as under the bond; and this judgment was adhered to by the Court. [British Linen Co. Bank v Thomson, 15 D. 314. Bill for £1500 deposited in security of cash-credit bond. Held that obligants not liable unless there were a balance due by the debtor at the time the bill arrived at maturity.]

³ [See Swan v Bank of Scotland, 1839, 2 D. 78.]

bills, and give time both to the holder of the credit, and to those who in the course of his discounts come to be collaterally bound to them; for the very purpose of the credit is to enable the bank to give every facility that may be useful to those who hold this accommodation, looking at last to the guarantees of his mercantile credit.

The bank will be bound to assign to the cautioners such obligations as they have brought into the account; under this qualification, that if the balance due to the bank exceed the sum secured by the bond, the banker will not be required to give up bills or other securities on which advances have been made, unless they have at the time of the transaction been introduced into the cash account, and discounted expressly on the credit of the cautioners. It has been held that they cannot demand the benefit of collateral securities, as long-dated bills, lodged as a fund of credit.¹ But this is very questionable; and the case seems rather to fall under the rule already explained, pp. 370, 371.²

The cautioners in cash accounts may put an end to their responsibility when they please, by giving notice to the bank, and to the person in whose name the account is kept. The former is the essential notice. But the death of the cautioner does not discharge his bond: the bond binds the parties, their heirs and successors; and it still subsists against representatives, not merely for the debt as it stood at the cautioner's death, but prospectively, as if they were the original obligants for what may become due under the credit till the recall of the responsibility.³ Notice ought to be given to the representative of the [370] obligation: for as it happens in most cases that the heir has no means of knowing that such engagements have been undertaken by his predecessor, the hardship may be very great of a sudden and unforeseen demand in consequence of such an undertaking; and although it cannot be said that such notice is necessary to continue the responsibility,⁴ a court will examine very strictly into the equities of a claim in which this has been neglected.

